Concerning this

TRANSLATION.

WHEN I first undertook to Reviſe this following Tranſlation, I had no Thoughts of having my Name made ſo publick as it has been ſince upon this Occaſion. Few Men, I ſuppoſe, will aſcribe it to Vanity or Ambition, ſince the French Language is ſo very common among us, that it is not thought a part of Learning to underſtand it: For though Tranſlating is not always the eaſieſt Employment in which a man may be buſied, yet the Opinions of Men, by which moſt things receive their Eſtimate, have ſet ſo much an higher Value upon Original Productions, than upon any, even the exacteſt Copies, that it is no Wonder if that has been for the moſt part concealed, which, when divulged, would have brought ſo little Credit.

But I am ſenſible that Apologies are tedious Things to thoſe who are abſolutely unconcerned: And it will be rather expected that I ſhould acquaint the World with what they ſhall find in this Tranſlation, than either why it was Reviſed by me, after the ſeveral Tranſlators had finiſhed their Parts; or why the Notice of its future Publication ſeemed to have been immediately given by my Order. And here indeed I ought to ſay, that the Book it ſelf, with which the Engliſh Reader is preſented, is a very valuable One. The Doctrines and Practices of the Primitive Church are repreſented with ſo much Candour and Sincerity, that thoſe who are unacquainted with the Writings of the Fathers, need not fear being impoſed upon. Our Author is indeed of the Communion of the Church of Rome, and accordingly he does not (as indeed he durſt not) any where conceal his own Opinion; but yet, as long as he never ſuffers the Sorboniſt to break in upon the Hiſtorian, his Writings carry an Authority with them, greater than they could have done had they come from a Proteſtant. Truth, I confeſs, is the ſame, whoever ſpeaks it; yet all Men grant, that it carries a more Convictive Force along with it, when extorted from thoſe whoſe Ingenuity over-bears their Intereſt, than when it freely comes from Men that advance their Cauſe by telling it.

For this Reaſon I have taken as much Care as I could, that Monſieur Du Pin's Sence ſhould be exactly preſerved; and therefore, when he cites Authors, whom, for Form ſake, he was obliged to call Hereticks, if they are not named with Applauſe, it is not to be wonder'd at.

In ſome few places I have thought fit to interpoſe: But leſt that might occaſion any Confuſion, the Paragraphs are all incloſed in Hooks; which will plainly diſtinguiſh whatever I ſay, from my Author's Words.

The great Uſe of Books of this kind is, to form an Idea in the Minds of thoſe that read them, of that unaffected Piety and Zeal which inſpired the Primitive Chriſtians, and which at laſt ſubdued the whole Roman Empire, and made its Advertiſement concerning this Tranſlation.

Princes follow the Banner of the Croſs of Chriſt with Joy and Pleaſure. What a Thing that was, can be but imperfectly conceived from the Writings, and, God knows! much more imperfectly from the Practices of this degenerate Age. The Abridgments of the Books of theſe firſt Chriſtians will be much more effectual to this Purpoſe, than a bare dry Hiſtory could poſſibly have been; for they wrote about Things that their Hearts were full of: And Men who are at all Times ready to lay down their Lives in Defence of any Cauſe, will produce warmer and more moving Arguments to awaken their drowzy Brethren, than can poſſibly come from others that are leſs concerned, becauſe in much leſs Danger.

If therefore the Reading of theſe Papers ſhall be a Means to incite thoſe that are able, to draw from the Fountains in larger Quantities, having found theſe ſmall Streams ſufficiently inviting; and thoſe that muſt take what they read upon Truſt, to endeavour to live up to theſe great Patterns which are here propoſed to their Imitation, I ſhall have my End; and ſhall think the Pains which I have taken in this Work, not only very well beſtowed, but my ſelf abundantly rewarded.

THE

THE

OF THE

Doctors of the Sorbonne.

THE whole World has ſo openly declared the Eſteem which they think due to the New Hiſtory of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that we could not but be ſenſible of the Complaiſance ſhewn to us, ſince the Judgment we had formed of it was followed, ſupported and authoriz'd by that of the Publick. It belongs to none but great Men to undertake and execute great Things. The Title of this Work, as plain as it is, preſents to the Mind, the Idea of a Deſign equally vaſt and difficult; and every one muſt think, that whoever would fulfil it with Praiſe, muſt have a Learning ſo extenſive, as to take in all Ages; a Judgment ſo exact, as can neither fall into Error it ſelf, or impoſe upon the Credulity of others; an Application ſo aſſiduous, as no Obſtacle can ſtop or ſuſpend; and laſtly, ſo ardent a Zeal for the Publick, that he believes he ought to render it an Account of all his Time, and that he is only paying a Debt when he makes it a Preſent of infinite Wealth, which he might have reſerved for his own private Uſe. Thoſe that have read the four firſt Centuries of this Hiſtory, have ſeen with Pleaſure, that our Author has fully anſwered this grand Idea; they have remarked in him with us, a Knowledge ſo univerſal, as comprehends all ſorts of Subjects; a Penetration ſo profound, as unravels the moſt intricate Difficulties; ſo great a Juſtneſs of Thought and fixt Senſe of Truth, as never receives from others, or gives it it ſelf a falſe Turn; ſo conſtant an Aſſiduity in reading and writing, that his Works ſucceed each other with ſuch Life, that they every Day riſe in their Strength and Beauty; ſo ſincere a Deſire to be uſeful to others, that they ſee him profuſely beſtow them in an Hour, the Fruit of Years; and not content with that, look only on the Preſent he now makes as an Engagement to continue his Bounties: And we are all fully perſuaded that this Work will be like thoſe mighty Floods, which taking their Riſe from a noble Source at firſt, increaſe every Day in their Current; and the more Kingdoms they flow through, rowl their majeſtick Waves with the greater Pomp and Impetuoſity. This fifth Century contains an Abridgment of the moſt important Things in the Writings of St. Chryſoſtome, St. Jerome and St. Auguſtine, and other great Men of that Time: All thoſe that have already read them, will here find what will recall to their Memory many things they may have forgotten, and will ſee with Pleaſure, that our Author has reduced their Doctrines to certain Principles, by which they ſhew their Solidity and Coherence; thoſe who wiſh to read them will here meet with what will ſave them much Time and Trouble; and thoſe that are engaged in that long and weariſome Journey, will at leaſt have the Advantage of a faithful and experienced Guide, who will lead them only through Paths equally ſafe and known. Both the one and the other will meet with a Piece of Criticiſm, which always clear, prudent and upright; distinguishes what is certain, from that which is false or doubtful; never precipitates the Judgment, nor lays down simple Conjectures in Place of demonstrative Proofs; gives to every thing what it merits, purely on its own Account; and the better to attend to Reason, banishes all Prejudices, and looks at nothing in its search after Truth but Truth it self; nor condemns, only where it cannot excuse. Nor do we doubt but they will join with us to engage the Author to give us in the next Tome, that great Number of Writers of the fifth Century which he could not speak of here.

This Approbation is prefixt to the firſt Part of the Fifth Century in the original Paris Edition.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

PART I.

The Reaſon of the Title. An Account of thoſe Authors that have written upon the ſame Subject. A general View of the Deſign of this Work.

THE Name of Bibliotheca, or Library, is not only given to thoſe Places that contain great Numbers of Books; but alſo to Collections that have been made by ſeveral Authors, and to thoſe Books that treat of their Works. Thus Collections of the Works of ſeveral Fathers, are called Bibliothecæ Patrum: A General Hiſtory drawn out of vaſt Numbers of Hiſtorians, ſuch as Diodorus Siculus's Bibliotheca Hiſtorica: A Book that treats of the Sacred Volumes of Scripture, ſuch as Sixtus Senenſis's Bibliotheca Sancta, or rather, Bibliotheca Sacrorum Codicum: A Treatiſe upon thoſe Authors who have written concerning Matters of Religion, as this of ours is, Bibliotheca Authorum Eccleſiaſticorum: And, in ſhort, any Book that ſpeaks indifferently of all ſorts of Authors, and Writings, compoſed upon different Occaſions, may be called a Bibliotheca.

This is not the firſt time that ſuch ſort of Libraries have been made. Apollodorus, an Athenian, a moſt learned Grammarian, that lived under the Reign of Ptolomæus Euergetes, Two Hundred and Forty Years, or thereabouts, before the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, compoſed a Bibliotheca of the Original of the Gods; that is to ſay, of the moſt ancient Hiſtory, as it lies diſguiſed under Fictions and Fables. In imitation of him, Diodorus Siculus, that lived in Auguſtus's Time, compoſed a Bibliotheca of General Hiſtory; which was taken out of an infinite Number of Authors. To theſe, we muſt join thoſe Authors that have written the Lives of Illuſtrious Perſons; ſuch as Hermippus, Antigonus, Satyrus, Heraclides, Ariſtoxenus, and Diogenes Laertius, amongſt the Greeks; and amongſt the Latins, Varro, Tully, Nepos, Santra, Hyginus, and Suetonius; who have compoſed the Lives of the Philoſophers, and other Authors.

To deſcend now to thoſe Chriſtians that have made Catalogues of their own Authors: Are not Clemens Alexandrinus's Stromata a Bibliotheca of the Opinions and Judgments of an incredible Number of Writers? May not the Hiſtory of Euſebius be called a Library of Eccleſiaſtical Authors? ſince his whole Book is little elſe but an Account of their Lives, a Catalogue of their Works, and a Collection of ſeveral memorable Paſſages. But St. Jerom is the firſt of the Chriſtians, that has expreſly treated of Eccleſiaſtical Authors; which Book was tranſlated into Greek by Sophronius. Gennadius of Marſeilles, Iſidore of Sevil, Ildefonſus of Toledo, continued it down to their own Times. Honorius Biſhop of Autun made a ſmall Abridgment of theſe four Authors, Sigebert of Gemblours, and Henry of Ghent, continued their Books down to St. Bernard's Time. And Laſtly, Aubertus Miræus, who publiſhed theſe Authors under the Title of Bibliotheca Eccleſiaſtica, continued the Hiſtory of theſe Eccleſiaſtical Writers down to our Times. Trithemius, who lived about two Hundred Years ago, made a diſtinct Book upon the ſame Subject. We ought not to forget the Roman Council, held under Pope Gelaſius the Firſt, in the Year 494, in which there is a Catalogue of the Sacred Books, and of Catholick and Apocryphal or Heretical Authors. Amongſt the Greeks, the learned Photius compoſed an excellent Bibliotheca, in which he gives a ſhort Summary of the Books that were read; and paſſes his own Judgment upon near Three Hundred Volumes of different Authors, that not only treat of Religion, but alſo of Hiſtory, Rhetorick, Philoſophy, Grammar, Phyſick, Medicine, and other profane Sciences. But never was more Induſtry and Labour beſtowed upon all ſorts of Books, and eſpecially Eccleſiaſtical, than has been in theſe laſt Ages, wherein we have revived (if I may uſe the Expreſſion) all manner of Learning and Knowledge, and carried Criticiſm to a Perfection and Height that it never arrived to before. The Roman Catholicks and Proteſtants have ſeemed to rival each other in compoſing of theſe Bibliotheca's. Eraſmus, who cauſed ſome of the Fathers to be Printed, writ ſeveral Prefaces and Annotations upon their Works that contain abundance of judicious Reflections; and though he is ſometimes overhaſty in rejecting ſome particular Books, yet however we muſt own that he opened the Way for thoſe that followed him. Since him, moſt of thoſe Perſons that have obliged the World in publiſhing thoſe Authors, have written their Lives, and made ſome Critical Obſervations upon their Works. But to confine my ſelf at preſent, only to thoſe that have written upon Eccleſiaſtical Authors, Sixtus Senenſis, in his Bibliotheca Sacra, has not only treated of the Authors of the ſeveral Books of the Bible, but likewiſe of their Commentators too: And ſince there is ſcarce any Eccleſiaſtical Author to be found, who has not writ ſomething or other about the Scripture, he was obliged to ſpeak of moſt of the Fathers, and a great Number of other Eccleſiaſtical Writers. Cardinal Baronius alſo, whoſe principal Deſign was, to collect together every thing that had a relation to the Hiſtory of the Church, in his Annals, has written the Lives of the greater part of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and mentioned their Books. Bellarmine writ a diſtinct Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, which reaches down to the Year 1500. wherein, after he had briefly taken notice of their Profeſſion, and the Time when they lived, he makes a Catalogue of their Works, with ſome Criticiſms upon them. This little Book is very valuable for the great Variety of Things contained in it, but yet it is very imperfect, and his Critical Remarks upon the Works of theſe Authors are not always exact. Poſſevin, in his great Apparatus, that is diſpoſed in an Alphabetical Order, has ſupplied part of thoſe things that are wanting in Bellarmine's Book. An Italian Maſter of the Sacred Palace, has made ſome uſeful Reflections and Notes upon ſeveral Books. Halloixius treats very largely of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, but ſpeaks very little of the Writers of the firſt Ages. After him, Father Labbè, a Jeſuit, compoſed a Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, as a Supplement to Bellarmine, but it is very imperfect; and he himſelf tells us, that it was only an Extract out of a great Univerſal Library, that he had been preparing a long time: But whether he never liv'd to finiſh it, or for whatever other Reaſon it was, it has not as yet ſeen the Light. I ſhall ſay nothing of thoſe that have made Critical Animadverſions upon theſe Authors ſince his Time, becauſe they have only copied from other Criticks that wrote before them, without adding any thing remarkable of their own. I ſhall likewiſe paſs them over that have criticiſed upon ſome particular Books; as, Sirmondus, Launoy, and Morinus, upon the Books attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite; becauſe it will be time enough to take notice of them, when I ſhall treat of the Books upon which they have criticiſed.

But we ought by no means to omit thoſe Books which the Proteſtants have written upon theſe Eccleſiaſtical Authors, becauſe, though they are full of Errors, Falſhoods and Invectives, and ſometimes treat the Fathers with little Reſpect; and have beſide, upon falſe Conjectures rejected ſeveral Books which they diſliked, as not being agreeable to their own Opinions, and diſcovering their own Errours; though, I ſay, it muſt be owned, that almoſt all the Treatiſes written by them upon this Subject, abound with ſuch Faults as ought to be abhorred by all Catholicks; yet we muſt do them the Juſtice to confeſs, that for what has a Relation to the Critical Part, they have ſometimes ſeen more clearly than the Catholicks themſelves, and have diſcovered ſome Things that we are obliged to acknowledge and approve. The Centuriators were the firſt amongſt the Proteſtants that ſeriouſly attempted to write the Lives of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and to make Critical Remarks upon them; and it muſt be owned, that their Books are very uſeful even to the Catholicks themſelves. Conrardus Geſner's Bibliotheca, Abridged by Joſias Simlerus and Friſius, and augmented by ſome others, is no ill Dictionary of theſe Authors. Perkins and Cook have publiſhed an accurate Examen of ſpurious Books; but they have done it rather upon the Faith of other People, than by their own proper Light. Scultetus's Work upon the Fathers of the Four firſt Ages of the Church, is more conſiderable, not only for ſeveral points of Hiſtory and Criticiſm, that are there very ſuccinctly ſet down; but alſo for the Analyſis, or Abridgment of their Writings, which he has performed with great Exactneſs, but in a Scholaſtick Way, and conſequently tedious. Voſſius's Treatiſes upon the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, Poets and Philoſophers, amongſt whom he has placed ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical Writers, are excellent Things in their kind, and ſhew a great deal of Learning. Rivet has taken the greateſt pains, is the moſt exact, and has performed the part of a Critick beſt upon ſpurious Works; but then his Book is not exempt from thoſe faults that are common to Proteſtants, as we have obſerved above. I ſhall not mention thoſe that have ſpoken of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors by the bye; as Toſſanus, Hottinger, Aubertin, Mareſius, Sandius, and many others: As alſo thoſe that have compoſed particular Treatiſes upon ſome Books; as Blondel upon the falſe Decretals of the Popes, and the Books of the Sibyls; Daillé upon the Canons and Conſtitutions of the Apoſtles, and upon the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius; Pearſon, and ſome other Engliſh-Men, upon the ſame Letters; Voſſius upon the Creeds; Beveridge upon the Apoſtolick Canons; Alix upon Tertullian; and ſeveral others.

There is not one of all theſe Books which we have mentioned, that comprehends all that might be ſaid upon thoſe Eccleſiaſtical Authors. Some of them contain nothing, in a manner ner, but their Names, and a Catalogue of their works: Others only give a ſhort account of their lives, and handle what relates to the critical part very ſuccinctly. The greateſt part of them wholly employ themſelves in examining the ſpurious and ſuppoſitious Books. Photius is the only man amongſt the Ancients, that has made an abridgment, and paſſed his own cenſure upon the books he mentions; but then the Eccleſiaſtical Authors he treats of are few in number; and beſides, he paſſes over ſome of them very ſuperficially, and ſlightly. Sculte-tus is the only modern writer, who has given the World an Epitome of the doctrine of the Fathers; but then he ſpeaks little or nothing of their lives, and has made no critical reflections upon their Works: The perplexed manner wherein he treats of theſe matters, renders him diſagreeable to the Reader: And beſides, he only concerns himſelf with the principal Authors of the Four firſt Centuries. Halloixius has wrote upon fewer of theſe Authors; and his work, which is of a prodigious bulk, is by no means exact, and he is full of falſe and uſeleſs things. Having thus obſerved the miſtakes or failures of all theſe Works, I undertook to make a Bibliotheca of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, more ample and perfect than thoſe that have hitherto appeared in the World; and that I might the better ſucceed in my deſign, I endeavoured to render it as like as was poſſible to what we commonly call a Bibliotheque, or Library. Thus, as we ordinarily range the Books in thoſe places, according to the order of their Matter and Time, I have likewiſe in this Work diſpoſed the Eccleſiaſtical Authors according to the order of Time; and it will be an eaſie matter to reduce them into a Method, according to their Subjects, by the aſſiſtance of a table at the end of every Volume. When we enter into any Library, the firſt thing we generally take notice of, are the Titles of the Books; and in this Library alſo, at the firſt opening of the Leaves, the Reader may ſee the Names of the Authors, and a Catalogue of their Works. But ſince it is not enough barely to conſider the Titles of Books, ſo that we muſt of neceſſity read them over if we would be learned, I have not contented my ſelf with making a Catalogue of their Treatiſes only, but I have drawn up an Abridgment or Summary of what is contained in them, obſerving at the ſame time what particular Opinions are to be found in their Writings. If in other Libraries, you often ſee the Pictures of great Men and famous Authors, either painted upon Cloth, or engraven upon Copper; here alſo you will ſee their Pictures drawn after a more lively and more natural manner; not only in the Hiſtory of their Lives, but alſo in the Judgment that we have given of their Stile, their Spirit, and their Genius. Laſtly, As in great Libraries Men are not content with having only one Edition of an Author, but endeavour if they can to procure all, or at leaſt a great part of them; ſo in this, I have taken notice of all the different Editions of Authors, that came to my knowledge, and I have endeavoured to omit as few, as was poſſible: However this Library of mine, will contain more Volumes upon Eccleſiaſtical matters, than any other Collection of Books can pretend to ſhow; becauſe, it not only comprehends thoſe that we now have; but likewiſe gives an account of thoſe that are loſt; the number, whereof, is exceeding great; and then it may boaſt of another advantage wholly peculiar to it; and that is, It helps to diſtinguiſh thoſe Books that are forged, from thoſe that truly belong to the Authors, whoſe Names they bear, which are confounded and mingled together in common Libraries. This is the deſign of my Undertaking, a ſmall but very conſiderable part whereof I now preſent to the Publick, which only concerns the Three firſt ages of the Church; with a reſolution to publiſh a continuation of the other Ages (a good part of which is already done) and ſo to bring it down to our own times, if God gives me Abilities and Strength enough to finiſh ſo long a Work, and if the reception it meets withal in the World ſatisfies me, that my Endeavours may be of ſome advantage to the Publick. I am not ſo vain as to flatter my ſelf with having performed ſo great a deſign, as perfectly as it ought to be, whatever diligence, pains or exactneſs I have uſed in the performance: But this at leaſt, I may venture to aſſert, That of all the Books that have been written upon Eccleſiaſtical Authors, there is none that comprehends ſo many things. If I have failed in my Undertaking, I have this to comfort my ſelf, that I have drawn ſuch an Idea of a Work as may employ the learned a conſiderable time for the publick benefit; and if they will be pleaſed hereafter to acquaint me with the Faults which I may have poſſibly committed, or inform me of thoſe things which I have let ſlip, and communicate to me part of their Obſervations, as well upon the Authors that are in this Volume, as upon thoſe that I ſhall examine in the next; I hope this Work will be able to acquire ſome ſort of Perfection, according to my hearty wiſhes, for the common benefit of Mankind, the advancement of Learning, and the advantage of Religion it ſelf.

PART II.

Some Obſervations upon the Method. An Account of the Deſign of the Work. Rules of Criticiſm laid down.

IT being not ſufficient barely to repreſent the general deſign of this Work, as I have done in the firſt Part of the Preface, I found my ſelf obliged to give ſome ſhort account of the method I uſed in the management of it. I uſually begin with the Life of every Author, which I relate as ſuccinctly, and in as few words as poſſibly I can. For there being two ways of writing the Life of any perſon; one by taking in the Moral; the other by comprehending the Hiſtorical Part: I have applied my ſelf wholly to the laſt, as being the moſt agreeable to my deſign. In the firſt, I ſet down all the Actions of thoſe Men, whoſe Lives I write, and then enlarge upon their vertues; and make ſeveral Reflections upon their Behaviour and Conduct: In the ſecond, I only take notice of the principal circumſtances of their Life, paſſing over thoſe actions that are purely perſonal, and that have no relation to the Hiſtory of their Times, contenting my ſelf with delivering Matters of Fact without a large examination, whether they were well done or not. After this manner, I have endeavoured to write the Life of thoſe Authors of whom I have occaſion to ſpeak, chiefly taking notice of thoſe circumſtances that concern their Writings, and may ſerve either to illuſtrate them, or to make the Order, Subject, and Occaſion of them known. For nothing is of more uſe to make us underſtand the meaning of any Author, than the knowing when, and with what Temper he wrote, what Hereticks he oppoſed, what Opinion he deſigned to eſtabliſh; and laſtly, what Condition he was in at that time. A Biſhop, for example, writes otherwiſe than a Lay-Man, an African otherwiſe than an Aſiatick, and a Man under perſecution, talks in a different manner from one that is at eaſe. An Author that attacks the Hereſie of his own time, and beſides, has perſonal conteſts with his Adverſaries, expreſſes himſelf in another ſtrain, than a Man that writes againſt an Hereſie that is extinct, and who has no other ſhare in the Quarrel, or no other Motive of Writing, than to defend the Truth: In a word, we ſpeak and we write generally according to the different Motions and Paſſions, with which we are agitated: the Objects that moſt forcibly ſtrike us, repreſent themſelves in a lively manner to our Imaginations, and by that means determine our Tongues and Pens to that ſide. After Tertullian was provoked againſt the Church, he never wrote one ſingle Book, wherein he does not fall upon it, and bring in the Paraclete of Montanus. St. Cyprian making it his buſineſs to ſupport his own Authority and the Diſcipline of the Church againſt thoſe that attacked both, ſpeaks always of the Unity of the Church, and of publick Pennance. Origen, who was full of the Platonick Philoſophy, conſiders all the Principles of Chriſtianity as they have a relation to Plato's Doctrine. St. Athanaſius, a ſworn Enemy of the Arians, never took pen in hand, but he fell upon them. St. Auſtin having the Donatiſts and Pelagians always in view in all his Writings, and even in his Homilies, talks perpetually of the Church and of Grace. 'Tis the ſame with all the reſt, and if we examine the matter narrowly, we ſhall find that all Men are made after the ſame ſort, and agree as to this particular. We commonly know by a Man's diſcourſe what Books he reads, what Sciences he ſtudies, what Religion he is of, what Profeſſion he follows, whether his Circumſtances in the World are happy or not, and whether he is well or ill received by great Men; ſo difficult a matter is it to conceal our own opinions, when they have once made a deep impreſſion within! We offer a violence to our ſelves when we attempt to conceal them for any time, and ſooner or later they eſcape from us, notwithſtanding all our endeavours to the contrary. And this ſhows what a conſiderable advantage it is to us towards the better underſtanding of any Author, to be perfectly inſtructed in the Hiſtory of his Life, and to know what Country he was of, in what Times he lived, what was his Profeſſion, his Genius and Inclination, what Hereticks he oppoſed, and what Intereſts he had to manage.

This very ſame Reaſon likewiſe makes us ſenſible, that it is not ſufficient to know in general the Age wherein any Author wrote; but that we muſt alſo, if it is poſſible, find out the exact Time and Year in which he wrote every Treatiſe, and ſo obſerve the Order and Series of his Works; for beſides, that a Man writes otherwiſe when he is Young, than when he is well in Years; it is a certain Truth, that the ſeveral Changes, that happen every day in the Courſe of worldly Affairs, and to every Perſon in particular, often make Men alter their Stile. Tertullian, when he was engaged in the Sect of the Montaniſts, oppoſes what he had formerly eſtabliſhed. St. Cyprian ſpeaks of the Reconciliation of Penitents, according to the different Circumſtances of the Times he lived in; St. Auſtin, when he writes againſt the Pelagians, ſpeaks otherwiſe of God's Grace and of Free-Will, than he uſed to do before. St. Athanaſius when he was under Perſecution, wrote more violently than when he enjoy'd Tranquility. In a word, ſince nothing is ſo changeable as the Mind of Man, and ſince every Accident, that influences it, is under continual Motion, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that an Author will write differently in different Times. It is therefore of infinite Uſe to obſerve, as we have done, the Chronology of any Writer's Works, if we can diſcover it either by Reaſoning, or by conjecture; and this was more eaſily done in Polemical Diſcourſes, than Treatiſes of Morality. The Characters, that help us to know the Time and Order of their Works, are, 1. The Years of the Emperors, the Names of Conſuls; or laſtly, the Years when any particular Epocha's begin, as we find them any where ſet down. 2. The Names of Perſons that are mentioned there. 3. The Citations of the works of other Authors, or of the Author himſelf. 4. Conjectures drawn from the Stile, the Matters that are treated of, and the manner wherein they are delivered. I do not explain theſe Characters, becauſe they are ſo eaſie to be underſtood, and becauſe they may be ſo often diſcovered by an infinite Number of Examples in the Book it ſelf.

A Catalogue of the Works of theſe Authors was abſolutely neceſſary: Sometimes I made it ſeparately, and ſometimes, as I had occaſion to diſcourſe of them in a Chronological Order, der. This Catalogue as well comprehends the Books that we have at preſent, as thoſe that are loſt, whoſe Titles have been preſerved by the Ancients: but this has not been obſerved in the ordinary Catalogues, where they content themſelves with ſetting down thoſe Books only that are to be found in the Editions we now have. I have not ſuffered even thoſe Authors to eſcape me, of whom we have not any entire Diſcourſe remaining. I have made a Catalogue of their Treatiſes, where I cou'd be fully informed of them by any of the Ancients, and I have taken Care to preſerve the Fragments of ſome Writers that are ſtill remaining, and to acquaint the Reader in what Authors and in what Places they are to be found. I have referred what I have to ſay of the Rules of Criticiſm to the end of the Preface, where I ſhall examine them more particularly.

One would imagine that a Summary or Abridgment of theſe Books would prove a long Work, and ſwell the Volume to a mighty great Bulk; yet I have reduced it into very narrow Bounds, and have ſuffered nothing that was of conſiderable Moment, to eſcape me. I have contrived to make it as little troubleſom and tedious as was poſſible, by not always confining my ſelf to the Formality of an exact Method, and without making a ſcrupulous Analyſis of their Propoſitions and Reaſonings.

I contented my ſelf with delivering the Arguments of their Books in a few Words. When I met with any conſiderable things either for Doctrine, Morality, or Diſcipline, I carefully took notice of them, and I have alſo drawn out of ſeveral Books thoſe Paſſages that appeared to be the moſt beautiful, and thoſe thoughts that were the moſt Sublime. For the end which I always propoſed to my ſelf, was to give a true Character of the Author I treated of, and to omit nothing that was remarkable, and yet for the Reader's Eaſe, I have done it as ſhort as I could.

After this Abridgment of their Work, I generally give my Judgment of the Stile, and Genius, and Learning of the Author. I don't in the leaſt queſtion but that ſeveral perſons will be offended at the Liberty I have taken, and that even thoſe who approve my deſign in the main, will be of a different opinion from me; for the Judgments of Mankind are ſo vaſtly divided in nothing as in the Cenſures they paſs upon other Men. Every Man thinks he has ſufficient authority in him ſelf to judge another, and indeed every Man judges after his own way, led by his own fancy or humour, without any certain or ſteddy rules.

Hence it follows, that it is almoſt impoſſible to find two perſons that agree in their opinions of a third perſon, and indeed this reflection made me at firſt alter my deſign of drawing up the Characters of my Authors, foreſeeing plainly, that I ſhould hereby draw upon my ſelf a great number of adverſaries. For though the perſons of whom I ſpeak, have been long ſince dead, yet they have abundance either of admirers, or cenſurers, that will appear either for, or againſt them; ſo that whether I commend or blame them, 'tis all one, and I muſt expect to be cenſured and ill thought of. But afterwards, when I conſidered with my ſelf, that ſince all the World give themſelves the liberty to judge the Ancients upon all occaſions, juſt as they pleaſe, I thought that no Man ought to condemn me for doing the ſame, after I had carefully read them over, and particularly in a Book where the ſubject and deſign ſeemed to require it; I reſolved to do it however with moderation, and yet with a convenient freedom. I don't pretend to oblige any Man to follow my Judgment; neither do I flatter my ſelf that I have always found out their true Characters; I only deſire my Reader not to condemn me inconſiderately, or upon the faith of another, without having ſo much as read or ſtudied theſe Authors; and I likewiſe conjure him to reſt ſatisfied, that in paſſing my Cenſures, I have uſed all imaginable exactneſs and application, knowing that a Man cannot be too circumſpect when he offers to judge others, and eſpecially thoſe perſons that have left ſo great a reputation behind them in the World, and to whom we owe ſo much reſpect.

I conclude with a Catalogue of the ſeveral Editions of thoſe Books, which I have examined with the utmoſt care and diligence. I am not certain that I have ſet down all, yet I am ſatisfied that I have mentioned the beſt, and given my Judgment of each in particular. So that any Man may ſee at firſt ſight, which Edition is moſt uſed, and ought to be moſt valued.

At the end of theſe three firſt Centuries, I have made an abridgment of the Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Morality of thoſe Times, that whatever is to be learnt in the Authors of thoſe Ages, may be ſeen at one view. This Summary I have compoſed as faithfully and in as ſhort a compaſs as I cou'd; however I don't pretend to have taken notice of every thing that is to be found in the Authors of the three firſt Ages upon theſe ſubjects, ſince I only deſigned to ſet down the principal points, that I might give my Reader a ſmall Idea of them.

Laſtly, There are ſeveral Tables at the end of each Volume, which will not be wholly uſeleſs. The firſt contains a Catalogue of the Authors, in a Chronological Order, where one may ſee the time of their Birth, and Death, and that wherein they flouriſhed. The ſecond contains a Catalogue of the ſame Authors, in an Alphabetical Order. The third, is a Catalogue of their Works: The genuine, the ſpurious, and thoſe that are loſt. The fourth, is a Catalogue of their Works, according to the matters contained in them. And the laſt, is an ordinary Table of the things contained in the body of the Book.

I have only now to acquaint my Reader, that at the end of each Author, I have added ſome Annotations, that are merely critical, to make my Book as plain and eaſy as was poſſible. In theſe Notes you will find ſome illuſtrations and proofs of the things that I aſſerted in the Text.

I was not willing to reſerve them 'till the end of the Volume, becauſe, generally moſt Men do not look ſo far, and ſo never mind them; nor to charge the Margin with them; becauſe they were too long to be placed there, and conſequently wou'd have interrupted the Series of the Diſcourſe. But I have placed them at the end of each Author, where it is an eaſy matter to conſult them by obſerving the ſeveral Letters that will conduct the Reader, and yet not detain him too long from the Text. Thoſe that are but indifferently skilled in theſe matters, may, if they pleaſe, paſs over theſe Notes; but I would deſire thoſe that have a mind to examine carefully what I have written, to read them along with the Text, becauſe I have often barely aſſerted ſeveral things in the Text, that are juſtified and proved by theſe Notes.

I ſhall leave the Reader to judge, whether this Book may be of any advantage to the Publick, or no; but I think I ought to acquaint him, that the principal end I propoſed to my ſelf, was to excite thoſe that ſhall peruſe it, to read the Works of the Holy Fathers; and that whoever imagines himſelf diſpenſed with from conſulting the Originals by reading my Book, does manifeſtly pervert and abuſe the deſign of it. I publiſhed it with an Intention to give them a taſte, and not to make them looſe their appetite for the Fathers; and the abridgment I have made of their Works, was only deſigned to inflame thoſe that love theſe things, to go and refreſh themſelves at the fountain-head. This Work may eaſily inſpire Men with a deſire of reading the Fathers, ſince it gives them before-hand a general Idea of their Doctrine and Maxims; but here is not enough to ſave them the labour of reading the Originals: And let a Work of this nature be never ſo well written, yet we ought to read theſe things in their Originals, where only they are to be found in their purity, and natural beauty. This I thought neceſſary to premiſe, before I ſet down the neceſſity and the rules of true Criticiſm, and the great Importance of them, which I am now going to explain.

Criticiſm is a kind of a Torch, that lights and conducts us in the obſcure Tracks of Antiquity, by making us able to diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood, Hiſtory from Fable, and Antiquity from Novelty. 'Tis by this Means, that in our times we have diſ-engaged our ſelves from an infinite Number of very common Errours, into which our Fathers fell for want of examining things by the Rules of true Criticiſm. For 'tis a ſurprizing thing to conſider how many ſpurious Books we find in Antiquity; nay, even in the firſt Ages of the Church. Several Reaſons induced Men to impoſe Books upon the World, under other Men's Names. The firſt, and moſt general, is, the Malice of Hereticks; who, to give the greater Reputation to their Hereſies, compoſed ſeveral Books, which they attributed to Perſons of great Reputation; in which they ſtudiouſly ſpread their own Errours, that ſo they might find a better Reception, under the Protection of theſe celebrated Names. And thus the firſt Hereticks deviſed falſe Goſpels, falſe Acts, and falſe Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, and their Diſciples: And thus thoſe that came after them publiſhed ſeveral ſpurious Books, as if they had been written by Orthodox Authors, that ſo they might inſenſibly convey their Errours into the Minds of their Readers, without their perceiving the Cheat.

The Second Reaſon that inclined People to forge Books under other Men's Names, is directly contrary to the Firſt; being occaſioned by the indiſcreet Piety of ſome Perſons, who thought they did the Church conſiderable Service, in forging Eccleſiaſtical or Profane Monuments in favour of Religion and the Truth. And this Reaſon prevailed with ſome ancient Chriſtians, to forge ſome Teſtimonies in behalf of the Chriſtian Religion, under the Name of the Sibyls, Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, and divers others; and likewiſe induced the Catholicks to compoſe ſome Books, that they might refute the Hereticks of their own Times with the greateſt Eaſe. And Laſtly, the ſame Motive carried the Catholicks ſo far, as to invent falſe Hiſtories, falſe Miracles, and falſe Lives of the Saints, to nouriſh and keep up the Piety of the Faithful. Now, though the Deſign of theſe Perſons ſeems to be commendable, yet we ought not, by any Means, to approve of the making uſe of theſe ſorts of Artifices to defend the truth; which is well enough ſupported by real Proofs, without the neceſſity of inventing any falſe ones. It would be a Shame to call Lying and Falſhood to its Aſſiſtance, and we muſt never uſe ſuch ſort of Methods, which Truth and Sincerity will always condemn, whatever good Effects they may pretend to have.

The Third Reaſon of the Forgery of ſome Books, keeps a middle Way between thoſe we have already mentioned; for there have been ſome Perſons in the world, that have been guilty of this Impoſture, without any other Deſign, than to divert themſelves at the Expence of their Readers, and to try how nearly they could imitate the Stile of other Men. Hence it is, that ſome Authors have compoſed treatiſes under St. Cyprian's, St. Ambroſe's, and St. Auſtin's Names. But it muſt be confeſſed, that this reaſon has not been near ſo common as the other two, and that it very rarely prevailed, eſpecially in the Primitive Times. Only in theſe latter Ages there have been ſome, who having Vanity enough to over-value their own Productions, have publiſhed them under the Name of ancient celebrated Authors; deſiring rather (as the Abbot of Billi ſays) to appear abroad, and be eſteemed under other Men's Names, than to continue deſpiſed, and be buried in Darkneſs, by writing in their own. And theſe are the Reaſons that may have occaſioned the Forgery of Books; Malice, Indiſcreet Piety, and the Humours of Men.

But beſides theſe Reaſons that have advanced this trade of Forgery, there are ſeveral others that have occaſioned the ſetting Authors Names to ſeveral Books, which they never writ.

The firſt, and the moſt general, is, the Fault of the Tranſcribers, or Printers, who have frequently ſet wrong Names in the Title-Pages of their Books. And this has happened ſeveral Ways; for either they did it to raiſe the Price of the Copy, or, becauſe they found theſe Tracts at the end of ſome other Author, they therefore concluded too raſhly that they were done by the ſame Hand; or through Ignorance and Negligence; or laſtly, ſome not being able to find out the Name of the true Authors, upon the ſtrength of a few feeble Conjectures, have ſuppoſed they had good Reaſon on their ſide to change it.

From hence therefore, one Book has often carried the name of ſeveral Authors in manuſcript, and this has principally happen'd to Sermons; either becauſe the Tranſcribers found it their Intereſt to publiſh them under the Names of Great Men, to make them more vendible; or becauſe theſe Sermons, though of different Authors, by being often inſerted into the Office of the Church, and divided into Leſſons, were ſo interwoven and confounded one with another, that it was a difficult matter to diſtinguiſh them.

A ſecond Reaſon of the giving to ſome Books the Name of wrong Authors, is, becauſe ſometimes Men have written Books by way of Dialogue, or otherwiſe, to which, in imitation of Tully, they have given the Names of thoſe Perſons whom they have introduced there as Speakers. After this manner Vigilius Thæphſenſis made five Books under the Name of St. Athanaſius, and perhaps too under the ſame Name he compoſed the Creed that is attributed to that Father: Where it happened, that thoſe that looked upon the titles of theſe Books, attributed them to St. Athanaſius, without examining the Reaſons why they carried his Name: As if we ſhould attribute Tully's Books to Lælius, Brutus, or Cato.

Laſtly, The Ambiguity of Titles, and the Reſemblance of Names, have often contributed to the aſcribing of Books to thoſe to whom they did not belong. Two Authors were of the ſame Name, though perhaps they differed in every Circumſtance beſide; and this has given Occaſion to ſeveral unwary or ignorant Readers, to attribute their Books to the wrong Perſons. This has frequently happened; and, to give one remarkable Inſtance of it, the Reſemblance of the Names of Sixtus the Philoſopher, and Sixtus the Pope, cauſed Sentences that were written by the former to be attributed to the latter.

Having thus diſcovered the reaſons why we find ſo many Books attributed to Authors who have no juſt title to them, we ought to eſtabliſh the rules of true Criticiſm. 'Tis equally dangerous to be ignorant of them, as to take them the wrong way, and miſ-apply them; for if we do not know them, we may be eaſily impoſed upon by falſe Monuments; and if we do not underſtand them aright, or if we abuſe them by allowing our ſelves too great a liberty, we may very often reject the Truth it ſelf. This laſt abuſe has been frequent with many Criticks of our time, and particularly Proteſtants, who, upon very ſlight ſuperficial Conjectures, have rejected ſeveral Books that are unqueſtionably ancient and genuine, becauſe they contradict their Doctrine or Diſcipline. Wherefore we may, in the firſt place, ſet this down for a general rule in theſe matters, that we ought always to act fairly, and upon the Square; and that we muſt lay aſide our paſſions, or our intereſts, and hearken only to our reaſon, when we paſs our judgment upon ſuppoſitious or genuine Books. 'Tis very ill done to conclude that ſuch a Book is ſpurious becauſe it pinches us, and afterwards to ſearch for reaſons why it may be thought ſo. We ought, on the contrary, when a Book does not pleaſe us, to uſe more than uſual circumſpection to examine the reaſons that make us call it into queſtion; ſince it is to be feared, that unleſs we take due care, the Prejudices we have formed againſt it may caſt a miſt before our eyes, and make us miſtake frivolous conjectures for ſolid reaſons. We ſhall now examine the proofs and conjectures that a Man may have of a Book's being ſpurious, one by one, as they lie: They are either external, or internal; and both one and the other may be convincing or probable.

The internal proofs are thoſe that are drawn out of the Books themſelves, which we apparently demonſtrate to be ſuppoſitious, either by the Time there ſet down, or by ſome other Sign, or by the Opinions that are there maintained, or by the Stile wherein it is written. Time is one of the moſt certain proofs; for nothing more evidently ſhews that a Book cannot belong to that time wherein it is pretended to have been written, than when we find in it ſome Marks of a later date. Theſe Marks, in the firſt place, are, falſe dates; for 'tis an ordinary thing for Impoſtors, that are generally ignorant, to date a Book after the death of the Author to whom they aſcribe it, or of the perſon to whom it is dedicated, or written; and even when they do fix the time right, yet they often miſtake in the names of the Conſuls, or in ſome other Circumſtances: All which are invincible proofs, that he that dated this Book did not live at that time. Secondly, Impoſtors very often ſpeak of Men that lived long after the death of thoſe perſons to whom they attribute thoſe ſpurious diſcourſes, or they relate the Hiſtory of ſome paſſages that happened afterwards, or they ſpeak of Cities and People that were unknown at the time, when thoſe Authors wrote; or laſtly, they cite Authors that wrote and lived after thoſe whom they make to mention them.

The Opinions or Things contained in a Book, do likewiſe diſcover the Forgery of it; 1. When we find ſome Opinions there, that were not maintained 'till a long time after the Author, whoſe Name it bears. 2. When we find ſome Terms made uſe of, to explain theſe Doctrines, which were not cuſtomary 'till after his death. 3. When the Author oppoſes Errours, as extant in his own Time, that did not ſpring up 'till afterwards. 4. When he deſcribes Ceremonies, Rites and Cuſtoms, that were not in uſe in his Time. 5. When we find ſome Opinions in theſe ſpurious Diſcourſes, that are contrary to thoſe that are to be found in other Books, which unqueſtionably belong to that Author. 6. When he treats of matters that were never ſpoken of in the Time when the real Author was alive. 7. When he relates Hiſtories that are manifeſtly fabulous.

In ſhort, Stile is a ſort of Touch-ſtone, that diſcovers the Truth or Falſhood of Books; becauſe it is impoſſible to imitate the Stile of any Author ſo perfectly, as that there will not be a great deal of difference. By the Stile, we are not only to underſtand the bare Words and Terms, which are eaſily imitated; but alſo the Turn of the Diſcourſe, the Manner of Writing, the Elocution, the Figures, and the Method: All which Particulars, it is a difficult matter ſo to counterfeit, as to prevent a Diſcovery. There are, for inſtance, certain Authors, whoſe Stile is eaſily known, and which it is impoſſible to imitate: We ought not however always to reject a Book upon a ſlight difference of Stile, without any other Proofs; becauſe it often happens, that Authors write differently, in different Times: Neither ought we immediately to receive a Book as genuine, upon the bare reſemblance of Stile, when there are other Proofs of its being ſpurious; becauſe it may ſo happen, that an ingenious Man may ſometimes counterfeit the Stile of an Author, eſpecially in Diſcourſes which are not very long: But the Difference and Reſemblance of Stile may be ſo remarkable ſometimes, as to be a convincing Proof, either of Truth or Falſhood.

The external Proofs are, in the firſt place, taken from ancient Manuſcripts; in which, either we do not find the Name of an Author, or elſe we find that of another: The more ancient or correct they are, the more we ought to value them. Secondly, from the Teſtimony or Silence of ancient Authors; from their Teſtimony, I ſay, when they formally reject a Writing as ſpurious, or when they attribute it to ſome other Author; or from their Silence, when they do not ſpeak of it, though they have occaſion to mention it: This Argument, which is commonly called a Negative one, is oftentimes of very great weight. When, for example, we find, that ſeveral entire Books which are attributed to one of the Ancients, are unknown to all Antiquity: When all thoſe Perſons that have ſpoken of the Works of an Author, and beſides, have made Catalogues of them, never mention ſuch a particular Diſcourſe: When a Book that would have been ſerviceable to the Catholicks, has never been cited by them, who both might, and ought to have cited it, as having a fair Occaſion to do it, 'tis extreamly probable that it is ſuppoſitious. It is very certain, that this is enough to make any Book doubtful, if it was never cited by any of the Ancients; and in that caſe, it muſt have very authentick Characters of Antiquity, before it ought to be received without contradiction. And on the other hand, if there ſhould be never ſo few Conjectures of its not being genuine, yet theſe, together with the Silence of the Ancients, will be ſufficient to oblige us to believe it to be a Forgery.

Theſe are the Rules of Criticiſm, by which we diſtinguiſh falſe and ſpurious Works from thoſe that are genuine. As I ſaid before, ſome of theſe Rules are convincing, and ſome are only probable; the internal Proofs are generally more certain than the external; and amongſt theſe, the poſitive Teſtimony of Authors is the moſt preſumptive and ſtrong. But it may be ſaid, that all of them are ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſs convincing and probable; and that the Sovereign Rule is, the Judgment of Equity and Prudence; according to which we ought to balance the Reaſons of one ſide and the other, and conſider all the Conjectures that can be brought for or againſt it. For it often happens, that although every Conjecture, conſidered apart, does not ſeem to bear any conſiderable weight, yet when they are all joined together, they make the thing almoſt morally certain. I have brought no examples to explain all theſe Rules that I have ſet down; for, beſides that they are ſufficiently clear and intelligible of themſelves, it is impoſſible to read in any Pages of my Book, without finding them applied upon all Occaſions.

Before I conclude my Preface, I am obliged to make ſome kind of Anſwer to thoſe who have been pleaſed to declare, that they ſhould have been better ſatisfied if I had wrote my Book in Latin. Some Perſons have been of that Mind, becauſe they have a greater Value for Latin, ſince it has laſted longer, and is more currant in foreign Countries: Others take it ill that I have publiſhed thoſe things in French, which, as they pretend, ought only to be underſtood by Divines. Theſe Men have told me, That they could not endure to ſee Women and ignorant People learn the moſt curious Parts of Divinity: And that it might prove of dangerous Conſequence to inſtruct them throughly in the Doctrine of the Fathers.

As for the Firſt, I ſhall take care to ſatisfie them, by tranſlating my Book into Latin ſome time or other, if the Publick ſhall think it worth being preſerved.

For the Others; As their Complaint is unreaſonable, ſo I never ſaw any good Reaſons to hinder my publiſhing it in French: For when the Fathers themſelves wrote, they made uſe of a language that was underſtood by all the World; and we live at preſent in an Age, wherein great numbers of their Books have been tranſlated with Applauſe. No Man therefore ought to take it ill, that I publiſh an Abridgment of their Doctrine to all the World: On the contrary, It were to be wiſhed, that every Chriſtian could be inſtructed in theſe Matters, that they might be the better confirmed in their Belief, when they ſee that this Doctrine has been always taught in the Church of JESUS CHRIST, who is the Pillar and Ground of the Truth.

THE AUTHOR's PREFACE TO THE Fourth and Fifth Centuries.

IT would be here very unneceſſary to make Encomiums on the Eccleſiaſtical Writers of the fourth Century of the Church; the Publick is ſufficiently prepoſſeſs'd in their Favour, their Names are better known than thoſe of the Authors of the three firſt Ages, their Reputation more eſtabliſh'd, and the World has a greater Idea of their Knowledge and Merits. In ſhort, we may affirm, that as the Church was never in a more flouriſhing Condition outwardly, ſo it never injoy'd ſuch Illuſtrious, Learn'd and Eloquent Authors, as at this Time; which makes me hope, that this Century will pleaſe the Learn'd as well as the three former. I have endeavour'd to render it even more Exact than them, and the Extracts of ſome of the finer Paſſages of the Fathers, will make it more uſeful and agreeable; as to other things, I have altered nothing in the Method and Deſign I firſt propoſed, which I have explained at large in my General Preface.

The Hiſtory of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, that flouriſh'd in the beginning of the fifth Century, and died before 430, is very large, tho' thoſe that lived in that period of time were ſo few in Number, that my Readers may apprehend they do not deſerve ſo particular an Account; but when they find St. Chryſoſtome, St. Jerome and St. Auguſtine, of that Number, they will not only ceaſe to wonder that I have written ſo largely on them, but will be in pain to conceive how I could give a detail of their Works in ſo few pages; the World is ſo ſtrongly prejudiced in their Favour, and has conceived ſo high an Eſteem for them, that I doubt not in the leaſt, but it will be pleaſed, to find here a faithful and exact Abridgment of them, and will be ſo far from reproaching me for being too prolix in this part of the Work, that it will rather charge me with being over conciſe: I believed notwithſtanding I ought to obſerve a juſt Medium; and in examining the Works of theſe great Saints, I have endeavoured to ſay enough to make their Character thoroughly known, without entering too much into Minute particulars; tho' in every part of the Work we find more Authors named and more Years run over, yet we will no where meet with ſo great and agreeable Subjects, nor ſee any Authors that equal or even compare with thoſe mentioned here, as all that read the whole will be fully convinced.

Altho' the latter part of the fifth Century, comprehends not ſo great a Number of Famous Authors, as the firſt, yet it has many however of the firſt rank. The Greek Church produced two celebrated Antagoniſts, St. Cyril and Theodoret, whoſe Works the World is well acquainted with. The See of Rome was adorned with Biſhops of extraordinary Worth, among whom St. Leo, the moſt Eloquent of the Popes, Excells. In fine to ſay nothing of other Churches, that of France ſhone at this time with great Numbers of Illuſtrious Men, whoſe Works are equally admired for their uſefulneſs and elegance; but the Affairs which made the greateſt Figure in this part of the Century, were the Controverſies about the Myſteries of the Incarnation debated with ſo much heat, diſcuſſed with ſo much Subtilty, and decided in two general Councils. There is perhaps no part of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory more conſiderable, and alſo none of which we have more authentick Monuments. We have faithfully copied them, and with aſſiſtance of thoſe which are lately publiſhed, we have diſcover'd many particulars in this Hiſtory unknown to the Authors who have written before us.

THE AUTHOR's PREFACE TO THE Sixth CENTURY.

THE greater the Excellence was of the eccleſiaſtical Writers in the fourth and fifth Ages, the more it diſcovers the Weakneſs of thoſe in the following Centuries: For the former were like great Lights, whoſe meridian Splendor darkened the little Lights, and diſcovered the Defects of the latter. Yet there were ſome ſtill in the ſixth Age who were Men of Merit. St. Gregory is admirable as to what concerns Morality and Diſcipline: St. Fulgentius and ſome other Fathers, retained alſo ſomething of the ſublime Thought of the Ancients, and the Councils of this Age left us very excellent Canons; but it muſt be confeſs'd that the Guſt of the Time began to be depraved. Men pleaſed themſelves with ſtarting a great many unprofitable Queſtions, with explaining Myſteries by the Principles of Logick, and diſputing with dogmatical Stiffneſs about things of ſmall conſequence. Moreover, too great Credulity begun to poſſeſs the Minds of the more Learned and Wiſe. There was nothing then heard of, but Miracles, Viſions, and Apparitions; the Veneration due to Saints and their Relicks was advanced beyond juſt bounds, and a mighty buſtle was made about ſome very indifferent Ceremonies. Altho' the Councils continually renewed the ancient Canons, yet Diſcipline now grew remiſs, and the Rigor of the ancient Laws about Penance, was now very much abated. The Riches of the Church began to be burthenſome too, becauſe its Miniſters conſidered them as their own peculiar Poſſeſſions, whereas before they were look'd upon only as the Patrimony of the Poor. This obliged the Councils of this Age to make ſo great a number of Canons about the Diſtribution and Preſervation of theſe Poſſeſſions; which was a Matter wholly new, about which there were never any Canons made before this time. In the Latin Church the Obligation to live in Celibacy, was extended as low as to Subdeacons; but to free their Behaviour from all Suſpicion, ſhe was forced to renew very often, and with particular Circumſtances, the ancient Canons, which forbid Clergymen to keep ſtrange Women in their Houſes. Conteſts and Canvaſſings for obtaining Biſhopricks were very common, and many were promoted to them, who had neither Knowledge, Merit, nor Capacity. The Church of Rome was thrice diſturbed with the Schiſms of Anti-popes, and the Sees of Alexandria and Antioch were frequently the Prey of the Ambitious. The eaſtern and weſtern Churches begun to be divided; ſome Popes pretended to ſuch Rights and Prerogatives as their Predeceſſors never thought of, and there wanted not Flatterers, who endeavoured to perſuade them, that they were independent upon, and ſuperior to Councils: But the more holy rejected theſe falſe Maxims, and aſſerted their greateſt Glory to conſiſt in maintaining the Laws of the Church.

Yet it cannot be denied but this Age had alſo its own peculiar Advantages. In it the Doctrine of the Church was explained with all poſſible Exactneſs; the African Biſhops defended the Faith with a Conſtancy and Boldneſs equal to that of the primitive Biſhops: The Popes in it ſhew'd much Prudence, Conduct and Charity in the moſt difficult Times; and the eaſtern Biſhops diſcovered great Subtilty and Sharpneſs of Wit in the Diſputes they had among themſelves, and with the Occidentaliſts. The weſtern Councils made very good Laws, concerning the Diſcipline of the Church, which are ſtill obſerved to this day. They regulated the Ceremonies and Rites of divine Service, the Degrees of Conſanguinity within which 'tis unlawful to contract Marriage, the Qualifications requiſite for entring into Orders, the Impediments which render Perſons incapable of receiving them, and many other things of this nature. Laſtly, the monaſtical Order was perfected in the Eaſt by the Laws of the Emperors, and divers pious Writings; and in the Weſt by many Rules, and particularly by that of St. Benedict, whoſe Order in a little time ſpread, not only into Italy, but alſo into France and England.

I ſhould here conclude this Advertiſement, but that I think my ſelf obliged to precaution the Reader againſt a Doubt which has been ſtarted ſince the Impreſſion of this Tome againſt ſome Authors contained in it, whoſe Works all the Criticks have hitherto received as moſt authentick Monuments. 'Tis in a Writing, entituled, A Defence of the Letter of St. Chryſoſtom to Caſarius, p. 78. He has alſo, ſays the Author of this Writing, added moreover Facundus; he has explained his Words agreeably to the Sentiments of the African Church, becauſe he who forged this Work under his Name, would not have it thought that he was of any other Judgment. Yet P. H. was convinced from thence, that it was a forged Piece, though he choſe rather to follow for ſome time the common Opinion, becauſe he muſt be reſerved in declaring who is the genuine Author of a Work. But ſince I know the Original of his Secret and his Proofs, I am willing to make you now my Confident in this particular. Know then, that Facundus, Liberatus, Marius Mercator, Victor of Tunona, Caſſiodorus, to whom ſo many Works are attributed, excepting only his Formularies, the Treatiſe of the Soul, and his Commentaries upon the Pſalms, and Iſidore, who who is thought to be the Author of the Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers: Know then, I ſay, that all theſe pretended Africans, Italians, Spaniards, with ſome others, were born in France, and are not near ſo old as they are believed to be. I will tell you at ſome time hereafter the Reaſons I have to reckon them among forged Writings.

If he to whom this Opinion is attributed were an ordinary Perſon, his Judgment might be deſpiſed as not being founded upon any Proof: But becauſe P. H. is an Author famous for Learning and Worth, whoſe Reputation may make ſome Impreſſion upon the Mind of the Reader, it will be convenient to produce the Proofs, upon which the Monuments, which he is ſaid to reject, are founded.

We ſhall begin with the Treatiſe of illuſtrious Men, written by Iſidore of Sevil, which gives teſtimony to the Truth of the Books of Facundus, and of the Chronicle of Victor of Tunona. Never was Book atteſted to be genuine by Authors more worthy of Credit. The firſt of them is Braulio Biſhop of Saragoſa, the Friend and Cotemporary of Iſidore: This Biſhop ſurviving him, made his Elogy, and the Catalogue of his Works, and there he has reckoned among the reſt, The Book of illuſtrious Men, to which we have added, ſays he, what I ſaid juſt now about it. The Authority of the Witneſs cannot be rejected, nor can his Teſtimony be called in queſtion; the former is unqueſtionable, and the other has all the Characters of Truth that can be deſired. He ſpeaks of the Works of St. Iſidore, as one that was very well acquainted with them; he obſerves that it was at his Requeſt that this Author undertook the Book of Etymologies, that he had left it imperfect, and only divided it into Titles: He ſpeaks of Iſidore alſo in ſuch a manner, as ſufficiently diſcovers that he had ſeen him, and had been his Friend.

The ſecond Witneſs for this Book of Iſidore of Sevil, is Ildephonſus of Toledo, who may have ſeen Iſidore; for Iſidore died in 636, and Ildephonſus was ordained Biſhop in 658. This laſt wrote a Book of illuſtrious Men, in the Preface to which he obſerves, that he did it to continue the Works of St. Jerome, Gennadius and Iſidore. To theſe two Witneſſes may be added Honorius of Autun, who abridged the Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and their Works, and tranſcribed from St. Jerome in the firſt Book, from Gennadius in the ſecond, and from Iſidore in the third. I do not relate the Teſtimony of the Chronicle of Iſidore of Paca concerning this Work, becauſe it is not an unqueſtionable Monument.

If we ſhould ſet aſide theſe Witneſſes, and conſult the Book it ſelf of Iſidore, we muſt judge very favourably of it; for it has not any Mark of Forgery; the Stile of it is not different from that of his other Works, it contains nothing but what agrees with Hiſtory; the Authors mentioned in it are genuine, the greateſt part of the Books which it mentions are ſtill extant. It cannot be ſaid to be the Work of an Author born in France, ſince it appears, that he chiefly inſiſts upon the Writers of Spain, and that the Hiſtory and People of that Country are beſt known to him. He relates alſo ſome Particulars concerning the Writers of his own Time, which no ways appear to be fabulous, and which could not be known but by an Author of that Time and Country. You need only read the laſt Writers he mentions to be convinced of this. Laſtly, the Manuſcripts of this Work were found in Spain, from which Garcias publiſhed it. There are many of them yet extant; there was one at Coria, into which was inſerted by a Miſtake the Work of another Author, who made a Catalogue of twelve Writers: But the other Manuſcripts contain nothing but the Books of Illuſtrious Men by Iſidore and Ildephonſus, with their Names at the beginning. Theſe are all the Proofs that can be had that any Work is genuine.

It ſeems that they had never called in queſtion the Authority of Iſidore, but that they might have ſome pretence to reject the Writings of Facundus, and the Chronicle of Victor of Tunona, which are mentioned by Iſidore. They ſaw well enough, that if the Book of Iſidore was genuine, they could not doubt but theſe Monuments were authentical: And for the ſame Reaſon they ſhould have carried on their Conjectures to Ildephonſus alſo; but either they durſt not, or they forgot it, and ſo the Authority of Iſidore ſtands good ſtill, and conſequently that of Victor of Tunona and Facundus cannot be queſtion'd. But tho' we could imagine, that Iſidore's Book of Illuſtrious Men is ſuppoſititious, yet I believe they dare not ſay the ſame of his Books, called Origines. Now in the laſt Chapter of the fifth Book of this Work, he mentions the Chronicle of Victor of Tunona. Ado Biſhop of Vienna does alſo mention it in the beginning of his Chronicle, and Otho Friſigenſis in his Hiſtory, Book 5. chap. 4. But that which determines this Matter, is this, that John Abbot of Biclarum, an Author of the ſame Time, has continued the Chronicle of Victor of Tunona, as he himſelf aſſures us, at the beginning of his Chronicle. There are no Witneſſes more worthy of Credit, than thoſe who give teſtimony to the Authors who wrote before them upon the ſame Subjects: For they having carefully enquired about them, ſpeak not at a venture, nor upon the Credit of another. Gennadius gives teſtimony to St. Jerome by continuing his Work of Illuſtrious Men, St. Iſidore to Gennadius, and Ildephonſus to St. Iſidore: St. Jerome alſo gave teſtimony to the Chronicle of Euſebius, by continuing it. Proſper followed them, after him came Victor of Tunona, and laſtly, John Abbot of Biclarum, who gives teſtimony to thoſe who preceded him. Honorius of Autun, and Ado of Vienna, undertake after theſe Authors to write upon the ſame Subjects; they follow them, and give teſtimony to them, as well as thoſe who come after. 'Tis not eaſy to break this Chain, and to give the Lie to ſo certain a Tradition. Laſtly, if we ſhould refer our ſelves wholly to the reading of the Chronicle of Victor of Tunona, we ſhall find nothing in it, which appears either feigned or fabulous. On the contrary, we find in it the moſt notable Tranſactions related with their proper Circumſtances, which do perfectly agree with other Hiſtories: There are many things in it which concern the Church of Africa, and particularly Victor of Tunona; and everywhere there are Marks of Ingenuity and Sincerity, which are not to be met with in the Works of Impoſtors.

We have now re-eſtabliſhed the Authority of two Witneſſes, who depoſe in favour of the Books of Facundus; for both Victor and Iſidore of Sevil make honourable mention of them. Caſſiodorus alſo ſpeaks of this Author in his Commentary upon Pſalm 138. a Work which is excepted out of the number of thoſe which are falſely attributed to Caſſiodorus. 'Tis true, he ſpeaks not there of the 12 Books, but of two others addreſſed to Juſtinian, which are probably the ſame that are mentioned in the Preface of the twelve. But this Teſtimony however informs us, that there was an African Biſhop called Facundus, who dedicated ſome Works to Juſtinian; that this Author wrote briskly and ſubtilly, Hæreticorum penetrabili ſubtilitate deſtructor, a Character which agrees very well to the twelve Books of his which ſtill remain.

But

But without ſearching for Witneſſes, we need only conſult the Work it ſelf, to be perſuaded that it is ſerious and genuine, and that it cannot be the Fiction of an Impoſtor. 'Tis plain, that he who was the Author of it, wrote at ſuch a time, when the Controverſy about the three Chapters was very freſh and warmly debated: He ſpeaks of it himſelf with much heat, as a Perſon extreamly addicted to one ſide; he appears throughly informed of all that paſſed, and he takes a great deal of pains to gather together every thing that might juſtify his Cauſe. His Exhortation alone to the Emperor Juſtinian, with which he concludes, ſufficiently diſcovers that this Emperor was then alive, and that this Work is not a Fiction: The Preface alſo confirms the ſame thing. Laſtly, if ever a Work had the infallible Marks of being genuine, this is certainly ſuch. I know not, whether they had alſo a deſign to queſtion the Letter of the ſame Facundus to Mocianus or Mucianus, but I can aſſure them that there is the ſtrongeſt Evidence that this is not the Work of an Impoſtor. It has the ſame Stile with the twelve Books, and this Stile is peculiar to this Author. There is no Writer that came after him who reſembles it; it is an Original in its kind. In a word, it is as clear as the Day, that theſe Works are a Biſhop's of Africa, who was baniſhed into the Eaſt, and lived in the time of Juſtinian, and who was one of the moſt zealous Defenders of the three Chapters. This Truth cannot be called in queſtion, but if you muſt overturn all the Rules of good Criticiſm, and render all things liable to Doubts. The very ſame almoſt is to be ſaid of the Works of Marius Mercator, and Liberatus. 'Tis true the Ancients have not mentioned theſe Works, but they have ſuch plain Marks of being genuine, and contain ſome Tranſactions ſo particular and remarkable, that no queſtion can be made of receiving them, upon the Credit of the ancient Manuſcripts, from which they were publiſhed. They have been made uſe of for clearing up many Points of eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which were unknown before theſe Authors came to light. The learned Criticks thought they had made a great Diſcovery by lighting upon them. Now theſe Men who reject them would deprive us of all that Light and clearer Knowledge which they have given us, and throw us back into the ſame Darkneſs in which we were before. This indeed is not to endeavour the Advancement of Learning.

As to Caſſiodorus, ſince they acknowledge for genuine the Formularies, the Commentary upon the Pſalms, and the Treatiſe of the Soul, I cannot ſee how they can reject the other Treatiſes which we have aſcribed to him, which have the ſame Stile, and chiefly the Book of divine Learning, which is ſo perfectly like for Method and Stile to his Treatiſe of the Soul, and where he diſcovers himſelf in ſo many places, that none but he who does wilfully blind himſelf, can doubt but it is his. To which we may add the Teſtimonies of Sigibert of Gemblours, and of other Library-keepers, and the Authority of many very good and ancient Manuſcripts.

The Proofs which we have alledged are more than ſufficient to eſtabliſh the Genuineneſs of thoſe Works, which the Author of The Defence of the Letter of Cæſarius, would have us to doubt of, upon the Opinion of P. H. I know not whether it will be confeſs'd by this learned Man; but this I know, that if he would oppoſe the Teſtimonies and Proofs which I have produced, he muſt draw from the Works themſelves Demonſtrations to the contrary. Now there is not the leaſt probability, if there were any ſuch thing, that they ſhould have eſcap'd the Notice of Father Sirmondus, Labbee, Garnier, Geberon, and Mr. Baluzius, and ſo many other able Criticks, who have examin'd theſe Authors with all poſſible Exactneſs.

But the Boldneſs wherewith he rejects theſe Monuments, is nothing in compariſon of the Judgment which is given of the Works of St. Juſtin. ['Tis alledg'd that ſome heard a little while ago from P. H. that which is not to be found in Mr. Prior, that of all the Works which go under the Name of Juſtin, there is none but the Dialogue with Tryphon which is truly his, and that all the reſt are ſuperſtitious.] It was not neceſſary to ſeek out this Inſtance, for proving that P. H. knew ſome things that are not in Mr. Prior. Many other things might have been produced which had been leſs liable to be blam'd, and many People could rather wiſh that nothing were ſaid but what is in Mr. Prior, than that ſuch a ſtrange Paradox as this ſhould be aſſerted. The two Apologies of St. Juſtin, cited by Euſebius, St. Jerome, and by all the Ancients, being ſo authentick and ſo famous, that no Perſon ever doubted of them, what greater Aſſurance can we have of the Genuineneſs of the Dialogue with Tryphon, than we have of theſe two Apologies. It ſeems to me, that if there were any room for doubting of the one or the other of theſe two Monuments, one ſhould rather doubt of the Dialogue than of the two Apologies, whereof the one has at the beginning the Name of Juſtin, and of his Father, and the place of his Birth; and the other does plainly deſcribe him. In it he mentions the Snares that were laid by him for the Philoſopher Creſcens, who was at laſt the Cauſe of his Death; as Tatianus, a Diſciple of St. Juſtin relates it in his Book to the Gentiles, where he manifeſtly alludes to the words of St. Juſtin, and cites alſo what he had ſaid in this place concerning the Deluſions of Demons. Caius, or another ancient Author who wrote againſt the Ebionites, cited by Euſebius, Book 5. cap. 12. of his Hiſtory, places St. Juſtin in the number of the Apologiſts for Religion, and cites at the ſame time Tatianus. Laſtly, Methodius in his Book of the Reſurrection, tranſcribes what St. Juſtin had ſaid of his own Country in the beginning of his Apology to Antoninus.

Theſe are Witneſſes as Authentical as can be deſired, and there are but few Monuments of Antiquity, for which the ſame Proofs can be alledged. For the moſt part Men ſatisfie themſelves with the Teſtimony of Euſebius and St. Jerome, without aſcending higher: But here we find Witneſſes cotemporary, Tatian the Diſciple of the Author, of whom the Queſtion is, and two other Authors who followed very quickly after him. If there can be any doubt, whether the Apologies of St. Juſtin be genuine or no, there is not any Monument in Antiquity which may not be made to paſs for ſuppoſititious.

I know that the Author of the Defence adds, That to his knowledge P. H. has very good proofs to ſhow, that theſe Pieces, together with Ariſteas, were contrived at the end of the ſecond Century. Theſe Proofs muſt be founded either upon the Teſtimony of the Ancients, or the Difference of Stile, or upon the Matters of Fact related in theſe Pieces, which cannot be reconciled to the Hiſtory of that time. But it does not appear, that he can have any of theſe Proofs. All ancient Authors make St. Juſtin the Author of the two Apologies, not one doubts of it, but it paſſes for a thing moſt evident among them. Tho' there ſhould be ſome difference between the Dialogue and the Apologies, it were a thing not to be wondered at, ſince theſe Works are of different natures: But on the contrary, 'tis plain that the Stile and Doctrine of theſe two Works agree very well together. There remains therefore only the hiſtorical Matters which can be alledg'd againſt them; but we have prov'd that the Emperors named at the beginning of theſe Apologies, and the Matters of Fact related in them, agree very well with the Hiſtory of the Time in which St. Juſtin flouriſhed. Beſides, P. H. could not find in the Pieces themſelves any Proofs of their Novelty, ſince he confeſſes that they were written at the End of the ſecond Age. Upon what grounds therefore can this ſo new an Opinion be founded, which robs the Church of one of the moſt excellent Monuments which it has to juſtify the Antiquity of its Liturgy.

I ſhall add no more, and perhaps what I have ſaid may be too much. All the Favour which I deſire of him who is ſaid to be of that Opinion which I have oppoſed, is to believe, that I have not done it upon any deſign to offend him, but only upon the account of defending the Works which I think to be moſt genuine. The Republick of Learning ought to enjoy an entire and perfect Liberty, and the Spirit of Tyranny and Domineering ought to be baniſh'd out of it. Whatever Rank ſome hold in it, we ought never to be offended becauſe others are not of our Opinion, eſpecially when it is new. 'Tis a bad way for any Man to defend himſelf, by treating his Adverſary with Contempt, by comparing him to Zoilus, and calling himſelf a Homer. He muſt bring good Proofs of his Opinion, and refute ſolidly the Reaſons of others, without Bitterneſs, Paſſion, and Reproach. Thus ought thoſe to do who ſeek not their own Glory, in attacking the Reputation of others, but only endeavour to find out the Truth, and to maintain Charity.

The TRANSLATOR's PREFACE To the FIFTH CENTURY.

SINCE the Publication of the former Volumes of this Bibliotheca, in our Language, we have had an Account, that the Author was cenſured for it at Paris: It was reaſonable enough to expect, that ſome notice would be taken of that great Freedom, with which he ſo induſtriouſly maintains the Privileges of national Churches, againſt the Pretenſions of the Court of Rome; eſpecially if ever the French King ſhould command thoſe of his Clergy, who aſſiſted in the general Aſſembly in 1682. to make ſuch Submiſſions as the Court of Rome would accept of. The great Care which M. Du Pin has taken to get full Approbations from ſeveral Doctors of the Sorbonne, to every Volume, ſeem'd ſufficient to ſecure him from any ignominious Cenſures which he might have been in danger of at home; but when a Man meets with Enemies upon other Accounts, they will fall upon him for thoſe things which at any other time would not have been regarded.

It is commonly ſaid, that the firſt Beginning of M. Du Pin's Misfortune, proceeded from a private Quarrel of the Biſhop of Meaux's, who was angry with him for publiſhing a Tranſlation of the Pſalms, when himſelf had publiſh'd another not long before. This was interpreted to be a Trial of Skill in an inferior Presbyter, who preſumed to conteſt with ſo great a Biſhop, that had ſo long been famous for his Skill in writing: It touch'd M. de Meaux the more ſenſibly, becauſe M. Du Pin is ſaid to have corrected ſeveral Things in his Tranſlation, wherein the Biſhop had been miſtaken. Therefore, ſince he could take no hold of that, without expoſing himſelf, which he would not run the Hazard of, he collected ſeveral bold Expreſſions in M. Du Pin's Bibliotheca, and exhibited an Accuſation of Hereſie againſt him to the Archbiſhop of Paris, who accordingly proceeded againſt him.

This Accuſation was ſeconded by the Pope's Nuncio, who concerned himſelf ſo far in this Matter, that M. Du Pin thought it neceſſary to yield to his Dioceſan, who obliged him to retract ſeveral Propoſitions, and to mollifie others that were thought too hard, and to ſubmit his Book entirely to the Archbiſhop's Mercy. How great that was, appear'd by the Archbiſhop's Condemnation and Cenſure of M. Du Pin's Bibliotheca, printed at Paris, with M. Du Pin's Retractation annex'd to it. I have not been able to procure the Condemnation it ſelf, but the Author of the Hiſtorie des Ouvrages des Scavans, has printed an Extract out of it in his laſt Volume, which ſays, that the printed Cenſure condemns M. Du Pin's Bibliotheca, becauſe it contains, 'Several Propoſitions that are falſe, raſh, ſcan-'dalous, capable of giving Offence to pious Ears, tending to weaken the Arguments that are brought 'from Tradition for the Authority of the canonical Books, and of ſeveral Articles of Faith injurious 'to general Councils and the apoſtolick See, erroneous and leading to Hereſie; and, therefore, he for-'bids all Perſons to read it, or to keep it by them.

This Ordinance of the Archbiſhop of Paris was ſeconded by an Order of the Parliament of Paris, bearing date April 25. 1693 which ſays, 'That the Gens de Roy acquainted the Court, that they 'thought it was her Duty to inform them, that the Archbiſhop of Paris had lately condemned a 'Book, entituled, A new Bibliotheca of eccleſiaſtical Authors, written by M. Ellies Du Pin, Doctor in 'Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, becauſe it contained Propoſitions contrary to ſound Doctrine: 'That the Cognizance of every thing that relates to the Faith belonging to the Church, and the De-'ciſion of thoſe Matters to the Biſhops within their reſpective Dioceſſes, the Suppreſſion of the Books 'which they condemn, and the afflictive Puniſhment of thoſe who perſiſt in Opinions which have 'been cenſured by the Biſhops, belong to the King's Officers, and principally to the Court, the 'Depoſitary of ſovereign Juſtice: That they have nothing to object againſt the Author of this Book, 'becauſe he has ſubmitted himſelf to the Judgment of his Biſhop, and becauſe it appears by a Writing, 'which he has publiſhed, that he has retracted ſome of thoſe Propoſitions which he had advanced, 'and explained the reſt in ſuch a Manner as frees them from all Suſpicion of Error: That they are 'willing to believe, that the Faults which M. Ellies Du Pin fell into, and which deſerved the Cen'ſure pronounced againſt him, proceeded rather from the Greatneſs of the Work that he undertook, 'than from any form'd Deſign of introducing new Opinions; and, beſides, that there is a great deal 'of Learning in his Books: That they were obliged to take Notice to the Court upon this Occaſion, 'of the Care, the Application and Vigilance, which the Archbiſhop of Paris ſhews to preſerve 'ſound Doctrine in his Dioceſs, and to ſtifle every thing, in the Beginning, which may diſturb the 'Peace and Tranquility of the Church. And therefore, they omitted nothing in thoſe Stations in 'which they had the Honour to be placed, that could ſecond ſuch good Deſigns; and this it was that 'obliged them to demand of the Court, that thoſe Books that the Archbiſhop had condemned, 'might be ſuppreſſed; and that all Bookſellers ſhould be forbidden to ſell them, till they ſhall be 'corrected according to the Writing of the ſaid Du Pin, annexed to the Archbiſhop's Cenſure, and that the 'Corrections ſhall have been approved by him the ſaid Archbiſhop. The Gens de Roy withdrawing, the 'Court took the Matter into Deliberation, and it was reſolved, that all Bookſellers and others, 'ſhould be commanded not to ſell or keep by them any Copies of the ſaid Books, which have hither'to been printed; and it was ordered, that they ſhould be brought forthwith into the Greffe of the 'ſaid Court there to be ſuppreſſed; with very expreſs Prohibitions to all Perſons to reprint that Book 'in any Manner whatſoever for the time to come, without the Advice and Conſent of the Archbi'ſhop of Paris. So far the printed Extract out of the Regiſter of the Parliament of Paris.

If we may judge of all thoſe things which M. Du Pin has retracted or mollified by that Specimen in the Hiſtorie des Ouvrages des Scavans, the Proceedings againſt him have been ſpiteful and malicious, rather to ſatisfie thoſe particular Perſons who are concerned to ſee his Credit leſſened, than becauſe he really deſerved ſo rough a Treatment. He acknowledges, for inſtance, that the Title of Mother of God, given to the bleſſed Virgin, is not only an innocent Expreſſion, but was always conſecrated to her, and ought to be uſed; that when he ſaid, that there are no poſitive Authorities for Purgatory in the Writings of the Fathers of the three firſt Centuries, he expreſſed himſelf too generally; that when he ſays, that S. Cyprian was the firſt that ſpoke very clearly of the neceſſity of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, he did not pretend to ſay, that the Fathers did not ſpeak clearly concerning it, before him; that when he ſaid, that general Councils called about Matters of Faith, have ſeldom given Peace to the Church, he did not mean, that Councils do not bring Peace, or that they ever take the wrong ſide: Theſe are all the doctrinal Retractations which the Author of the above-mentioned Extract has taken notice of; and then adds, That his Explications are often very much forced.

It is evident enough, from this ſhort Specimen, that they had no Inclination to ſpare him, but to make him ſmart for all that Liberty with which he made his Abridgments, and paſſed his Cenſures upon the Writings of the ancienteſt Fathers of the Church. In Juſtice, they ought alſo to have proceeded againſt thoſe Doctors of the Sorbonne who have given their Approbations, that are prefixed to the ſeveral Volumes, wherein they commend the Faithfulneſs and Judiciouſneſs of his Extracts, and recomend his Work as extreamly uſeful to all ſorts of Men: Theſe Doctors certainly knew very well what they did; they knew what uſe Proteſtants would make of this Work and of their Approbations; yet this did not, it ſeems, deter them from giving ſuch Characters as no Man could give who was not himſelf in earneſt, or at leaſt would have others believe him to be ſo: Accordingly the firſt Volume, againſt which there has been the greateſt Clamour, was not animadverted upon for near ſix Years

It appears by the Order of the Parliament, that that Court acted only ex Officio, and that that illuſtrious Body has a great Value for M, Du Pin. Otherwiſe the Gens de Roy would not have made ſuch Excuſes for a Man, upon whoſe Writings they are then paſſing Cenſure; but the Pope's Nuncio is at preſent too great a Man to be deny'd Satisfaction, when he may be gratified with ſo ſmall a Sacrifice; and it is probable, that the Archbiſhop of Paris, who went along with his Maſter in the greateſt Oppoſitions which he made to Pope Innocent XI. was willing to embrace this Opportunity to ſhew the Pope how zealouſly he is concerned for the Intereſts of the See of Rome; eſpecially, when he can gratifie a private Revenge at the ſame time.

In the ſecond Edition of the firſt Volume of M. Du Pin's Bibliotheca, when he gives an Account of the Condemnation of Paulus Samoſatenus by the Council of Antioch, he has this Expreſſion, 'Enfin apres avoir accuſe de tous les Vices Ordinaires aux Eveques des grands Sieges, ils diſent qu'ils l'ont con'damne principalement a Paris qu'it renouvelloit l' Erreur d' Artemas. In ſhort after they have accuſed him of all thoſe Vices that are ordinary in Biſhops of great Sees, they ſay they condemned him, principally at Paris, becauſe he revived the Error of Artemas. Theſe Words at Paris, make the latter Part of the Period Non-ſenſe; and could ſignify nothing to the Author's Purpoſe: If they had been Senſe it ſhould be read, principalement parce qu'il renouvelloit; principally becauſe he revived: And ſo it is in the Engliſh [edit. 1. p. 193. edit. 2. p. 173.] This unfortunate Erratum coming juſt after a very ſevere Character of Paulus Samoſatenus, out of Euſebius, put every Body upon making a Parallel between this Ancient Biſhop of Antioch and the preſent Archbiſhop of Paris, and if the Reports that are ſpread againſt this Archbiſhop are true, the Compariſon was too juſt to be overlooked; and it is ſaid at Paris, that this Sentence, thus faultily printed in the ſecond Edition, did M. Du Pin a great deal of Miſchief

A Cenſure thus carried on, will be ſo little to our Author's Diſadvantage, that few Perſons will think the worſe of this Book upon that Account; it is his Misfortune that he lives in a Country where he had no other way to ſave his Liberty, and perhaps his Life, but by yielding to the Storm: And, according to the Principles of his Religion, he was bound to ſubmit to his Dioceſan. But this will leſſen the Authority of any Books that M. Du Pin may hereafter print upon eccleſiaſtical Matters, becauſe Fear of giving Offence will make him extreamly cautious, and he will dread a ſevere Inquiſition that may ſet upon every thing which he ſhall write.

Thoſe

Thoſe who are unacquainted with Antiquity will be hereby further confirmed in their Opinion, of the Impartiality of our Author, in his Abridgment of the Writings of theſe ancient Doctors of the Church, when they ſee how ſeverely he has been dealt withal upon that Account: Otherwiſe it is very probable that ſome might think him too favourable in his Accounts of Monkery, Invocation of Saints and ſome other Superſtitions which aroſe very early, and which were a Means of Introducing in a Courſe of Ages, ſuch enormous Abuſes into the Church; but tho' ſome Errors have a more ancient original than is commonly believed, yet that ought not to be wondered at by any Man, who believes that the Church was never Infallible ſince the Apoſtles Days. Still, as we read downwards, we ſhall ſee how that primitive Simplicity, which adorn'd the Profeſſion of the firſt Chriſtians, who were almoſt always under Fear of Perſecution, leſſened and wore away. Thoſe who were ſenſible of the Decay of the primitive Zeal, ſought to retrieve it by placing great Merit in the Practice of monaſtical Auſterities, whereby they hoped to obtain that Reward which was believ'd to be peculiarly reſerved for thoſe who laid down their Lives for the Name of Chriſt: This put them upon all thoſe Opinions that tended to mortifie, not only forbidden Luſts, but alſo the allowed Appetites of Humane Nature, which the chriſtian Religion intended to regulate, and not to remove. And when thoſe who could not be Martyrs, ſaw what Honours were paid to thoſe who had formerly ſuffered for the Truth, it raiſed in them an Emulation to do ſomething for the ſake of Jeſus Chriſt, that ſhould be more diſagreeable to Fleſh and Blood than Death it ſelf. This, I believe, is the moſt probable Reaſon of that great Ardour wherewith ſo very many Perſons bound themſelves under Vows to embrace a monaſtical Life, in the fourth and fifth Ages of the Church. The firſt Monks were ſome Ægyptians, who in the Tenth Perſecution fled into the Deſerts of Thebais; there they accuſtomed themſelves to Retirement, and Uſe taught them to reliſh the Satisfactions of a contemplative State: When the Storm was over, they returned home, and eaſily perſuaded others, who had then, as they thought, no other way of ſhewing their Zeal for Jeſus Chriſt, than to embrace this auſtere Courſe of Life. In thoſe warm Climates this was not ſo extraordinary difficult: Thoſe eaſtern People could live upon very little, better than other Men; ſo that thoſe terrible Mortifications, mentioned in the oldeſt aſcetical Books, were not ſo impracticable, as we, at this diſtance of Place and Time may be apt to think them. The Monk in Sulpicius Severus, who heard Poſthumianus give an Account of the Abſtinences of the eaſtern Monks; cries out, Edacitas in Græcis Gula eſt, in Gallis natura. Exceſſive Eating is Luxury in a Greek, it is Nature in a Gaule: And though one can hardly believe all that Poſthumianus there relates of the Abſtinence of the Monks of Nitria and Cyrene, yet it is moſt certain that they put a mighty Force upon Nature, ſuch a one as nothing but the modern Practices of ſome of the Mahometan Derviſes could make us believe to be poſſible.

But though the Honours paid to Martyrs, which gave Riſe to an Opinion, That they could intercede for us in Heaven, or at leaſt hear our Prayers, together with the Love which moſt Men then ſhewed for a ſingle and a retired Life, may ſeem too exceſſive, yet the Opinions and Practices of theſe Ages were, generally ſpeaking, very venerable. One ſees a great and a ſerious Concern for the Truths of the Goſpel in almoſt all their Writings; one ſees a ſincere Reſpect paid by Men of all Parties, to the Cenſures of the Church, and to the Perſons of thoſe with whom they were entruſted. They always diſtinguiſhed between the Faults of Men and their Character and Employment, and when they puniſhed the one, they took care not to caſt a Diſreſpect upon the other; by which Means they preſerved a real Veneration for Holy Things in their Minds, though their Diviſions run as high, and were as eagerly managed as ever they have been ſince. This is not the only Age wherein Men have met with Temptations, and have ſhewn their Frailty, by being too weak to withſtand them; ſo that an Acquaintance with the Opinions and Practices of theſe earlier Ages, before a general Corruption had infected the Church, will be of great Uſe to thoſe who value Religion and Godlineſs for their own ſakes, when it ſuggeſts ſuch Thoughts as can only be effectual to reſtore that Senſe of Piety which is ſo generally loſt amongſt us.

A PRELIMINARY DISSERTATION ABOUT THE AUTHORS OF THE BIBLE.

SECT. I.

Of the Authors of the Books of the Old Teſtament.

OF all thoſe (a) Paradoxes, that have been advanced in our Age, there is none, in my Judgment, more raſh and dangerous than the Opinion of thoſe, who have preſumed to deny, that Moſes was the Author of the Pentateuch: For what can be more raſh than to deny Matter of Fact, that has been eſtabliſhed by expreſs Texts of Holy Scripture (b), by the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt (c), by the Conſent of all Nations (d), and by the Authentick Teſtimonies of the moſt Ancient Authors (e)? And what can be more dangerous, than to bid Defiance to Antiquity, and conſequently deſtroy the Authority of thoſe Books, which are, as it were, the very Foundations of our Religion (f)? And yet this they do, who dare affirm that the Books of the Pentateuch are not written by Moſes, and endeavour to prove it by ſuch weak Conjectures, that 'tis impoſſible for a Man of tolerable ſenſe to be convinced by them (g). For, allowing all that they alledge were true, (h) they could only prove, the ſame thing has happen'd to the Books of Moſes, which has happen'd almoſt to all the Books of Ancient Authors, viz. That ſome few Words, Names and Terms have been altered or added to render the Narrative more intelligible to thoſe that lived in the following Ages. For example: We find the Ancient Names of Cities are ſometimes changed for thoſe they received afterwards, becauſe they would have been no longer known by their Ancient Appellations. There are likewiſe ſome ſhort Explications inſerted into theſe Sacred Books, to illuſtrate what was ſaid by the Author: And, in ſhort, ſome neceſſary Paſſages have been added to compleat the Hiſtory. Theſe things are common, and we find Examples of it in the Books of Homer, Herodotus, and almoſt all the Ancient Hiſtorians, and yet no Body is inclined for all this to reject their Books, as if they did not belong to thoſe whoſe Names they bear. Why then ſhould we not ſay the ſame thing of the Books of the Pentateuch, which have been more conſtantly aſſigned to Moſes, than the Poems of the Iliads, or the Odyſſes to Homer, or the Hiſtories of Herodotus and Thucydides to thoſe by whoſe Names they are known? Let us examine all the Reaſons that are alledged againſt the Antiquity of the Pentateuch, ſince they imagine they are unanſwerable, (which yet is very falſe, as we ſhall make appear in theſe following Diſcourſes) and we ſhall ſee they only prove that ſome Names of Cities or Countries are changed, ſome few Words inſerted to explain ſome Difficulties; and laſtly, that the account of Moſes's Death has been put in ſince, which was but neceſſary to finiſh the Hiſtory of the Pentateuch. We ought therefore to affirm it for a certain Truth, That Moſes was the Author of the firſt Five Books of the Bible, called the Pentateuch.

There are given to each of theſe Five Books, (which have their Names in Hebrew from the firſt Word in each Book) there are given 'em, I ſay, ſuch Names as have a relation to the Subject. The firſt is called Geneſis, becauſe it begins with the Hiſtory of the Creation of the World. It contains beſides that the Genealogy of the Patriarchs, the Hiſtory of the Flood, a Catalogue of the Deſcendants of Noah down to Abraham, the Life of Abraham, of Jacob and Joſeph, and the Hiſtory of the Poſterity of Jacob, down to the Death of Joſeph. So that this Book comprehends the Hiſtory of 2369 Years, or thereabouts, following the account of the Years of the Patriarchs, as we find them in the Hebrew Text.

The Second is called Exodus, becauſe the principal Subject of it is the Departure of the Children of Iſrael out of Egypt, and all that paſſed in the Wilderneſs under Moſes's Conduct, for an Hundred forty five Years, viz. from the Death of Joſeph, to the Building of the Tabernacle. We find there a Deſcription of the Plagues wherewith Egypt was afflicted; an Abridgment of the Religion and Laws of the Iſraelites; together with the admirable Precepts of the Decalogue.

The third is called Leviticus, becauſe it contains the Laws, the Ceremonies, and Sacrifices of the Religion of the Jews: All which has a particular Relation to the Levites, to whom God gave the charge of all thoſe things that concern'd the Ceremonial part of that Religion.

The fourth is called Numbers, becauſe it begins with the Numbring of the Children of Iſrael that came out of Egypt, and concludes with the Laws that were given the People of Iſrael during the Thirty nine Years of their ſojourning in the Wilderneſs.

Deuteronomy, that is to ſay, the ſecond Law, is ſo called, becauſe it is, as it were, a Repetition of the firſt: For after Moſes has deſcribed in a few Words the principal Actions of the Iſraelites in the Wilderneſs, he recites abundance of the Precepts of the Law.

(i) We don't certainly know when theſe Books were compoſed by Moſes, or which was firſt written: However, 'tis very certain, that Deuteronomy was written laſt, in the Fortieth Year of the Departure out of Egypt, and a little before the Death of Moſes.

We can't ſo certainly tell who are the Authors of the other Books of the Bible: Some of 'em we only know by Conjecture, and others there are of which we have no manner of Knowledge.

It is not certain that the Book of (k) Joſhuah was written by himſelf; for as it is obſerved by the Author of the Abridgment of the Scripture attributed to St. Athanaſius, this Title is ſet at the Head of that Book, not ſo much to diſcover the Author, as to make the Subject of it known; becauſe it treats of War, and other things that happen'd under the Conduct of Joſhuah, after the ſame manner as the Books of Judges, of Kings, of Tobit, of Judith, are ſo called, becauſe they give an Account of the Lives and Actions of thoſe whoſe Names they bear. But though 'tis commonly believed that this Book was written by Joſhuah, and this Opinion ſeems to be countenanced by ſome Words of the laſt Chapter, where it is ſaid that Joſhuah wrote all theſe things in the Book of the Law: Nevertheleſs we muſt affirm, that 'tis certain, that Theodoret, and ſome others among the Ancients, are not of this Opinion, and that we have Reaſons ſtrong enough to make us doubt whether he is the Author or no. However it is, 'tis a moſt unqueſtionable Truth, that this Book is ancient, and that if it is not Joſhuah's, it was written either by his particular Order, or a little after his Death. It carries the Hiſtory of the People of Iſrael Seventeen Years beyond the Death of Moſes, or thereabout.

We yet know leſs of the Author of the Book of Judges. Some with the Talmudical Doctors attribute it to Samuel, ſome to Hezekiah, others to Ezrah. In ſhort, ſome Perſons are of Opinion, that every Judge wrote his own Memoirs, which were afterward collected by Samuel or Ezrah. Be it as it will, the Book is certainly ancient, and (l) admit it was put into the condition we now find it by Ezrah, yet we cannot reaſonably queſtion its being compoſed from ancient Memoirs. It contains the Hiſtory of what happen'd to the Iſraelites from the Death of Joſhuah, to that of Sampſon. We cannot preciſely tell what Number of Years it takes in, tho' 'tis commonly fixed to ſomething above 300 Years.

The Book of Ruth is a kind of an Appendix to the Book of Judges, which is the reaſon why the Jews made but one Book of theſe two, and for the ſame reaſon 'tis commonly believed that one Author compoſed both. 'Tis certain that the Hiſtory of Ruth comes up to the times of the Judges, but we don't know the time exactly. We may aſſign it to the time of Samgar, Eight and twenty Years, or thereabouts, after the Death of Joſhuah.

The two firſt Books of Kings are called by the Hebrews the Book of Samuel, which has occaſioned the Opinion that they were in part written by that Prophet (m); that is to ſay, that he compoſed the Four and twenty firſt Chapters, and that the Prophets, Gad and Nathan afterwards compleated the Work. This is the Opinion of the Talmudiſts and Iſidore, and is founded upon theſe Words of the Chronicles, 1 Chron. 29. 29. Now the Acts of David the King, firſt and laſt, behold they are written in the Book of Samuel the Seer, and in the Book of Nathan the Prophet, and in the Book of Gad the Seer. Theodoret and Diodorus of Tarſus ſeem to be of this Opinion, when they ſay, that it was the cuſtom of all Prophets amongſt the Hebrews to write down whatever happen'd in their time; and that upon this ſcore it is, that the firſt Book of Kings is called the Propheſie of Samuel. Others pretend that theſe Books are of a later date, becauſe we find ſome ways of ſpeaking there which don't belong to that time, but perhaps they were added ſince; and it is very probable that both theſe Books are very ancient. However, 'tis certain that they were written before the Chronicles. The firſt of theſe two Books of Kings contains that which paſſed under the Government of Eli, of Samuel, and under the Reign of Saul: The ſecond, is the Hiſtory of David's Government. The two laſt Books of Kings, contain the Hiſtory of the Reign of Salomon Son of David, and afterwards the Reigns of the ſeveral Kings of Iſrael, and Judah, down to the Deſtruction of Iſrael, and the Captivity of Judah. We don't know who is the Author of theſe two Books. Some, as the Talmudiſts for inſtance, attribute them to Jeremiah, others to Iſaiah, and the greateſt part to Ezrah. 'Tis a Collection, or an Hiſtorical Abridgment drawn out of ſeveral Memoirs and Books of the Prophets, which are there frequently quoted. Theſe Four Books of Kings contain the Hiſtory of almoſt Six hundred Years.

The two Books of Chronicles are called Paralipomena by the Greeks, becauſe they contain ſome Circumſtances that were omitted in the other Hiſtorical Books. The Hebrews call them Diaries, and St. Jerome, Chronicles. 'Tis commonly believed that Ezrah wrote them, and that he drew this Abridgment partly from thoſe Books of the Bible which we have, and partly from other Memoirs that he had at the time of his writing. St. Jerome thinks that this was the Book that is cited in the Book of Kings, under the Name of The Book of the Sayings of the Kings of Judah. But 'tis evident that it is not, and that the Book of Chronicles was written ſince that of Kings, as we prove by the laſt Words of that Book, where mention is made of the Deliverance of the Jews by Cyrus.

'Tis commonly believed that it was Ezrah, who compoſed the firſt Book of thoſe that carry his Name; and indeed Ezrah ſpeaks there in his own Perſon (n). Huetius pretends that the firſt Chapters of that Book were written by another Author, but his Conjecture is not ſtrong enough to make us quit the common Opinion (o). The ſecond Book belongs to Nehemiah without queſtion (p), for he declares himſelf the Author of it in the beginning of the Book, and always ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon. The firſt of theſe two Books contains the Hiſtory of the Deliverance of the Jews from their Captivity, and their Re-eſtabliſhment in Judea from the firſt Year of Cyrus, to the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus, for 82 or 83 Years. And the ſecond begins from the twentieth Year of the aforeſaid Artaxerxes, and reaches to the Reign of Darius his Son, Sirnamed the Baſtard, which comprehends the Hiſtory of the Jews for thirty or one and thirty Years.

'Tis commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own Hiſtory themſelves (q): But this Opinion is very uncertain. 'Tis generally believed that this Book was at firſt writ in Chaldee, that St. Jerome tranſlated it into Latin, and that this Hiſtory was afterwards put into Hebrew. There are two different Hebrew Editions of it, one ſet out by Munſter, and the other by Fagius. There is alſo an ancient Greek Edition, out of which the Syriac Verſion was compoſed. Tobit was one of the Iſraelites that were carried out of Samaria by King Shalmanezer.

The Author of the Book of Judith is yet leſs known, as Iſidore has obſerved. Some believe it was written by Eliachim, or Joachim High Prieſt of the Jews, of whom mention is made in that Book: Others ſay it was Joſhuah the Son of Joſedec, the Companion of Zorobabel: Others, in ſhort, maintain that it was not written till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, before the Maccabees time. 'Tis written in Chaldee, and that has made Huetius think that it was written during the Babylonian Captivity. St. Jerome tranſlated it into Latin, rather following the Senſe, as he tells us, than the bare Letter. The Greek Verſion which we have is very different from the Latin, and ſeems to be more literal. The time wherein the Hiſtory mention'd in this Book did happen, is no leſs uncertain (r). Some place it before the Captivity, others after, and ſome have the boldneſs to ſay, That whatever is in this Book, is only a Parable and Allegory, that has nothing of Hiſtorical Truth in it.

The time, and the Author of the Hiſtory of Heſter, are alſo very uncertain (ſ). St. Epiphanius, St. Auſtin, and St. Iſidore, attribute this Book to Ezrah. Others to Joachim High Prieſt of the Jews, Grand-Son of Joſedec. Moſt Men ſay that Mordecai wrote it (t), who is ſo often mentioned in it. The Talmudiſts attribute it to the Synagogue. The ſix laſt Chapters, that are found in the Greek, are not in the Original Hebrew. Origen, in his Letter to Africanus, believes it was loſt. Grotius pretends that theſe Chapters were compoſed by the Greek Proſelytes. Sixtus Senenſis ſays they were taken out of Joſephus. Bellarmine, and ſome others, maintain, that there are two Hebrew Editions of this Book, one larger than the other, where theſe laſt Chapters are found, and the other the ſame with what we have. Some ſay the Hiſtory of Heſter happen'd under Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes; others place it under Xerxes; and laſtly, there are ſome who place it under Ciaxares King of the Medes. The firſt Opinion ſeems to be moſt probable.

The time wherein Job lived, is yet more difficult to diſcover; and the Author of the Book, who has compiled his Hiſtory, is no leſs unknown (u). Some, as Origen, St. Gregory, and Suidas, attribute it to Job himſelf: Others believe that Moſes was the Author of it, or that he tranſlated it into Hebrew. St. Gregory Nazianzen attributes attributes it to Salomon; others to Iſaiah, or to ſome one of the Prophets. All theſe Opinions are built but upon very ſlight Conjectures. Wherefore 'tis better, in my Opinion, to ſuſpend ones Judgment, than to aſſert any of the above-mentioned Opinions that are equally uncertain. But at the ſame time we muſt not fall into the oppoſite Errour, by ſaying with the Talmudiſts, and ſome other Criticks, that the Hiſtory of Job is an entire continued Fiction (x). The Perſons and Nations that are there called by their proper Names, the Teſtimonies of Tobit, of Ezekiel, and St. James, with the Opinions of the Ancient Fathers, ought to convince us that the Foundation of this Hiſtory is real and true. But the manner wherein 'tis related, the Converſation that is held with the Devil, the Prolixity of the Diſcourſes of Job's Friends, and of what Job himſelf delivered in his miſerable eſtate, ought to make us acknowledge, that this Hiſtory is mightily amplified and adorned with ſeveral feigned Circumſtances, to render the Story more uſeful and agreeable. 'Tis commonly believed that Job lived before Moſes, or at leaſt in his time, and that the Hiſtory related in this Book happen'd during the time when the Iſraelites were in the Deſert, becauſe there is not a Word ſpoken there about the Written Law. Some there are who make Job to deſcend from Nahor, the Brother of Abraham, but (yz) others from Eſau. The laſt Opinion ſeems to me to be the moſt probable, becauſe 'tis ſupported by the Authority of a very ancient Addition, which is to be found at the end of the Greek Edition of the Book of Job.

Though the Pſalms are commonly called The Pſalms of David, or rather The Book of the Pſalms of David; yet 'tis certain, as St. Jerome has obſerved in many places, that they are not all of 'em his (aa), and that there are ſome of them which were written long after his Death. 'Tis therefore a Collection of Songs that was made by Ezrah. It is a difficult matter to ſay who are the Authors (bb), and to diſtinguiſh thoſe that were made by David, from thoſe that were compoſed by others. But whoever were the Author 'tis certain, as Theodoret has judiciouſly obſerved, that they were compoſed by Perſons inſpired by God, and that they are cited under that Character both in the Old and New Teſtament (cc).

The Authors of the following Books are better known; the Proverbs or Parables belong to Salomon, whoſe Name is written in the beginning of that Book, The Proverbs of Salomon the Son of David. 'Tis obſerved in the 25th Chapter, that the following Parables are ſtill Salomon's, but that they were collected by ſome Perſons choſen by the King Hezekiah; Theſe are alſo the Proverbs of Salomon, which the Men of Hezekiah King of Judah copied out. The 30th Chapter begins with theſe Words. The Words of Agur the Son of Jakeh, which ſhew that this Chapter is an Addition made to the Proverbs of Salomon by one Agur, as is eaſie to be proved, becauſe this Chapter is entirely ſeparated from the reſt, and beſides is written in another Style. In ſhort, the laſt Chapter is entituled, The Words of King Lemuel. We ought therefore to conclude, from what has been ſaid, that the 24 firſt Chapters are Salomon's Originally, that the five following ones are Extracts or Collections of his Proverbs, and that the two laſt Chapters were added afterwards.

The Book of Eccleſiaſtes is aſcribed to Salomon by all Antiquity: And yet the Talmudiſts have made Hezekiah the Author of this Book, and Grotius, (dd) upon ſome ſlight Conjectures, pretends it was compoſed by Zorobabel. It begins with theſe Words, The Words of the Preacher, the Son of David, King of Jeruſalem: Which may be applied to Hezekiah as well as to Salomon: But what is ſaid of that Wiſdom in ſeveral places, which was peculiar to him, and in the ſecond Chapter of his Riches and Power, determines that we ought rather to underſtand it of Salomon.

The Song of Songs, that is to ſay, a Song by way of Excellence, is allowed to be Salomon's by the Conſent of the Synagogue and the Church. The Talmudiſts attribute it to Ezrah, but without any Grounds.

The Book of Wiſdom is commonly ſaid to be Salomon's (ee), but this Opinion is not very probable. For, 1. This Book is not to be found in the Hebrew. 2. It was never received into the Hebrew Canon. 3. 'Tis evident, as St. Jerome has obſerved, that the Style is extreamly different from that of Salomon, and that it was compoſed by a Greek. The ſame St. Jerome obſerves, that it was commonly attributed to Philo, which we are to underſtand of an older Philo than him whoſe Works we have. However, it appears plainly, that it was compoſed by a Helleniſt Jew, who had a mind to imitate the Books of Salomon, from whom he has borrowed abundance of Thoughts.

The Preface which is before the Book of Eccleſiaſticus, and the Fifth Chapter of that Book, inform us, that the Author thereof was a Jew, named Jeſus the Son of Syrach, who compoſed it in Hebrew, and which was tranſlated into Greek by his Grand-Son. St. Jerome tells us, he ſaw in his time an Hebrew Copy of it (ff). Some of the Ancients attribute it to Salomon (gg), perhaps becauſe of the reſemblance of the Subject, and the Thoughts, which is ſo great, that 'tis viſible he deſign'd to imitate him, and that ſeveral Thoughts are taken from him.

The Books of the Prophets carry the Names of their Authors undiſputed. Iſaiah is the firſt and moſt excellent of the Prophets. He was the Son of Amos, whom we are by no means to miſtake for the Prophet of the ſame Name (hh). He Propheſied from the end of the Reign of Uzziah, to the time of Manaſſes, by whoſe Command, they ſay, he was cruelly ſlain, and ſawn aſunder with a Wooden Saw (ii). He himſelf collected into one Volume all thoſe Prophecies which he delivered under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahas and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah. Beſides theſe, he wrote a Book of the Actions of Uzziah, which is mention'd in the 2d of Chron. Chap. 26. Verſe 22. Some Apocryphal Books are aſcribed to him; amongſt others, that famous one ſo often quoted by Origen; and another, intituled, The Aſcenſion of Iſaiah, which St. Jerome, and St. Epiphanius mention; and a later one likewiſe, called, The Viſion of Iſaiah. Some have pretended that this Book of Iſaiah which we have, is only compiled out of the Works of Iſaiah; but the Conjectures which they bring to prove it, are extreamly frivolous (kk).

Jeremiah, born in a Village near Jeruſalem, of Sacerdotal Extraction, began to Propheſie about the end of the Reign of Joſiah, when he was very young, and continued his Prophecies till after the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon. He was not carried away with the other Jews into that City; but tarrying in his own Country to lament its Deſtruction, he was afterwards taken Priſoner, and carried into Egypt along with his Diſciple Baruch; where, as 'tis commonly believed, he was ſtoned to Death. The Fathers think that he always lived in the ſtate of Celibacy. We are told in the beginning of the 36 Chapter, that King Jehoiachim having burnt the Book of his Prophecies, this Prophet compoſed a new Volume larger and ſtronger than the former. He afterwards added thoſe Prophecies, which he made till the Babylonian Captivity, and thoſe which he delivered in Egypt. In the 50th and 51 Chap. he foretels all that was to come to paſs in Babylon, and theſe he tranſmitted thither by Saraiah the Son of Neriah. The 52d Chapter does not belong to him, for his Prophecies terminated at the end of the 51 Chapter, as appears by theſe Words, Thus far are the Words of Jeremiah. It was rather written by Baruch, or Ezrah, and contains an Account of taking of Jeruſalem, and of what happen'd during the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon, after the Death of Iſaiah. It ſerves to illuſtrate the Prophecies of Jeremiah, and particularly his Lamentations, which follow in order, and make another part of the Works of Jeremiah. In this laſt Book one ſees the Ruine and Deſolation of Jeruſalem painted in lively Colours, and eſpecially the Grief and Concern of the Prophet upon occaſion of that mournful Scene. It has a Preface in the Greek and Vulgar Latin, which is to be found neither in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee Paraphraſe, nor in the Syriac, and ſeems plainly to have been added to explain the Argument of the Book. In ſhort, theſe Lamentations end with a Prayer to God. The Style of Jeremiah, if we may be determined by St. Jerome's Teſtimony, is Simple in its Expreſſions, and Majeſtick in its Senſe. But this Simplicity of Language does not appear to us at preſent. On the contrary, we find him Elevated and Sublime, both in his Senſe, in the Turn, and the Majeſty of his Expreſſion.

The Propheſie of Baruch, who was the Diſciple and Secretary of Jeremiah, formerly made up but one Book with that of this Prophet. Joſephus reports that Baruch was deſcended of an Illuſtrious Family, and that he perfectly underſtood the Language of his own Country. We are told in the firſt Chapter, Verſe the firſt, that he wrote this Phropheſie in Babylon, but we don't certainly know the time (ll). The Hebrew Copy of Baruch is loſt, though we need not doubt but it was written in that Tongue. There is a Letter in the Syriac, which by ſome is attributed to Baruch, but 'tis very clear that it is written by a Chriſtian. The Epiſtle to the Captives of Babylon, which we find in Baruch, belongs to Jeremiah. The Author of the Second Book of the Maccabees has mention'd it; it is exactly the Style of that Prophet, and contains nothing but what is very agreeable to the time in which it was written.

Ezekiel, the Son of Buzi the Prieſt, having been carried away into Babylon under Jeconiah, began to Prophecy in the fifth Year of the Captivity, and was ſlain, as 'tis commonly believed, by a Prince of that Nation, whom he reproved for his Adoration of Idols. His Propheſies are dark and obſcure. St. Jerome ſays, his Style is neither very eloquent nor very mean, but between both.

Daniel, one of the Royal Family, was ſent captive into Babylon, when he was but an Infant. The Jews don't reckon him amongſt their Prophets: But the Chriſtians, following the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt, who gives him that Title in St. Matthew, Chap. 24. Verſ. 15. look upon him under that Quality and Character: And indeed there is no diſpute, but what he has wrote, deſerves the name of Prophecy, as the Jews themſelves are obliged to confeſs. But they don't give him the name of a Prophet, becauſe he lived a Life extreamly different from that of the other Prophets, and rather like one of the Great Men of Babylon: Beſides, they think that he was an Eunuch, and there is a paſſage in his Book ſeems to confirm it (mm). 'Tis certain, that the firſt Chapters of Daniel's Propheſies are undoubtedly his, though we have reaſon to doubt of the Antiquity and Truth of the two later, which contain the Hiſtory of Suſanna, and Bel and the Dragon (nn.) The four firſt Chapters in Daniel are written in Hebrew, the following ones, as far as the 18th Chapter, in Chaldee, and were afterwards tranſlated into Hebrew. The laſt are written originally in Greek.

The Twelve leſſer Prophets compoſed but one Book among the Hebrews. Hoſea the Son of Beeri is the firſt (oo). He propheſied in the Days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah; and 'tis very plain, that he wrote this Prophecy, becauſe he frequently ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon. There is one paſſage in his Book that appears very extraordinary, and that is, God's commanding him to take a Wife of Whoredoms, and Children of Whoredoms. But either this ought to be ſimply underſtood of a Viſion, as St. Jerome pretends, or we are to ſuppoſe that God did not command him to commit Adultery, but only to eſpouſe a Proſtitute, as St. Baſil and St. Auſtin have explain'd this place. The Style of this Prophet is very pathetick, and full of ſhort lively Sentences, as St. Jerome has obſerved.

The Prophet Joel follows Hoſea (pp) in St. Jerome's Edition; but we don't certainly know the time when he Prophecied (qq). Some Perſons believe that he is more ancient than Amos; others ſay that he did not write till after the Captivity of the Ten Tribes; and there are plauſible Conjectures both of one ſide and the other. According to ſome he was of the Tribe of Gad, but others place him in the Tribe of Reuben.

Amos, a Herdſman of Tekoah, a Village two Leagues from Bethlehem to the South, was choſen of God to be a Prophet in the time of Uzziah King of Judah, and of Jeroboam the Son of Joaſh King of Iſrael, two Years before the Earthquake, which happen'd in the 24th or 25th Year of Uzziah.

The time of Obadiah's Prophecying is altogether unknown (rr). St. Jerome, with the Jews, believes that this Prophet was he, that was Governor of the Houſe of King Ahab, who is mentioned in the firſt Book of Kings, Chap. 18. Verſ. 4. he that fed the Hundred Prophets. Others believe he is the ſame with that Obadiah, whom Joſiah made Superviſor of the Building of the Temple, who is mentioned in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, Chap. 34. Verſ. 12. Moſt People make him Contemporary with Hoſea, Amos and Joel. Some after all, believe that he lived in the time of Jeremiah, after the taking of Jeruſalem.

Jonah, the Son of the Prophet Amittai (ſſ), of the City of Gath, near Dioceſarea, of the Tribe of Zabulon in Galilee, Prophecied under King Jeroboam, Uzziah and Azariah. God ſent him to the City of Ninive to Preach Repentance there, and his Book is an Account of his Meſſage and Journey. He has written another Prophecy mention'd in the Book of Kings. This Book which we have, ſeems to be quoted by Tobit in the 14th Chapter, Verſe the 4th, and is approved by our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt himſelf.

The Prophet Micah, born at Moraſthi, a Village of Paleſtine in the Tribe of Judah, Prophecied under the Reign of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, after the Prophets of whom we have ſpoken already, but before Jeremiah, who cites him in the 26th Chapter. He is a different Perſon from him, who lived in the time of Ahab and Jehoſhaphat, and 'tis commonly believed that he died a Martyr.

We don't certainly know the Country of the Prophet Nahum: Nor have we any better Aſſurances of the Time wherein he lived. His mentioning the Deſtruction of Ninive, makes ſome think that he lived in the Time of Sardanapalus, under Jeaſh and Jehu; which if it were ſo he wou'd be the moſt ancient of the Prophets. Joſephus is of Opinion, that he lived in the Time of Jotham, and that he foretold the Ruine of Ninive, which happen'd many Years after the time of Joſiah. St. Jerome, Theodoret and Theophylact, ſay he Prophecied after the Captivity of the Iſraelites; others ſay under Hezekiah, and ſome under Manaſſes. The moſt received Opinion is, that he Prophecied after the Captivity of the Ten Tribes by Shalmanezer, before Sennacherib's Expedition againſt the Tribe of Judah, which is foretold in the firſt Chapter of his Prophecy.

Nor have we any better Information either of the Country or time of the Prophet Habakkuk. The Jews ſay that he Prophecied in the time of Manaſſes, or Jehoiachim, a little before the Captivity. St. Epiphanius, and the falſe Epiphanius, make him Contemporary with Zedekiah and Jeremiah. Others ſay he lived in Joſiah's time, St. Jerome in Daniel's, confounding him with that Habakkuk who is mentioned by that Prophet. The moſt probable Opinion is, that he lived under the Reign of Manaſſes, whoſe iniquities he ſeems to deſcribe in his firſt Chapt. Verſ. 13, and 14. and before the Expedition of the Chaldeans againſt the Jews, which he foretells in the firſt Chap. Verſ. the 6th, as well as their Deſtruction Chap. the 2d. Verſ. the 3d.

The time wherein Zephaniah Prophecied, is exactly marked out to us in theſe Words at the beginning of his Prophecy, The Word of the Lord came unto Zephaniah, the Son of Cuſhi, the Son of Gedaliah, the Son of Amariah, the Son of Hizkiah, in the Days of Joſiah the Son of Amon King of Judah. We don't know from what Country he came. St. Cyril makes him to have been of Noble Extraction, becauſe he mentions his Anceſtors.

Haggai, and the two following Prophets Prophecied not till after the return of the Jews from the Captivity of Babylon. It is ſaid in the beginning of Haggai's Prophecy, that it was written in the ſecond Year of Darius (tt) the Son of Hyſtaſpes, and the ſixth Month.

Zechariah, the Son of Barachiah, Grand-Son of Iddo (uu,) wrote his Prophecy in the ſame Year of Darius, two Months after the Prophet Haggai, as he himſelf has obſerved in the beginning of his Prophecy. He is a different Perſon from that Zechariah, of whom Iſaiah ſpeaks in his eighth Chapter (xx,) and of him that was ſlain by the Command of King Joaſh between the Temple and the Altar, 2 Chron. 24. 20.

Malachi, whoſe Name in Hebrew ſignifies My Angel (yy), Porphecied ſince Haggai and Zechariah, after the Rebuilding of the Temple, for the two former exhort the People to build the Temple, but he exhorts them to obſerve the Law, and offer their Sacrifices with purity; which does neceſſarily ſuppoſe that the Temple was already rebuilt. Beſides this, the Diſorders for which he reproves the Jews, are the very ſame with thoſe which Nehemiah lays to their charge, which is a manifeſt Argument that they both lived in the ſame time. Malachi is the laſt of the Prophets; and as there was none other to ſucceed him till the coming of Jeſus Chriſt, ſo he concludes his Prophecy with an Exhortation to the Jews to obſerve the Law of Moſes, and wait for the great and dreadful Day of the Lord, who ſhould turn the Hearts of the Fathers to the Children, and the Hearts of the Children, to their Fathers. All which clearly and expreſly ſets before us St. John Baptiſt, and Jeſus Chriſt.

The two Books of the Maccabees were not written by the ſame Perſon, as the ſenſible difference of the Style, of the Chronology, and the Hiſtory ſufficiently ſhew (zz). We don't know who is the Author of the firſt; 'tis indeed very probable that it was Originally written in Hebrew, and afterwards tranſlated into Greek and Latin. The ſecond is an Abridgment or Epitome of Jaſon, who was one of the Jews of Cyrene, as it appears by the Preface of that Book, which begins Chap. 2. Verſ. 23. It is preceded by two Letters of the Jews at Jeruſalem to the Jews inhabiting Egypt, added by the Author of this Abridgment which he has made with a great deal of Liberty. Theſe two Books are called The Books of the Maccabees, from the Name of Judas the Son of Mattathias, Sirnamed Maccabeus, becauſe he had placed in his Banner the firſt Hebrew Letters of the Words of a certain Sentence in Exodus (aaa) which being joined together make that word. Theſe two Books contain the Hiſtory of the Jews under the Government of the Greeks, from the Reign of Alexander to that of Demetrius Soter, which comprehends the ſpace of Forty Years, or thereabouts, and they conclude an Hundred and Thirty Years before the Coming of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

NOTES.

(a) There is no Paradox more dangerous than the Opinion of those who have presumed to deny that the Pentateuch was composed by Moses.] I have already observed in the first Edition, that this Paradox was started by Rabbi Aben-Ezra, because he is the first that raised these Objections, which have occasioned some Persons to believe, that Moses was not the Author of the Pentateuch; and though he durst not openly declare his Opinion in this Matter, yet he expresses himself after such a Manner, that it will evidently appear that he was not heartily perswaded that the Pentateuch was written by Moses. For in his Explication of these words in Deuteronomy, Behold what Moses said to the Israelites that were beyond Jordan, he not only makes use of this passage to shew that this Book was not Moses's but he musters up the most terrible Objections he could raise for this purpose. You will know the Truth, says he, if you comprehend the Mystery of the Twelve: Moses wrote the Law: The Canaanites were then in the Land: In the Mountain of the Lord it shall be seen: Behold his Iron Bed: Words which allude to some passages in the Pentateuch, and which he uses to prove; that it was not written by Moses. And 'tis principally upon the Authority and Reasons of this Rabbi that Hobbs, Pererius, and Spinosa, established their Doctrine, when they publickly maintain'd that the Pentateuch was not written by Moses. To these Authors we may add Monsieur Simon, who has wrote a Book, called, A Critical History of the Old Testament. I was not willing to name him in the first Edition of this Volume, though I took occasion then to confute his Reasons; but since he has been pleased to declare that he was the Person, whom I meant, in a Letter to Monsieur Labbe a Doctor of the Faculty, he ought not to resent it as an Injury, if I attack him by name, and endeavour to shew, that his Hypothesis about the Books of Moses is as rash and dangerous as Spinosa's.

Monsieur Simon lays down his Opinion in the first Chapter of the first Book of his Critical History, p. 3. of Leer's Edition. When we suppose that there have been such publick Scribes, we ascribe to them all the Historical part of the Pentateuch, and to Moses all that belongs to the Laws and Ordinances; and 'tis this which the Scripture calls the Law of Moses. And so one may say in this sense, that all the Pentateuch is really and truly written by Moses, because those persons that made the Collection lived in his time, and what they did was by his particular Direction. He says the very same thing in his 2d. Chap. p. 17. 'Tis therefore not improbable that there were in Moses's time such sort of Prophets, who were necessary to the State, because they preserved the most considerable Actions that passed in their Commonwealth. 'This being granted, we shall distinguish in these five Books of the Law that which was written by Moses, from what was written by the Prophets and publick Scribes: We may attribute to Moses the Commandments and Ordinances which he gave the People, in lieu of which we may suppose these same publick Scribes to have been the Authors of the greatest part of this History. In the seventh Chapter, p. 50. he adds: As for what concerns the Books of Moses, such as they now are in the Collection which we have, the Additions that have been made to the ancient Acts hinder us from discerning what is truly his, and what has been added by those who succeeded him, or by the Authors of the last Collection. Besides, this Compilation being now and then Epitomized out of the ancient Memoirs, one cannot be assured, that the Genealogies there are set down in their full length and extent.

From these Principles of Monsieur Simon, it follows in the first place, that Moses is not the Author of the greatest part of the Pentateuch, for the Controversie here is not about some few Passages that are of small consequence, but even those that make up the Body and principal Part of the Pentateuch; Moses according to his Notions, being only concerned about the Laws and Ordinances, has no share in any thing besides, and so the History of the Creation and of the Deluge, in a word, all Genesis, and whatever has a relation to the Historical part, is taken away from Moses. It is to no purpose to say, as he has done already, p. 3. That one may say, that all the Pentateuch is Moses's, because they that made the Collection lived in his time, and did nothing but by his order. For would it not be a Jest to ascribe to Moses the Works of the publick Scribes of his time? If this were really true, a Man might ascribe all publick Registers to those Kings and Princes, in whose time, and by whose order, they were compiled: But what is a great deal more surprizing, Monsieur Simon, or at least one of his Zealous Defenders, abandons this Hypothesis as not to be maintained, and acknowledges that there is no convincing proof to make us believe there were such publick Scribes divinely inspired in the time of Moses. This is taken notice of in a Marginal Note of the 17th Page of his Critical History, and the same Edition that we cited before. We find in truth, says the Author of that Remark, this sort of publick Scribes in the time of the Kings amongst the Hebrews .... but we find no Foot-steps of them in the Books of Moses. The Author of the Answer to a Letter which Monsieur Spanheim wrote against F. Simon confesses the same thing. If you now demand of me, what is my Opinion concerning these publick Scribes; I answer, That it would be very hard to reject 'em totally .... In the mean time I don't altogether agree with him as to the time, wherein he pretends, that these Prophets were Established in the Jewish Commonwealth for the Reasons he brings, and indeed the greater part of his Authorities cleary suppose, that this happened after Moses. If this Letter was Monsieur Simon's as the World was inclined to believe, he cannot possibly excuse himself from having dealt very treacherously in a matter of the highest consequence about Religion, since he has established the truth of the Pentateuch upon a supposition, which he himself acknowledges to be either false or uncertain. But suppose this Letter was not his, it shows at least, that those persons who are the most favourable to his Hypothesis, freely own 'tis impossible to prove there were any of these publick Scribes divinely inspired in Moses's time; and consequently that Monsieur Simon, who has grounded the validity of the Pentateuch upon this Hypothesis, has done it upon a very weak Foundation, even in the judgment of those Criticks who stand up the strongest for him. Thus Monsieur Simon alledges this Conjecture as only a matter of probability. In the second place, Monsieur Simon has of himself ruined whatever he says of the Antiquity and Authority of the Pentateuch, by confidently asserting, as he has done in the third passage we quoted, that the Pentateuch, in the condition we find it in at present, is only an Abridgment of the ancient Acts that were made in the time of Moses, and that 'tis impossible to discern what is ancient, and what is not. Is not this formally to deny that Moses was the Author of the Pentateuch, and that the Books which we now have are not so ancient, as is pretended?

In a word, he establishes the Authority of the Books of Scripture upon the pretended Inspiration of certain Scribes or Keepers of the publick Registers, whom he believes to have been from time to time among the Jews. Now nothing is more uncertain than the Existence or Inspiration of these publick Scribes, as we shall shew in the following Pages.

(b) By expres Texts of Holy Scripture.] It is very certain that Moses wrote the Law, and that in Scripture we are to understand the Pentateuch by the Law. Exod. 24. v. 4. and 7. Moses wrote all the Words of the Law, and took the Book of the Covenant, and read it in the audience of the People. Deut. 31. v. 19, and 22. Moses therefore wrote this Law, and gave it to the Priests the Sons of Levi .... and to all the Elders of Israel. In Exodus, ch. 17. v. 14. God commanded Moses to write the Law, and give it to Joshuah. And in the Book of Joshuah, ch. 1. v. 7, and 8. God tells him, That the Volume of the Law which he received from Moses ought to be always in his mind; This Book of the Law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night .... that thou mayst observe to do according to all the Law which Moses my Servant commanded thee. Now tho' the Word Law may indeed be applied to one part of the Pentateuch, yet we ought to take notice, that it is generally taken in Scripture for the whole Pentateuch. And 'tis certain, that in the 31st Chapter of Deuteronomy, where it is said, Moses therefore wrote this Law, it is meant of all this Book, and the Passage of Joshuah ought likewise to be understood of the whole Law. To this may be added, that in the other Books of the Old Testament, they always consider the entire Pentateuch as the Work of Moses. In the first of Kings. ch. 2. v. 3. David speaking to Salomon, tells him, That the Ceremonies, Precepts, and Laws of the Jews, were written in the Law of Moses; Keep the Charge of the Lord thy God to walk in his Ways, to keep his Statutes and Commandments, and his Judgments, and his Testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses. It is therefore believed, that all the Pentateuch, which contains these Ceremonies, Precepts, and Judgments, was the Law of Moses. All the Law is likewise attributed to Moses in the second Book of Kings, ch. 21, and 23. v. 8. v. 25. If they observe all the Law of Moses. In the second Book of Chronicles, ch. 23. v. 18. To offer the Burnt-Offerings of the Law as it is written in the Law of Moses. Is not Leviticus therefore Moses's Book? That which is delivered in the 30th, 31st, 35th Chapters of the same Book, is taken out of Leviticus and Numbers; are they not therefore the Books of Moses? In the 25th Chapter, Deuteronomy is cited as one of Moses's Books; As it is written in the Law in the Book of Moses, the Father shall not die for the Children: Which Words are to be found in the 24th Chapter of Deuteronomy. Leviticus quoted by Baruch, ch. 2. as a Book that was written by Moses; As thou speakest by thy Servant Moses, in the day when thou didst command him to write thy Law before the Children of Israel, saying, If ye will not hear, &c. Which words are in the 26th Chapter of Leviticus, v. 14. In the second Book of Kings, ch. 22, and 23. as also in the second Book of Chronicles ch. 34. it is said, that Hilkiah found a Book of the Law of Moses's written, perhaps, with his own hand, as these words seem to intimate, Per manum Moysi. This Book of the Law, according to Josephus, is all the Pentateuch, according to others Deuteronomy. However it is, yet it follows from hence at leaſt, that Deuteronomy is his. Now Deuteronomy ſuppoſes, that the other Books of the Law were written, becauſe it is as it were an Abridgment, and upon that account is called Deuteronomy, or The Second Law. In the ninth Chapter of Daniel, it is ſaid, that the Curſe, which is written in the Book of Moſes, is fallen upon the Jews, and in the tenth Verſe the words of Deuteronomy and Exodus are particularly cited. The Prophet Malachi, ch. 4. exhorts the Jews to remember the Law of Moſes. Raguel, in the 7th Chapter of Tobit, ſays, He will give his Daughter in Marriage to Tobias, to obey the Law of Moſes. The Law of Moſes is frequently repeated in the Pſalms; the 77th, 104th, 105th, 135th Pſalms, contain the Hiſtory of the Iſraelites, which is plainly taken out of the Pentateuch. The Law of Moſes is often cited in Ezrah; (Ez. 9. 10. 23.) the Paſſages cited in theſe places are to be found in the Books of the Pentateuch. In the 10th Chapter of Nehemiah, v. 29. the Iſraelites oblige themſelves by a new kind of an Oath, to keep the Law and Precepts of Moſes. Now among theſe Precepts, there are ſeveral that are taken out of the Books of the Pentateuch. In the ſecond Book of Maccabees, ch. 7. Eleazar ſaith, I will not obey the King's Commandment, but that of the Law, which was given unto Our Fathers by Moſes. Laſtly, whatever is taken out of the Pentateuch in the New Teſtament, is always cited under the name of the Law of Moſes. St. James in the 15th Chapter of the Acts, ſays, the Jews read Moſes every Sabbath day in their Synagogues; Moſes of old time hath in every City them that Preach him, being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath day. And St. Paul, in his Epiſtles, ſays, That the Jews did not underſtand Moſes, although they read him; Uſque in hodiernum diem cum legitur Moſes. Therefore they did not in the leaſt doubt, that the Pentateuch was written by Moſes, ſince they tell us, that thoſe who read that Book, read Moſes. All theſe Paſſages make it very evident in the firſt place, that Moſes wrote the Law of the Jews. Secondly, that by the name of the Law, we ought to underſtand, the Pentateuch. Thirdly, That not only Deuteronomy, but alſo all the other Books of the Pentateuch, have been cited in Scripture for the Books and Law of Moſes. Fourthly, That this has ever paſſed for a conſtant truth, of which no body doubted. Fifthly, that they not only believed Moſes to be the Author of the things contained in theſe Books, but of the Books themſelves, ſo that when they read them, one might ſay, they read Moſes; as when we read the Æneids, we ſay, we read Virgil.

(c) By the Authority of Jeſus Chriſt.] In St. John, ch. 5. There is one that accuſeth you, (ſaith our Saviour) even Moſes, in whom ye truſt: For had you believed Moſes, you would have believed me, for he wrote of me. 'Tis plain therefore that Moſes wrote, and that he wrote thoſe Books, which the Jews read for his. Now who doubts that theſe Books were the Pentateuch. And indeed ſince our Saviour does always diſtinguiſh the Prophets from the Law of Moſes, by the Law he can mean only the Pentateuch. In the firſt Chapter of St. John, Philip ſaith to Nathaniel, We have found him, of whom Moſes in the Law, and the Prophets did write. There are many other places where our Saviour cites the Books of the Pentateuch under the name of the Law, and conſequently we ought not to doubt, that he has aſſured us that theſe Books were written by Moſes.

St. Luke, in the 24th Chapter of his Goſpel, ſaith, That our Saviour beginning with Moſes, and continuing with the Prophets Expounded to his Diſciples, who were going to Emmaus, the Things that were ſaid concerning himſelf in the Scriptures. Therefore Moſes was the moſt ancient Author of the Jews, and the Pentateuch was acknowledged to be written by him, as they owned the Books of the Prophets to be written by the Prophets.

(d) The Conſent of all Nations.] 'Tis certain, that not only the Jews were always of opinion, that theſe Books were written by Moſes, but alſo that all People have conſidered Moſes as the Author of the Law and Religion of the Jews. 'Tis the unanimous Conſent of all Nations, and all Men, no one ever queſtioning the Truth of it before theſe laſt Ages. Huetius maintains, that all Religions have borrowed their Theology out of the Books of Moſes, whoſe Hiſtory they have purpoſely altered and diſguiſed, to accommodate it the better to their Fables. He pretends, for Inſtance, That Adonis of the Phænicians; that Mercury, Oſiris, Serapis, Anubis, and the other Gods of the Ægyptians; that Zoroaſter of the Perſians, and the Divinities of the Weſtern Nations; that Cadmus, Apollo, Priapus, Æſculapius, Prometheus, and the other Gods of the Grecians; that Janus, Faunus, Vertumnus, Evander of the Latins; in a word, that all thoſe Fabulous Deities, were taken out of the Books of Moſes, but diſguiſed according to the Pagan manner, and put into a new Dreſs. But theſe Conjectures being only Probabilities, and no more, cannot ſerve to demonſtrate a Truth, which does not need ſuch Supports, as being clearly eſtabliſhed upon indiſputable Principles.

(e) And by the Authentick Teſtimonies of the moſt ancient Authors.] That is, a continued Tradition of Authors from the Times that came neareſt to Moſes down to ours; and as we cannot doubt that Homer's Poem is his, becauſe all Writers that have appeared ſince his Age have attributed it to him; ſo neither can we reaſonably doubt, that theſe Books were written by Moſes. They commonly produce the Authority of Sanchoniathon, who, as they give out, lived before the Trojan War, and wrote the Hiſtory of the Phœnicians, Tranſlated afterwards into Greek by Philo Byblius, where he has borrowed ſeveral Paſſages out of the Books of Moſes. But 'tis not certain that this Author is ſo ancient as they pretend. They likewiſe affirm, that Homer and Heſiod have taken many things out of him, and 'tis indeed extreamly probable. The ſame thing has been obſerved of the Philoſophers, as Thales, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Socrates, and Plato, but all this is ſaid by Conjecture. We ought therefore to rely principally upon the Teſtimony of thoſe Authors who tell us poſitively, that Moſes was the Chief Leader and Law-giver of the Jews, ſuch as Manetho, cited by Joſephus in his firſt Book againſt Appion, Philochorus the Athenian, whom the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, commonly ſaid to be St. Juſtin, mentions; Eupolemus, cited by the ſame Author; Eupolemus, cited by Alexander Polyhiſtor, mentioned by Euſebius; Apollonius Molo, cited by Joſephus; Caſtor, cited by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles; Diodorus Siculus, produced by the ſame Authors, and by St. Cyril in his firſt Book againſt Julian, though in our Copies he does not make mention of Moſes, but of Mnuës, who is the Oſiris of the Ægyptians; Charemon Author of the Ægyptian Hiſtory, cited by Joſephus; Trogus Pompeius, Epitomized by Juſtin, who makes Moſes the Author of the Jewiſh Laws; Nicolaus Damaſcenus, cited by Joſephus; Mendeſius, cited by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, by Tatian, by Euſebius, and by St. Cyril. Strabo, who makes Moſes the Author of the Religion and Laws of the Jews; Appion, who although an Enemy to the Jews, yet ſuppoſes that Moſes gave 'em their Laws; Juvenal, who ſpeaks of the Volumes of Moſes, Sat. 14. Tradidit arcano quodcunque volumine Moſes. Ptolomy of Alexandria, who calls him the Legiſlator of the Jews; Pliny, Tacitus, and Juſtin, who have obſerved the ſame thing; Numenius, who has taken notice that Plato was a Grecizing Moſes; Longinus, who commends the beginning of Geneſis, and produces a Paſſage in it as an Example of Sublimeneſs, calling the Author in theſe words, The wiſe Law-giver of the Jews; Porphyry and Julian, who wrote againſt the Chriſtian Religion, yet acknowledged that the Books of the Pentateuch were written by Moſes. To theſe we may add ſeveral Authors who have delivered Hiſtories down to Poſterity, that were undeniably taken out of the Pentateuch, ſuch as Hecataus, Berroſus, Abydenus, Manetho, Eupolemus, Alexander, Polyhiſtor, Artapanus, Demetrius the Jew, and many others, cited by Joſephus in his firſt Book againſt Appion, by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Euſebius in his Books De Prap. Evang. I have not mentioned Philo, Joſephus, and the other Jews, becauſe they all take it for granted that Moſes is the Author of the Jewiſh Laws, meaning by theſe words, the five Books of the Pentateuch. The Samaritan Pentateuch affords us yet more convincing Proofs; for after the diviſion of the People of Iſrael, which happened under Rehoboam the Son of Salomon, the ten Tribes preſerved the Pentateuch written in the Samaritan Character, which is the ancient Character, of the Hebrews, from whence we may rationally conclude, that at that time they had the Pentateuch in the ſame condition, as it is in at preſent, which they conſtantly aſcribe to Moſes. One cannot with any tolerable pretence queſtion the Antiquity of the Samaritan Pentateuch, ſince it is written in Characters, which were not in uſe after the Babyloniſh Captivity. The Verſion of the Septuagint, which is aſſuredly very ancient, is likewiſe another Proof that the Books of the Pentateuch are written by Moſes. In a word, all thoſe who have ſpoken of the Pentateuch, whether Jews, Chriſtians, or Pagans, have taken it for granted that theſe Books were written by Moſes. And certainly 'tis extravagant raſhneſs to oppoſe a few weak ill-grounded Conjectures to the Univerſal Conſent of all Mankind.

(f) And conſequently Ruine the Foundation of our Religion.] One of the great Proofs of the Truth of our Religion, is its Antiquity, which is principally ſupported by the Antiquity of the Books of the Law. Now if they are not Moſes's, and if they carry a falſe Name, what Proof can we give of their Antiquity? this is the ready way to give occaſion to Libertines to Ridicule 'em, and conſider 'em only as Fabulous Books, compoſed at pleaſure by the later Jews after the Captivity.

(g) If what they alledged were true, yet they could only prove.] Here are the Objections which Rabbi Aben-Ezra, Spinoſa, the Author of the Book of the Praadomites, F. Simon, and ſome others, propoſe againſt the Antiquity of the Books of Moſes, and the Anſwers to them, from which we ſhall better diſcern their Weakneſs.

The firſt Objection is drawn from theſe words of Deuteronomy; Behold the Words which Moſes ſpoke before all the Congregation of Iſrael beyond Jordan. This could not be written, ſay they, by Moſes, who never paſſed the Jordan, no more than the Children of Iſrael did, while he was alive. Anſwer. The Hebrew word, as Vatablus obſerves, may ſignifie on this ſide as well as on the other ſide. Pigninus, Buxtorf, and all Perſons that are converſant in Hebrew are of the ſame opinion. It literally ſignifies, In traſitu, in tranſeundo; In their paſſage, being ready to paſs. Thus this Objection that appeared ſo terrible at firſt ſight, carries indeed no difficulty with it.

Second Objection. In the Pentateuch, Moſes is always ſpoken of in the third Perſon. He is commended there in ſeveral places, as in Numbers, ch. 12. where he is called, The meekeſt man upon earth; as alſo in Deuteronomy, ch. 34. And there aroſe not a Prophet ſince in Iſrael like unto Moſes. And is it credible that Moſes would have thus commended himſelf? Anſwer. 'Tis ordinary for thoſe who compoſe a Hiſtory, where themſelves are concerned, to ſpeak of themſelves in the third Perſon. Cæſar in his Commentaries always ſpeaks of his own Actions in the third Perſon. Joſephus does the ſame thing in his Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews. St. John in his Goſpel ſpeaks likewiſe of himſelf in the third Perſon; The Diſciple, ſays he, whom Jeſus loved. And in another place, If I will that he tarry, what is that to you? St. Matthew relating his own Converſion, ſpeaks of himſelf in the third Perſon, and ſome ſay, that St. Luke was one of the two Diſciples, whom our Saviour met going towards Emmaus. The Praiſes which Moſes gives himſelf are not exceſſive. It was neceſſary that in his own Books he ſhould take notice of the ſignal Favours which God had conferred upon him, as well as conceal none of his own Miſcarriages. Joſephus and Cæſar often commend themſelves after the ſame manner.

Third Objection. In the 12th Chapter of Geneſis the Author has this remarkable Parentheſis, And the Canaanite was then in the Land. Which makes it evident, ſay they, that this was written when the Canaanites were no longer in Paleſtine, otherwiſe this Advertiſement had been impertinent. Now 'tis plain, they were not chaſed out of that Land till a long time after Moſes's death, and conſequently he is not the Author of this Book. Anſwer. Since theſe words, Cananæus erat in terrâ illâ, bear this ſenſe, it may be reaſonably ſuppoſed, that this Parentheſis was inſerted after Moſes's time. This is an uſual thing, and it often happens that theſe ſorts of Explications, which at firſt were written in the Margin, to illuſtrate the Text, afterwards were inſerted into the Text by way of Parentheſis. But one may likewiſe ſay, that theſe words Cananæus autem erat in terrâ, don't ſignifie Olim erat in terrâ, but Jam tum erat in terrâ, i.e. That Moſes ſpeaking of the paſſage of Abraham through the Land of Sichem, obſerves that the Canaanites were then in the Land. Thus the ſenſe is natural, and no ways forced.

Fourth Objection. In Geneſis, ch. 22. v. 14. the Mountain Moria is called The Mountain of the Lord, who will provide; Appellavitque Abraham nomen loci illius, Dominus videt. Now, ſay they, it had not this Name, till after it was ſet apart to make a Temple there. Anſwer. But how do they know this? For is not the contrary expreſly atteſted in that place of Geneſis? And does it not appear, that this Mountain received the name of The Lord will provide, becauſe of Abraham's Anſwer to his Son, My Son, God will provide?

Fifth Objection. In Deuteronomy, ch. 3. v. 10, and 11. where mention is made of Og King of Baſan, 'tis ſaid, That he alone was remaining of the Race of the Giants. Behold his Bedſtead was a Bedſtead of Iron, is it not in Rabbath of the Children of Ammon? Nine Cubits was the length thereof, and four Cubits the breadth of it. They ſay, theſe words make it evident, that the Author of Deuteronomy was of a later ſtanding than Moſes. For in the firſt place, why ſhould Moſes ſpeak of this Bed, to prove the greatneſs of this Giant, ſince all the Iſraelites might have beheld it themſelves? 'Tis more probable to ſay, That this was written by an Author, who lived in a time, when they had no knowledge of this King. Secondly, Why was not this Bed any longer in the Land of Baſan, but in Rabbath of the Children of Ammon? In ſhort, ſay they, this Bed was not diſcovered till the time of David, who ſubdued the Ammonites, and took Rabbath, as we find it related in the ſecond Book of Samuel, ch. 12. v. 30. Anſwer. Suppoſing all this to be true, 'tis eaſily anſwered, by ſaying that, as for what has a relation to Og's Bed, it was added in a Parentheſis. But why might not Moſes give an account of that Bed, to prove the greatneſs of that Giant, even when he addreſſed himſelf to the Iſraelites, ſince perhaps he was writing this Relation ſome conſiderable time after the King was ſlain, and 'tis not to be imagined that all the Iſraelites had ſeen the Bed? But admit the Matter was not ſo, yet Moſes might very well make uſe of this Proof to make the Matter of Fact credible to Poſterity. Thus the Hiſtorians of our time, when they occaſionally diſcourſe of any extraordinary thing, although it is never ſo well known to the World, yet they frequently ſay, We have ſuch and ſuch Proofs of it, the Monſter is ſtill kept in ſuch a place, &c. As for what follows, that this Iron Bed was in the Land of Baſan, and not in Rabbath this is all taken upon ſuppoſition, for why might not the Ammonites poſſeſs it in the time of Moſes?

Sixth Objection. The Author of the Pentateuch, ſay they, gives ſuch Names to ſeveral Cities and Countries as they had not, till a long time after the Death of Moſes. In Geneſis, ch. 14. 'tis ſaid, That Abraham purſued the Kings, who had carried away his Nephew Lot, as far as Dan. Now the Name of Dan was not given to this Country till a long time after, when ſix hundred Men of the Tribe of Dan took the City of Laiſh, and, after they had taken it, gave it the Name of their Tribe, as we read in the Book of Judges, ch. 18. The ſame Author likewiſe ſpeaks often of the City of Hebron, which was not ſo called, till after the death of Moſes, from Hebron the Son of Caleb, to whom Joſhuah gave it; formerly it was called Kirjath-Arba, as we are particularly informed in Joſhuah, ch. 14. v. 15. In Deuteronomy ch. 3. v. 14. it is ſaid, That Jair the Son of Manaſſeh took all the Country of Argob unto the Coaſts of Geſhuri, and Maachathi, and called them after his own name Baſhan-Havoth-Jair unto this day. Anſwer. We may generally anſwer theſe Objections thus, by ſaying, That theſe Names were changed after Moſes's time, to render the Hiſtory more intelligible to thoſe, to whom the ancient Names of thoſe Cities and Countries that Moſes uſed, would be altogether unknown. But the firſt difficulty may be cleared otherwiſe, by ſaying, That the Name of Dan is more ancient than they pretend: That the River Jordan was ſo called, becauſe it has its Original from two Springs Jor and Dan. So we may ſay there was another City of that Name called Dan or Danna, whereof mention is made in the 15th Chapter of Joſhuah, Verſe the 49th, which was in the Tribe of Judah, in the Country of Sodom. To the ſecond Inſtance we may return this anſwer, That it is not clearly ſaid in the Book of Joſhuah, that Hebron gave his Name to the City of Kirjath-Arba, but only that the City of Hebron was formerly called by that Name. Which may be well enough underſtood of an ancient Name, which it had heretofore. The laſt Difficulty is not conſiderable, 'tis only in theſe Words, Uſque in præſentem diem. Now Moſes might uſe this expreſſion to demonſtrate that Country more clearly, or perhaps it might be added after him.

Seventh Objection. The Author of the Pentateuch ſpeaketh of things that happened after the Death of Moſes, in Exodus, ch. 16. v. 35. it is ſaid that the Children of Iſrael did eat Manna, Forty Years, until they came to a Land inhabited; they did eat Manna, until they came to the Borders of the Land of Canaan. Now this could not be written by Moſes, who died before the Forty Years were accompliſhed. After the ſame manner 'tis written in the 36th Chapter of Geneſis, Verſe 31. And theſe are the Kings that reigned in the Land of Edom, before there reigned any King over the Children of Iſrael. Which words put it beyond controverſie, that he who wrote this, was alive after the Iſraelites had Kings ſet over them. To this we may add, that after this Author has given us a Catalogue of the eight Kings of the Edomites, he ſpeaks of their Dukes. Now they had not Dukes in the place of their Kings till a long time after, as we may obſerve in the firſt Book of the Chronicles, Chapter 1. Verſe 5. In ſhort, 'tis ſaid in Deuteronomy, Chapter 2. Verſe 12. that the Sons of Eſau dwelt in Seir, after they had driven out and deſtroyed the ancient Inhabitants called Horims, as the Children of Iſrael did unto the Land of their poſſeſſion. Which paſſage, ſay they, ſeems to intimate, that the Iſraelites had ſubdued the Edomites when this was written. Anſwer. If all theſe places were to be taken in the ſenſe that is given them, yet we might anſwer, that ſome of them have been ſince added, or that Moſes ſometimes ſpoke by a Prophetick Spirit. But we need not run to ſuch Solutions. Moſes might ſay, that the Iſraelites ſhould eat Manna Forty Years, knowing, as he certainly did, that they were to tarry ſo long in the Deſert, as it appears in the 14th Chapter of the Book of Numbers. Moreover, God had revealed to Moſes, that the Iſraelites ſhould afterwards have a King, as it is clearly foretold in the 17th Chapter of Deuteronomy, Verſe 14. The eight Kings of the Edomites there mentioned, might have reigned from Eſau to Moſes; and the Dukes, of whom he ſpeaks, did not ſucceed the Kings, but govern'd at the ſame time. Laſtly, theſe Words, As the Iſraelites did to the Land in their poſſeſſion, don't at all ſignifie or intimate the Land of the Edomites, but the Land which was promiſed to the Iſraelites. And let not any one ſay, that the Iſraelites were not as yet in poſſeſſion of the Land of Promiſe in Moſes's time, ſince 'tis certain that the Tribes of Reuben and Gad, with a great part of that of Manaſſeh, had poſſeſſed themſelves of the Country of the Amorites, and of the Men of Baſan, after they had put 'em to the Sword.

Eighth Objection. The ſtrongeſt Argument at firſt view is the Death and Burial of Moſes, which is deſcribed at the end of Deuteronomy. To this there are two Anſwers. The firſt of thoſe, who ſay with Philo and Joſephus, That Moſes wrote it himſelf by a Spirit of Prophecy. The ſecond, which is the more common and ſolid of the two, That this Account was added either by Joſhuah, or by Ezrah; or laſtly, by the Synagogue of the Jews, to make the Hiſtory of the Pentateuch more perfect.

Ninth Objection. They ſay, That Moſes is ſo far from being the Author of the Pentateuch, that the Author there cites Books that were compoſed by Moſes; as The Book of the Covenant, Exod. 24. The Book of the Wars of the Lord, Numb. 21. 14. in which there was likewiſe written the War againſt Amalek, which is mentioned in Exodus, Chap. 17. Verſe 14. The Book of the Law of the Lord in Deuteronomy, Chap. 31. Verſe 9. And laſtly, a Song, which is referred to, in the two and thirtieth Chapter of Deuteronomy. From whence they conclude, that the Pentateuch was compoſed out of the ſeveral Books of Moſes. Anſwer. This Objection carries no force with it; for what ſhould hinder Moſes from citing the Books which he had formerly compoſed? Beſides, ſhould we grant that all theſe paſſages are to be underſtood of thoſe Books that were written by Moſes, it would not invalidate our Opinion. But this cannot certainly be proved. For in the firſt place, we don't know, whether there was any ſuch Book or no that was intituled, The Battles of the Lord; for the Hebrew Text does not intimate that it was already written, but that it might be. Neither is it evident whether there is any Book mentioned: For the Hebrew Word may ſignifie any manner of Narrative, and ſo the Words that are cited may bear this ſenſe, As it will be related when the Iſraelites deſcribe the Battles of the Lord. Mr. Simon, quarrels with this Interpretation, which, I ſay, theſe Words will naturally bear; but however, he does not demonſtrate that they cannot be thus applied. Others underſtand this place of a certain Song, which they uſed to ſing in honour of their Victories. It is not ſaid in Exodus, Chap. 17. that the War of Amalek was written in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, but only God commanded Moſes to write it, and 'tis that which he did in that place. That paſſage in Exodus, Chap. 24. does not prove that Moſes wrote a Book of the Covenant, but only that being come down from the Mountain, he recited to the People the Laws which God had given him in the Mountain, which are ſet down in the preceding Chapters. And this it is which is called in that place The Book of the Covenant. The Book of the Law, of which mention is made in Deuteronomy, is not different from Deuteronomy it ſelf. And after all, it is not improbable that Moſes referred to a Song, which he himſelf had compoſed.

Tenth Objection. There were (ſays Mr. Simon) amongſt the Hebrews, Prophets inſpired by God, who had a particular Charge given 'em to preſerve in Writing the moſt important Actions that happened in that Government. 'Tis probable, there were ſeveral of theſe Prophets in the time of Moſes, and then we may rationally ſuppoſe, that Moſes, as a Legiſlator, wrote only the Edicts and Commandments which he gave to the People, and that he left the care of collecting and tranſmitting to Poſterity the moſt conſiderable Paſſages of State to theſe above-mentioned Scribes or Prophets. Anſwer. This Suppoſition is founded upon very uncertain Conjectures, and precarious Principles. The Egyptians, ſay they, had ſuch Scribes or Regiſters to write down their Sacred Tranſactions, and therefore there were ſuch alſo amongſt the Jews. A very fine Conſequence this! 'Tis credible however that Moſes eſtabliſhed ſuch an Order of Men. But what Proofs have they to ſupport this tottering Suppoſition? Why, Joſephus and Euſebius tell us, that amongſt the Hebrews it was not lawful for every one to write their Hiſtory, but only for the Prophets who were inſpired by God. All this may be very true; but then Joſephus and Euſebius underſtand by theſe Prophets no other Perſons but Moſes, and thoſe after him, who wrote the Books of the Old Teſtament down to the Reign of Artaxerxes. We muſt paſs the ſame Judgment of Theodoret, ſay they, and the other Fathers: Now this, in my Opinion, is to make 'em ſpeak things they never thought of, and not to underſtand them aright. As for what they add farther concerning theſe Prophets, whom they have inveſted with an Authority to add or diminiſh from the Books of Scripture, this is ſtill more improbable than the other. They barely tell us inſtead of proving it, that in the Books of Kings ſeveral other Memoirs are quoted, from whence they draw this Concluſion, that all the Books of the Bible, which have come down to our hands, are only Abridgments and Summaries of the ancient Acts. But does it follow from hence, that all the other Books of the Bible were uſed after this rate? Does it follow, that they added to, or retrenched from them, after they were once made? Or laſtly, that they were compoſed by theſe Prophets? They would have it proceed from this Reaſon, that there are ſo many Contradictions in the Books of the Holy Scripture. They ſay that this is the Reaſon of the Differences between the Chronicles and other Hiſtorical Treatiſes of the Bible, of that variety of falſe Conjectures that ruine the Authority of the Scriptures; and what is yet more material, that 'tis not impoſſible to reconcile theſe ſeeming Contradictions. To this purpoſe they amaſs together a great quantity of other Conjectures of this nature, very ſubtilely invented, but weak and ill-grounded, and yet upon the ſtrength of theſe, they make the Authority of the Bible to depend, after they have endeavoured to undermine the ſolid Foundations which bear it up. Thus by pretending to advance Criticiſm, they forſake the Rules of true Judgment, and follow the fantaſtick Chimæra's of their own Imaginations. There is no weight in what they have invented themſelves, or what they have found ready invented to their hands by ſome Rabbies; and yet at the ſame time they ſcruple and doubt of ſeveral things that are clearer and better eſtabliſhed.

Although I did not name Mr. Simon in my firſt Edition, yet he very well perceived that this reproach was addreſſed to himſelf. The manner wherein he anſwered me, ſufficiently ſhewed, that he was ſenſibly touched, however this his Carriage does not in the leaſt juſtifie him. For inſtead of demonſtrating by ſolid Reaſons, that the Reproaches I faſten'd upon him, were undeſerved and ill-grounded, he has filled his Letter with nothing but Contumelies and ſcornful Reflections, which ſhews how heinouſly he reſented the Liberty I took in examining his Hypotheſis; and this all ſenſible Men obſerved as ſoon as ever his Letter appeared in publick. But now to make it evident to the whole World, that I have Reaſon on my ſide, viz. that Mr. Simon is in the wrong for quarrelling with me upon this occaſion, I ſhall only caſt my Eyes on the Preface of his Book, where he ſets down the Principles of his Work at length: The World will obſerve, (ſays he) that having conſidered nothing in this Eſſay but the Profit of thoſe who have a mind to know the Grounds of the Holy Scriptures, I have inſerted abundance of Principles, very uſeful to reſolve the moſt weighty Difficulties of the Bible, and at the ſame time to anſwer thoſe Objections which are uſually made againſt theſe Holy Books. Theſe Principles are reducible to three Heads: The firſt is, That there were always amongſt the Hebrews a ſort of Prophets, or Publick Regiſters, Divinely inſpired, who made what Alterations or Additions they thought fit, in the Books of the Old Teſtament. The ſecond is, That they heretofore wrote their Books upon little Leaves, which they rowled one over another round a ſmall piece of Wood, without ſtitching them together; whence it happened ſometimes, that not taking ſufficient care to preſerve the order of theſe ancient Leaves or Volumes, the things themſelves treated of, have ſometimes been miſplaced. The third is, That there is a great deal of Reaſon to believe, that thoſe Perſons who joined theſe old Memoirs together, to keep up the Body of theſe Canonical Books which are now remaining, made no ſcruple at all to cut off ſeveral Synonymous Terms, which were found in their Copies, and were perhaps inſerted only for a fuller Illuſtration. Theſe are the great and admirable Principles of Mr. Simon, his Publick Regiſters, his Rolls, and Synonyma's. Here is, according to him, a way to reſolve the moſt perplexed Difficulties of the Bible, and to defend it's Authority againſt the Diſciples of Spinoſa. Here is an infallible Expedient whereby we may confound the Socinians and Proteſtants, and invincibly prove the Inſpiration of the Holy Books. And laſtly, here is a never-failing Salve to ſilence all the objections that can be urged againſt the Scripture. I am of Opinion that Mr. Simon will find very few People who will be inclined to ſubſcribe to the uſefulneſs of theſe Principles. But this is not the Buſineſs I deſign to examine, 'tis their Solidity I deſire to ſee, upon which he values himſelf ſo exceedingly. For if it be made evident, that theſe Principles are only eſtabliſhed upon weak frivolous Conjectures, then adieu to all thoſe Advantages, ſay I, that may be drawn from thence. Let us therefore examine all the Proofs that Mr. Simon has brought together in his Critical Hiſtory, and other Books.

The firſt of his Principles, is that about the Scribes or Regiſters that were Divinely inſpired. But he gives us no Proofs of this matter in his Preface; it ſeems that was not the proper place. In the firſt Chapter of his Critique, which is a ſort of a ſecond Preface, he contents himſelf with ſaying, That he gives the name of Prophets to the Authors of the Books of the Bibles, and with repeating what he ſaid before in his Preface concerning the great advantage of theſe publick Scribes; as if it were enough for him barely to aſſert theſe things, without giving himſelf the trouble of proving them. But in the ſecond Chapter he endeavours to make this whole matter evident, and therefore let us conſider by what Reaſons he offers to do it. In the firſt place he obſerves, that the Jewiſh State acknowledged no other Chief or Head, but God. From this Principle he concludes, that God himſelf gave 'em Laws by the Miniſtry of Moſes, and of the other Prophets who ſucceeded him. This Concluſion is undeniable, but it was not neceſſary to prove it by a Principle more obſcure than the Concluſion that is drawn from thence. But we are not concerned to know, whether there were any of theſe Prophets amongſt the Hebrews, for that is a conſtantly received Truth; but 'tis our buſineſs to know, In the firſt place, Whether there were in all Ages amongſt the Jews thoſe Scribes or Regiſters whom he talks of, who looked after the Records and Hiſtories of the Affairs of that Nation. Secondly, Whether they were divinely inſpired. Thirdly, Whether they are the Authors of the Books of the Bible. 'Tis Mr. Simon's buſineſs to prove theſe three Propoſitions, and not barely to tell us in general, that there were Prophets among the Jews. The ſecond Remark made by Mr. Simon is this, That in all well-regulated Kingdoms, and eſpecially in the Eaſtern Nations, they had always certain Perſons, who took care to ſee, that the moſt important Occurrences of State were preſerved in Writing. I thought indeed that Mr. Simon would have concluded from this Obſervation, that they had ſuch Perſons likewiſe amongſt the Jews. He diſowns this Conſequence, and therefore this can only paſs for a Compariſon, and ſo we muſt look for other Arguments to ſhew there were ſuch publick Scribes amongſt the Jews. It carries a great deal of Probability with it, continues he, that Moſes, upon the firſt eſtabliſhment of that State, ſet up this ſort of Scribes, whom we may call Publick or Divine ones, to diſtinguiſh 'em from particular Writers, who uſually engage to write the Hiſtory of their own Times from no Motives but thoſe of Intereſt. However 'tis not certain that Moſes ever did inſtitute theſe Scribes, 'tis a mere Conjecture and nothing elſe. But how does Mr. Simon endeavour to prove it? He gives us two Reaſons in a Parentheſis; the firſt is, Becauſe Moſes was bred up in the Ægyptian Court, where they had Prieſts, to whom they gave the name of Scribes or Regiſters of Sacred Things. As if it were neceſſary, or indeed probable, that Moſes would appoint amongſt the Children of Iſrael whatever he ſaw practiſed by the Ægyptians. He ought to have produced ſome Reaſon, or at leaſt ſome Conjecture, to prove that Moſes imitated them in this. But Mr. Simon omits to do it. The ſecond Reaſon, which he alledges to prove that Moſes eſtabliſhed this ſort of Scribes amongſt the Jews, is, Becauſe he was a perfect Law-giver; as if it was neceſſary for a perfect Law-giver to inſtitute ſuch a Cuſtom. Was not Lycurgus a perfect Law-giver? And yet, by the acknow-acknowledgment of Mr. Simon himſelf, he did not appoint any of theſe publick Scribes in his Commonwealth. But for what purpoſe I wonder ſhould Moſes ſet 'em up amongſt the Jews, when he himſelf had written their Laws and Hiſtory. Beſides, could Mr. Simon undeniably prove, that there were theſe publick Scribes in the time of Moſes, yet it would not follow from thence, that they were the Authors of the Pentateuch. And thus we ſee, that all Mr. Simon's admirable Conjectures to ſhow, that the Books of the Pentateuch were written by the Scribes divinely inſpired, fall to the ground, without doing what they were produced for.

Let us now ſee, if he is more fortunate in his Citations. The firſt is from Joſephus, who tells us, That amongſt the Jews it was not lawful for every one to write their Annals, but that this Province was only reſerved for the Prophets, who knew remote and future Things by Divine Inſpiration, and committed to Writing all the remarkable Paſſages of their time. Now to this I formerly anſwered, That Joſephus by the Prophets underſtands no more than Moſes, and thoſe that wrote the Books of the Old Teſtament after him. Mr. Simon anſwers, That the Reaſons of Joſephus are too general to be explained by ſuch a Reſtriction. But this is a matter where we need not wholly depend upon Conjectures; 'tis but reading the whole paſſage in Joſephus, and it will evidently appear, that in this place he only ſpeaks of thoſe Books that were received by the Jews for Canonical. The Words faithfully tranſlated are theſe; It is not lawful for every body amongſt us to write Hiſtory, there is no contrariety at all in our Hiſtories. They are the Prophets who write, either about ancient Things that happened a long time ago, and which they learn by Divine Inſpiration, or about Things that happened in their own time, and theſe they ſet down in order as they were tranſacted. We have not millions of Books that contradict one another, and only ſerve to perplex the Reader. We have only twenty two, which contain the Hiſtory of all times, and to which we reſign our Belief with a great deal of Juſtice. Of theſe Books there are five by Moſes .... From Moſes down to Artaxerxes King of Perſia, who lived after Xerxes, the Prophets in thirteen Books wrote the Hiſtory of their Times. The four following contain Hymns in Praiſe of God, and ſeveral moral Precepts. In ſhort, from Artaxerxes down to our own Times we have our Hiſtory very well written, but theſe Books are not of the ſame Authority with the former, becauſe there has not been a continued and regular Succeſſion of Prophets. Nothing in the whole World can be more directly oppoſite to Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis than this paſſage of Joſephus. Mr. Simon ſuppoſes, that in Moſes's time there were publick Scribes, who cited the Memoirs from whence they compoſed the Pentateuch; and Joſephus expreſly tells us, that theſe five firſt Books were written by Moſes. Mr. Simon ſuppoſes, that the following Books are only Abridgments of thoſe ancient Memoirs, that were from time to time written by the publick Scribes, and afterwards collected together by others of the ſame Character; and Joſephus ſuppoſes, they were written in the ſame manner as we now find 'em, by the Prophets that lived upon the ſpot when theſe things, which they have delivered, were tranſacted. Mr. Simon would needs have it, that in the Jewiſh Nation there were always publick Scribes divinely inſpired; and Joſephus plainly tells us, that the Succeſſion of Prophets failed after Artaxerxes. Now what can be more irreconcileable than all this? Beſides, 'tis obſervable, that Joſephus's Prophets are different from Mr. Simon's publick Scribes. They were not Men entruſted with the Regiſters, and appointed to write Hiſtory: But Prophets, whom from time to time we find amongſt the Jews, who took care to tranſmit the Paſſages of their time to Poſterity; and their Books are not at all different from thoſe, which the Jews acknowledged for Canonical in the time of Joſephus. From all which it neceſſarily follows, that this paſſage confirms my Hypotheſis, and utterly deſtroys Mr. Simon's: For we maintain with Joſephus againſt Mr. Simon, that Moſes is the Author of the Pentateuch, and that the other authentick Books of the Old Teſtament were written by Men divinely inſpired, or by Prophets who lived near the times wherein thoſe Occurrences happened which they delivered, though we do not certainly know their Names: 'Tis to theſe Books and not to the Pentateuch, that we are to apply the Words of St. Gregory upon Job, which Mr. Simon manifeſtly perverts and abuſes in his firſt Chapter, Quis hæc ſcripſerit valdè ſupervacuè quæritur, cum tamen Auctor Libri Spiritus Sanctus fideliter credatur. For this Father ſpeaks this only with relation to the Book of Job, whoſe Author is unknown to us.

The ſecond Author, that Mr. Simon alledges in his Critical Hiſtory to prove theſe Scribes divinely inſpired, is Euſebius: Euſebius, ſays he, confirms this Opinion, when he takes notice, that amongſt the Jews it was not allowed for all ſorts of People to paſs their Judgment upon thoſe Men that were inſpired by the Holy Spirit to write Holy Books. He cites in the Margin, Euſebius de præparatione Evangelicâ; that is to ſay, a great Book in Folio; I have diligently hunted after this paſſage there, but have not been ſo happy as to meet with it. But let the matter be how it will, I don't ſee what Aſſiſtance it brings to Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis; The Jews had Writers that were divinely inſpired; Who queſtions it? As alſo, That it did not belong to all the World to judge who they were, that were thus divinely inſpired; but this Province was reſerved for thoſe Perſons, who had the ſame Inſpiration themſelves. Well then, ſuppoſe it were ſo, does it therefore follow that the Books of Moſes were compoſed by the Keepers of Regiſters? Does it follow that thoſe who were appointed to write Hiſtory, and that too out of the publick Memoirs, were divinely inſpired? Or laſtly, That all the Books of Scripture which we now have, are but ſo many Abridgments extracted out of theſe Memoirs. As for what remains, Mr. Simon could not have cited any Author more contrary to his own Hypotheſis, than Euſebius, and that even in this very Book De Præparatione Evangelicâ. For one of the great Principles, which he there eſtabliſhes in ſeveral places, is the Authority and Antiquity of the Books of Moſes, which he always ſuppoſes to have been written by that Prophet in the ſame manner as we have 'em at preſent. The Truth of this Aſſertion he confirms by theſe three Propoſitions, which he lays down in the beginning of the 14th Book. The firſt is, That Moſes is ancienter than any Greek Author. The ſecond, That he has written what he had learned of his Anceſtors. The third, That the Jews have neither added nor diminiſhed from the Writings which he left them. And now I'll leave the World to judge whether theſe Principles of Euſebius agree with thoſe of Mr. Simon.

The third Author cited by Mr. Simon is Theodoret. It muſt be confeſſed, that this Father owns, (as well as ſeveral other Authors have done) that the Books of Kings and Chronicles were compoſed from very ancient Memoirs. But this is not the point in Queſtion. We confeſs, we are not aſſured of the Authors of thoſe Books. We acknowledge they are a Collection drawn out of old Memoirs. But we demand of Mr. Simon whether it follows from hence, that the Pentateuch, and other Books of the Bible, are of the ſame Nature. This is a thing which Theodoret wou'd beware of ſaying, becauſe he owns Moſes to be the Author of the Pentateuch. 'Tis with this Aſſertion he begins his Preface to the Books of Kings, from whence Mr. Simon has drawn theſe paſſages which he quotes. After having explained the Books of Moſes, &c. To theſe three Authors has Mr Simon in his Letter to Monſieur L' Abbe, added the Author of the Synopſis, attributed to St. Athanaſius. This Author follows the Opinion of Joſephus, and after having obſerved that the five firſt Books of the Bible do without diſpute belong to Moſes, he ſays, that all the following Books are not written by thoſe whoſe Names they bear, but that they were compoſed by Prophets who lived from time to time. Laſtly he obſerves, when he is ſpeaking concerning the Chronicles, that one finds ſeveral Hiſtorical Books of the Prophets quoted there. And what does all this make for Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis? Have not we ſaid the very ſame thing? Does not all the World agree as to this particular? Had Mr. Simon kept himſelf here, no Body would have fell upon him.

The laſt Author, whom Mr. Simon cites to juſtifie his Hypotheſis, is the Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum. This Author in the place tranſcribed by Mr. Simon, tells us, that there were ſome Prophets who wrote their own Propheſies themſelves, as David the Book of Pſalms, and Daniel his Prophecy; and that there were others who did not write themſelves, but that they had Scribes in the Temple, who wrote down, as it were in a Journal, the Words of each Prophet..... That the Books of Kings were thus compoſed by parts, that under Saul's Reign they wrote whatever paſſed in his time, and ſo likewiſe in David's time, and the other Kings; That the Chronicles are but a Collection of Regiſters, and ſeveral Papers of their Kings; That Moſes wrote the Pentateuch; That Joſhuah is the Author of the Book which bears his Name; That the Book of Judges was written by the Scribes in the Temple from time to time, as well as that of Ruth; That Salomon compoſed the Proverbs, the Canticles, and Eccleſiaſtes. This Author's Hypotheſis is extreamly different from that of Mr. Simon. 1. He ſuppoſeth for a certain truth, that Moſes was the Author of the Pentateuch, and does not attribute his Works to the publick Scribes or Abbreviators. 2. He does not ſay, that theſe publick Scribes were inſpired by God, or that they wrote the Hiſtory of themſelves. He ſuppoſes the Prophets dictated that to them as well as their Prophecies. 3. He believes that the Books of Kings and Judges were the very Originals from the Prophets, which were joyned together. Inſtead of which Mr. Simon believes, that theſe Books are Abridgments. I won't loſe ſo much time as to anſwer the Rabbies, and other Authors of that Stamp, whom Mr. Simon has muſtered up in his laſt Letter. 'Tis viſible there's not one ſingle Author he quotes that is of the ſame opinion with himſelf. For, in the firſt place, they all of 'em acknowledge, That the Books of the Pentateuch ought not to be attributed to Scribes, or to Prophets divinely inſpired, but to Moſes himſelf. Secondly, they ſay, That the following Books were written by Perſons divinely inſpired, to whom they gave the name of Prophets, but they don't tell us, that theſe Prophets were Superviſors of the Regiſters, or publick Scribes. Thirdly, they acknowledge, that there were ancient Memoirs, or ancient Hiſtories, often quoted in the Books of Kings, and the Chronicles. No body doubts this, I have frequently obſerved it, and have made a Catalogue of the Books that are quoted in the Old Teſtament. But it does not follow from hence, that all the Books of the Bible are extracted from theſe Memoirs, and compiled a long time after. Mr. Simon has given theſe publick Scribes authority to change, to enlarge, and abridge theſe ſacred Books as they ſee convenient. To prove this, he quotes Don Iſaac Abarbinel, barbinel, a learned Spaniſh Jew, as if we were obliged to take all for Goſpel that theſe Rabbies have been pleaſed to deliver. He joyns Procopius and Theodoret to this Jew, as Men that have obſerved, that the Books of Kings and Chronicles were drawn out of ſeveral other Hiſtorical Books. Not to diſpleaſe Mr. Simon, he has mightily altered the Point, for this is not the Queſtion under debate. We agree with him, that the Authors of the Books of Kings, and the Chronicles, compiled their Hiſtories out of Memoirs and particular Hiſtorians whom they found, as Livy and Mezeray made uſe of the ancient Hiſtorians to compoſe their Hiſtories: But for all this, we dare not ſay, they have changed or diminiſhed the ancient Hiſtories, that always continued in the ſame condition they were in, nor that they had a Privilege to do this, much leſs that they have made any conſiderable Alterations or Additions to the Books of Moſes. Mr. Simon at laſt brings in a very dangerous Maxim, though he covers it under a ſpecious appearance of Uſefulneſs: It would be dangerous, ſays he, to pretend to Correct one Book of Scripture by another, becauſe they don't agree altogether themſelves. 'Tis very truly ſaid, that we ought not to Correct one Book of Scripture by another: But it is not true, that two Books of the Scripture don't altogether agree with each other. There is not any real Contradiction between the Books of the Bible; if there are any apparent ones, the fault does not lie in the Authors, but in our want of underſtanding them. 'Tis a piece of extraordinary Raſhneſs and Preſumption to ſuppoſe with Mr. Simon, that there are real Contradictions in the Books of the Bible, that the Author of the Chronicles has reported Matter of Fact otherwiſe than it is in other places, or that the Genealogies and Chronology of the Scriptures are faulty, and the like: I know, ſays Mr. Simon, that it is expreſly forbidden in Deuteronomy to add or diminiſh a Tittle from the Word of God. Here then there is an expreſs Text againſt Mr. Simon's Hypotheſis. Now to anſwer this Paſſage, he ought to alledge ſome other place of Scripture, which reſtrains and limits this Prohibition to private Perſons, or gives Permiſſion to the Prophets and publick Scribes to do the contrary. But Mr. Simon thinks it enough to quote the Author of the Book Cozri, who is of the ſame opinion, but by a peculiar Misfortune that attends him, we find, that a certain Commentator towards the bottom of the Page, where this Book is quoted, obſerves, That the Author of the Book Cozri does not ſpeak of the Scripture in that place, but only of the Explication of the Commandments, which depended upon the Judges of the Sanedrim, who had power to extend or limit them according to the circumſtances of Time, and emergent Occaſions. What becomes then of Mr. Simon's Anſwer? It ſtood only upon the Authority of the Author of the Book Cozri, and now we ſee, that this very Author will not be brought to ſay what he would have him. After all, Mr. Simon quotes the Common Opinion of the Fathers, who believe, that the Collection of the Old Teſtament, ſuch as it now is, was compoſed by Ezrah, which confirms, ſays he, what I am now maintaining; for Ezrah could not correct and reſtore theſe Books, which, according to them, had been corrupted during the time of the Captivity, but in the Quality and Character of a Prophet and publick Scribe, and therefore he is called a Scribe by the way of Excellence in the Bible. I would willingly know what neceſſity there was, that Ezrah ſhould reſtore the Holy Scripture in quality of Publick Scribe, or Maſter of the Rolls. Is it not infinitely more probable to imagine he did it, becauſe he was commanded to reſtore the Religion and Laws of the Jews in their ancient Purity, as being their Chief and High-Prieſt. Whenever he is called a Scribe in Scripture, 'tis not in Mr. Simon's ſenſe, but becauſe he was well skilled and knowing in the Law of the Lord. We need only give our ſelves the trouble to read this paſſage, Ez. 7. v. 6. Ezrah went up from Babylon, and he was a ready Scribe in the Law of Moſes, which the Lord God of Iſrael had given. That is to ſay, he perfectly underſtood the Law, the Word Scribe being taken in the ſame ſenſe in Jeremiah, ch. 8. v. 8. And it does not ſignifie any thing elſe in the New Teſtament, where this Name is given to all the Doctors of the Law.

The ſecond Principle of Mr. Simon depends upon the changing of the Rolls or Volumes in which theſe ſacred Books are written. I ſaid before, that this Conjecture is only pleaſant becauſe it is new, and that it was a Chimæra, that had nothing at all to do with the Argument in hand. Mr. Simon anſwers me immediately, That what I call a Chimæra, was a very ancient opinion, and likewiſe taken notice of by the moſt ancient Criticks. It was therefore his buſineſs to look after his Proofs. But I have no Exceptions to make to the Antiquity of Rolls, (for 'tis very plain that they formerly wrote upon Leaves which they rolled together) but only to the ill uſe he makes of 'em. He ought to have ſhown by convincing Inſtances, that theſe Rolls frequently occaſioned Tranſpoſitions, and he ought likewiſe to have applied this Conjecture to ſome Examples in Scripture which had ſuffered by this diſorder. But this I defy him to do after all his attempts, he dares not undertake any thing of that nature, but contents himſelf to ſay in general terms, that it may be ſo. I ſaid alſo, that this Conjecture had nothing to do with the Subject, becauſe if we ſuppoſed, that ſome little confuſion might accidentally happen in the rolling of theſe Leaves, yet the Abridgers might eaſily rectify 'em and ſet 'em in order. To this Mr. Simon replies, that 'tis to no purpoſe to talk of the Abridgers, becauſe theſe Leaves were diſordered long after the Collection of the Abridgments. I did indeed believe Mr. Simon had ſpoken of the Leaves of the Originals or Memoirs, out of which, as he pretends, they made an Abridgment of the Bible, and I am ſtill of opinion, that he is thus to be underſtood, where he ſays, p. 35. I much doubt whether we are to attribute to Moſes and the publick Scribes, that lived in his time, the diſorder and confuſion which we find in ſeveral places of the Pentateuch: There is great probability for us to believe, that as they wrote their Books then upon little Rolls, or ſingle Leaves, which they rolled one upon another, the order of theſe Leaves has been changed. Now it was very probable, that this then had a relation to Moſes, and the publick Scribes: But ſince Mr. Simon is willing to have it underſtood of the Times that followed theſe Abridgments, he ought to inform us, that the little Order which we find, as he pretends, in the Pentateuch, proceeded from the changing of theſe Rolls. But this he can never be able to do, and I challenge him to apply this Conjecture to the Examples which he produces; as one may readily rectify a printed Sheet of Paper which was tranſpoſed in binding a Book. Hence it follows, that this ſecond Principle of Mr. Simon is ſo very far from being well grounded, that 'tis indeed wholly uſeleſs. As for what concerns his third Principle, which is the Repetition of the Synonymous Terms, from whence he pretends to conclude, that the Books of the Bible are compoſed from ſeveral ancient Memoirs, 'tis a falſe and frivolous Conjecture; for there is much greater reaſon for a Man to believe, that theſe Repetitions came from one Author, who wrote theſe things as Memoirs at firſt, than from an Epitomizer, who has weaved one continued Hiſtory without making any repetition of the ſame things, or the ſame Words: Beſides, that theſe Repetitions which Mr. Simon produces as Examples, are not abſolutely needleſs, but ſerve either to Illuſtrate what has been ſaid, or elſe to Corroborate ſome Circumſtances or other, or laſtly, to give more Force and Efficacy to what is written. 'Tis no unuſual thing to meet with Repetitions of that nature in moſt Authors, and principally in thoſe, that write the Hiſtory of their own times with an air of Simplicity and Unaffectedneſs.

Eleventh Objection. 'Tis pretended that the Repetitions, which we meet with in the Pentateuch, were not in all probability made by Moſes, but rather by them, who made a Collection of the Holy Books, and have joyned together ſeveral Precepts or Explications of the ſame Words. There are abundance of theſe Repetitions which they produce. They ſay moreover, that there are many Repetitions of the ſame thing differently related, and this makes it appear, that this Hiſtory is drawn from ſeveral different Memoirs. They add, that we cannot rationally attribute them to Moſes, becauſe of the little Order or Regularity we find them in. They produce upon this occaſion a Conjecture that is pleaſant enough, becauſe new. There is reaſon to imagine, ſay they, that as they wrote their Books in thoſe times upon Rolls, or ſeparate Leaves, which they rolled one upon another, the order of the Leaves has been changed and inverted. And ſo they pretend, that the diverſity of Style, which is to be found in the Books of the Pentateuch, is a ſatisfactory Proof, to ſhew that the ſame Writer was not the Author. Anſwer. All theſe Objections are extremely weak and impertinent, and rather deſtroy, than contribute any thing to the Hypotheſis they are produced to eſtabliſh. For can any Man in the World believe, that an Author, who had abridged any Hiſtory, would ſo often repeat the ſame things, that he would preſerve no order, and not write in the ſame ſtyle throughout. On the contrary, Don't all Abbreviators make it their buſineſs to make their Relations in as few Words as poſſible, regularly, and after an uniform manner? The contrary Faults more frequently belong to the firſt Authors of Hiſtory, who naturally and ſimply recount all Affairs which they know. This ſort of Repetition is very familiar and common among the Ancients, and particularly amongſt thoſe, who wrote an Hiſtory or Fable firſt; and they are rarely found in Hiſtorians, who compile their Works out of the Memoirs of other Men, the reaſon is, becauſe the firſt write naturally, juſt as they ſpeak, without Meditation and Study, and the others on the contrary, having all their Matter ready fitted to their hands, are only at the Expence of ranging, and digeſting it Methodically. The Repetitions, which we find in the Pentateuch, are often neceſſary to explain the Particularities of thoſe things, which at firſt they were forced to relate in general; for this reaſon it is, that the particular Circumſtances of the Creation of the World, which were ſet down in the firſt Chapter of Geneſis, were afterwards told over again, more particularly in the ſecond. 'Twas the Genius and Cuſtom of the Hebrews to repeat the ſame Words, as it was indeed the faſhion of all the Ancients.

But we are not to believe, that there is ſo little order, as they would make us believe, in the Pentateuch, and if there were leſs than there really is, that would be rather an Argument to ſhow it belongs to Moſes, who wrote without Art, Method, and Affectation, as thoſe People generally do, who leave Memoirs behind them of thoſe Paſſages, wherein themſelves bore a ſhare. The conjecture about the Rolls is an extravagant travagant Whimſie, that makes nothing at all to the purpoſe, for if there were any confuſion of the Leaves, the Abbreviators might without any great difficulty ſet them right in their true order. Laſtly, what they pretend about the conſiderable difference of ſtyle in the Pentateuch, is notoriouſly falſe: On the contrary, a Man may obſerve all along the Genius of the ſame Author; and if he ſometimes does not happen to enlarge upon the Affairs, which he relates, 'tis becauſe his Matter required ſhortneſs, or becauſe he did not judge it convenient to uſe that liberty. Now we cannot in juſtice call this a difference of Style, when all the reſt is agreeable, and of a piece.

But let us leave Mr. Simon to anſwer his Adverſary, who pretends, as well as himſelf, that the Pentateuch does not belong to Moſes, but to a Jewiſh Prieſt ſent from Babylon to inſtruct the Chriſtians. His Conjectures, which are eaſily anſwered, are theſe:

In the firſt place, he ſays, that the 11th and 12th Verſes of the ſecond Chapter in Geneſis could not be written by Moſes. The names of the firſt is Piſon, that is it which compaſſeth the whole Land of Havelah, where there is Gold. And the Gold of that Land is good, there is Bdellium, and the Onyx Stone. Theſe Remarks, ſays Mr. Simon's Adverſary, ſeem to proceed from an Author who had been in that Country, that is to ſay, in Chaldea, for Piſon is an Arm of Euphrates, that diſcharges it ſelf into the Perſian Gulf. It is by no means probable, that Moſes, who never went far from Ægypt, ſhould be able to give ſo particular a relation of a Country ſo remote and diſtant, in a time when ſuch Voyages were very rare, and attended with abundance of Difficulties. But I would willingly underſtand what ſhould hinder Moſes from knowing, that this Country was watered with the River Piſon, and how was it poſſible for him to give a deſcription of the place, unleſs he had given the moſt publick and commonly known Marks. We ſee plainly, that ſome Countries, though never ſo remote, are yet known well enough for thoſe excellent and precious Commodities that are found there, which are to be met with no where elſe, and which are tranſported from thence to other places. 'Tis not neceſſary for a Man, to go to Potoſi, to be informed, that the Gold of that Country is very fine, and in great plenty; or to make a Voyage to the Indies, to know that Pearls and precious Stones, are found there; nor is there any more ſtrength in the ſecond Reaſon, which ſuppoſeth, that the exactneſs wherewith this Author deſcribes the erecting of the Cities of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, v. 18. of the 10th Chapter of Geneſis, is a clear indication, that the Writer thereof had been in that Country. For is it neceſſary that an Hiſtorian ſhould have been in all the places he mentions? On the other hand, Was there ever any Hiſtorian in the World that has ſeen all the Countries which he gives an account of?

Theſe are this Author's private Gueſſes: We have already anſwered thoſe which have been ſtarted by Hobbs, Spinoſa, and Mr. Simon, as well as himſelf, but don't think it worth the while to throw away any time in refuting thoſe extravagant Whimſies he makes ſo much noiſe about, to prove that the Pentateuch was written by a Samaritan Prieſt. They are ſo weak and pitiful that they deſerve no body's Conſideration, and indeed if ſuch Reaſonings were to be allowed, I don't know one ſingle Book in the World which might not upon as good Grounds be taken away from the true Author, and beſtowed upon another. From hence we may ſee, of what ill conſequence it is to give ones Imagination too large a Scope, and miſtake bare Conjectures for eternal Truths.

(b) They would only prove, that the ſame thing has happened to the Books of Moſes, which has almoſt happened to all the ancient Authors, viz. That ſome few Words, Names, and Terms, have been added or altered to render the Narrative more intelligible.] If one examines all theſe Objections that I have already anſwered, he will be convinced they prove no more, and that one might have anſwered almoſt all of them by this very Remark. Mr. Simon, who cannot contradict me in this Point, is mighty deſirous to ſet upon me another way, by objecting, that in my Preface, and other places of my Book, I have laid down Rules which ſeem to prove from theſe Additions, that the Pentateuch is a ſuppoſitious Work: For it ſeems I had affirmed in the firſt part of my Preface, That impoſtors for the moſt part relate Matters of Fact that happened after the Death of thoſe whom they ſpeak of, and they give an Account of Cities and people that were not known in the time of thoſe Authors whoſe Names they aſſume. From whence Mr. Simon draws this Conſequence, that ſince I own there are ſeveral ſuch Additions in the Pentateuch, a Diſciple of Spinoſa may thence conclude, that according to my Rule 'tis a ſuppoſitious Work. To this I anſwer, that this Objection of Mr. Simon ſhews, that he has not ſo great a ſhare of good Senſe, and cloſeneſs of Arguing, as he has of Rabbinical Learning. For if he had only conſidered the General Remark which I made in my Preface about the Rules of Criticiſm there laid together, he could not have been guilty of ſo manifeſt a Soleciſm as this. I deſired him to mind theſe Words a little: A Man may ſay, that all theſe Rules which I have here laid down, are convincing and probable in different degrees, but that the Sovereign and Principal Rule is the Judgment of Equity and Prudence, which inſtructs us to ballance the Reaſons of this and t'other ſide, in diſtinctly conſidering the Conjectures that are made of both ſides. Now this is the General Rule of Rational Criticiſm, and we abuſe all the reſt if we don't chiefly make uſe of this. Let us now apply it to the preſent Queſtion. There are in the Pentateuch ſome Terms, and Names of Cities, and other Paſſages that could not come from Moſes; muſt we therefore haſtily conclude that it was not written by Moſes, becauſe 'tis a certain ſign that a Book is ſpurious, when one finds ſuch Occurrences in it, as have happen'd after the Death of the Author to whom it is attributed, and becauſe we there meet with ſome Names of Cities and People that were not known in his time? Or on the other hand, Does it follow, becauſe the Pentateuch was writ by Moſes, notwithſtanding ſome Additions which are there to be found, does it I ſay thence follow, that the abovementioned Rule is falſe? Theſe two Conſequences are very indiſcreetly drawn, but the Rule is ſtill good, and the Books of the Pentateuch may yet be written by Moſes. The Rule is good, but we ought to make a good uſe of it. When there are no certain Proofs of the Antiquity of a Book, and beſides there are other Conjectures to incline us to doubt of it, we may in purſuance of this Rule, conclude it ſpurious. But when it is paſt Diſpute that ſuch a Book is written by ſuch an Author, and there is an infinite number of evident Arguments to demonſtrate the truth of it; then we are neceſſarily to conclude, that theſe Words, and Terms, and Names, were afterwards added. After all, where there are Reaſons on one ſide, as well as on the other, we ought carefully to ballance them, to weigh one againſt the other, and at laſt to determine the matter on that ſide, where the greateſt appearance of probability lies. Theſe are the true Rules of Criticiſm, which it ſeems Mr. Simon is ignorant of, or at leaſt does not rightly examine, otherwiſe he could never have forgot himſelf ſo far, as to accuſe me wrongfully for giving favourable Rules to the Diſciples of Spinoſa. The fault is by no means to be imputed to theſe Rules, which almoſt every Critick has given before me, but 'tis his way of Arguing, and drawing of Inferences that has been favourable to the Spinoſiſts. His Conjectures, and Objections, and in ſhort his Hypotheſis, has ſerved to confirm thoſe Perſons in their Errors, beſides that ſeveral places of his Book give the greateſt Blow imaginable to the Authority of the Holy Scripture; When he asks me, What anſwer I will return to a Spinoſiſt, who to prove that the Pentateuch was not written by Moſes, ſhall uſe my own Reaſons to ſhow that the Liturgy of St. James, as 'tis commonly received by the Oriental Nations, was not made by him? I will anſwer him, that there are not the ſame Reaſons to induce a Man to believe that St. James was the Author of that Liturgy, which goes under his Name, as that the Books of Moſes were written by him: That this was never affirmed in any of the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, that the Ancients never ſpeak of it, that this Liturgy does not agree with the Diſcipline that was in uſe in St. James's time. Whereas the Scripture informs me that Moſes was Author of the Pentateuch, and Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles have aſſured me of the truth of it, and all the ancient Writers have teſtified ſo much, beſides the Univerſal Agreement of all People in this matter. 'Tis therefore a manifeſt Injuſtice and Calumny in Mr. Simon to accuſe me for deſigning to deſtroy the Books of Moſes, under a pretence of defending them againſt the Spinoſiſts.

Nor does Mr. Simon reaſon better in applying what I have ſaid with regard to the Book of Joſhuah, to the Books of the Pentateuch; 'tis but comparing the Arguments I brought to prove that the Books of the Pentateuch belonged to Moſes, with thoſe that are commonly produced to prove that the Book of Joſhuah was written by Joſhuah, and any Man will ſoon perceive the mighty difference between one and the other, and that the Reaſons that are alledged in favour of Moſes, are infinitely ſtronger than thoſe that are urged to prove that Joſhuah compoſed the Book that bears his Name. No man ever yet doubted that the Pentateuch was written by Moſes, but 'tis not the ſame caſe with the Book of Joſhuah. Mr. Simon ſuppoſeth there is as much evidence for one, as the other; in order to prove this, he imagines that all thoſe formal places of Scripture that are produced to ſhew that Moſes was Author of the Pentateuch, reduce themſelves to this Head, viz. That Moſes wrote the Law; and he pretends there is the ſame reaſon to affirm, that Joſhuah added the Book of his Hiſtory to the Books of the Law. But if any one will give himſelf the trouble to conſider the paſſages that are to be found in the Notes (b) and (c), he will be perſwaded that they are very poſitive as well as numerous, and don't lie in ſo narrow a compaſs as thoſe which are brought in behalf of Joſhuah: Beſides, 'tis but reading the 24th Chapter of the Book of Joſhuah, where we find this laſt paſſage, and we ſhall ſee that it may be very well underſtood of the Moral and Ceremonial Precepts that are mentioned in that place. From hence it evidently appears, that there's a vaſt difference between the Reaſons that prove Moſes to be the Author of the Pentateuch, and thoſe that ſeem to intimate that Joſhuah compoſed the Book which contains this Hiſtory; and that a man without incurring the guilt of raſhneſs, may doubt whether he is the Author of that Book; but that he cannot doubt whether Moſes wrote the Pentateuch, without being guilty of that crime to the higheſt degree. At the ſame time I will not abſolutely deny that Joſhuah was Author of the Book that carries his Name; I have only obſerved, that it is not abſolutely certain, and 'tis an eaſie matter to take notice, that I rather incline to that party which aſſign it to Joſhuah.

(i) We don't certainly know when theſe Books were written by Moſes.] Some ſay that Geneſis was written by Moſes, after the departure out of Egypt; ſo Pererius and Tena. 'Tis moſt probable, that all of them were written after the departure out of Egypt, and particularly that Geneſis was compoſed after the Promulgation of the Law. This is the Opinion of Euſebius and the Ancients, and indeed we find in Geneſis ſeveral Alluſions to the Law; as for example, in Chap. 2. there is mention made of the Law of the Sabbath; and in the 7th and 8th Chapters of clean and unclean Beaſts: Which are ſufficient Intimations that Moſes wrote thoſe things, when his Thoughts were full of the Law then newly made. Deuteronomy is the laſt, for beſides that it is a Repitition of what we find in the Law, it plainly tells us, that Moſes ſpoke thoſe things to the People of Iſrael when they were ready to go over Jordan. To this we may add, that he there relates whatever happened towards the end of his Life; and laſtly, that the Account of his Death is inſerted there, as being his laſt Work.

(k) Though 'tis commonly believed that this Book was written by Joſhuah.] Moſt of the Modern Writers are of this Opinion, as was alſo Iſidore in the 6th Book of his Origines, Junilius, and Dorotheus, Vatablus, Abulenſis, Driedo, and Bellarmine ſay the ſame, as do likewiſe the Talmudiſts Babatra, c. 1. This Opinion is chiefly ſupported by theſe words in the laſt Chapter, Verſ. the 26th, where it is ſaid, that Joſhuah wrote all theſe things in the Book of the Law of God. However, this paſſage may have a relation only to what is written in this Chapter, or elſe perhaps Joſhuah might have written another Book, of which this was an Abridgment. 'Tis ſaid in Eccleſiaſticus, Chap. 46. that Joſhuah was the Succeſſor of Moſes in Prophecies; But this does not prove that he wrote any thing. Theodoret aſſures us, that the Book of Joſhuah is nothing elſe but an Extract out of the Book of Jaſher, which is mentioned in the 10th Chapter, Verſ. the 13th.

The Reaſons that are brought to prove that this Book was not written by Joſhuah, are generally theſe. In the firſt place, ſay they, it is obſerved there in the 10th Chapter, Verſ. 13. that the Book of Jaſher, Where the Wars of Joſhuah were written, is quoted, therefore the Book of Joſhuah is later. 2. We meet there this faſhion of ſpeaking, Uſque in præſentem diem, unto this day, frequently repeated: As for inſtance, when 'tis ſaid in the 4th Chap. Verſ. 9. That the twelve Stones which Joſhuah took out of the midſt of Jordan, continue there unto this day. And in the 5th Chap. Verſ. 9. The name of the place is called Gilgal, unto this day. 3. The taking of the City of Lachiſh is related Chap. 10. Verſ. 35. tho' it happen'd not till after the Death of Joſhuah, as we may ſee, Judges, Chap. 18. Verſ. 29. So likewiſe, Chap. 11. Verſ. 14. and the following, there is an account of Caleb and his Daughter Athſah, which paſſage did not fall out till after the Death of Joſhuah, as it is written in the firſt Chapter of the Book of Judges. In the ſame Chapter, Verſ. 28. there is mention made of the Land of Cabul, which received this Name from Hiram King of Tyre, as we may find it in the 9th Chapter of the firſt Book of Kings. Laſtly, in the 9th Chapter, Verſ. 23. and the laſt, it is ſaid, That Joſhuah made the Gibeonites Drawers of Waters and Hewers of Wood in the Houſe of his God, which is probably to be underſtood of the Temple, that was not built long after the death of Joſhuah. Theſe Arguments are not wholly unanſwerable. Firſt, We don't know what manner of Book the Book of Jaſher was; 'tis not ſaid that all the Wars of Joſhuah were ſet down there, but only the relation of the Sun's ſtanding ſtill. Some think that Geneſis is there called the Book of Jaſher, where, as they pretend, this memorable Event was foretold. Others believe 'tis the Pentateuch; Grotius ſays it was a Song compoſed upon that occaſion. Huetius ſuppoſes that it is a Book of Morality. Laſtly, others imagine it to have been a Book of Annals. If this laſt Opinion were the only true one, yet it by no means follows, that Joſhuah was not Author of that Book where theſe Annals are quoted. Secondly, Suppoſing that Joſhuah wrote this book towards the end of his Life, as is moſt reaſonable to think he did, when he had occaſion to ſpeak of thoſe things that happen'd at the beginning of his Miniſtry, he might very well make uſe of that Expreſſion, Uſque in præſentem diem, unto this day, even as St. Matthew himſelf, who wrote a little after the Death of our Bleſſed Saviour, tells us, that the Field Aceldama was called The Field of Blood unto this day. Theſe, and the following Objections, may be anſwered, by ſaying, that theſe things have been added ſince, and particularly the taking of the City of Lachiſh by the Danites: Or at leaſt we may ſay that the City of Lachiſh, mentioned in Joſhuah, is a different place from Laiſh in the Book of Judges. The ſecond Objection may be anſwered by ſaying, That whatever is ſaid concerning Othoniel and Achſa in the Book of Judges, is only a Recapitulation of what happened in the time of Joſhuah. The Land of Cabul, mentioned in Joſhuah, is different from that in the Book of Kings: Joſephus has diſtinguiſhed them; one is a Country, the other a Village. The houſe of God, mentioned in the Ninth Chapter, may be underſtood well enough of the Tabernacle and Ark, which was in the time of Joſhuah.

(l) Be it as it will, the Book of Judges is ancient.] To prove that this Book was not compoſed till after the Captivity, they commonly inſtance in theſe words in Chap. 18. Verſ. 30, 31. Until the day of the Captivity of the Land; and in theſe, In thoſe days there was no King in Iſrael. Words, ſay they, which demonſtrate that this Book was written after the Captivity, and in the time when they had Kings in Iſrael. But the Captivity, ſpoken of in this place, is not that of Babylon, but the Captivity that happened in the time of Heli, when the Ark was taken by the Philiſtines, and the Idol of Micah was deſtroyed, as it is obſerved in this place of the Book of Judges. And as for theſe words, In thoſe days there was no King in Iſrael, they don't neceſſarily ſuppoſe that there were any when this Author lived, and perhaps they were added by Ezrah.

(m) Which has made Men think, that the Books of Samuel were written by that Prophet.] This Opinion is not certain, becauſe Chap. 9. Verſ. 9. it is ſaid. That he that is now called a Prophet, was before-time called a Seer, which Samuel could not ſay. In the fifth Chapter, Verſe the fifth, the Author of this Book, relating the Hiſtory of the taking of the Ark, tells us, that the Prieſts of Dagon did not tread upon the Threſhold of Dagon unto this day. But this might well enough be ſaid by Samuel, becauſe that happened when he was young, and he wrote not this Book till towards the end of his Life.

(n) Ezrah ſpeaks there in the firſt Perſon.] He ſpeaks of himſelf in the firſt Perſon, Ezrah, Chap. 7. Verſ. 27, and 28. God hath extended his Mercy towards me before the King, and I, &c. And Chap. 9. Verſ. 5. I fell upon my Knees, and ſpread out my Hands.

(o) The Conjecture of Huetius is not ſo ſtrong as to make us quit the common Opinion.] He ſays that the Author of the ſix firſt Chapters was at Jeruſalem in the time of Darius, as it appears by theſe words in the fifth Chapter, ad quod reſpondimus eis qua eſſent nomina. Now Ezrah came not to that City till after Darius's Reign under that of Artaxerxes, as is eaſily proved by the beginning of the ſeventh Chapter. But 'tis no hard matter to refute this Conjecture, by obſerving that when Ezrah ſaid, Reſpondimus eis, he only ſpoke in the name of the Jews; and 'tis an uſual thing with the Hiſtorians of any Nation to cry, We did ſuch or ſuch a thing, although the Hiſtorian had no ſhare in the doing it.

(p) The ſecond Book is conſtantly attributed to Nehemiah.] He begins thus, The Words of Nehemiah; and after the ſame manner, Herodotus, Thucydides, and Timæus, &c. begin their Works, not to mention the Prophets. The Author of Eccleſiaſticus ſpeaks of the Actions of Nehemiah, Chap. 40. and the Author of the ſecond Book of the Maccabees commends his Writings.

(q) 'Tis commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own Hiſtory.] This Opinion is principally founded upon the Angel's commanding them in the 12th Chapter, Verſ. 20. Narrate omnia mirabilia ejus. In the Greek Interpreter it is γράψατε, that is, Write all his wonderful Works. Secondly, becauſe in the Greek and Hebrew Editions they ſpeak of themſelves in the firſt Perſon.

(r) The time wherein the Hiſtory of Judith happen'd is no leſs uncertain.] Some ſay this Hiſtory happened before the Captivity, and prove it, firſt, becauſe it is ſaid in this Book, that it happen'd a little after the City of Ecbatana was built by Arphaxad King of the Medes. Now that City, according to Euſebius and Herodotus, was built by Dejoces, who lived a long time before the Captivity. Secondly, King Nebuchadnezzar, who ſent Holofernes into Judæa, reigned in Ninive, which City was deſtroyed before the Captivity of Babylon. Thirdly, This Nebuchadnezzar, they tell us, is Saoſduchinus Grandſon of Sennacherib, and ſon of Aſſaraïdon King of the Babylonians, who gave the Name of Nebuchadnezzar to their King. Fourthly, They ſay that Eliachim, or Joachim, was High-Prieſt under Manaſſes, as we may ſee in the 22d. Chapter of Iſaiah. Thoſe who are of the contrary Opinion, return the following Anſwers to theſe Conjectures. To the firſt they reply, that Ecbatana was ſeveral times rebuilt. To the ſecond, that Ninive was reſtored to its ancient Splendor by the Kings of Perſia. To the third, that the Name of Nebuchadnezzar was common to the Kings of Babylon and Aſſyria. To the fourth, that Eliachim, of whom mention is made in Iſaiah, and in the ſecond Book of Kings, Chap. 18. was not High-Prieſt. The Reaſons which they alledge for this Opinion are as follows: Firſt, that this Hiſtory happen'd at a time when there were no Kings at Jeruſalem, and the High-Prieſts had the whole Authority in their Hands: Now this was not before the Captivity. Secondly, We read that there was one Eliachim, or Joachim, High-Prieſt after the Captivity. Thirdly, Achior, Prince of the Edomites, being ask'd by Holofernes, Chap. 5. Verſ. 3. Who the People of Iſrael were? He tells him, that they were lately carried away Captives into a ſtrange Land, but now poſſeſſed the City Jeruſalem. Et plurimi eorum captivi abducti ſunt in terram non ſuam, nuper autem reverſi ad Dominum Deum ſuum, ex diſperſione quâ diſperſi erant adunati ſunt, & aſcenderunt Montana hæc omnia, & iterum poſſident Jeruſalem. And in the Greek it is added, Καὶ ὁ ναὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀνθʼ ἑσπέρας ἐγένετο καὶ ἔθανε. Et Templum Dei eorum factum eſt in ſolum. Words that ſhew, that this paſſage ought to be underſtood of the Captivity, and Deſtruction of the Temple. Laſtly, They add that it is ſaid in the 16th Chapter, that Judith, who lived an Hundred and five Years, ſaw no more War in Iſrael; and in the 8th Chapter, that when ſhe went to find out Holofernes, ſhe was young and beautiful. Hence they ſay it evidently follows, that this Hiſtory did not happen during the Reign of Manaſſes, becauſe from the War which Pharaoh Necho made in the time of King Joſiah, it was but Forty five or Forty ſix Years to the Captivity, ſo that by this account ſhe muſt have been Sixty four Years old, when ſhe went to meet Holoſernes, which is by no means probable. Theſe Reaſons, I confeſs, are not unanſwerable; but however, this Opinion ſeems to me to be moſt agreeable to truth. The greateſt part of the Proteſtant Criticks, as Luther, Chytraus, Beroaldus, Scaliger, and Grotius, believe that this Hiſtory is a Fiction, or Allegory, which Grotius has very handſomely explained; but this is a raſh Opinion, and ought not to be followed.

(ſ) The time and Author of the Hiſtory of Heſter are ſtill uncertain.] Scaliger aſſures us that it happened under Xerxes. Firſt he ſays, that the Name of Aſſuerus, in Greek Ὀξυάρης, reſembles that of Xerxes: That Xerxes's Queen, whoſe Name is Ameſtris according to Herodotus, is the ſame with Heſter: That the Feaſt whereof mention is made in this Book, is that which is related by the ſame Hiſtorian, which Xerxes made before his Expedition againſt Greece. This Opinion is eaſily confuted, becauſe from hence it would follow, that Heſter was very old when ſhe was married to Xerxes, and that her Uncle Mordecai was an Hundred and ſixty Years old; for being one of thoſe who were carried away Captives into Babylon in the time of King Jeconiah, when he was Ten Years old, if we thereto add the Seventy Years of Captivity, and the Years of the Kings of Perſia after Cyrus, it will by the leaſt Computation make up an Hundred and fifty Years. Secondly, Ameſtris was married to Xerxes a long time before his Expedition into Greece, as it appears by the joynt Teſtimonies of Herodotus and Cteſias. The Father of Ameſtris was Onophes a Perſian, and no Jew. In ſhort, that Queen was ill-natured and cruel. The Opinion of thoſe, who place this Hiſtory under Artaxerxes, is confuted by the ſame reaſon that is urged againſt the former; for 'tis preciſely ſaid in the ſecond Chapter, Verſ. 6. that Mordecai was of the Number of thoſe, who were carried away by the King of Babylon along with Jeconiah. The third Opinion of thoſe, who believe it was Cyaxares, is no leſs improbable. For firſt of all, the King who is mentioned in that Book, is called King of the Perſians, and not of the Medes. Secondly, It is ſaid that he Ruled from India to Æthiopia; now the Medes were never ſo powerful. Thirdly, Ahaſuerus commonly reſided in the City of Suſa, which, as Solinus, Diodorus, and Plutarch teſtifie, was the place of reſidence of the Kings of Perſia, and not of the Median Kings. Laſtly, It could not happen under Cyaxares the Father of Aſtyages, as the Authors of this Opinion are agreed. As for Cyaxares, who is ſuppoſed to be the ſon of Aſtyages, he is altogether unknown to Herodotus, and other ancient Hiſtorians. None mention him but Xenophon, and all the world knows he is no exact Hiſtorian in his Cyropædia. So that after all, the Opinion of thoſe who believe that Ahaſuerus was the ſame with Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, as it is by far the moſt probable, ſo it carries no difficulty with it. The firſt Reaſon alledged againſt the other Opinions, makes it evident that it could not be any of the Perſian Kings after Darius; and as for what is ſaid of him in this Book, that he Ruled from India to Æthiopia, it excludes all the Kings before Cambyſes, and at the ſame time excludes Cambyſes himſelf, who never conquered Egypt, and conſequently belongs to none but Darius. It is ſaid there, that Ahaſuerus reſided in the City of Suſa, which agrees very well with Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, becauſe, as Ælian has obſerved, that King built himſelf a Palace in that City; and beſides Herodotus adds, that he kept his Treaſure there. The ſame Hiſtorian tells us, that he paſſionately loved one of his Wives, whom he calls Artiſſone, and that he put a Diadem upon her Head. This paſſage ſuits mightily with the Hiſtory of Heſter, and the Name too bears ſome Conformity, for Heſter is likewiſe called Hadaſſa. King Ahaſuerus made all the Iſles of the Sea Tributary to him. Now according to Thucydides, Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes conquered them, as it is alſo obſerved by Plato in his Menexenus, and after him none of the Perſian Kings brought them under their Command. They Object, That Ahaſuerus was deſcended of the Perſian Kings, as it appears in the 16th Chapter, whereas Darius was the Son of Hiſtaſpes, who was no King. But Herodotus aſſures us, that he was of the Royal Family. They likewiſe tell us, that it is written in the ſame Chapter that Haman would have tranſlated the Empire to the Macedonians. Now ſay they, the Macedonians were not known till a long while after the time of Darius. Some People ſay, that Haman was no Macedonian, and that inſtead of Μακεδὼν, we ought to read Ἀμαληκίτης, becauſe he was of the Race of Agag, but this Conjecture is not ſolid. Anſwer. The Hiſtory of Heſter, could not happen after this King, as we have already ſhewn, and the contrary Opinion is very weak. It was Natural for Haman, who was a Macedonian, to endeavour to Tranſlate the Empire to his own Nation, which was very Famous and Powerful at this time, as Juſtin has informed us. Laſtly, they ſay, That Ahaſuerus is alſo called Artaxerxes in the 16th Chapter; Now there were but three Kings of that Name, viz. one Sirnamed Longimanus, another Mnemon, and the Laſt Ochus. Ahaſuerus therefore was one of theſe three. Anſwer. Artaxerxes is a Name that might perhaps be given to all the Kings of Perſia, as Caſar to all the Roman Emperors.

(t) The greateſt part make Mordecai the Author of it.] It ſeems that Mordecai was the Author of this Book, by chap. 9. verſ. 20. and 23. and by chap. 12. verſ. 4. where it is ſaid, That he wrote down all that happened. In the Septuagint, chap. 9. Heſter is joined to Mordecai, which made Serrarius, and ſome others, believe, that Heſter and Mordecai compoſed it together. Thoſe that pretend it was done by the Synagogue, draw their Conjecture from hence, becauſe the Original and Ceremonies of the Feaſt of the Jews, called Purim, are there largely deſcribed, upon which occaſion the Book ſeems to have been written.

(u) The Author of the Book, that recounts the Hiſtory of Job, is no leſs uncertain.] Thoſe that attribute it to Job ground their Opinion chiefly upon this, that he twice wiſhes in the 19th and 31ſt Chapters, that his Words were written down: But 'tis eaſie to obſerve, that he does not here ſpeak of an ordinary Book, and that 'tis only a Figure, to ſhew how well he was ſatisfied of the Truth of them. Quis mihi tribuat ut ſcribantur Sermones mei: Quis mihi det ut exarentur in libro Stylo ferreo, & plumbi laminâ, vel certè ſculpantur in ſilice? Thoſe that make Moſes the Tranſlator of it, as particularly the Author of one of the Commentaries upon Job, commonly aſcribed to Origen, does ſay, That he Tranſlated it out of the Arabick or Syriack. The Talmudiſts and Rabbins make Moſes the Author of it; and this is likewiſe the Opinion of the Author of the ſecond Commentary upon Job, attributed to Origen, of Methodius in Photius, of Polychronius, of Julianus Halicarnaſſeus in the Catena, and of Nicetas upon Job. St. Jerome alſo ſeems to be of the ſame Judgment. The only Reaſon they alledge to ſupport this Opinion, is the reſemblance of the Style, but for my part, I profeſs I cannot find it out. The Style of the Book of Job is Figurative, Poetical, Obſcure, and full of Sentences. One finds there an infinite number of Arabick or Syriack Terms, and 'tis extreamly different from the Style of the Pentateuch. Origen rejects this Opinion, Tom. 5. in Johannem, where he formally denies that Moſes wrote any other Books beſides the Pentateuch. St. Gregory, who attributes it to Salomon, brings nothing to prove this conjecture of his. Thoſe that aſcribe it to Jeremiah, juſtifie themſelves by the Conformity of the Style, and the Syriack Words that occur ſo frequently there. Cadurcus makes an Edomitiſh Prophet Author of it, but upon very frivolous idle Surmiſes. Some attribute it to the Captive Jews in Babylon, without any Foundation, ſo that we can ſay nothing of the Author of this Book, but that he is altogether unknown.

(x) Who ſay that the Hiſtory of Job is wholly feigned.] This is the Opinion of the Talmudiſts, of Maimonides, and ſeveral Rabbins; but Ezekiel, ch. 14. v. 14. Tobit. ch. 2. v. 12. and St. James in his Epiſtle, ſpeaks of him as a Man that really was. The proper Names of Job, of his Friends, of his Country, of the Number of his Children, ſerve to ſhew that it is a true Hiſtory. St. Cyprian in his Treatiſe of Patience, St. Jerome in his Ep. 103. St. Baſil, Homily the 4th, St. Auſtin in his Sermon 103. and all the Fathers, ſpeak of him after this manner. 'Tis alledged againſt this Opinion, that the proper Names of this Book have myſtick Significations; That Job ſignifies a Man in Grief; Uz, Counſel; Zophar, one that is watchful; Eliphaz, the Law of God; Elihu, God himſelf. To this it is anſwered, that moſt Hebrew Names have ſuch ſort of Significations. All the other Objections only prove, that this Hiſtory is delivered Poetically. This is really true in this Hiſtory, that there was a certain great Perſon named Job, who was reduced to the extremity of Miſery, by the loſs of his Goods, and his Children, heighten'd by a very ſevere fit of Sickneſs; that he ſupported himſelf under all theſe Afflictions with incredible Patience; and at laſt was reſtored to a proſperous Condition. Upon the occaſion of this remarkable Event, ſome one or other compoſed the Book of Job, the Diſcourſes of his Friends, the Anſwers of Job, &c.

(y z) Some perſons make Job to have deſcended from Nahor the Brother of Abraham.] This is the Opinion of Bellarmine, who makes him the Grandſon of Nahor, and older than Moſes. He concludes, that 'tis probable he lived long, and that he lived not in Moſes's time, but he produces no Authorities to back this Opinion. Amongſt the Grand-Children of Eſau there is one called Jobab, which Name is eaſily formed into that of Job. Hence it is, that ſome People believe he was one of the Deſcendants of Eſau, and an Edomite. This is particularly obſerved in the Greek Addition, which is without queſtion very ancient, ſince Theodotion has acknowledged it. Grotius believes, that in chap. 26. verſe 12. there is mention made of the drowning of the Ægyptians in the Red Sea, but that is not certain. Caſtellio aſſures us, that in chap. 28. verſ. 28. there is a paſſage taken out of Deut. chap. 4. verſ. 56. but theſe two paſſages are different. The firſt is, Ecce timor Domini ipſa eſt Sapientia: The ſecond is, Hæc eſt enim vera Sapientia & Intellectus. Grotius adds, That this Book was written after David and Salomon, but before Ezekiel, pretending, that as it is quoted by that Prophet, ſo there are ſeveral paſſages in it drawn out of the Pſalms, and the Books of Salomon; but this is not evident, and it ſhould rather ſeem, that David and Salomon borrowed ſome of their thoughts out of Job, although it is not neceſſary either to ſay one or the other.

(a a) 'Tis certain, as St. Jerome has obſerved, that all the Pſalms were not written by David.] St. Jerome, Epiſt. ad Cypr. Scimus errare eos qui Pſalmos omnes David arbitrantur, & non eorum, quorum nominibus inſcripti ſunt. Epiſt. ad Sophron. Pſalmos eorum teſtamur Autorum, qui ponuntur in titulis; ſcilicet Aſaph, Idithum, filiorum Chore, Emon Eſraita, Moſis, Salomonis, & reliquorum quos Eſdras uno volumine comprehendit. This is alſo the Opinion of Origen, of St. Hilary, and the Author of the Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius. St. Auguſtine in his Expoſition of the ſecond Pſalm ſeems to be of that Opinion: But in his Book of Hereſies, Hereſie the 26th, he takes the other Opinion to be the more probable of the two. Theodoret alſo is doubtful in the matter, as he teſtifies in his Preface upon the Pſalms. Some others of the Fathers ſeem to have been perſwaded, that they were all compoſed by David, as St. Chryſoſtome, Euthymius, Caſſiodorus, and particularly Philaſtrius, who in Hereſie the 126*th* reckons all thoſe for Hereticks that doubt the truth of it. Nevertheleſs it is very certain, that they were not all written by David, for in the firſt place, there are ſome of them that bear other names; and ſecondly, ſome paſſages are to be found there, which happened after David's death, as in Pſalm the 137th, where mention is made of the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon. One may obſerve the ſame thing in Pſalm 64th and 124th.

(b b) It is difficult to name the Authors of them.] St. Jerome pretends, that theſe Pſalms belong to thoſe whoſe names they carry; but this is not certain. 'Tis believed, that the fifty next immediately after that that carries for its Title the return of Haggai and Zechariah, were written by thoſe Prophets. The Author of the Abridgment, commonly attributed to St. Athanaſius, believes, that all the Pſalms entituled to David, ipſi David, are nevertheleſs done by ſome other hand. Our Bleſſed Saviour cites the hundred and tenth Dixit Dominus, which is found to have that Title, under the name of David, Matt. 22. v. 42. The hundred and thirty ſeventh Pſalm carries the name of David and Jeremiah, τῶ Δαβὶδ Ἰερεμίου, which makes it apparently thus to be underſtood. A Pſalm of Jeremiah compoſed in imitation of David. The 64th Pſalm, in the vulgar Tranſlation, bears the name of Iſaac and of Ezekiel; the 70th that of the Sons of Jonadab, and the chief Captives. The Jews make Salomon the Author of the 92d, and of ſeveral others. Origen ſays, that the 90th was compoſed by Moſes, whoſe name it bears; and the Jews tell us, he made it upon the occaſion of a Sedition that happened amongſt the Children of Iſrael, upon the return of thoſe that were ſent to diſcover the Land of Promiſe. St. Jerome is of the ſame opinion. The ten following Pſalms are alſo attributed to Moſes, not only by the Jews, but even by St. Hilary and Jerome. This cannot poſſibly hold true of the 99th, where mention is made of Samuel. Some of the Rabbies attribute the 92d to Adam, as the Talmudiſts do ſome to ſeveral of the ancient Patriarchs. There is a Greek Pſalm, which is not of the number of the 150 attributed to David, but written by ſome Helleniſt who has borrowed it out of David, Iſaiah, and Ezekiel.

[I believe it ſhould be 5 inſtead of 50, becauſe the 146th Pſalm has this Title in the LXX, of Haggai and Zechariah.]

(c c) They have been cited as Books inſpired by God both in the Old and New Teſtament.] The 105th, the 96th, and the 136th Pſalms are to be found in the 16th Chapter of the Firſt Book of Chronicles, and in the 7th of the Second Book it is ſaid, that the Prieſts did ſing the Pſalms which David had compoſed for the Lord, ſinging, For his mercy endureth for ever. This is the 136th Pſalm, which is yet to be found quoted in Chapters 5, and 20, of the ſame Book, in the 3d of Ezrah, in the 13th of Judith, in the 33d of Jeremiah, and the 3d of Daniel, [according to their Computation, who eſteem the Song of the Three Children to be part of the Canonical Scripture.] In Eccleſiaſticus, ch. 47. v. 9. it is ſaid, that David praiſed God with all his heart, and ſet Singers before the Altar, In quorum ſono dulces fecit modos. I have not leiſure to ſpeak of thoſe many paſſages in the Prophets which allude to ſeveral places in the Pſalms. In the ſecond of Maccabees, ch. 2. v. 13. there is mention made of the Pſalms of David; St. Matthew, ch. 13. v. 35. and 27. v. 35. recites the Prophecies about our Bleſſed Saviour, contained in the Pſalms. Jeſus Chriſt himſelf cites the Pſalm Dixit Dominus, &c. under the name of David; and in St. Luke, ch. 24. it is ſaid, that all things muſt be fulfilled which were written in the Law of Moſes, and in the Prophets, and in the Pſalms concerning him: The Acts and the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, are full of Citations out of the Pſalms.

(d d) Grotius has pretended upon ſlight conjectures it was compoſed by Zorobabel.] This Opinion is not ſupported by any ſolid Reaſon. He ſays, that the Shepherd mentioned towards the end of the laſt Chapter is Zorobabel, and his Son Abiud, but he brings no Proofs to recommend this Opinion. They commonly object, when they would prove that this Book was not written by Salomon, that there are abundance of Chaldee words to be found in it, that are only to be met in Daniel, Ezrah, &c. but perhaps theſe words might be in faſhion amongſt the Jews towards the end of Salomon's Reign, or it may be they were added ſince. One might alſo object this paſſage of ch. 2. v. 8. Os regis obſerva, which makes it credible that it is not a King that ſpeaks; but we ought to read obſerva, as it is in the Septuagint. [It looks alſo a little ſtrange that Salomon ſhould ſo often ſay, that he did ſo or ſo, above all that were before him in Jeruſalem (Eccleſ. 1. 16. 2. 7, 9.) ſince his Father David was the firſt that ever reigned in Jeruſalem.]

(e e) This Book of Wiſdom is commonly attributed to Salomon.] This is St. Cyprian's opinion in his Book of Morality, of St. Auguſtine in his ſecond Book of the Chriſtian Doctrine, ch. 8. The ancient Verſions, the Rabbins, Origen, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Cyprian, have likewiſe attributed it to Salomon. The moſt ancient Fathers call the Proverbs, the Wiſdom of Salomon.

(ff) St. Jerome ſays, he ſaw in his time an Hebrew Copy.] Munſter and Fagius ſtill make mention of an Hebrew Copy of this Book: Buxtorf tells us, he ſaw one that was Printed at Conſtantinople, but 'tis probable, that that Text was made upon the Greek.

(g g) Some of the Ancients have attributed this Work to Salomon.] St. Cyprian and St. Ambroſe have cited it under his name. St. Hilary teſtifies, that ſeveral Perſons in his time attributed it to him. This opinion is impoſſible to be maintained, not only becauſe we know who is the Author, but alſo becauſe in ch. 47. there is mention made of the Prophets that lived after Salomon. Euſebius, St. Jerome, the Author of the Abridgment attributed to Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Auſtin, Caſarius of Arles, and many others, have acknowledged the true Author of it, who was Jeſus the Son of Syrach. St. Jerome ſays, he lived under the High-Prieſt Simon the Son of Onias the ſecond, and that he wrote this Book after the Verſion of the Septuagint, or at leaſt, that he lived in their time: And firſt he proves it by the Preface of his Grandſon, who ſays he collected theſe Books of his Grandfather in the time of Ptolomy Euergetes, who immediately ſucceeded Ptolomy Philadelphus. Secondly, becauſe he commends the High-Prieſt Simon the Juſt, Son of Onias the Firſt, ch. 50. and afterwards the Tranſlator praiſes Jeſus the Son of Syrach, as one that lived in the time of that High-Prieſt. Thirdly, becauſe, ch. 2. he ſeems to ſpeak of the Perſecution, which the Jews ſuffered under Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and in the firſt year of Ptolomy Philadelphus. Huetius believes, that Joſeph the Son of Syrach is the ſame with a certain Jew named Ben Sira, who has written the Proverbs in Hebrew, but this opinion does not appear to be well grounded.

(h h) The ſon of one Amos, whom we muſt not confound with the Prophet that bears this name.] The name of the Prophet is Amos, and that of the Father of Iſaiah, is Amots. The firſt was a Shepherd, the ſecond was of Royal Extraction. The firſt lived in the time of Uzziah King of Judah, the latter is more ancient. St. Jerome in cap. 1. Iſaiæ, St. Auſtin in the 18th Book de Civitate Dei, ch. 27. St Cyril in his Preface upon Amos, and others, have diſtinguiſhed between theſe two. Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 1. Strom. the Author of the Life and Death of the Prophets, attributed to St. Epiphanius, and the Rabbins, have confounded them. St. Jerome tells us, that the Father of Iſaiah was Father in Law to Manaſſes.

(ii) By whoſe command, they ſay, he was cruelly put to death, and ſawn aſunder with a Wooden Saw.] This is a common Tradition amongſt the Jews, and is confirmed by the Teſtimonies of Tertullian, St. Jerome, and St. Baſil.

(kk) The conjectures they bring to prove it are very frivolous.] They ſay, that the Prophecy of Iſaiah does not begin before the 6th Chapter, when, after he has ſaid that he held his Tongue, he ſays, I heard a voice of the Lord, ſaying, whom ſhall I ſend? In the ſecond place they pretended, that what he ſays in the firſt Chapter concerning the deſolation of Judah, does not at all agree with the Reign of Uzziah, and therefore 'tis not the beginning of his Prophecy. Thirdly, we don't find, ſay they, in this Book the Life and Actions of Uzziah that were written by Iſaiah, as we are informed in the Chronicles. Fourthly, Iſaiah propheſied alſo under Manaſſes, but there are no Prophecies under his Name, that have any relation to the Reign of that King. Fifthly, the order of things frequently reverſed as well in Iſaiah, as in the other Prophets. Anſwer. To the firſt Objection we return this anſwer, that the Prophet does not ſay, he had as yet wrote nothing, but only that he tarried a long time without writing, and at laſt God commanded him to write. 'Tis believed, he wrote this in the laſt year of King Uzziah. To the ſecond we reply, that he might foretel a future deſolation, even at a time before it happened. 'Tis an eaſie matter to anſwer the third by ſaying, that the Book of the Actions of Uzziah mentioned in the Chronicles, is different from that of his Prophecies. In order to anſwer the fourth, it ſufficeth to obſerve, that it is no where ſaid, that Iſaiah wrote thoſe things which he propheſied under Manaſſes. Laſtly, as for the fifth, we ſay, that we ought not to expect a continued Hiſtorical ſtyle from the Prophets. On the contrary, their Prophecies are generally written without connexion and order. There was formerly another Prophecy of Jeremiah mentioned by Origen, where theſe words were to be found, Appenderunt mercedem meam, &c. The Nazarens made uſe of it, as St. Jerome teſtifies in cap. Matth. 27.

(ll) We

(ll) We don't certainly know at what time.] Some are of opinion, that Baruch went not to Babylon till after the death of his Maſter Jeremiah, to whom he was too far engaged ever to quit him, and they confirm this opinion by the 2d Verſe, where mention is made of the burning of Jeruſalem. Others ſay, he wrote his Book before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, becauſe he there ſpeaks of Sacrifices and conſecrated Veſſels, which makes them believe, that he was one of thoſe that were deputed in the fourth Year of Zedekiah, of whom Saraiah the Brother of Baruch was chief. They affirm therefore, that having carried the Book of Iſaiah thither, he compoſed his Prophecy the year following to comfort the Captives, and that the fifth year after the taking of Jeruſalem, which is mentioned in the ſecond Verſe, ought to be computed from the Captivity of Jechoniah.

(mm) Which ſeems to be confirmed by a certain paſſage in his Book.] In the firſt Chapter, verſe, 3. Et ait rex Aſphenes præpoſito Eunuchorum · · · fuerunt ergo inter eos Daniel, &c. Origen and St. Jerome are of this opinion. The Author of the Life and Death of the Prophets attributed to St. Epiphanius, and the falſe Dorotheus, are of the contrary opinion.

(nn) The truth and antiquity of the two laſt Chapters, that contain the Hiſtory of Suſanna and of Bel, are mightily doubted.] Africanus, Euſebius, and Apollinarius, reject both theſe Stories as fabulous, and maintain, they were not written by Daniel, but that they make a part of the Prophecy of Habakkuk. St. Jerome ſeems to be of this opinion in his Preface upon Daniel. Origen has defended the truth of this Hiſtory, without being willing to affirm that it was Canonical. The Author of the Book of the Wonderful things in Scripture attributed to St. Auſtin, Tom. 3. lib. 2. chap. 32. does not mention the Hiſtory of Suſanna, and rejects that of Bel. Theodoret in his Comments upon Daniel ſpeaks not a word of theſe Hiſtories. Nicephorus places the Hiſtory of Suſanna amongſt the Apocryphal Books. The Action of Suſanna is related and commended by Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 4. Strom. by Tertullian, libr. de Corona, c. 4. by St. Cyprian, Ep. 4. by St. Auſtin in his 118th Sermon, and in ſeveral other places; by St. Baſil, lib. 3. de. Spir. ſancto. cap. 7. by St. Ambroſe, lib. 2. de Spir. ſancto; by St. Chryſoſtome in an Homily which is in Tom. 5. by Gregory Nazianzene in his 29th Oration; by Avitus in his Epiſtle to his Siſter; by St. Fulgentius in his Anſwers to Ferrandus; and by Bede. The Author of the Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius, and Ruffinus, ſeem to own it for a Canonical Book, as well as St. Ambroſe, and Sulpitius Severus. The Objections that are urged againſt this Hiſtory are theſe. In the firſt place they tell us, that the Hiſtory of Suſanna could not happen when Daniel was a youth, as he is called in that Story. For in the 13th Chapter, verſe 65. it is obſerved, that Aſtyages was dead, and Cyrus reigned in his place. Now Daniel was then well in years. Anſwer. This Hiſtory happened a long time before, and as for the above mentioned paſſage it is put out of its place. For in the ancient Verſions it is placed at the beginning of the Book of Daniel, and 'tis therefore ſet at the end of it in the Vulgar Edition, becauſe it is not to be found in the Hebrew Text. Wherefore theſe words of the 13th Chapter, verſe 65. And King Aſtyages was gathered to his Fathers, do not at all concern the Hiſtory of Suſanna, but that of Bel, which immediately follows, and accordingly in the Edition of Sixtus Quintus it is joyned to it.

Africanus objects, that it is not credible, that Joachim the Husband of Suſanna was ſo rich and powerful in the Captivity, as he is ſaid to be in that Book; nor that the Captive Jews had authority to condemn their own Criminals. To this Origen anſwers, That the Jews that were carried away Captives into Babylon were not plundered, but that they were both rich and powerful, and that there is a great deal of reaſon to believe they had authority to judge and condemn their Malefactors by their own Laws, as they had afterwards, when they were conquered by the Romans. In the ſecond place, Africanus raiſes an Objection about an alluſion that is to be found in this Hiſtory, where Daniel is introduced diſcourſing to the Elders in certain words, that allude to the Greek names of the Trees, under which they found Suſanna committing wickedneſs. For the firſt of them having ſaid, that it was under a Maſtick Tree, in Greek σχῖνα, he anſwered him, that an Angel ſhould cut him in two, becauſe the word σχίζειν ſignifies in Greek to cut aſunder; and the other having ſaid, that it was under a Holm-Oak πρῖνα, he makes uſe of the word πρίζειν, which alluſions, ſays Africanus, make it appear, that it was a Greek that wrote theſe things. On the other hand Origen anſwers, that Daniel never made uſe of theſe terms, or names of Trees, but of ſome other Hebrew or Chaldee word, to which the Verb that ſignifies to cut aſunder, anſwered, and that the Greek Interpreter endeavoured to render this ſenſe by finding out ſome names of Trees, which alluded to thoſe Greek Verbs that ſignifie to cut aſunder: And thus in Geneſis, when it is ſaid in the Hebrew, that a Woman is called Iſha, the feminine of the word Iſh that ſignifies a Man, the Latin Tranſlation has rendred it hæc vocabitur virgo, and in the Greek, Symmachus has tranſlated it ἀνδρίς, which is a better word than γύνη that the Septuagint have uſed.

'Tis commonly objected againſt the Hiſtory of Bel, that the ancient Title in the Septuagint attributes it to Habakkuk, and that the Daniel mentioned in that Hiſtory was a Prieſt; 'tis therefore another Daniel to whom all this happened. Anſwer. St. Jerome obſerves, that the Greek Interpreter of Daniel, whoſe Verſion goes under the name of the Septuagint, has allowed himſelf a great deal of liberty. Secondly, 'tis ſaid, that Habakkuk, who lived in the time of Manaſſes, was dead about that time. Likewiſe 'tis replied by way of anſwer, that we ought to diſtinguiſh between the two Habakkuks, one that was a Prophet and lived in the time of Manaſſes, and the other who is ſpoken of in this place of Daniel, the laſt was of the Tribe of Levi, the former of Simeon. Laſtly they tell us, that in the Hiſtory of Bel and the Dragon it is ſaid, that Daniel was ſix days in the Lions Den, whereas in the ſixth Chapter, v. 19. we are told that he continued there but one night. But to this they anſwer, that Daniel was twice caſt into the Lions Den, under Darius, becauſe he prayed to his God contrary to the expreſs command of that King, and under Cyrus upon occaſion of the Dragon. The Prophecy of Daniel is quoted by Ezekiel, chap. 14. v. 14. in the Book of the Maccabees, chap. 2. v. 59. and 60. Matth. 24. v. 15.

(oo) Hoſea the Son of Beeri is the firſt.] 'Tis believed, that he is the moſt ancient not only of the twelve Minor, but alſo of all the Prophets. The falſe Epiphanius, and falſe Dorotheus report, that he was of the Tribe of Iſſachar, and the City of Belenor, but theſe two are not very credible Authors.

(pp) The Prophet Joel follows Hoſea.] This order is obſerved in the Hebrew Text, but the Greeks place Amos and Micah between them.

(qq) 'Tis not certainly known at what time Joel propheſied.] Huetius pretends, that he propheſied after the Captivity of the ten Tribes, becauſe it is ſaid, chap, 3. v. 2. that they have ſcattered the People of Iſrael amongſt the Nations. But why might not he ſpeak of a future thing, as if it were already done? He likewiſe ſays, that there is not a word ſpoken of the Kingdom of Iſrael in the whole Prophecy, but this is not certain. Thoſe perſons that ſay he propheſied before Amos ground themſelves principally upon his prediction of a Famine towards the end of the firſt Chapter, whereof Amos ſpeaks as of a thing already paſt in the 4th Chapter of his Prophecy. But Huetius thinks, that theſe are two ſeveral Famines, that the Famine mentioned in Amos happened naturally, whereas the other, which Joel foretold, was to be occaſioned by the incurſions of Enemies.

(rr) The time of Obadiah is uncertain.] 'Tis not probable, that this Prophet was he, of whom mention is made in the Book of Kings, for he is only called there one that feared God. 'Tis more probable, that he lived in the time of Ahaz, when the Edomites, in conjunction with the Iſraelites, made War upon the Tribe of Judah, becauſe he perpetually declaims againſt the Edomites.

(ſſ) Jonah the Son of the Prophet Amittai.] The Hebrews ſay, he was the Widows Son of Sarepta, but this is only a groundleſs fancy.

(tt) He that was the Son of Hiſtaſpes.] This is the opinion of Joſephus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, of St. Jerome and Theodoret. Scaliger thinks, that it was Darius Nothus, becauſe there is mention made here of Ahaſuerus and Artaxerxes his Predeceſſors, whom he takes to be Xerxes and Longimanus; but it is an eaſie matter to anſwer him, by ſaying, that theſe names are given in Scripture, without any diſcrimination, to all the Kings of Perſia; and that by them we may underſtand Cyrus and Cambyſes the Predeceſſors of Darius the Son of Hiſtaſpes, or Cambyſes and Smerdis, or, if we pleaſe Cambyſes himſelf, to whom the Scripture gives two Names. Scaliger's other Argument is ſtronger; he ſays that Zechariah and Haggai Propheſied at the ſame time. And Zechariah in the firſt chapter, verſ. 12. and in the 7th. verſ. 5. teſtifies, That when he wrote, the People of Iſrael had been Threeſcore and ten Years in Affliction, and that God was Angry with them. Now the ſecond Year of Darius, the Son of Hiſtaſpes, is not the 70th year of the Captivity. To this it is anſwered, that the Prophet Zechariah does not ſay, that it was 70 Years ſince the Children of Iſrael were in Captivity; neither that they were then in Captivity, but he only ſays in general Terms, that they had been in Affliction, and that God had poured down his Indignation upon them for the ſpace of threeſcore and ten Years, which ought to be underſtood of the 70 Years of the Captivity, although it was already paſt. The Hebrew and Greek Phraſe in this paſſage no more denotes the preſent time, than the paſt. One undeniable Argument to prove, that Haggai wrote in the time of Darius, the Son of Hiſtaſpes, is this, that ſpeaking of the ſecond Temple, in ch. 2. ver. 3. he ſays, Who is left amongſt you that ſaw this Houſe in her firſt Glory? Quis in vobis eſt derelictus, qui vidit Domum iſtam in Gloriâ ſuâ Primâ? Now if this had been Written under Darius Nothus, theſe Perſons ought to have been 176 Years old, or thereabout; and it wou'd follow, that Ezrah was 100 years old, Zorobabel and Joſhuah 140, for ſo great a ſpace of time there is from the firſt year of Cyrus down to the time of Darius Nothus.

(uu) Grandſon of Iddo.] He is called in Ezrah the Son of Iddo; in the Septuagint, and in St. Jerome's Verſion, the Son of Barachiah, the Son of Iddo. St. Jerome is of Opinion, that he was the Natural Son of Barachiah, and the Son of Iddo by Imitation; Others ſay he was the Son of the latter, according to the Law, but 'tis far more probable that he was his Grandſon, as it is obſerved in our vulgar Tranſlation. St. Jerome is miſtaken in confounding this Iddo with him, that was ſent to Jeruſalem in the time of Jeroboam, ſince there were 240 years from Jeroboam to Darius, a time too long to allow between Grandfather and Grandſon.

(xx) He is different from Zechariah, mentioned by Iſaiah.] By Chronology it appears, that this was not the Prophet, no more than he who is mentioned in the Chronicles, and died in the time of Joaſh. The firſt was the Son of Barachiah, the ſecond of Jehoiadah. That which has occaſion'd this difficulty, is the ſaying of our Saviour, in St. Matthew, chap. 25. That Zechariah the Son of Barachiah was Slain between the Temple and the Altar; which agrees with what is related in the Chronicles, with Zechariah the Son of Jehoiada; and this introduced St. Jerome to believe that our Bleſſed Saviour ſpoke of him, and that we ought to Read, as we find in the Goſpel of the Nazarens, the Son of Jehoiada, and not of Barachiah. Origen on the contrary, and ſeveral others, underſtand this place of the Prophet, who, they ſay, was Slain after the ſame manner. They have this Text of the Goſpel on their ſide; and beſides, our Saviour ſpeaks of a Prophet, which cannot be underſtood of the Son of Jehoiada.

(yy) Malachi, whoſe Name in the Hebrew, ſignifies, My Angel.] And this has made Origen and Tertullian believe, that he was an Angel Incarnate. He is called an Angel by the greateſt part of the Fathers, and in the Verſion of the Septuagint, but he was Angel by Office and not by Nature, as he himſelf calls the Prieſts Angels. Some Perſons, as Jonathan the Chaldee Paraphraſt. St. Jerome, and ſeveral Jews believed, that it was an Appellative Name which Ezrah aſſumed, and that he was Author of this Book, but this Opinion is eſtabliſhed upon very weak Conjectures; and beſides, Ezrah is no where in Scripture called a Prophet. St. Jerome proves his Opinion in the firſt place, becauſe Malachi and Ezrah lived at the ſame time; Secondly, Becauſe what is in Malachi is very like what we find in Ezrah; And laſtly, Becauſe in chap. 2. verſ. 7. he ſeems to point at Ezrah by theſe Words, Verba Sacerdotis cuſtodiunt Scientiam, &c. But theſe Conjectures are light and frivolous. For the firſt only proves that Malachi and Ezrah lived at the ſame time, not that they were one and the ſame: The ſecond is not true, and if it were, it would prove juſt nothing. The Words quoted in the third ought to be underſtood of Levi, and all the Prieſts of the Law. He adds, that in Eccleſiaſticus, chap. 49. where mention is made of all the Prophets, the Name of Malachi is not to be found. To this is anſwered, that we ought not to be ſurprized, becauſe he is not Named there, ſince in the ſame place there is no mention made of Daniel, and ſeveral others.

(zz) The difference of the Style, of the Chronology, and of the Hiſtory make it appear.] The firſt Book of Maccabees was written by an Hebrew, the ſecond by a Greek; the ſecond begins the Hiſtory a great deal higher than the firſt. One follows the Jewiſh Account, the other that of Alexandria, which begins Six Months after. Some Perſons attribute the firſt to Joſephus, others to Philo, others to the Synagogue, and others to the Maccabees. The Phraſe of the firſt is Jewiſh; and St. Jerome tells us, he had the Hebrew Copy of it. It was Intituled, The Scepter of the Rebels againſt the Lord, or rather, The Scepter of the Prince of the Children of God. The ſecond was Written by Jaſon, as it is obſerved in the Preface. Huetius believes, that the third and fourth Chapters, as well as the two laſt, don't belong to Jaſon, becauſe it is ſaid in chap. 2. verſe. 20. that he wrote down all that paſſed under Antiochus and Eupator, but then the remainder, which is the end and the beginning of that Hiſtory, ought to be underſtood.

(aaa) From a Sentence in Exodus.] This Sentence is in Hebrew, Mi Camacha Be Elim Jehovah: Who is like to the Lord amongſt the Powers? Now taking the firſt Letters of each Word we make Maccabee: Others give a different Etymology of this Name, but this is the moſt probable.

SECT. II.

The Canon of the Books of the Old Teſtament, of Books Doubtful, Apocryphal, and Loſt, that belonged to the Old Teſtament.

WE call the Books of the Bible Canonical Books, becauſe they are received into the Canon, or the Catalogue of Books, that we look upon as Sacred (a). Oppoſite to theſe are thoſe Books, we uſually call Apocryphal (b), which are not acknowledged as Divine, but rejected as ſpurious. The firſt Canon or Catalogue of the Holy Books was made by the Jews; 'tis certain they had one, but 'tis not ſo certainly known who it was that made it. Some Perſons reckon upon three of them, made at different times by the Sanedrim, or the great Synagogue of the Jews (c); But 'tis a great deal more probable, that they never had more than one Canon (d), or one Collection of the Holy Books of the Old Teſtament, that was made by Ezrah after the rebuilding of Jeruſalem, and was afterwards approved and received by the whole Nation of the Jews, as containing all the Holy Books. Joſephus, ſpeaking of this buſineſs, in his firſt Book againſt Appion, ſays; 'There 'is nothing in the World that can boaſt of a higher de- 'gree of certainty, than the Writings Authorized amongſt 'us, for they are not ſubject to the leaſt Contrariety, be- 'cauſe we only receive and approve of thoſe Prophets, 'who wrote them many Years ago, according to the 'pure Truth, by the Inſpiration of the Spirit of God. 'We are not therefore allowed to ſee great numbers 'of Books that contradict one another. We have 'only Twenty two that comprehend every thing of 'moment that has happen'd to our Nation, from the 'beginning of the World till now, and thoſe we are 'obliged firmly to believe. Five of them are Written 'by Moſes, that give a faithful Relation of all Events, 'even to his own Death, for about the ſpace of Three 'Thouſand Years; and contain the Genealogy of the 'Deſcendants of Adam. The Prophets, that ſucceeded 'this admirable Legiſlator, in Thirteen other Books 'have Written all the memorable Paſſages that fell out, 'from his Death until the Reign of Artaxerxes, the Son 'of Xerxes, King of the Perſians. The other Four Books 'contain Hymns, and Songs, compoſed in the Praiſe 'of God, with abundance of Precepts, and Moral In- 'ſtructions, for the regulating of our Manners. We 'have alſo every thing Recorded that has happen'd ſince 'Artaxerxes down to our own Times; but becauſe we 'have not had, as heretofore, a Succeſſion of Prophets, 'therefore we don't receive them with the ſame Belief 'as we do the Sacred Books, concerning which I have 'diſcourſed already: and for which we preſerve ſo great 'a Veneration, that no One ever had the boldneſs to 'take away, or add, or change the moſt inconſiderable 'thing in them. We conſider them as ſacred Books, and 'ſo we call them; we make ſolemn Profeſſion invio- 'lably to obſerve what they Command us, and to Die 'with Joy if there be occaſion, thereby to preſerve them. Origen, St. Jerome, the Author of the Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, and ſeveral other Chriſtian Writers do teſtifie, That the Jews received but Twenty two Books into the Canon of their Holy Volumes. The Diviſion that St. Jerome has made of them, who diſtributes them into three Claſſes, is as follows. The firſt comprehends the Five Books of Moſes, which is called the Law; The ſecond contains thoſe Books that he calls the Books of the Prophets, which are nine in number; namely, the Book of Joſhuah, the Book of Judges, to which, ſays St. Jerome, they uſe to joyn the Book of Ruth; the Book of Samuel, which we call the firſt and ſecond Book of Kings; the Book of Kings, which contains the two laſt. Theſe Books are followed by three great Prophets, viz. Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, which are three different Books, and by the twelve minor Prophets, which make up but one Book. The third Claſs comprehends thoſe Books, that are uſually called, the Hagiographa, or Holy Scriptures; the firſt of which is the Book of Job; the ſecond the Pſalms of David; the three following are the Books of Salomon, which are, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and the Canticles; the ſixth is Daniel, the ſeventh the Chronicles, the eighth Ezrah, which is divided into two Books by the Greeks and Latins, and the laſt is the Book of Eſther. 'Thus ſays St. Jerome, all the Books of the 'Old Teſtament, amongſt the Jews, juſt make up the 'number of Twenty two, five whereof were Written 'by Moſes, eight by the Prophets, and nine are the Ha- 'giographa. Some Perſons make them Twenty four in 'number by ſeparating Ruth, and the Lamentations of 'the Prophet Jeremy, and placing them amongſt the Ha- 'giographa. This Prologue to the Bible, continues he, 'may ſerve as a Preface to all thoſe Books, that we have 'Tranſlated out of the Hebrew; and we ought to underſtand,

'derſtand, that whatſoever Book, is not to be found in 'this number is Apocryphal. From hence it follows, 'that the Book of Wiſdom, commonly attributed to Sa-'lomon, the Eccleſiaſticus of Jeſus the Son of Syrach, Judith, 'Tobit, and the Paſtor, don't belong to the Canon no 'more than the two Books of Maccabees do; one of 'which was originally Written in Hebrew, and the o-'ther in Greek, as the ſtyle ſufficiently ſhews. Thus we ſee how St. Jerome has clearly explained the Canon of the Scriptures, as they are received by the Jews; yet we have reaſon to doubt, whether he has been very exact in this Catalogue, ſince in ſome particulars it does not agree with Joſephus. For although they are agreed about the number of the Books, yet they notoriouſly differ in the manner of diſtributing them. Joſephus places all the Hiſtorical Books, to the number of Thirteen, amongſt the Prophets, adding to St. Jerome's nine, Daniel, the Chronicles, Ezrah, and Job. And conſequently he ſets only thoſe in the third rank that are purely Moral Treatiſes, as the Pſalms of David, and the three Books of Salomon. But beſides this difference, we may probably ſuppoſe, that Joſephus has not reckoned the Book of Eſther in the number of the Canonical Books. For he is of opinion, that they were all written before the Reign of Artaxerxes, but as for the Hiſtory of Eſther, he believed it fell under the Reign of that King, as we may ſee in his Antiquities. 'Tis therefore very likely, that he never conſidered that Book as Canonical, but that to make up the number of the 13 Books of the Prophets, he reckoned the Book of Ruth ſeparately from that of the Kings. 'Tis in purſuance of this Canon, that Melito, and the Author of the Abridgment of the Scriptures, attributed to St. Athanaſius, reject the Book of Eſther, and ſeparate the Book of Ruth from that of the Kings. Some Perſons pretend, that he has not owned the Book of Job, becauſe he makes no mention of that Hiſtory, but we ought not to wonder, that he paſſes it by, ſince it has no relation to the Nation of the Jews, and he only deſigned to ſpeak of them in his Antiquities. Others imagine, that he acknowledged Eccleſiaſticus for a Canonical Book, becauſe he has cited a paſſage out of it in his ſecond Book againſt Appion. But it is viſible, as Pithæus has remarked, that this Citation, which is not to be found in the ancient Verſion of Ruffinus, has been ſince inſerted into the Text of Joſephus (e).

The ancient Chriſtians have followed the Jewiſh Canon in the Books of the Old Teſtament. There are none quoted in the New Teſtament (f), but thoſe that were received into the Canon of the Jews, and the greateſt part of theſe (g) are frequently cited there. The firſt Catalogues of the Canonical Books made by the Eccleſiaſtick Greek and Latin Authors, comprehend no more, but at the ſame time we ought to affirm, that even thoſe Books, that have been ſince added to the Canon, have been often quoted by the Ancients, and indeed ſometimes under the name of Scripture.

The firſt Catalogue, we find of the Books of Scripture amongſt the Chriſtians, is that of Melito Biſhop of Sardis, ſet down by Euſebius in the 4th Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 26. It is entirely conformable to that of the Jews, and contains but twenty two Books, in which number Eſther is not reckon'd, and the Book of Ruth is diſtinguiſhed from that of the Judges. Origen alſo in a certain paſſage drawn out of the Expoſition of the firſt Pſalm, and produced by Euſebius in his 6th Book, chap. 25. reckons twenty two Books of the Old Teſtament, but he places the Book of Eſther in this number, and joins the Book of Ruth with that of Judges. The Council of Laodicea, which was the firſt Synod that determined the number of the Canonical Books, St. Cyril of Jeruſalem in his fourth Catechetick Lecture, St. Hilary in his Preface to the Pſalms, the laſt Canon falſely aſcribed to the Apoſtles, Amphilochius cited by Balſamon, Anaſtaſius Sinaita upon the Hexameron, lib. 7. St. John Damaſcene in his fourth Book of Orthodox Faith, the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, and of the Feſtival Letter, attributed to St. Athanaſius, the Author of the Book of the Hierarchy, attributed to St. Dionyſius, and the Nicephori, follow the Catalogue of Melito. Gregory Nazianzen is of the ſame opinion in his thirty third Poem, where he diſtributes the Books of Scripture into the three Claſſes, viz. Hiſtorical, Poetical, and Prophetical (h). He reckons up twelve Hiſtorical Books, namely, the five Books of Moſes, Joſhuah, Judges, Ruth, the two Books of Kings, the Chronicles, and Ezrah; The five Poetical Books are Job, David, and the three Books of Salomon; and there are likewiſe five Prophetical Books, viz. the four Great, and the twelve Minor Prophets. Leontius in his Book of Sects follows this Catalogue and diſtribution, only he reckons the Book of Pſalms by it ſelf. St. Epiphanius, in his Eighth Hereſie, counts twenty ſeven Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament; nevertheleſs, he adds nothing to Origen's Canon, but he ſeparates the Book of Ruth from that of Judges, and divides into two the Book of Kings, the Chronicles, and the Book of Ezrah. Several of the Latins reckon twenty four Books, whether it be that they add Judith and Tobit, as St. Hilary has obſerved of ſome in his time, or whether they ſeparate Ruth, and the Lamentations of Jeremiah, as St. Jerome has obſerved. Victorinus upon the Apocalypſe, St. Ambroſe upon the ſame Book, Primaſius the Author of the Poem againſt Marcion, Bede, and the Author of the Sermons upon the ſame Book, attributed to St. Auſtin, and ſeveral others, reckon twenty four Books of the Old Teſtament, and ſay, they are repreſented by the twenty four Elders in the Revelations. The firſt Catalogue of the Books of the Holy Scriptures, where they added ſome Books to the Jewiſh Canon, is that of the third Council of Carthage held Anno Dom. 397. when the Books of Judith, Tobit, the Wiſdom of Salomon, Eccleſiaſticus, and the two Books of the Maccabees were reckoned in the number of Canonical Books. There is at the end of this Canon a Poſtil that is very remarkable: Let the Church beyond the Sea be conſulted (to confirm, or) before this Canon is confirmed. De confirmando iſto Canone Eccleſia Tranſmarina Conſulatur. This Catalogue of Canonical Books is confirmed by the Authority of Pope Innocent the Firſt, in an Epiſtle to Exuperius, and by that of a Roman Council held under Gelaſius, A. D. 494 (i), and is followed in the Decree of Eugenius to the Armenians, and by the holy Council of Trent. All theſe Catalogues ſerve to acquaint us in general, what were the Books that were always believed to be certainly Canonical, and which they are, whoſe Authority have been queſtioned by Antiquity. But nevertheleſs we ought to ſpeak of them particularly, for although they were not received in the firſt Ages by all Churches, nor reckoned by all Authors in the Canon of the Books of the Bible, yet they were frequently cited by the Ancients, and ſometimes too as Books of Scripture, and for this reaſon were afterwards admitted into the Canon along with the firſt.

The Book of Eſther, according to ſome, was in the Jewiſh Canon, but others ſay, it was not reckoned at all. It is placed in the Canon, as we have already obſerved, by Origen, by the Council of Laodicea, by St. Jerome, by St. Epiphanius, by St. Hilary, by St. Cyril, not to mention the Council of Carthage, or the Deciſions of Pope Innocent and Gelaſius. Joſephus, Melito, St. Athanaſius, and the Author of the Abridgment of the Scripture, Gregory Nazianzen, Leontius, the Author of the Book of the Hierarchy, and Nicephorus, reject it. The Action of Eſther is commended by Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and by Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1. Pædag. and l. 5. Strom. which makes it appear, that this Book was known and eſteemed by the firſt Chriſtians. The ſix laſt Chapters of this Book are not to be found in the Hebrew. Origen is of opinion, that it was formerly extant in that Language, and has been ſince loſt. But it is very evident, that they are taken out of ſeveral places, and that they contain ſome Pieces that were probably collected by the Helleniſt Jews. And for this reaſon Dionyſius, Carthuſianus, Nicolaus de Lira, Hugo Cardinalis, and afterwards Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral of the Moderns, turn them out of the Canon of the Holy Books.

The Book of Baruch is not to be found by name in the Jewiſh Canon, but perhaps it was joined together with Jeremiah. Melito, Origen, St. Hilary, Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Epiphanius, don't make any mention of it, confounding it perhaps with Jeremiah, but St. Jerome expreſly rejects it out of the Canon in his Preface to Jeremiah. On the contrary, the Council of Laodicea, St. Cyril of Jeruſalem, St. Athanaſius in his Feſtival Letter, and the Author of the Abridgment, annex it to Jeremiah, along with the Lamentations of that Prophet. It is cited under the name of Jeremiah, and as a Book of Scripture by Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1. pedag. chap. 2. by St. Cyprian in the Fourth Book of his Teſtimonies to Quirinus, chap. 6. by Euſebius in his Books of Demonſtration; by St. Baſil in his Fourth Book againſt Eunomius; by St. Ambroſe in his Firſt Book of Pennance, as alſo in his Firſt Book of Orthodox Faith. chap. 2. by St. Auſtin, lib. 18. de Civ. Dei; by St. Chryſoſtome in his Homily of the Trinity, and by many other Church-Writers that are more modern. It is not neceſſary to take notice, that it was received by the Council of Carthage, by Pope Innocent, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, by the Decree of Eugenius, and by the Canon of the Council of Trent.

The Book of Tobit is rejected in all the ancient Catalogues of the Books of the Bible, and not received into the number of the Canonical Books. Origen in his 27th Homily upon the Numbers ſays, it is one of thoſe Books that were read to the Catechumens, but that it is not Canonical (k). St. Jerome, who frequently rejects it as an Apocryphal Book, that was neither to be found in the Jewiſh or Chriſtian Canon, yet gave himſelf the trouble to Tranſlate it, ſpeaks of it very advantageouſly in his Preface, and calls it a ſacred Volume in his Hundred and fortieth Epiſtle. Ruffinus in his Expoſition of the Creed expreſly rejects it as an Apocryphal Book. But beſides that it is received by the Council of Carthage, and by Pope Innocent and Gelaſius, it appears, that in Irenæus's time it was reckoned amongſt the Books of the Prophets, becauſe this Author, l. 1. ch. 34. has obſerved, that the Gnoſticks, who diſtributed the Prophets into ſeveral Claſſes, and attributed them to their pretended Divinities, aſſign the Prophets Haggai and Tobit to Eloi. This Book is often cited by St. Cyprian, who likewiſe calls it Holy Scripture in his Book of Alms and Good Works. It is alſo cited by St. Hilary upon the 129th Pſalm, where he makes uſe of the Authority of this Book to prove the Interceſſion of Angels. The ſame Father making a Catalogue of the Canonical Books, obſerves, that ſeveral Perſons made the number of them twenty four, by adding the Books of Tobit and Judith. St. Ambroſe explained it throughout as a Book of Scripture, and cited it in his Hexameron, and ſo has St. Chryſoſtome in his 13th Homily to the People of Antioch, and the Author of the Apoſtolick Conſtitutions in the 8th Book, chap. 45.

The Book of Judith is not only rejected in all the ancient Catalogues of the Canonical Books, but it is alſo ſcarcely mentioned by the Ancients, though Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 4. Strom. Tertullian in his Book of Monogamy, and in his firſt Book againſt Marcion, commend the Heroick Action of Judith, which makes it evident, that they had all of them an eſteem for that Book. St. Jerome, after having ſeveral times rejected it as an Apocryphal Book, and obſerved in his Preface before it, that we ought not to prove any conteſted Doctrines out of it, adds, that we read, that the Council of Nice, reckoned it in the number of the Holy Scriptures; Sed quia hunc librum Synodus Nicæna in numero Sanctarum Scripturarum legitur computaſſe. We ought to believe, that St. Jerome reported this paſſage upon the Faith of another, there being not the leaſt appearance of its truth. For beſides, that we find nothing like it in the Creed, in the Canons, and Letters of the Council of Nice, and that it is highly probable, that there are no other Acts of that Aſſembly, is it to be imagined, that if they had made a Canon concerning the Sacred Books, not ſo much as one Man, that aſſiſted in that affair, would make mention of it? Is it to be thought, that St. Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, St. Cyril, who cou'd not be ignorant of the Deciſions of the Council of Nice, wou'd have rejected the Book of Judith as Apocryphal, if it had been reckoned amongſt the Canonical Volumes by the Authority of a Council they ſo highly reverenced? In ſhort, wou'd St. Hilary have contented himſelf with ſaying, that ſome Perſons added this Book to the Canon, and not rather have openly declared, when he was ſpeaking of the Canonical Books, that the Church received it? St. Jerome himſelf, if he had been aſſured of this buſineſs, wou'd he have rejected this Book ſo often, and not alledged this Catalogue of the Council of Nice, which ought to have been the infallible rule for him to follow? We muſt therefore ſay, that this Father received this Information from another. But if the Council of Nice reckoned not this Book of Judith in the number of Canonical Books, yet the Latin Church has ſince done it by the Council of Carthage, by the Mouth of Innocent the Firſt, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, and by the Council of Trent, which followed the Decree of Eugenius.

The Book of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus (l), in the ancient Catalogues are placed in the number of thoſe Books that are very profitable, but not Canonical; Nevertheleſs, theſe Books are cited by St. Barnabas, by Clemens Romanus, by Tertullian in his third Book againſt Marcion, and in his Book of Preſcriptions, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by St. Cyprian in ſeveral places; likewiſe frequently by Origen, by St. Hilary upon the 140th Pſalm; and according to ſome by St. Baſil, by St. Ambroſe, by St. Jerome, and St. Auſtin; but it does not follow, that all theſe acknowledged them for Canonical. On the contrary, Origen, St. Jerome, and St. Hilary, ranked them amongſt the Apocryphal Books; And St. (m) Baſil plainly ſays, in the Preface to his Commentary upon the Proverbs, That there are but three Books of Salomon; and he ſufficiently ſhews in ſeveral other places, that he did not own the Books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus for Canonical Books. Philaſtrius and Ruffinus reject them as well as St. Hilary, who has written a Letter about them to St. Auſtin. Theodoret is of the ſame Opinion in his Preface to the Canticles. One cannot ſay that of St. Cyprian, St. Ambroſe, and St. Auſtin, who ſeem to own them for Canonical, as it has been determined by the Council of Carthage, by Innocent the Firſt, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, by the Decree of Eugenius, and by the Council of Trent.

To conclude the two Books of Maccabees are not entred into the Canon of the Books of the Holy Scripture in the Catalogues of Melito, of Origen, of the Council of Laodicea, of St. Cyril, of St. Hilary, of St. Athanaſius, of St. Jerome, and others whom we have Named. In Euſebius's Chronicon, they are oppoſed to the Canonical Books, in theſe words, That which we have hitherto reported of the Annals of the Jews, is drawn out of the Holy Scriptures; that which follows is taken out of the Books of the Maccabees, Joſephus, and Africanus. Tertullian in his Book againſt the Jews, relates the Hiſtory of the Maccabees, but yet he does not cite the Books of the Maccabees as Books of Scripture. St. Cyprian quotes them very often under that Character, and ſo does St. Ambroſe, and St. Chryſoſtome. St. Jerome himſelf, who rejects them in ſeveral places, cites them ſometimes as Books of Scripture. St. Auſtin quotes them in his Book of the concern which we ought to have for the Dead, to prove that we may offer Sacrifice for the Deceaſed; and he aſſures us, l. 18. de Civit. Dei, that although theſe Books were never received as Canonical by the Jews, yet they were acknowledged for ſuch by the Church. But in his firſt Book againſt Gaudentius, taking occaſion to ſpeak of the action of Razias, who killed himſelf, he thus delivers his Thoughts about the Books of the Maccabees; The Jews don't receive theſe Books of the Maccabees as they do the Law, the Prophets, and the Pſalms; but the Church receives them, and they are not unprofitable, provided one Reads and Underſtands them with ſome ſort of Moderation, and they deſerve eſteem particularly for the Hiſtory of the Seven Maccabees. In the laſt Canon attributed to the Apoſtles, we find the three Books of Maccabees reckoned amongſt the Canonical Books, but there is reaſon to believe, that this paſſage has been added, becauſe they are not acknowledged for Canonical Books by Nicephorus, Johannes Damaſcenus, and ſeveral others, who have owned the Authority of the Apoſtolical Canons. They are received by the third Council of Carthage, and by Innocent the Firſt. There is but one of them approved by the Roman Council under Gelaſius. It is a very ſurprizing thing, that after all theſe Authorities, St. Gregory the Great ſhould thus Speak of them in the Nineteenth Book of his Morals; We don't without Reaſon, ſays he, produce Teſtimonies drawn out of thoſe Books that are not Canonical, ſince they have been Publiſhed for the Edification of the Church. We ought to make the ſame Reflection upon all the reſt of the Greek and Latin Eccleſiaſtical Writers, whom we have cited, and who ſince the Deciſions of the Councils of Carthage and Rome, and the Declaration of Innocent the Firſt, reckon but Twenty two or Twenty four Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament. Which makes it evident, that theſe Definitions have not been followed by all Authors, and all Churches, till at laſt it was intirely determined by the Council of Trent.

I ſhall not ſpeak of the Hiſtories of Suſanna and Bel, that are in Daniel, and have been rejected as falſe, or as Apocryphal, by ſeveral of the Ancients, ſince I have already diſcourſed largely about them.

Beſides theſe Books, that were at laſt received into the Canon of the Books of the Old Teſtament, there are many others, that either were not admitted into the Jewiſh Canon, although they were more ancient, or that having been compoſed ſince, have been eſteem'd and cited by ſome Chriſtian Authors, but never found any place in the Canon, or thoſe laſtly that were ſuppoſititiouſly obtruded upon the World by Hereticks, and by conſequence were always rejected.

In the firſt place there are ſeveral Books cited in the Old Teſtament, that have been totally loſt long ſince, and are not named in the Jewiſh Canon. The firſt of theſe Books, as they commonly pretend, is the Book of the Battels of the Lord, that is cited in the 21ſt Chapter of Numbers, verſe 24. But it is not certain, as we have elſewhere obſerved, that there is any mention made of a Book in this place: we ought to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the Book of the Covenant, that is mentioned, as they aſſert, in Exodus, chap. 24. but is in reality nothing elſe, but the body of the Laws, which Moſes received from God, and delivered to the People. Neither is there any greater certainty, that the Book of Jaſher, cited by Joſhuah, chap. 10. verſe 13. and in the ſecond Book of Samuel, chap. 11. verſe 18. was an Hiſtorical Book, although I confeſs there is ſome reaſon to believe it was. But one can hardly doubt, that the Books of Nathan, of Gad, of Shemaiah, of Iddo, of Ahijah and Jehu, cited frequently in the Books of the Chronicles, were Memoirs compoſed in all probability by theſe Prophets. We muſt ſay the ſame thing of the Book of the Sayings and Acts of the Kings of Iſrael, oftentimes cited in the Kings, which is different from the Chronicles, as we have already obſerved. To theſe muſt be added the Book of Samuel, cited in the firſt Book of Chronicles, and the laſt Chapter. The Diſcourſes of Hoſai, [or of the Seers] that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, chap 33. verſe. 19. The Hiſtory of Uzziah, written by the Prophet Iſaiah, and cited in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, chap. 26. verſe 22. The Three Thouſand Parables written by Salomon, as it is ſaid in the firſt of Kings, chap. 4. verſe 32. The Five Thouſand, or rather the Thouſand and Five Songs, with the ſeveral Volumes concerning all manner of Plants and Animals, that were likewiſe compoſed by Salomon, as we are informed in the ſame place. The Deſcriptions of Jeremiah, that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Maccabees, chap. 2. verſe. 1. The Prophecy of Jonas that is loſt. The Memoirs of Johannes Hircanus, [mentioned 1. Maccab. 16. 23, 24.] and the Books of Jaſon, that are mentioned in the ſecond Book of Maccabees.

'Tis uſually ask'd, Whether theſe Books cited in the Old Teſtament were Canonical or no? This Queſtion in my Opinion is asked to no purpoſe, ſince we have not any remainders of them at preſent; but however, certain it is, that they are not Canonical in the ſame Senſe as we uſually take the Word; that is to ſay, they were never received into the Canon, either of the Jewiſh or Chriſtian Church; and no body knows whether they ought to have been admitted there, in caſe they had been ſtill preſerved. Neither can we poſitively tell, whether they were written by the Inſpiration of God, or were the mere works of Men, only the latter Opinion ſeems to be more probable. In the firſt place, becauſe the greater part of them having been compoſed before Ezrah, he had without queſtion reckoned them in the Jewiſh Canon, if he had looked upon them to be divine Books. Secondly, becauſe we muſt otherwiſe be obliged to ſay, that the Church has loſt a great part of the Book of God. Thirdly, becauſe the Apoſtles never cited any other Books than what we now have, as Books of Scripture. Fourthly, becauſe the Fathers are all agreed, that theſe Books were Apocryphal, and place the Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, in the ſame rank. This is the Opinion of Origen, of St. Jerome, St. Auſtin, and indeed of all the Fathers except Tertullian. For although Theodoret, and ſome other Greek Fathers, give the Title of Prophets to the Authors of theſe Books that are cited in Scripture; yet it does not follow from thence, that they compoſed theſe ancient Memoirs by the Inſpiration of God. It is not neceſſary, that all the Writings and Diſcourſes of a Prophet ſhould be inſpired by Heaven. Upon this account, St. Auſtin has very judiciouſly obſerved, cap. 38. l. 28. de Civit. Dei, that although theſe Books, cited in the Holy Scriptures, were written by Prophets that were inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, yet it is not neceſſary to ſay, that they were divinely inſpired: For, ſays he, theſe Prophets might one while write like particular Men, with an Hiſtorical Fidelity, and another while like Prophets that followed the Inſpiration of Heaven: Alia ſicut homines Hiſtoricâ diligentiâ, alia ſicut Prophetas Inſpiratione Divinâ ſcribere potuiſſe.

Let us now go on to the Books that are not in the Canon of the Old Teſtament, and which we have at preſent. The Catalogue of them is as follows. The Prayer of King Manaſſes, who was captive in Babylon, cited in the ſecond Book of Chronicles, where it is ſaid, that this Prayer was written amongſt the Sayings of Hoſai, who has Tranſlated into Greek the Diſcourſes of the Seers, or Prophets. It is to be found at the end of the ordinary Bibles, there is nothing lofty in it, but it is full of pious Thoughts. The Latin Fathers have often quoted it: It is neither in Greek nor Hebrew, but only in Latin.

The third and fourth Books of Ezrah are alſo in Latin in the common Bibles, after the Prayer of Manaſſes. The third, which is to be found in the Greek, is nothing but a Repetition of what we find in the two former; it is cited by St. Athanaſius, St. Auſtin, and St. Ambroſe; St. Cyprian likewiſe ſeems to have known it. The fourth, that is only to be had in the Latin, is full of Viſions and Dreams, and ſome Miſtakes. 'Tis written by a different Author from that of the third; for beſides the great difference of Style, one of them reckons nineteen Generations from Aaron down to him, and the other but fifteen.

The third Book of Maccabees contains a miraculous deliverance of the Jews, whom Phiſcon had expoſed in the Amphitheatre at Alexandria, to the fury of Elephants. Joſephus relates this Hiſtory in his ſecond Book againſt Appion. This Book of the Maccabees is to be found in all the Greek Editions. It is reckoned in the number of Canonical Books, in the laſt Canon attributed to the Apoſtles, but perhaps that has been added ſince; 'tis alſo mentioned in the Chronicle of Euſebius, and in the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius. This Hiſtory, if it be true, happened about fifty years before the paſſages that are related in the other two Books, and therefore ought to be the firſt; It is without any reaſon called the Book of Maccabees, ſince it does not ſpeak of them in the leaſt.

The fourth, containing the Hiſtory of Hircanus, is rejected as Apocryphal by the Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius. It is mentioned by ſcarce any of the Ancients. Perhaps it was taken out of the Book of the Actions of Johannes Hircanus, mentioned towards the end of the firſt of Maccabees. Sixtus Senenſis aſſures us, that this account very much reſembles Joſephus's, but that he has abundance of his Hebrew Idiotiſms there.

There is towards the end of Job in the Greek Edition, a Genealogy of Job, that makes him the fifth from Abraham, with the Names of the Edomitiſh Kings, and of the Kingdoms of his Friends. This Addition is neither in the Latin nor in the Hebrew. There is likewiſe in the Greek a diſcourſe of Job's Wife, that is not in the Hebrew, rejected by Africanus and St. Jerome. Towards the end of the Pſalms in the Greek Editions, we find a Pſalm that is not of the number of the Hundred and Fifty, made in the Perſon of David, when he was yet a Youth, after he had ſlain the Giant Goliah. The Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius, cites it, and places it alſo in the number of the Canonical Pſalms. To conclude, at the end of Wiſdom there is a diſcourſe of Salomon drawn from the eighth Chapter of the firſt Book of Kings.

We have not the Book of Enoch, ſo celebrated by Antiquity, and cited by St. Irenæus, by St. Clement of Alexandria, by Tertullian, by Origen, by Athenagoras, by St. Jerome, and ſeveral other Fathers: But we learn from thoſe paſſages of it which the Fathers have quoted, and which ſtill remain in the Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and in the Chronography of Syncellus, that it principally treated of the Stars, and their Virtues, of the Deſcent of Angels to the Earth to entertain a Commerce with the Daughters of Men, of the Original of Giants occaſioned by this Correſpondence, of things that were to befal the Jews, of our Saviour, of the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, of the Diſperſion of the Jews, of the laſt Judgment. It contains a World of Fictions upon theſe Subjects; For which reaſon all the Fathers, except Tertullian, have look'd upon it as an Apocryphal Book, that does not belong to the Patriarch Enoch. That which has cauſed all the difficulty, is that this Book ſeems to have been cited under Enoch's Name by St. Jude, in his Canonical Epiſtle, verſe 14. And of this, ſays he, Enoch the ſeventh from Adam propheſied, ſaying, Behold the Lord cometh, &c. from whence one may conclude, That we ought either to reject the Epiſtle of St. Jude, or believe that the Book of Enoch, truly belonged to that Patriarch. St. Auſtin avoids this difficulty, by ſaying, That the true Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, is loſt, and that a ſpurious one has been ſince father'd upon him. But it is not probable, that the Book of Enoch, cited by St. Jude, is different from that which was known to St. Irenæus, to St. Juſtin, and the other Fathers that lived in the firſt Ages of the Church; and therefore St. Jerome, after Origen, anſwers, That St. Jude might cite an Apocryphal Book if he pleaſed, and that this hindred not his Epiſtle from being Canonical, that even in the other Books of the New Teſtament, we find ſome paſſages that are drawn out of Apocryphal Books, which ought not to diminiſh the Authority of the Canonical Books, or give any new Power to the Apocryphal ones. Some of the Modern Criticks have pretended to unravel this difficulty with greater eaſe, by maintaining, that St. Jude does not here ſpeak of the Book of Enoch, but only of a Prophecy of that Patriarch, which he had learnt by Tradition, as St. Paul reports the Names of Jannes and Jambres, the Egyptian Magicians of Pharaoh, from the common Tradition of the Jews; but this Opinion being contrary to the determination of all the Ancients, is in my Judgment very improbable and ill-grounded, and we had much better relie upon St. Jerome's Solution.

The Book of the Aſſumption of Moſes, from whence, as they pretend, St. Jude took the Relation of Michael the Archangel's diſputing with Satan about the Body of Moſes, is not ſo famous in Antiquity; nevertheleſs it is cited by Origen, l. 3. Princ. and by St. Clement, l. 3. Strom. who there gives us an account of a Viſion of Joſhuah and Caleb, that was taken out of this Book. Oecumenius in his Commentary upon the Epiſtle of St. Jude recites theſe Words of the Archangel to the Devil, the Lord rebuke thee Satan; Increpet te Deus, O Diabole; as quoted from hence. St. Jerome tells us, it is an hard matter to ſay, from whence St. Jude took this paſſage; only he obſerves, that there is ſomething like it to be found in the Prophecy of Zechariah, chap. 3. verſe 2.

Origen likewiſe cites a Book, Entituled, The Aſſumption, the Apocalypſe, or the Secrets of Elias. Syncellus after him, pretends, that out of this Apocryphal Book, St. Paul has taken this Sentence in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians; The Eye hath not ſeen, nor the Ear heard the good Things that God hath prepared for them that love him: As alſo that in the Epiſtle to the Galatians; Circumciſion availeth nothing, &c. Moreover he is of Opinion, that this Sentence in the Epheſians, Awake thou that ſleepeſt, is taken out of the Apocryphal Book of Jeremiah. But it may ſo happen ſometimes, that like Sentences may be found in two different Books, and yet it is not neceſſary to ſay, that one Author borrowed them from the other.

Some Jews have forged and counterfeited thoſe Books, that are by ſome attributed to the Patriarchs; as for Example, the Books Entituled, The Generations, and the Creation, aſcribed to Adam, The Revelation of the ſame, cited by St. Epiphanius. 'Tis alſo commonly believed, that he compoſed a Book about the Philoſopher's Stone; and that there was a Book of Magick extant, ſaid to have been written by Cham, as we find in Caſſian's eighth Conference, chap. 21. The Abridgment of Scripture, that goes under the Name of St. Athanaſius, makes mention of the Book of the Aſſumption of Abraham. The Author of the Homilies upon St. Luke, attributed to Origen, in the 15th Homily, and ſome others quote the Book of the Twelve Patriarchs. The ſame Author in the 35th Homily, cites an Apocryphal Book, where Angels and Devils diſpute about the Salvation of Abraham. The Author of the above-mentioned Abridgment of Scripture, ſpeaks of two Apocryphal Books, one of which is the Prophecy of Habakkuk, from whence as they pretend, the Hiſtory Bel, that is in Daniel, was taken; and an Apocryphal Book, that carries the Name of Ezekiel. Hermas, one of the moſt ancient Chriſtian Writers, in his Paſtor, ch. 2. cites the Propheſies of Eldad, and Medad, that are mentioned in chap. 11. of Numbers. Origen and St. Ambroſe cite a Book of Jannes and Jambres, the Magicians of Pharaoh, that is rejected by Gelaſius, as an Apocryphal Book. There is alſo a Book of King Og placed in the number of Apocryphal Books by Gelaſius.

The Ebionites have impoſed a Book upon the World, Entituled, Jacob's Ladder, as Epiphanius teſtifies. Manes compoſed a Genealogy of the Sons and Daughters of Adam, as we are informed by St. Auſtin, and Pope Gelaſius. In ſhort, there were abundance of ſuch kind of Books formerly to be found, compoſed either by Jews, who had an admirable Talent at Fiction, or elſe by the Hereticks, who made uſe of them to give the greater Reputation to their Errors, ſo that it would be an unprofitable, as well as a tedious thing, to make an exact Catalogue. But I ought not to omit two paſſages cited in the New Teſtament, as if they were in the Prophets, which upon ſtrict ſearch are not to be found there, and which have given occaſion to ſome perſons to imagine they were taken from other Books; The firſt is in St. Matthew, ch. 2. v. 23. Jeſus, ſays he, dwelt in a City called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by the Prophet, He ſhall be called a Nazarene. Now theſe Words, He ſhall be called a Nazarene, are not to be found in any of the Prophets that we now have, which has induced St. Chryſoſtome to imagine, that they are taken out of ſome other Prophet that is loſt. Others pretend, that they are cited out of the 11th Chapter of Iſaiah, verſ. 1. where it is foretold, That a Branch ſhall grow out, which they call in Hebrew Netzer. Huetius thinks, that this paſſage is taken from the 13th Chapter of the Book of Judges, verſe 5. where it is ſaid, that he ſhall be a Nazarite from the Womb. But the moſt probable Opinion is that of St. Jerome, who ſuppoſes, that St. Matthew does not cite any Prophet in particular, but only all the Prophets, who have predicted, that our Bleſſed Saviour ſhould be Holy, and Conſecrated to God, as the Nazarites were.

The ſecond paſſage is cited in the ſame Goſpel, chap. 27. verſe 9. Then, ſays he, was fulfilled that which was ſpoken in Jeremy the Prophet, ſaying, And they took the Thirty Pieces of Silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the Children of Iſrael did value, and gave them for the Potters Field, as the Lord appointed me. This Prophecy is not to be found in Jeremiah, but there is ſomething that ſeems to reſemble it in Zechariah, ch. 11. v. 13. Origen in his 35th Treatiſe upon St. Matthew, pretends, that it ought to be ſaid, that this paſſage is taken out of an Apocryphal Book, called, the Secrets of Jeremiah, or elſe that we muſt affirm, that in this Goſpel the Name of one Prophet is uſed for that of another. Some other Authors ſay, that this Propheſie has been ſtruck out of the Book of Jeremiah. Others run to Tradition, which, as they give out, preſerved this Propheſie of Jeremiah down to the time of St. Matthew. It is very probable, ſay ſome others, that this Propheſie being compoſed of the Words of Jeremiah, and the Thought of Zechariah, has been cited only under the Name of Jeremiah, as in another place a Propheſie of Malachi being joined to one of Iſaiah, is attributed to the latter: But yet 'tis a great deal more probable, that St. Matthew having only wrote, as it was ſpoken in the Prophet, without naming any one, they added in the Text of the Goſpel, the Name of Jeremiah, that Evangeliſt not being accuſtomed to name the Prophets, whom he cites. This is St. Jerome's Solution of the matter, which ſeems to be by far the ſolideſt.

NOTES.

(a) We call the Books of the Bible Canonical, &c.] Some Perſons ſay, that they are thus called, becauſe they are the Rule of Faith; but the other Opinion is far more probable.

(b) Books that are called Apocryphal.] We don't know well why they were ſo called. This word comes Originally from the Greek, where it ſignifies to hide or conceal. St. Auſtin, l. 15. de Civit. Dei, ch. 23. ſays, they are ſo called, becauſe the Original of them is not known. Others, as St. Jerome and Gelaſius, believe they had this Name given them, becauſe they contained the hidden Myſteries of the Hereticks. St. Epiphanius imagines this diſtinguiſhing Appellation was ſet upon them, becauſe they were not kept in the Ark. The ſignification alſo of this word is doubtful, one while they give this Name to all Books that are not in the Canon, another while only to erroneous or ill Books. Some of the Fathers make three Diſtinctions of Books, viz. The Canonical, the Doubtful, and the Suppoſitious. Conſult Origen upon the 4th Chap. of St. John. St. Athanaſius in his Feſtival Letter, St. Gregory in the Poem to Seleucus, Euſebius, and the other Fathers, divide them but into two ſorts, Canonical and Apocryphal: But then they diſtinguiſh the Canonical into two Claſſes. Indeed generally ſpeaking, they are ranged into three Claſſes, the Canonical of the firſt Rank, the Canonical of the ſecond Rank, and the Apocryphal.

(c) Some perſons diſtinguiſh three Canons made at ſeveral times by the Sanedrim, or the great Synagogue of the Jews.] Serrarius makes only two: The firſt made by Ezrah, and the Synagogue in his time: The ſecond, either when they ſent the LXX Elders to tranſlate the Bible, or when the Diſpute about the Reſurrection was ſo warmly diſcuſſed between the Sadducees and Phariſees: Genebrard ſuppoſes there were three; The firſt, compoſed by Ezrah, and approved of by the Synagogue; The ſecond, appointed by a Grand Aſſembly of the Synagogue, when they ſent the LXX, at which time, as he pretends, Tobit, Judith, Eccleſiaſticus, and the Book of Wiſdom, were added to the Canon; The third, at the time of the famous Controverſie between the Sadducees and Phariſees, when the Books of the Maccabees, according to him, were ſolemnly approved and received.

(d) But 'tis a great deal more probable, that they never had but one Canon.] It is unqueſtionably true, that Ezrah received, and collected the Sacred Volumes, and conſequently that he was the Author of the Canon amongſt the Jews. Neither they, nor the ancient Chriſtians acknowledged any other. As for the Books, which as they pretend, were inſerted into the other Canons, 'tis certain they were never owned by the Jews; and what they talk about the two great Aſſemblies of the Synagogues, that were convened upon that Occaſion, is all a Chimera and Fiction. The Ancients themſelves never make the leaſt mention of the Approbation of the Synagogue or Sanedrim of the Jews, which our Moderns boaſt of ſo mightily. Some are of Opinion, that Nehemiah added the two Books of Ezrah to the Canon, and found their Notion upon what is ſaid in the 2d. Book of Maccabees, ch. 2. v. 13. that he gathered together the Books of David, and the Prophets, and the Books of the Kings, &c. But this only proves, that he erected a Library, as it is intimated in that place, and not made a Collection of the Sacred Books. Others ſay, that we ought to attribute this Canon to Judas Maccabeus, becauſe it is ſaid in the firſt of Maccabees, ch. 1. v. 56. that Antiochus and his Miniſters burnt and tore to pieces the Books of the Law: and in the ſecond Book ch. 2. v. 13, 14. the Jews of Jeruſalem acquaint their Brethren that were in Egypt, that Judas Maccabeus had gathered together all thoſe things that were loſt by reaſon of the War. This does not prove that Ezrah's Canon was entirely loſt, and that Judas compoſed another, but only that he got other Copies of thoſe Sacred Books that were were burnt and torn under Antiochus, and made a Collection of ſeveral pieces relating to the Hiſtory of their Wars, which was never received into the Jewiſh Canon. Our Opinion is invincibly proved by the concurring Teſtimonies of Joſephus and St. Jerome.

(e) But it is viſible, that this Citation has been ſince inſerted into the true Text of Joſephus.] The paſſage which, as they pretend, is cited by Joſephus, is in ch. 42. of Eccleſiaſticus, v. 14. Better is the Churliſhneſs of a Man, than a courteous Woman. 'Tis beyond diſpute, that it was afterwards added, for Joſephus propoſes in that place to cite the Laws of Moſes, and this paſſage makes nothing at all to the purpoſe. In the ancient Verſion of Ruffinus this Quotation is not to be found, which makes it evident, that it has been added ſince.

(f) There are no others cited in the New Teſtament, but thoſe that were received into the Canon of the Jews.] Some Perſons ſay, that the Book of Wiſdom is cited by St. Paul, Rom. 11. in theſe words, Who hath known the mind of the Lord? Or who hath been his Counſellor? Which they ſay are the very ſame in effect with thoſe in Wiſdom, ch. 9. For what Man can know the Counſel of God? But this paſſage cited by the Apoſtle is to be found word for word in Iſaiah, ch. 40. v. 13. where the Greek terms are the ſame that are uſed by St. Paul. St. Baſil, l. de Spir. Sancto, ch. 5. Tertullian in his fifth book againſt Marcion, ch. 14. St. Ambroſe, or rather the Author of the Commentaries upon St. Paul, that are falſly attributed to him, Peter Lombard, and ſeveral others obſerve, that it is taken out of Iſaiah. 'Tis alſo pretended, that the paſſage in his Epiſtle to the Hebrews, where it is ſaid, that Enoch was tranſlated, that he might not taſte of death, is taken out of that Book. But it is in Geneſis, ch. 5. v. 25. It is likewiſe ſaid, that there are ſeveral Alluſions in the Goſpel and the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles to ſome places in Eccleſiaſticus, the Book of Wiſdom, Judith and Tobit. Every one abounds in his own ſenſe, and can find out what Reſemblances or Alluſions he pleaſes; but it is not neceſſary that two Perſons that have happen'd upon the ſame thought, ſhould take it one from the other. St. Juſtin, and the Ancients, don't accuſe the Jews for not acknowledging all the Books of Holy Scripture for Canonical. Theophilus ſays, that Zechariah is the laſt of the Prophets, and concludes the Holy Scripture with Ezrah.

(g) A great part of theſe are quoted there.] Theſe are all Books that are cited there; Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joſhuah, the ſecond Book of Samuel, the firſt of Kings, Job, the Pſalms, the Proverbs, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hoſea, Joel, Amos, Jonah, Micah, Haggai, Habakkuk, Nahum, Zechariah, Malachi.

(h) Gregory Nazianzen diſtributes the Books of Scripture into Hiſtorical, Poetical, and Prophetical.] This Diſtribution in my Opinion, ſeems to be the juſteſt, and moſt natural.

(i) By that of the Roman Council held under Gelaſius, Anno Dom. 494.] There is mention made in this Catalogue but of one Book of Ezrah, and one Book of Maccabees, although the number of Books is not exactly diſtinguiſhed in all the reſt. For Example: Regnorum libri quatuor - - - - - - - Eſdras liber unus, Maccabæorum liber unus. In ſome Manuſcripts Job is not mentioned there, and they read Maccabæorum libri duo.

(k) St. Jerome, who frequently rejects it as Apocryphal, and puts it out of the Canon, not only of the Jews, but the Chriſtians alſo.] Every time that St. Jerome treats expreſſly about the Canonical Books in his Prologues to the Kings, to the Books of Salomon, Ezrah, and Eſther, in his Epiſtles 7 and 103 to Paulinus, in his commentary upon Ezekiel in l. 17. ch. 43. he always rejects thoſe Books that are not to be found in the Canon of the Hebrews as Apocryphal, and only fit to be conſidered as ſuch. But when he ſpeaks without making any manner of reflection, he frequently cites theſe very Books as parts of the Holy Scripture, and attributes the ſame Character to the Book of the Wiſdom of Salomon, although it is certain, that he believed the contrary. In his Prefaces before Judith and Tobit, as if he had a mind to reſtore the Reputation of theſe Books, he ſpeaks very advantageouſly of them.

(l) The Books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus.] Beſides ſeveral Alluſions to the Scripture, which might be produced, but don't prove, that they were cited from thence, St. Barnabas cites a paſſage drawn out of the Book of Wiſdom, ch. 2. v. 12. and another out of Eccleſiaſticus, ch. 4. v. 36. Clemens Romanus, in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, has quoted the Book of Wiſdom, ch. 11. v. 22. Tertullian likewiſe has quoted the ſame Author in his Book againſt Marcion, towards the end, and in his Preſcriptions. Clemens Alexandrinus has alſo quoted him frequently. St. Cyprian very often quotes theſe two Books, and aſcribes them to Salomon. Origen mentions the Book of Wiſdom under the Name of Scripture in Epiſt. ad Heb. in his third Book againſt Celſus, and in his eighth Homily upon Exodus, as he alſo cites Eccleſiaſticus, Tom. 2. —— upon St. Matthew, Treatiſe the 24th: And Euſebius, l. 6. of his Hiſtory, ch. 13. ſays, That although St. Clement cites theſe Books, yet they are for the moſt part rejected. St. Hilary cites them upon the Pſalm 104. St. Baſil alſo cites them ſometimes, and particularly in his fifth Book againſt Eunomius. So does St. Jerome frequently, in his Commentary upon Pſalm 73. in his 16th Book upon Iſaiah, and in his 33d Book upon Ezekiel, and in his ſecond Book upon Iſaiah. St. Auſtin does the ſame in abundance of places. They are likewiſe cited by the Author of the Book of Divine Names, and of the Hierarchy, in the laſt Book, Chap. 2. in the firſt, Chap. 4. In the Letter of the Council of Sardica, ſet down by Theodoret, Hiſt. l. 2. ch. 8. By Anaſtaſius Sinaita, lib. 9. In Exam. Orat. 2. De incircumſcripto, and Queſt. 8, and 10. By Johannes Damaſcenus, l. 4. Of the Orthodox Edith, ch. 16. In his third Oration of the Nativity, and in his Sermon of the Dead. But to cite a Book, as Gretzer obſerves, is not to declare it to be Canonical. Theſe Books are thrown out of the Canon, by thoſe very Perſons that cite them under the Name of Scripture, and they that attribute them to Salomon; when they cite them, at other times formally deny it. Some ſeem to think, that the Book of Eccleſiaſticus is cited by thoſe who produce this Sentence as from the Scripture, Do nothing without advice. Such as St. Baſil in his ſhort Rules, Queſt. 104. Euſebius de Prap. Evang. Lib. 12. Caſſian, Conference, 2. Boniface, Epiſt. 98. The Council of Epheſus, in the Epiſtle to the Synod of Pamphylia. But the ſame ſentence is in ſubſtance in the 13th Chapter of the Proverbs, Verſe 16. and is word for word in the 24th Chapter, Verſe 13. of the Septuagint Verſion, from whence theſe Fathers quoted it; as well as Iſidore Peluſiota, who frequently uſes it. The Proverbs likewiſe are very often cited by the Ancients under the Name of Wiſdom, by Melito in his Catalogue, Proverbia qua & Sapientia, for ſo it ought to be tranſlated, and not Proverbia & Sapientia; by Origen, Homil. 17. upon Geneſis, upon Exodus, and Numbers; by the Author who has written under the Name of Dionyſius of Alexandria againſt Paulus Samoſatenus; by the Author of the Conſtitutions, frequently by St. Baſil, Conſt. Monaſt. C. 3. and 16; by Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. 1. and 26. And by Gregory Nyſſene in his Book of The Life of Moſes, and in his 7th Book againſt Eunomius. By the Council in Trullo, Chap. 64. By the ſecond Council of Nice, Act. 6. The Proverbs are alſo called by St. Clement of Alexandria, Stromata. By Hegeſippus, and the Ancients, Παροιμίαι.

(m) St. Baſil ſufficiently obſerves, that he did not own the Books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus for Canonical.] In his Epiſt. 406. to Amphilochius, he tells us, that Philo ſpeaking of the Manna, has ſaid according to the Tradition of the Jews, that it had a different Taſte according to the difference of Palats or Appetites. Now this is expreſly ſaid in the Book of Wiſdom. St. Baſil therefore believed it was written by Philo, if this is the Book whereof he ſpeaks, or at leaſt that it was no Book of Scripture, for otherwiſe he would not barely have called an Opinion, that is ſo clearly eſtabliſhed there in the 16th Chapter, by the Name of a Jewiſh Tradition. The ſame St. Baſil, Lib. 2. contr. Eunom. ſays, that this paſſage, Dominus creavit me initium viarum ſuarum, is only to be found once in Scripture. Socrates ſays the ſame thing, Lib. 4. Chap. 7. If they had acknowledged the Book of Wiſdom to be Canonical, they ought to have ſaid that this Sentence is twice to be found in the Bible, becauſe we read it in the Book of Wiſdom, as well as in the Proverbs.

SECT. III.

The Hiſtory of the Hebrew Text. Of the Verſion of the Septuagint, and other Greek Verſions of the Old Teſtament.

THE Books of Moſes, and (a) almoſt all the reſt of the Books of the Old Teſtament, were written in Hebrew. The ancient (b) Characters, which Moſes and the other Authors, that wrote before the Captivity, made uſe of, according to the common Opinion, were the Samaritan. For after the Diviſion of the Ten Tribes under Roboboam the Son of Salomon, the Iſraelites preſerved the Pentateuch in the ſame form they received it from Moſes, and (c) gave it afterwards to the Men of Cuth, who came to ſettle in their place at Samaria, from whence they were called Samaritans. The Tribes of Judah and Benjamin alſo preſerved the ſame Characters till the Babyloniſh Captivity. But being once carried away into Babylon, they inſenſibly uſed themſelves to write and ſpeak after the manner of the Chaldeans. Therefore it was, that (d) Ezrah, having reviewed, and gathered together the Books of the Bible, uſed the new Chaldee Characters, as being better known to the Jews than the Ancient, which they have uſed almoſt always ever ſince. But the Jews not only borrowed their Characters from the Chaldeans, but they borrowed their Language alſo, which was the ſame with that of the Syrians or Aſſyrians, and came very near the Hebrew (e). It is very certain, that at firſt this Language was not common to all the Jews, that they all underſtood Hebrew, and that there were likewiſe ſome Perſons that ſpoke it ſtill; ſo that the Chaldee and Hebrew Tongue were at the ſame time common in Judæa (f). But by little and little they were confounded together, and the Vulgar Language of the Jews became the Syriack, but mixed with ſeveral Hebrew Terms, which was afterwards commonly called Hebrew. Nevertheleſs, the Sacred Books ſtill continued written in Hebrew, and the Jews read them in that Language in their Synagogues; but the ancient Hebrew Language being no longer common, and beginning to be leſs intelligible to all the Jews, they explained the Original Hebrew in their Synagogues, and this perhaps might give the firſt occaſion to the (g) Chaldee Paraphraſes, though thoſe we now have ſeem to be of a later date. The Hebrew Text continued in this ſtate without Points, till about the Year of our Lord 500, at which time the (h) Jews of Tiberias invented the Points, to limit and reſtrain the Reading and Pronunciation of the Hebrew Tongue.

I will not loſe any time in endeavouring to prove all theſe things by any large Explications, ſince any Man may ſee them more amply handled by thoſe Perſons, who have wrote Volumes of purpoſe upon theſe Subjects; Neither will I diſcourſe of the Oriental Verſions of the Old Teſtament, that are all new, and beſides of a very inconſiderable authority. But I cannot forbear to ſpend ſome time about the Greek Verſion of the Bible made by the LXX, whom we commonly rank in the number of Eccleſiaſtical Authors.

It has been long diſputed, whether there was not a Greek Verſion of the Books of the Bible more ancient than the Septuagint. St. Clement of Alexandria, Euſebius, and ſome other ancient Writers, who pretend, that Plato, and ſeveral other Pagan Philoſophers, have borrowed many paſſages out of the Books of the Bible, were of opinion, that they were Tranſlated into Greek before the Seventy undertook that buſineſs. They that follow this opinion, ſupport it principally by the Teſtimony of Ariſtobulus related by Euſebius, who ſays, that before the time of the Seventy, ſome Perſons had explained, all that concerned the Laws of the Jews, their departure out of Egypt, and whatever happened to them after the taking of their Country; words that ſeem to intimate, that the Pentateuch had been Tranſlated before the Verſion of the Septuagint. St. Auguſtin, l. 18. De Civit. Dei, ch. 11. and Baronius after him deny it, and aſſure us, that the firſt Verſion of the Bible was the Septuagint. Huetius endeavours to reconcile theſe two Opinions, by ſaying, that there were only ſome few fragments of the Old Teſtament tranſlated before the Septuagint, but that theſe LXX Elders were the firſt, that made an entire Verſion of all the Sacred Volumes. He grounds his Opinion upon the above-cited paſſage of Ariſtobulus, which ought to be only underſtood, ſays he, of ſome parts, as the Circumlocution he uſes makes it appear, as well as what he adds, that the Law was firſt entirely tranſlated under Ptolomy Philadelphus. But in caſe this Book of Ariſtobulus ſhould only be the work of an Helleniſt Jew, as it is exceeding probable, this Opinion would become very uncertain. Let us go on now to the Verſion of the Septuagint.

All the Ancient Fathers have believed after Joſephus and Philo, that the Verſion of the Bible, commonly called the Septuagint, was compoſed by Seventy or Seventy two Jews ſent to Ptolomy Philadelphus, who deſired to have the Jewiſh Books in Greek, that he might place them in the Magnificent Library which he had lately erected at Alexandria by the care and induſtry of Demetrius Phalereus an Athenian. This has gone a long time for conſtant matter of fact, nor was it ever queſtioned but in our Age, in which ſome Criticks have been found, that have looked upon this Hiſtory to be fabulous. We ſhall examine the conjectures they generally bring to prove it.

In the firſt place they ſay, that this Story is wholly founded upon the Authority of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus, from whom Joſephus and Philo have taken all that they ſay in this matter, and that if theſe two Authors ſhould prove ſpurious, as the greateſt part of the Criticks agree they are, then there would be no other credible Witneſs of the truth of this buſineſs, the Fathers having talked of them only upon the relation of theſe Authors. Secondly, theſe Criticks pretend, that this Hiſtory does not in any manner agree with the Chronology of thoſe times, and they demonſtrate it thus: All thoſe Authors, ſay they, who ſpeak of this ſubject, ſuppoſe, that it was Demetrius Phalereus, who had been formerly a great Man at Athens, that took the pains to make the Jews come to tranſlate the Books of the Bible, and in the mean time they pretend that this Verſion was compoſed under the Reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus. Now Demetrius could not be in reputation under Ptolomy Philadelphus, nor could he be alive at that time, when they ſuppoſe that this Verſion was made. For it is certain, that Demetrius lived in Egypt under the Reign of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and that having councelled this Prince to name for his Succeſſors the Children which he had by Euridice, he incurred the diſgrace of Ptolomy Philadelphus, who baniſhed him the Court immediately after the death of his Father, and ordered him to be kept cloſe in a certain Province, where he died ſoon after, as Hermippus, cited by Diogenes Laertius, teſtifies. All which makes it evident, that in the firſt place Demetrius was never in any credit with Ptolomy Philadelphus, and conſequently, that he was not Superviſor of his Library, nor ordered to bring the Jews to tranſlate the Bible: ſecondly, that the Verſion of the Septuagint being made, as we are obliged to ſuppoſe, ſome years after the beginning of Philadelphus's Reign, Demetrius could not be employed in that affair, ſince he was dead before. 'Tis commonly anſwered, that Ptolomy Philadelphus reigned ſome time along with his Father, as 'tis obſerv'd in Euſebius's Chronicon, and that in this time he took care of the Library, and got the Verſion of the Bible to be made. 'Tis likewiſe urged, that this is the reaſon why ſome Authors place this Tranſlation in the time of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and others in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus. But in my Opinion this anſwer does not clearly remove the difficulty, ſince Ariſteas and Joſephus tell us in expreſs words, that it happen'd under the Reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and that he was the King who took ſo much care to compleat his Library, without making the leaſt mention of his Father. 'Twas to him alone that Demetrius addreſs'd himſelf, to procure his Letters to the Jews, he was the only Man that wrote them; In a word, all Authors who ſay this matter happen'd under his Reign, ſpeak not one word of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and thoſe that affirm, that it happen'd under the firſt Ptolomy, don't mention a ſyllable of Philadelphus. Vitruvius in the preface to his 7th Book tells us, that Ptolomy Philadelphus made a Library in imitation of the Kings of Pergamus, and that Ariſtophanes, an Athenian Grammarian, was his Library Keeper, from whence it follows, that Demetrius never managed that Office, and that the Library was not begun till after his death. For that King of Pergamus, in imitation of whom Ptolomy Philadelphus, erected his Library, was Eumenes, who could not Poſſibly do it till after the death of Demetrius; and therefore Suidas ſays, the Verſion of the Septuagint was not made till the 33d year of the Reign of Philadelphus, and he obſerves, that Zenodotus was his Library-Keeper. This ſtill diſcovers another contradiction in Chronology, that is to be found in Ariſteas and Joſephus's Narration; for they ſay, that the Seventy came into Egypt when Ptolomy made a ſolemn Feſtival, occaſioned by a Naval Victory which he obtained over Antigonus. This Sea-Fight ought to be the ſame, which Diodorus mentions in his 20th Book, and happen'd in the third year of the 118th Olympiad. Now at that time Demetrius was not come to Egypt, where he came not till after the death of Caſſander, which happen'd in the ſecond year of the 120th Olympiad, according to the Teſtimony of Hermippus. And though one ſhould ſtill maintain, that he came thither at that time, yet it is certain, that Eleazer was not then the High Prieſt, ſince according to Euſebius, he did not begin to be ſo till the 123d Olympiad. They obſerve alſo another Soleciſm in Chronology, and that is in the Epiſtle attributed to Demetrius by Ariſteas: For Hecatæus of Abdera that was Demetrius's Contemporary, is there cited as a Man that had been dead a long while ago. Thirdly, 'tis urged againſt the truth of this Story, that it is notoriouſly full of the fictions and inventions of the Helleniſt Jews. It is ſuppoſed there, that Eleazer choſe Seventy two Men, by taking ſix out of every Tribe. Now all the World knows, that at this time ſome of the Tribes were not to be found there, as having been carried away out of Judæa, by Shalmanezer after the taking of Samaria. To this it may perhaps be replied, that there were ſtill remaining amongſt the Jews ſome Perſons deſcended from all thoſe Tribes, that were concealed in the Tribe of Judah, but that Eleazer ſhould find juſt Six and no more in every Tribe, who were able to do ſuch a buſineſs, ſeems, as they ſay, to look a little too fabulous. 'It is certain, ſays a modern Critick, that if we 'reflect a little upon the Hiſtory of Ariſteas, and read it 'with never ſo little Application, we ſhall be convinc-

'ed, that an Helleniſt Jew wrote this Book under the 'name of Ariſteas in favour of his own Nation. 'The Miracles that are related there, and the very man-'ner in which it is written, give us a true Idea of a Jewiſh 'Genius, which always, and eſpecially at that time, de-'lighted to publiſh Forgeries, that contained ſcarce any 'thing but extraordinary things. He tells us, that ſome 'Perſons having formed a deſign to Tranſlate theſe Sa-'cred Volumes, were deterred from their bold reſolu-'tion by a ſignal puniſhment from Heaven, that Theo-'pompus having determined to inſert ſome part of their 'Law into the body of his Hiſtory, became mad; That 'the ſame Theopompus having pray'd to God, during the 'intermiſſion of his Diſtemper, to diſcover to him the 'cauſe of this unfortunate accident, God anſwered him 'in a Dream, that it happened to him for his great pre-'ſumption in endeavouring to make common thoſe ſa-'cred things that ought to be kept private, and that he 'was reſtored to his former health, after having deſiſted 'from this Enterprize. We read in the ſame place, that 'Theodectus, a Tragick Poet, loſt his ſight, for having 'preſumptuouſly attempted to inſert a paſſage of the Bible 'into his Works, but that he recovered his ſight upon ack-'nowledgment of his fault, and begging pardon of God. After all, the Authors of the Books attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus ſay nothing but what is great and pom-pous, and extraordinary. Ariſteas for example does not content himſelf with ſaying, that the Seventy carried a Copy of the Law, but he adds, that they brought one written in Characters of Gold. He makes Demetrius give the King a Petition, that they might have the Books of the Jews. He deſcribes the Table, and the other Preſents, which King Ptolomy offer'd to the Temple at Jeruſalem, very fabulouſly. In a word, there is ſcarce one ſingle Circumſtance in the whole Narration, that does not look very like a fable.

Theſe reaſons, and many others which may yet be brought, have made ſeveral Criticks reject theſe Books that are attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus; and what is yet more material, there are ſome Perſons that doubt, whether there were ever any Verſion compoſed by the 70 Jews that were ſent to Ptolomy Philadelphus. As for my ſelf, although I am heartily perſuaded, that theſe Books of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus are ſpurious, yet nevertheleſs (i) I am of opinion, that we cannot abſolutely deny, that there was a Greek Tranſlation of the Bible made in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus: But I dare by no means affirm, that this buſineſs was done perfectly after the ſame manner, as we find it related in the Book attributed to Ariſteas.

Now as the Jews are fruitful in Fictions, ſo they are not content with retailing thoſe, that are to be found in this Author, but they have likewiſe added abundance of more extraordinary paſſages, in ſuppoſing, that theſe 72 Perſons were ſhut up ſeverally, each Man in a particular Cell, and that they all of 'em tranſlated the Scripture in the ſame manner, inſomuch that all their tranſlations were found conformable to each other, not only in the ſame Senſe, but even in the ſame Words and Expreſſions. Upon this foundation they pretend, that they were inſpi-red by God, and that their Verſion ought to be conſide-red, as wholly Divine. Some of the Fathers, that were extreamly inclined to value the Authority of this Tran-ſlation, readily believed this Fiction of the Jews (k), but St, Jerome, who had examined theſe things more exactly, and who preferred the Hebrew Text to the Tranſlation of the Septuagint, laughed at this Story with reaſon, ſince neither Ariſteas, nor Philo, nor Joſephus, who were the firſt Perſons that gave us the Hiſtory of this Verſion, ſpoke a word concerning theſe little Cells; but on the contrary Ariſteas, or the Author of the Book that bears his name, tells us, that the Seventy, when they made this Verſion, concerted matters among themſelves, and confer'd together. 'Tis upon the Teſtimony of the ſame Author, that St. Jerome aſſures us, that the Seventy on-ly tranſlated the five Books of Moſes. Ariſteas, Ariſtobu-lus, and Philo, tell us, that they tranſlated no more than the Law, a word which ordinarily ſignifies the Pentateuch only. And though we might underſtand it of all the Books of the Old Teſtament, which is not true, yet Jo-ſephus utterly excludes this Explication, by telling us, that this Law was that of the Legiſlator of the Jews, which paſſage can only agree to Moſes and his Books.

The Talmudiſts are of the ſame Opinion. On the other ſide St. Juſtin, and the greateſt part of the ancient Fathers, believed, that the Seventy tranſlated all the Bible, becauſe in their time the Greek Verſion of the Books of Scripture, that are joyned to the five Books of Moſes, went under the name of the Septuagint: But it is far more probable to believe, that the Seventy only tranſlated the five Books of Moſes, and that the following Books were from time to time tranſlated by other Authors, as the difference of the ſtyle, that is to be obſerved between the ſeveral Ver-ſions, ſufficiently ſhews, ſince we have not the poſitive Teſtimonies of the Seventy to the contrary. But though the Greek Verſion of the other Books of the Bible, joyn-ed to that of the LXX, was not performed by them, yet we muſt acknowledge, that it is very ancient, and that the Jews had no other before our Saviour was born.

But after the Chriſtian Religion was ſettled, as the Chriſtians ſupported themſelves by the Authority of the Verſion of the LXX, ſo ſome of the Jews reſolved to make a new Tranſlation of the Books of the Bible, which as they pretend, ſhould be more conformable to the Hebrew Text, and leſs favourable to the Chriſtians (l). Aquila the Jew, who lived in the time of Adrian, was the firſt Man that thought of this deſign, and after put it into execution, by tranſlating the Hebrew Text in-to Greek word for word. Afterwards Theodotion (m), a Diſciple of Tatian, who after turned Marcionite, and at laſt a Jew, and flouriſhed in the time of the Emperor Commodus, made another Greek Verſion of the whole Bible, in which, as he does not confine himſelf ſo cloſe-ly to the Letter, as Aquila did, ſo neither does he depart ſo far from it as Symmachus (n), the Author of the third Verſion, who lived in the time of the Emperor Severus. He had formerly been a Jew, and at laſt went over to the Sect of the Ebionites, which comes up very near to Ju-daiſm. His Verſion is much freer, and he only concerns himſelf to render the ſenſe, without ſticking at the words (o). In the time of the Emperor Caracalla there was a-nother Verſion of the Books of the Bible found, or at leaſt of one part thereof, and likewiſe a ſixth under A-lexander the Son of Mammea, which is called the Nicopo-litan. Laſtly, Origen added a Seventh Verſion; but that reached the Pſalms only. The Hexapla, and Tetrapla of Origen were compoſed of theſe Verſions. In the Hexapla they were joyned to the Hebrew Text written two ways, that is to ſay, in Greek Characters, and in Hebrew Cha-racters, and this compoſed the two firſt Columns of the Work: In the third Column ſtood Aquila's Tranſlation, which was joyned to the Hebrew Text, as following the letter more religiouſly than any of the reſt. The Verſion of the Septuagint was placed between that of Symmachus and Theodotion, and ſo theſe three Verſions compoſed three Columns: the two other Verſions were ranked in the two laſt Columns, and the Seventh, which was of the Book of Pſalms, in the ninth Column. I think that this Work ought rather to be called Octapla than Hexapla, being compoſed of eight Columns; and therefore ſome have be-lieved, that the Hexapla, did not contain the fifth and ſixth Verſion, but only the other four; and that theſe two Verſions having been added ſince Origen, they then made Octapla of them. But Euſebius, and (p) St. Jerome, with ſeveral of the ancient Writers, make no diſtinction at all between the Octapla and Hexapla, but only be-tween the Tetrapla and the Hexapla, and plainly affirm, that both the fifth and ſixth Verſion were in the Hexapla of Origen, and even the ſeventh of the Book of Pſalms. Therefore we muſt either ſay, that they counted not the two Columns of the Hebrew Text, or elſe, that the fifth and ſixth Verſions were only of ſome particular Books of the Bible; and that thus the ſame Work of Origen had ſix Columns in ſome places, in others eight, and even nine in the Pſalms, but that they were called Hexa-pla, either becauſe there were generally but ſix Columns, or becauſe the fifth and ſixth Columns were afterwards added. And this appears to be the opinion of St. Epi-phanius, which the Learned Huetius has ſo excellently explained. In the Tetrapla, that were made after the Hexapla, Origen has rettenched the fifth and ſixth Ver-ſions, as alſo the two Columns of the Hebrew Text, ſo that they are only compoſed of the Verſions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion. We muſt ſtill obſerve, that the Verſion of the Septuagint, that was in the Hexapla, and Tetrapla, was corrected and aug-mented in ſeveral places yet without being changed. For Origen added there ſome paſſages taken from Theodotion, which he marked with an Aſterisk, and as for thoſe places, that as he ſuppoſed ought to be cut off, and re-trenched, he incloſed them between two Hooks. Since that there have been three Verſions of the Septuagint uſed in the Church. The firſt is the ancient or vulgar, and was received by Lucian, it was uſed at Conſtantinople, and in the Eaſt. The ſecond was that of Heſychius, which they uſed in Alexandria, and all over Egypt. Laſt-ly the third, which was uſed in Paleſtine, was the ſame with that, which was in the Hexapla of Origen, and which Euſebius and Pamphilus tranſcribed, and publiſh-ed ſeparately. Here, ſays St. Jerome, are the three dif-ferent Verſions of Scripture, that divide the whole Earth. Totuſque orbis hâc inter ſe triſariâ varietate pugnat. I ſhall not ſay any thing about the Authority of the Ver-ſion of the Septuagint, compared with the Hebrew Text, be-cauſe it is a great and famous Queſtion that does not in the leaſt concern that deſign I have propoſed to my ſelf.

NOTES.

(a) WERE almoſt all written in Hebrew.] We muſt except Judith, Tobit, ſome Chapters of Daniel, and ſome of the firſt Book of Ezrah, which are written in Chaldee, and ſome other Chapters of the ſame Prophet Daniel, with the Books of the Maccabees that are written in Greek.

(b) The Characters which Moſes made uſe of, &c. were the Samaritan.] This opinion was taken for granted in St. Jerome's time, as he himſelf obſerves in his Preface to the Kings, and it is confirmed by ancient Medals, where we find this Inſcription, Holy Jeruſalem, written in Hebrew in the Samaritan Characters; and this could not be written after the diviſion of the Tribes, for at that time the Samaritans did not conſider Jeruſalem as an Holy City.

(c) Gave it to the Men of Cuth.] 'Tis far more probable, that the Men of Cuth had the Books of the Law rather from the Iſraelites than the Jews. In the firſt place, becauſe they preſerved them written in the ancient Character, which makes it evident, that they did not receive them after the Captivity, ſince the Jews at that time wrote in Syriack Characters. Secondly, becauſe the Collection of the Sacred Books amongſt the Samaritans only contained the Pentateuch, and conſequently they received them of the Iſraelites, who acknowledged no other Books but theſe to be ſacred, and not of the Jews, who admitted the reſt.

(d) Ezrah having reviewed and gathered together the Books of the Bible.] I have followed the common opinion of the Jews and Holy Fathers, who aſcribe the collecting and reviſing of the Sacred Volumns of the Old Teſtament to Ezrah: Others are of opinion, that it was Nehemiah that took this care, but let the matter be how it will, certain it is, that the Jews at their return from the Babylonian Captivity, took care to ſearch after, and gather their Books together. The Author of the fourth Book of Eſdras, which is a Book full of falſities and fictions, ſuppoſeth, that all the Copies of the Sacred Books being burnt or loſt, Ezrah dictated them all anew by a Divine Inſpiration. We have this fable at length in the 14th Chapter of this Book, where it is tack'd to ſeveral other fooliſh Whimſies. St. Clement of Alexandria, Theodoret, and St. Baſil have followed this opinion, without reflecting upon it; but others who have uſed more precaution in this matter, are content to ſay with us, that Ezrah collected, review'd, digeſted, and put in order the Books of Holy Scripture, when there were many Copies of it as yet remaining. This is the opinion of St. Irenæus, Tertullian, St. Jerome, St. Chryſoſtome, the Author of the Abridgment of the Bible, commonly attributed to St. Athanaſius, and of ſeveral others. The firſt opinion is not only extremely prejudicial to Religion, but impoſſible to be maintain'd. For, firſt, What probability is there, that the Jews during the Captivity, ſhould loſe all the Copies of that Book, for which they always preſerved ſo profound a veneration, and which was the foundation of their Religion? Why ſhould we think, that not one ſingle Man amongſt them kept it by him? Is it credible, that Ezekiel, Daniel, and Jeremiah, were deprived of reading the Books of the Law? Can one conceive, that Ezrah had no other knowledge of them than by Inſpiration? He, I ſay, that was ſo learned a Doctor of the Law of Moſes at the time when he was in Babylon, as it appears, ch. 7. v. 6. of the firſt Book of Ezrah. 2. We ought to make the ſame reflection upon the Iſraelites of the ten Tribes. Now it is not probable, that they did not carry the Holy Books along with them. The Book of Tobit informs us, that Tobit read the Prophecy of Amos, Tob. ch. 2. v. 6. 3. And 3dly, is it not paſt diſpute, that the Men of Cuth preſerved the Pentateuch, which the Iſraelites of the ten Tribes gave them? 4. It appears by the 9th Chapter of Daniel, that the Jews had the Books of Moſes, and read them during the Captivity. All Iſrael, ſays this Prophet, have tranſgreſſed thy Law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice, and therefore the curſe is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the Law of Moſes, becauſe we have ſinned againſt him. And a little lower, All this evil is come upon us, as it is written in the Law of Moſes. 5. It is ſaid in the ſixth Chapter of the Book of Ezrah, that the building of the Temple was finiſhed in the ſixth year of Darius, and that the Prieſts and Levites were eſtabliſhed in their Miniſterial Functions, as it is written in the Law of Moſes, Sicut ſcriptum eſt in lege Moyſis. Now Ezrah was not yet come up to Jeruſalem, for it is related in the following Chapter, that he arrived in Judaa in the ſeventh year of King Artaxerxes. 6. In the ſecond Book of Ezrah, ch. 8. the People being deſirous to be inſtructed in the Law of Moſes, did not requeſt him to dictate it to them anew, but only to bring the Book of the Law of Moſes, which the Lord had given to the People of Iſrael. Et dixerunt Eſdra ſcribæ, ut afferret librum legis Moyſis quam præceperat Deus Iſraeli. And it is ſaid immediately after, that Ezrah brought the Book of the Law, and read it before all the People. It will be ſaid perhaps, that I have borrowed theſe Reaſons out of another Mans Book, I own it, but I thought they were ſuitable to the preſent occaſion.

(e) It is very certain, that at firſt this Language was not common to all the Jews.] This is abundantly proved againſt the common opinion, by what is ſaid in the Book of Nehemiah, ch. 13. v. 24. that the Children of the Jews who had Married ſtrange Women, ſpoke Aſotice and not Judaice. In the Hebrew the words are Aſhdodith, and Jehudith, and this laſt word in the ſecond Book of Kings, ch. 18. v. 26. is oppoſed to Aramith, which ſignifies in Syriack, Precamur loquaris nobis Syriace & non Judaice; in the firſt Book of Ezrah, ch. 4. v. 7. and in the Prophet Daniel, ch. 2. v. 4. Aramith has ſtill the ſame ſignification. On the contrary Jehudith ſignifies the Hebrew Tongue in oppoſition to the Syriack, as we may ſee in the ſecond Book of Chron. ch. 32 v. 18. 2 Kings, 18. 26. and in Iſaiah, ch. 36. v. 11. There were ſeveral Jews therefore in the time of Ezrah that ſtill ſpoke Hebrew. And this is evidently proved by the Books of Ezrah that were made ſince the Captivity, and yet were written in Hebrew, and not in Chaldee, except ſome Chapters of the firſt Book of Ezrah, where he tells us of the oppoſition, that the Officers of the King of Perſia, who ſpoke Chaldee, gave to the Jews. From whence it follows, that the Jews both underſtood and ſpoke Hebrew. For otherwiſe why ſhould Ezrah, if he deſigned to have his Books intelligible by all the Jews, write them in a Language, which was not natural to them. The ſame conſideration will hold good as to the Books of the latter Prophets, who wrote in Hebrew after the Captivity, and yet addreſſed their Prophecies to all the People. But laſtly, that which admits of no reply, is a remarkable paſſage in the Book of Nehemiah, ch. 8. and 9. Where we find, that the Law was read in Hebrew before the People, and all the People hearkened to it, and underſtood it; Theſe Remarks have been lately made by a very Ingenious and Learned Perſon. Mr Simon indeed brags that he has invincible Reaſons to overthrow them; When he has honoured the World with a Sight of them, we ſhall ſee whether they are powerful enough to make us retract this opinion, as he would willingly perſwade us they are; but in the mean time he ought not to take it amiſs, if till then, we continue in the ſame mind.

(f) The Syriack Tongue mix'd with Hebrew Words became the vulgar Language of the Jews, which was afterwards called the Hebrew Tongue.] The truth of this appears by the Hebrew Words that we find in the New Teſtament, which are all, as St. Jerome obſerves, Syriack Words, and what our bleſſed Saviour ſays, 'That not one Iota of the Law of God ſhall paſs away, &c. makes it evident, that the Jews at that time uſed the preſent Hebrew Alphabet, and not the ancient, and it is demonſtrated from hence, that the י of the Jews was a little Letter, which is true of the Syriack [and Hebrew] Jod, and not of the Samaritan, which has three Feet.

(g) The Chaldee Paraphraſes which we have ſeen to be of a later date.] The Chaldee Paraphraſe is divided into three Parts: The firſt, that contains the Pentateuch, is attributed to Onkelos; the ſecond, that contains the Prophets, to Jonathan; the third, to one Joſephus the blind. There is likewiſe another Paraphraſe of the Pentateuch, called that of Jeruſalem, and another of the Canticles; but all theſe Paraphraſes are imperfect, as well as new. Since that time the Jews having committed to writing abundance of Traditions in a Book which they call Miſna, they afterwards compoſed Commentaries upon it, whereof the moſt celebrated is called the Gemera. But all theſe Books are full of ridiculous fooliſh Fictions, and have nothing common with the Scripture; The Maſora, that is, a ſort of a Critical Performance upon the Bible, is of more uſe and advantage. The Follies and Whimſies of the Cabala are impertinent and impious.

(h) About the year of our Lord 500, the Jews of Tiberias invented the Points.] Theſe Points were not uſed in St. Jerom's time, as may be eaſily proved from ſeveral Paſſages of this Father drawn out of his 22th Queſtion upon Jeremiah, and out of his Commentary upon Habakkuk, in Chap. 3. Verſ. 20. which abundantly ſhew, that in his time the Pronunciation of the Hebrew Words was not determined by the Points, as it has been ſince.

(i) I am of opinion, that one cannot abſolutely deny, that there was a Greek Verſion of the Books of the Bible made in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus.] It is not credible, that the Authors of the Books attributed to Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus entirely invented the whole Hiſtory, and that there is no part of it true. 'Tis far more probable, that they only added ſeveral Circumſtances to the Matter of Fact, which was aſſuredly certain. Mr. Simon imagines, that this Verſion was called the Septuagint, becauſe it was approved by the Sanedrim, but this is a Conjecture without any Foundation.

(k) Some

(k) Some of the Fathers have believed this Fiction of the Talmudiſts.] The Author of the Diſcourſe againſt the Greeks, attributed to St. Juſtin, St. Irenæus, and St. Clement, believed it, St. Auſtin queſtioned and doubted the truth of it, St. Jerome laughs at it.

(l) Aquila the Jew.] A certain Syriack Author, cited by Monſieur Le Jai [the Publiſher of the French Polyglot,] tells us, that he was deſcended from Adrian, and adds many other Paſſages that are extremely improbable. St. Jerome aſſures us, that he was a Jew, in his Commentary upon the third Chapter of Habakkuk, upon the third of Iſaiah, and in his Epiſtle to Marcellus.

(m) Theodotion the Diſciple of Tatian.] St. Jerom's Teſtimony confirms what we have ſaid here, St. Irenæus names him in his Book againſt Hereſy, from whence it follows, that he lived when Eluthérius was Pope.

(n) Symmachus, &c.] What we ſay concerning this Man, is taken out of St. Jerome, in his Preface upon Job; Euſebius alſo ſays, l. 6. c. 7. that he was an Ebionite; and this is the reaſon why Hilary the Deacon Author of the Commentary of St. Paul, attributed to St Ambroſe, calls the Ebionites Symmachians.

(o) We yet find another Verſion of the Bible in the time of the Emperor Caracalla.] St. Epiphanius is of opinion, that this fifth Verſion was found at Jericho, the Author of The Abridgment attributed to St. Athanaſius is of the ſame opinion: But Euſebius following the Teſtimony of Origen, tells us, that the ſixth was found at Nicopolis; that we don't know where Origen found the fifth; and that the ſeventh, which was only a Verſion of the Pſalms, was found at Jericho. Conſult Euſeb. l. 6. c. 16. St. Jerome aſſures us, that all theſe Tranſlations were made by Jews.

(p) Euſebius, St. Jerome, and ſeveral other Ancients, make no diſtinction between the Octapla from the Hexapla.] They place the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh Verſion, in what they call the Hexapla. St. Epiphanius, in his Book of Weights and Meaſures, ſpeaks of the Octapla, but as of a Work which was not diſtinguiſhed from the Hexapla; for after he has deſcribed the Hexapla, he adds, And if we find there the fifth and ſixth Verſion added, it follows that we ought to call them Octapla. Theſe Columns were unqueſtionably written upon different Rolls, that were faſten'd one to the ſide of another.

SECT. IV.

Of ſome Authors, whoſe Works have a Relation to the Old Teſtament, viz. Philo, T. Flavius, Joſephus, Juſtus, Ariſteas, Ariſtobulus, Joſephus Bengorion, Beroſus, the falſe Dorotheus, Zoroaſter, &c.

THere are ſeveral Authors, whoſe Works, whether Genuine or Spurious, have a Relation to the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, whom we think our ſelves obliged to take ſome ſhort notice of.

Philo, a Jew of Alexandria, lived in the time of Caius Caligula, and was the chief Perſon of an Embaſſy, that the Jews ſent to the Emperor. He compoſed ſeveral Works upon the Old Teſtament, a Catalogue of which may be ſeen in Euſebius's Hiſtory, l. 2. ch. 8. and St. Jerom's Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, as well as at the beginning of the Greek and Latin Impreſſion of his own Writings, printed at Paris, 1640. This Author is a Platoniſt, and ſo well imitates Plato's Style, that he has been called by ſome the Jewiſh Plato: He explained the whole Bible by way of Allegory, he is very Eloquent and Diffuſive, his Works are full of Moral Thoughts, and continual Allegories upon all the Hiſtories of the Bible; he approaches very near the Notions of the Chriſtians in his Morals. His Works were publiſhed in Greek by Turnebus, and printed at Paris 1552. and at Francfort 1587. Tranſlated into Latin by Gelenius, and printed at Baſil, 1554, and 1561. at Lyons 1555, in Greek at Geneva 1603. and in Greek and Latin at Paris 1640.

Joſephus was deſcended of the Sacerdotal Race of the Aſmoneans, as we are told in his Life, which he wrote himſelf, where all his Employments and Actions are exactly related. He was born Anno Dom. 37. and died 93. He was ſirnamed Flavius, by reaſon of Veſpaſian. He compoſed the Hiſtory of the Jews, which he took for the moſt part out of the Books of the Bible, and continued it down to the time of the Wars of the Jews, under the Name of the Jewiſh Antiquities. He alſo wrote the Hiſtory of the War againſt the Romans, and the taking of Jeruſalem. He has likewiſe written, beſides his own Life, two excellent Books againſt Appion to anſwer the Objections, which that Heathen had muſtured up againſt the Antiquity of the Jewiſh Nation, the Purity of the Law, and the Conduct of Moſes; and he has written a Treatiſe concerning the Martyrdom of the Maccabees, which is called by Eraſmus, and not without Reaſon, an exquiſite Maſter-piece of Eloquence. This Author wrote very politely, and the turn which he gives things, is very agreeable. His Hiſtory is beautified with admirable Deſcriptions, very eloquent Harangues, and very ſublime Thoughts; his Style is clear and faithful, he not only diverts his Readers, but he alſo brings them over to what ſide he pleaſes; in one word, he excites and calms the Paſſions as himſelf thinks fit. We may ſay, he is a perfect Hiſtorian, and we may juſtly call him the Livy of the Greeks. The Treatiſe of the Maccabees ſufficiently ſhews the Beauty of his Genius, and the Height of his Eloquence; and his Books againſt Appion demonſtrate his profound Learning, and the exactneſs of his Judgment. The Works of this Author have been printed ſeveral times in Latin, of the Tranſlation partly of Ruffinus, partly of Gelenius, and partly of Eraſmus; and at Geneva in Greek and Latin, Anno Dom. 1611. It were to be wiſhed that we had a new Edition of it, in a better Letter, and better Paper.

Juſtus of Tiberias wrote alſo an Hiſtory of the Jews, and ſome Commentaries upon the Bible, but Joſephus accuſes him of Falſity and Lying. We had not placed him in the number of the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, if St. Jerome had not done it before us.

The Books of Ariſteas and Ariſtobulus concerning the Verſion of the Septuagint, are manifeſt Forgeries, and impoſed upon the World by ſome Helleniſt Jews, as we have already ſhewn when we were diſcourſing of that Verſion.

The Hiſtory of the War of the Jews by Joſephus Bengorion, was written by an Author that lived ſince St. Jerom's time. He ſpeaks of the Goths as being in Spain, and of the Franks in Gaul. Now theſe People were not ſettled in Spain and in France till about the fifth Century, and ſo by conſequence this is a ſpurious Writer, who having ſtolen ſeveral things out of the true Joſephus, has mingled them after his manner with Fictions and Fables.

The Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, which is extant in the firſt Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, is a Book wholly filled with Trifles and Impertinencies, and deſerves nothing but contempt. Neither ſhould one have a better opinion for the Abridgment of the Lives of the Prophets, the Apoſtles, and the other Diſciples, attributed to Dorotheus of Tyre, who ſuffered Martyrdom in the time of Dioclefian. It is a Book altogether unknown to the Ancients, full of groſs Faults and Miſtakes in Hiſtory, and made up of Fables and Tales to divert the Reader.

There are ſome Books that go under the Name of Beroſus the Chaldean, of Manetho the Egyptian, and of Metaſthenes; but they are altogether unworthy of thoſe great Men, whoſe Names they carry, and the Forgery is plain and manifeſt. All thoſe Paſſages out of the true Beroſus, cited by Joſephus in his Book againſt Appion, are not to be found in this Book that is aſcribed to him, but we find there ſeveral Things that are clean contrary. He ſpeaks of the City of Lyons, which had not that Name till after Cæſar's time. In ſhort, the Hiſtory of Beroſus went no farther than the time of Nabuchadonoſor, and Nabopalaſſar, and this deſcends much lower.

The Book of (a) Zoroaſter, of the ſacred Hiſtory of the Perſians, a Fragment whereof is cited by Euſebius in his firſt Book De præpar. Evangel. is a ſuppoſititious Work, as well as the other Writings attributed to that fabulous Author. In fine, the Hiſtory of the Phœnicians, which is ſuppoſed to be written by (b) Sanchoniathon, and tranſlated into Greek by Philo Biblius (c), who lived in the time of Adrian, is a Romance, wherein there are ſeveral Paſſages taken out of the Hiſtory of the Bible and many Circumſtances of the Fables of the Greeks.

NOTES.

(a) Zoroaſter.] There were many of this Name, but 'tis generally held, that the firſt and moſt celebrated of them lived in the time of Nimrod, that he was King of the Bactrians, and that he was overcome by Ninus. They ſpeak wonderful Things of his Knowledge, his Wiſdom, and of the Prodigies which he wrote. They make him the firſt Author of the Perſian Philoſophy, which they called Magick. Plato ſpeaks of Zoroaſter as Inventor of that Science amongſt the Perſians, and obſerves that he was the Son of Oromazes. Eubulus, cited by Porphyry, attributes the Inſtitution of the Myſteries of the Goddeſs Mithra to him. Eudoxius and Hermippus, cited by Pliny, tell us, that he lived Six thouſand Years before Plato. But Cteſias, who has written the Hiſtory of Zoroaſter, teſtifies, that he lived in the time of Cyrus. This is the reaſon why Arnobius diſtinguiſhed the two Zoroaſters. Euſebius alſo makes Zoroaſter as old as Ninus, and St. Epiphanius ſays, that he lived in the time of Nimrod. He is called Zarades by the Perſians, and by the Greeks Zoroaſter. There are ſeveral Explications given of his Name: Some pretend, that it ſignifies a Living Star; others ſay, that he was the Son of After; and laſtly, others tell us, that it ſignifies a Contemplator of the Stars. All that is related of the ancient Zoroaſter is fabulous. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the King of Bactria, that fought againſt Ninus, was named Oxiartes, and not Zoroaſter. Nevertheleſs there is a great deal of reaſon to believe, that there was a Man of this Name amongſt the Perſians, who taught them Magick. Hermippus tells us, that he made an infinite number of Verſes. The Fragment, which Euſebius cites in the 7th Chapter of his firſt Book De præparatione Evangelicâ, taken out of the Hiſtory of the Perſians attributed to this Author, has ſo plainly explained all the Attributes of God, that it is viſible, it was compoſed by an Author who was no Stranger to the Chriſtian Religion. Syneſius cites the Oracles of Zoroaſter, upon the Dreams that are taken out of the Works of the later Platoniſts. Theſe Oracles have been publiſh'd by Opſopæus, and printed at Paris 1599. with the Notes of Pſellus and Plato. 'Tis no difficult matter to diſcover, that theſe Writings have been forged by the Platoniſts, that lived ſince our Bleſſed Saviour.

(b) Sanchoniathon.] This Author was unknown to all the Ancients. Porphyry is the firſt Man that cited this Hiſtory, which is full of Fables and ridiculous Fictions. Whatever we there find concerning the Origine of the World, and the firſt Men, is taken out of Geneſis. From thence he has borrowed the Word Bohu to ſignifie Night, and that of Colpia, which is given to the Wind; as for what he ſays of the Æora, and of the Firſtborn, it looks very like the Dreams of the Valentinians. Laſtly, he takes ſeveral things out of the Fables of the Greeks, which evidently ſhew, that the Author of this Book could not live in the time of Semiramis. [Mr. Dodwell has writ an Engliſh Diſcourſe, to prove that this Book could not be older than Philo Byblius, who is ſaid to Tranſlate it out of the Phœnician Language.]

(c) Philo Byblius.] This Man was a Grammarian, of whom mention is made in Suidas, who lived after Nero's time, for 'tis obſerved, that he was 78 Years old, when Servus and Herennius were Conſuls, which was A. D. 137. that is almoſt an hundred Years after the Death of Nero. According to the Teſtimony of the ſame Suidas, he wrote twelve Books, Περὶ πλίνθων, ἢ ἑλλογῆς βιβλίων, and thirty Books, Περὶ πολέων, Et de Claris viris; and one Treatiſe about Adrian's Empire, under which he lived. Suidas does not ſpeak of this Tranſlation of the Hiſtory of Phœnicia, Euſebius and Theodoret cite it after Porphyry. This Philo is probably the Man, of whom St. Clement of Alexandria ſpeaks, lib. 1. Strom. and whom he calls Philo the Pythagorean.

SECT. V.

Concerning the Authors of the Books of the New Teſtament.

THE Goſpel in the Greek Language ſignifies (a) Happy Tydings, but now this Word, in the common acceptation of the Church, is taken for the Hiſtory of the Life of Jeſus Chriſt; and the Name (b) of Evangeliſt, that was heretofore given to all thoſe Perſons that preached the Word of God, is at preſent only given to the four Saints that wrote the four Goſpels, which the Church has always owned for Canonical. We there find two Apoſtles, that were Eye-witneſſes of the Life and Actions of Jeſus Chriſt; and two Diſciples of the Apoſtles, who wrote their Goſpel upon the relation of others.

The firſt of the four Evangeliſts is St. Matthew, who of a Publican became an Apoſtle of our bleſſed Saviour: He wrote his Goſpel in Jeruſalem ſoon after the Death of Jeſus Chriſt (c), in favour of the Jews that embraced the Chriſtian Faith, as St. Jerome has obſerved. (d) For this reaſon he wrote in Hebrew, or rather in Syriack, according to the Teſtimony of Papias, St. Irenæus, Euſebius, St. Jerome, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Epiphanius, and indeed of almoſt all the Ancients, whoſe poſitive Determinations we ought not to reject, unleſs we have convincing Proofs to the contrary.

Therefore the Opinion of Cajetan and ſome others, who pretend, that the Original of St. Matthew's Goſpel was written in Greek, is rejected with reaſon by all the learned Criticks, as being eſtabliſhed upon very weak Foundations. St. Jerome aſſures us, that in his own time he ſaw an Hebrew copy of this Goſpel in the Library at Cæſarea, and that the Nazarenes likewiſe had a copy of it in the City of Beræa, which they gave him the liberty to tranſcribe; and that it was remarkable, that all the paſſages out of the Old Teſtament, cited in this Goſpel, were exactly according to the Hebrew, and not according to the Septuagint. Euſebius alſo tells us, that Pantænus found a copy of it amongſt the Indians, but it is not certain, whether that was not a copy of the Goſpel of the Nazarenes, which was different from that of St. Matthew. However it be, 'tis paſt diſpute, that the Original Hebrew of St. Matthew's Goſpel is loſt at preſent; and it is equally certain, that the Hebrew Texts, that have been publiſhed in our time, are not the Original of St Matthew (e), no more than the Syriack Verſion publiſhed by Widmanſtadius: The Greek Verſion, which we have, is very ancient, and was extant even in the time of the Apoſtles, as St. Jerome and St. Auſtin have obſerved. We cannot tell who is the Author of it: Some Perſons, as for inſtance, St. Athanaſius in his Book Entituled, The Abridgment of Scripture, attribute it to St. James Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Theophylact to St. John; Papias ſays, that they tranſlated into Greek, as well as they could, without naming in particular any Author of that Verſion.

(f) The Evangeliſt St. Mark, the Diſciple and Interpreter of St. Peter, and Founder of the Church of Alexandria, ſeems to be different from that Mark, who is ſo often mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and in the Epiſtles of St. Paul. (g) He compoſed his Goſpel at Rome with St. Peter, at the intreaty of the Chriſtians reſiding in that City, ſetting down in Writing thoſe things which he had learned from that Apoſtle, who alſo approved of his Goſpel after it was compoſed. (h) Some late Authors imagine, that it was written in Latin, but this Opinion is contrary to St. Jerom's and St. Auſtin's Opinion, and indeed has no tolerable pretences to ſupport it, for we can no more doubt that St. Mark wrote it in Greek, than that St. Luke or St. John did theirs. He follows St. Matthew in abundance of things, and ſometimes ſometimes abridges him, nevertheleſs there are ſome Hiſtorical Paſſages which he relates more copiouſly, and with the addition of ſeveral Circumſtances. 'Tis commonly believed, that this Goſpel was written in the Forty third Year after our Saviour's Birth, and, according to the common Computation, ten years after his Death, but this is not certain. St. Jerome obſerves, that the laſt Chapter of this Goſpel is to be found but in very few Copies, and that almoſt all the Greeks reject it. Wherefore, ſays he, one may reject it, particularly becauſe it ſeems to relate ſome things contrary to the account we have of them in the other Evangeliſts. And in his ſecond Book againſt the Pelagians, he cites a Paſſage that was inſerted into this Chapter, and contained the Error of the Manichees: It plainly proceeds from this addition, that in moſt of the Copies of St. Mark, this Chapter was entirely left out; for as for the reſt, it is cited by St. Irenæus, and ſeveral others, and contains nothing that cannot be reconciled with eaſe to the Accounts given by the other Evangeliſts.

St. Luke was of Antioch, the Metropolitical City of Syria. (i) He was a Phyſician by Profeſſion, and very well skilled in the Greek Tongue; (k) he was not an Apoſtle or Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, but was a Diſciple or Follower of St. Paul, whom he accompanied in his Voyages. He himſelf tells us, ſays Euſebius, in the beginning of his Goſpel, the reaſon of his writing, for many Perſons having raſhly undertaken to write the Evangelick Hiſtory, he thought himſelf obliged to reſcue it out of ill Hands, after he had been exactly informed of all the Occurrences by thoſe that were Eye-witneſſes and Miniſters of the Word, that is to ſay, by the Apoſtles, and particularly by St. Paul. 'Tis imagined, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of this Goſpel, when he ſays, according to my Goſpel, and that he meant St. Luke when he wrote this paſſage. The Brother whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel in all Churches, Cujus laus eſt in Evangelio per omnes Eccleſias. St. Jerome obſerves, that he wrote his Goſpel travelling along with St. Paul, when he was in Achaia and Bœotia, towards the ſecond year of Nero, and the fifty ſixth of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſame Father aſſures us, that he always continued unmarried, and that he lived Fourſcore and four years. He is alſo the Author of the Acts of the Apoſtles, which Book contains the Hiſtory of the Church from the Aſcenſion of our Bleſſed Saviour to the fourth year of Nero, during the ſpace of 29 or 30 years.

St. John the Evangeliſt of the City of Bethſaida in Galilee, was the Son of Zebedee, and was called to the Apoſtleſhip when he was very young. St. Jerome and Tertullian affirm, that he continued in the ſtate of Celibacy all his Life-time. He was the dearly beloved Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, and 'tis ſuppoſed, that he ſpeaks of himſelf, when he ſays, the Diſciple whom Jeſus loved: But though this were not to be thus underſtood, yet the tenderneſs which Jeſus Chriſt had for him, ſufficiently appeared in the laſt Supper, when he placed him in his Boſom, and in his laſt words to his Mother, Woman, behold thy Son. After the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, he went and preached the Goſpel in Aſia, where he founded and governed the Churches for a long time, being Biſhop of Epheſus, the Metropolis of that Province. He was condemned at Rome by the Emperor Domitian to be thrown into a Veſſel of burning Oyl, but he came out, ſays Tertullian, more vigorous and ſtrong, than when he entred in at firſt. He was baniſhed afterwards into the Iſle of Patmos, where, as 'tis generally ſuppoſed, he wrote his Revelation. After the death of Domitian he came back to Epheſus, and there wrote his Goſpel, about an hundred years after the Birth of our Bleſſed Saviour. St. Jerome reports, that he was engaged in this Work by the other Biſhops and Chriſtians of Aſia, who obliged him to write his Goſpel, to confound the Errors of Cerinthus and Ebion, who ſaid, that Jeſus Chriſt was a mere Man, and that He had no Being before He was born of the Virgin Mary. The ſame Father adds, that he had yet another reaſon to write his Goſpel after others, for having read the Goſpels of St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St Luke, he obſerved, that they only concerned themſelves to write the Hiſtory of one year of our Bleſſed Saviour's Life, namely, from the impriſonment of St John, down to the Death of our Saviour, which made him reſolve to give an account of the moſt conſiderable things that occurred in the preceding years. He has likewiſe written three Epiſtles. The firſt, of which no Man ever doubted, is directed to the Faithful, and particularly to the Parthians, if we may believe St. Auſtin, and ſome other ancient Writers, that is to ſay, to all the Faithful diſperſed in Perſia, which at that time was under the Domination of the Parthians. We don't certainly know the time or place where it was written. The two others were directed to particular Perſons, one to a Lady called Electa, the other to Gaius. They only carry the Name of an Elder or Prieſt; which has made ſome People of opinion, that they were written by another St. John, as Euſebius and St. Jerome obſerve. But the Stile, the Spirit, and Thoughts of theſe Epiſtles, together with the concurring authority of moſt of the Fathers, make it evident, that they belong to this Evangeliſt. There is a greater difficulty about the Apocalypſe, the ſtile of which Book appears to be different from the reſt, and which ſeveral of the Ancients rejected, or attributed to another St. John: but the moſt received opinion is, that it was written by the Evangeliſt. The Stile of St. John is ſimple, and has little eloquence in it, but his Thoughts are very lofty. He lived till the time of Trajan, not dying 'till the 68th year after the Paſſion of our Bleſſed Saviour.

St. Paul deſcended of the Tribe of Benjamin, and born in the City of Tarſus, came up to Jeruſalem, and there became the Diſciple of Gamaliel, a famous Phariſee. He was converted to the faith of Jeſus Chriſt in that miraculous manner which is ſet down in the Acts of the Apoſtles; he afterwards changed his Name of Saul into that of Paul, after he had openly converted and baptized the Proconſul Sergius Paulus. The Hiſtory of his Travels and Preaching, down to his firſt impriſonment at Rome, is written by St. Luke in the Acts. We don't certainly know, what he did after his enlargement; ſome of the Ancients were of opinion, that he went into Spain, but this is very uncertain, and the contrary ſeems to be more probable. Be that as it will, 'tis certain, that he was beheaded afterwards at Rome for his Religion, by Nero's Command, towards the 64th year of the common computation. He has written 14 Epiſtles, all which, Antiquity has own'd to be Genuine and Canonical, excepting the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, concerning which, there has been formerly ſome doubt, and ſome Perſons have ſuppoſed, that it was written in Hebrew. They are not ranked in the New Teſtament according to the order of time, which nevertheleſs is very neceſſary to be known.

The Epiſtle to the Romans was written from Corinth, as Origen proves by ſeveral reaſons; for firſt of all it was ſent by Phœbe Servant of the Church at Cenchrea from Corinth. Secondly, St. Paul calls Caius his Hoſt, with whom he tarried at Corinth, as we may ſee in the Firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. 14. Thirdly, in the Salutations, that are to be found towards the end of this Epiſtle, we find the Names of thoſe who departed from Corinth to go to Jeruſalem, as it is ſaid in the 20th ch. of the Acts. It was therefore written at the time, when St. Paul, having gathered the Contributions of Macedonia, and Achaia, went to viſit Jeruſalem in the 57th year of Jeſus Chriſt. From whence St. Chryſoſtome concludes, that it was written after both the Epiſtles to the Corinthians, in which he exhorts the Faithful to this charitable Contribution.

Nevertheleſs they were not written much before: For the firſt was written from Epheſus, as it appears, ch. 16. v. 8. (and not from Philippi, as ſome Greek Inſcriptions obſerve) in the abſence of Timothy. The ſecond was written from Macedonia after his return. In ſome Copies it is ſaid, that it was written from Philippi, in others from Nicopolis.

That to the Galatians is yet older than the two Epiſtles to the Corinthians. It was written from Epheſus, at the time when St. Paul taught in the School of one ſirnamed Tyrannus in the beginning of the year 56. It is obſerved in ſome Greek Copies, that it was written from Rome, but this is not probable, becauſe he does not there ſpeak concerning his Chains, as he does in his Epiſtle to the Epheſians, where he mentions them in three ſeveral places.

This Epiſtle therefore was written towards the 62d year of our Lord, as well as that to the Philippians, and that other which is directed to the Chriſtians of Coloſſæ, a City of Phrygia near Hierapolis and Laodicea.

The two Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians ſeem to be the earlieſt, if we follow the Chronological order. It is probable, that the firſt was written towards the year 52; for after St. Paul had converted many Chriſtians at Theſſalonica, as it is obſerved in the Acts, ch. 9. v. 7. he ſent Timothy thither, who being come to find him at Corinth, informed him of their Affairs, as it is obſerved in the third Chapter of this Epiſtle, which was conſequently written in the year 52. The ſecond Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians was written ſoon after, and from the ſame place.

The firſt Epiſtle to Timothy was written after he was ordained Biſhop, when St. Paul was freed from his Chains in the ſixty third year of our Bleſſed Saviour. The ſecond Epiſtle was written from Rome, when St. Paul was twice impriſoned there, a little before his Martyrdom. The Epiſtle to Titus was written about the ſame time with the firſt Epiſtle to Timothy. That to Philemon was written at the time of his firſt impriſonment at Rome.

And to conclude, the Epiſtle to the Hebrews was written likewiſe about this time, ſince it is there obſerved, ch. 13. v. 23. that Timothy was delivered. Some of the Fathers, as Cains, and Hippolytus, and the ancient Church of Rome, have rejected this Epiſtle. Others attribute it to St. Barnabas, ſome to St. Clement, and ſome to St. Luke; but however (p) the moſt prevailing opinion is, that it was written by St. Paul. St. Jerome ſeems to accommodate theſe differences, by ſaying, that the thoughts belong to St. Paul, but that the words and compoſition are either St. Barnabas's or St. Luke's, or rather St. Clement's, who diligently collected whatever he learn'd from his Maſter. Thoſe ancient Writers that attribute it to St. Paul, ſay, that it was written in Hebrew, that is to ſay, in Syriack (q), being written by an Hebrew, to the Hebrews. Some of the Moderns pretend it was written in Greek, but to this Authority of the Ancients, they oppoſe nothing but frivolous weak Conjectures, which are too weak to biaſs any Man.

The Epiſtles that follow thoſe of St. Paul, are called General, becauſe, if we except the two laſt of St. John, they are not directed to the Faithful of one City, as thoſe of St. Paul are, but to Chriſtians diſperſed in ſeveral Countries.

The Epiſtle of St. James was not written by James the Son of Zebedee the Brother of John, but by St. James the Brother of St. Jude the Apoſtle, and (r) Couſin of our bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and Biſhop of Jeruſalem. For it cannot belong to the other St. James, ſince it is directed to Chriſtians out of Judæa, whereas he ſuffer'd Martyrdom, before the Goſpel was preached in any other place than Judæa.

St. Peter the chief of the Apoſtles has written two Epiſtles; the firſt that has been received as Canonical by all the Ancients (ſ) was written from Babylon. Some of the Ancients were of opinion, that the City of Rome was meant by this name, but the Senſe is not natural. We cannot preciſely aſſign the time when it was written, but certain it is, that it was ſent, after the Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt were called Chriſtians at Antioch, that is to ſay, at leaſt nine years after the Death of our Bleſſed Saviour; for the name of Chriſtians is to be found there in the fourth Chapter. Now if thou art called a Chriſtian. Si autem Chriſtianus cognominaris. It is alſo probable, that it was written after St. Peter's being delivered out of Priſon, A. D. 44. for until that time he continued for the moſt part in Judæa. Some believe, that it was written towards the end of his Life, becauſe it does not ſeem to have been written long before the ſecond Epiſtle, but this is not certain: One may ſay, that it was written at Babylon in the 45th year of Jeſus Chriſt.

The ſecond was probably written towards the end of his Life, becauſe he there teſtifies, that he expected Death very ſuddenly, ch. 1. v. 14. Some of the Fathers have doubted, whether this Letter was written by St. Peter, becauſe the ſtile of it is ſo extremely different from that of the former, as St. Jerome obſerves; but St. Peter, diſcovers himſelf ſo plainly and openly there, that we cannot with the leaſt colour or pretence attribute it to any body elſe.

St. Jude the Apoſtle the Brother of James and Simon the Son of Alpheus, Sirnamed Thaddeus and Lebbeus, wrote the Epiſtle, that carries his Name, after the Death of moſt of the Apoſtles, as he teſtifies when he exhorts the Chriſtians to contend earneſtly for the Faith, which was once delivered to them by the Apoſtles. He imitates and follows the thoughts and deſign of the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, and even inſerts ſome of his words into his own.

NOTES.

(a) THE Goſpel ſignifies in Greek happy tidings.] Εὐαγγέλιον is derived from the Particle εὖ that ſignifies well, and the Verb ἀγγέλλω that ſignifies to tell. 'Tis to be found in Homer and Xenophon, but in another ſenſe, viz. 'tis taken for the recompence which is given a Man for carrying good news. Tully has uſed this term in this ſenſe in one of his Epiſtles to Atticus.

(b) The word Evangeliſt, that was heretofore given to all thoſe that preached the Word of God.] Act. 21. v. 18. Philip is called an Evangeliſt. St. Paul in his 2d Epiſtle to Timothy, ch. 4. v. 5. beſeeches that Biſhop to do the work of an Evangeliſt. Opus fac Evangeliſtæ.

(c) Soon after the death of our Bleſſed Saviour.] This is the opinion of St. Jerome, and St. Epiphanius, who ſay, that he compoſed his Goſpel, before he went to preach to the Gentiles. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. ſeems to ſay the contrary, when he aſſures us, that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel for the Jews, and in the Language of the Jews, at the time when St. Peter and St. Paul founded the Church of Rome: But theſe words are not to be underſtood in the literal ſenſe.

(d) For this reaſon he wrote it in Hebrew, or rather in Syriack.] Papias cited by Euſebius, l. 3. of his Hiſtory, Chapter the laſt. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. St. Jerome in his Preface to the Evangeliſts, in his Book of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and in ſeveral other places. Euſebius, l. 3. c. 18. the Author of the Work upon St. Matthew attributed to St. Chryſoſtome. St. Epiphanius, Hæreſ. 29. & 57. The Author of the Abridgment of Scripture, attributed to St. Athanaſius, St. Cyril, Catech. 14. St. Auſtin, l. 1. de Conſenſu Evangel. cap. 2. teſtifie, that the Goſpel of St. Matthew was written in Hebrew, that is to ſay, in Syriack. St. Irenæus and St. Jerome ſay that it was written in the Language of the Country, which was the Chaldee or Syriack Tongue mixt with Hebrew words, which is commonly called the Hebrew Tongue in the New Teſtament. St. Jerome tells us plainly, that the Goſpel of St. Matthew was written in this Tongue, for in his Commentary upon the 12th Chapter of this Goſpel, he ſays, that ſome Perſons were of opinion, that the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was the Original Hebrew of St. Matthew; and in his ſecond Dialogue againſt the Pelagians, he ſays, that the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was written in Chaldee or Syriack with Hebrew Characters. Thoſe that are of the contrary opinion, who maintain, that St. Matthew wrote it originally in Greek, as Grotius well obſerves, reject the unanimous Conſent of the Ancients without any appearance of Reaſon. Let us for once examine the Conjectures of a certain Author, that is of this opinion: He ſays, that the words Emanuel, Eli, Lamma Sabacthani, Aceldama, and other Syriack Terms are explained there; but this does not at all prove, that this Goſpel was not written in Syriack, for otherwiſe we ought to ſay, that ſeveral Books of the Old Teſtament were not written in Hebrew, becauſe even in thoſe Books we have the Hebrew Terms explained after the ſame manner; for example, Gen. 31. v. 49. Galaad, id eſt tumulus teſtis, 35. v. 18. Benoni, id eſt, filius doloris mei; Exod. 12. v. 11. Peſach, id eſt, tranſitus Domini; and 16. v. 15. Manhu, quod ſignificat quid eſt hoc. Theſe Explications are not to be found in the Hebrew, but have been added by the Interpreters; and we ought to make the ſame judgment of theſe paſſages in St. Matthew. They pretend ſtill, that theſe Fathers never ſaw the Original of St. Matthew, that they ſaid it was Hebrew, only becauſe the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was in Hebrew, which is extremely different from that of St. Matthew. To this it is anſwered, 1. That we cannot ſay this of the moſt ancient Fathers, as Papias, St. Irenæus, &c. 2. That although the Goſpel of the Nazarenes was different from that of St. Matthew, yet it might very well be taken from the Original of St. Matthew, in which the Hereticks had inſerted, and altered abundance of things.

(e) No more than the Syriack Verſion.] It is an eaſie matter to ſhew this, becauſe the Hebrew or Syriack words that are cited in the Greek of St. Matthew's Goſpel are different from thoſe of the Syriack, in the 27th Chapter in ſtead of Haceldama, he has Aguraſtadema; in ſtead of Cephos, he has Cepho; for Eli, Il; for Golgotha, Golgoutho; for Jaacob, Jaacoub; for Joſeph, Jouſeph. We likewiſe find there abundance of Greek words terminated after the Syriack manner, which makes it evident, that it was a Grecian that Tranſlated the Greek of St. Matthew into Syriack, and not the Original it ſelf of St. Matthew.

(f) The Evangeliſt St. Mark ſeems to be a different perſon from that Mark, who is ſo often mentioned in the Acts, &c.] He, of whom mention is made in the Acts, ch. 12. v. 12. and in ch. 15. v. 37, and 39, was Sirnamed John the Son of Mary. There is likewiſe mention made of one Mark the Couſin of Barnabas, Coloſſ. 4. v. 10. 'Tis very probable he is the ſame with the former, but the Evangeliſt in all appearance is a different Perſon: for beſides that he was not Sirnamed John, he was the Diſciple of St. Peter, and attending upon him, at the ſame time that the other was with St. Paul: he was likewiſe at Alexandria at the time when the other was with St. Paul at Rome. Some think, that St. Mark the Evangeliſt was one of the Seventy two Diſciples, but this is not certain enough to be relied upon; It is more probable, that he was converted to the Faith by St. Peter, who calls him his Son, and whoſe Diſciple and Interpreter he was.

(g) He compoſed his Goſpel when he was at Rome.] This is the opinion of all the Ancients. Papias in Euſebius, l. 2. c. 15. St. Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. St. Clement cited by St. Jerome, Tertullian, l. 4. Contra Marcionem, Euſebius, St. Jerome, &c. St. Irenæus tells us, that it was written after the death of St. Peter, others on the contrary unanimouſly affirm, that it was written whilſt he was living, and that he approved of it. Upon this account ſeveral Perſons have called it the Goſpel of St. Peter, as Tertullian obſerves.

(h) Some

(h) Some modern Authors imagine, that it was written in Latin.] Baronius ad ann. Chr. 45. n. 14. and thoſe that follow him without farther conſideration are of this opinion, but after all 'tis a Problem that cannot be maintained. St. Jerome in Epiſt. 125. to Damaſus, expreſly tells us, that all the New Teſtament, except St. Matthew's Goſpel, was written in Greek. And St. Auſtin, lib. de Conſenſu Evang. c. 2. tells us, that all the four Evangeliſts, except St. Matthew, wrote in Greek. The Latin St. Mark, which we now have, is certainly a Tranſlation of the Greek.

(i) St. Luke a Phyſician by profeſſion.] St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Coloſſ. Luke the beloved Phyſician greets you. Nicephorus, l. 2. c. 43. of his Hiſtory affirms, that he was an excellent Painter, and ſome People ſay, that he drew the Picture of the Virgin Mary, but theſe are fictions.

(k) He was neither of the number of the Apoſtles, nor of the Diſciples.] This is certainly true, becauſe he tells us, that what he wrote, he learnt from others. St. Irenæus, l. 1. c. 2. St. Jerome upon ch. 65. of Iſaiah, St. Auſtin, and ſeveral others poſitively ſay, that he was not a Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt. They are only ſome few modern Authors, that are pleaſed to beſtow this Character upon him.

(l) Cujus laus eſt in Evangelio per omnes Eccleſias.] We cannot certainly tell, whether the word Evangelium in this place ſignifies a Book of the Goſpel, or whether we are not rather to underſtand it thus, The Brother who deſerves praiſe for having preached the Goſpel. That which follows afterwards, and who was ordained to be the Companion of our Travels, made Baronius believe, that it is Silas, of whom we are to underſtand this paſſage. But St. Jerome, and St. Ambroſe in his Preface upon St. Luke do underſtand it of this Evangeliſt.

(m) He afterwards changed his name of Saul for that of Paul, after having converted and baptized the Proconſul Sergius Paulus.] The Author of the one and thirtieth Sermon, attributed to St. Ambroſe, tells us, that he changed his name at his Baptiſm, but this is but a groundleſs fancy, for in his time they gave no name to any body at their Baptiſm. Others ſay, that he changed his name, when he changed his profeſſion; and ſome pretend to affirm, that he had two Names. The moſt probable opinion is, that he took the name of Paul after the converſion of Sergius Paulus, for till that time he is conſtantly called Saul in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and afterwards he is always called by the name of Paul. It was the cuſtom of the Romans to give their own names to others in teſtimony of friendſhip; Joſephus for example received the name of Flavius from the Emperor Veſpaſian by way of Honour: [Or rather, becauſe having been once his Priſoner, he ſet him at Liberty: it being uſual for freed Men, to take their Patrons Prænomen.]

(n) Some Authors pretend, that he went into Spain, but this is very uncertain.] St. Athanaſius in his Epiſtle to Dracontius, St. Cyril, Cat. 17. St. Epiphanius, Hæreſ. 27. St. Chryſoſtome in Ep. ad Hebr. and in Matth. 76. and Homil. de laud. Pauli, Theodoret in Ep. ad Timot. c. ult. Hier. in 11. Iſ. Greg. moral. l. 3. c. 22. Iſidore, Bede, Ado, &c. are of this opinion. All theſe Authors lived after the third Century, but before that time nothing is written concerning it, and beſides they don't ſpeak of it as a certain thing, but only as a probable conjecture. St. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans, c. 15. v. 24. promiſes, that he would go into Spain, but though it follows from thence, that he had a deſign of going thither, yet we cannot rationally conclude, that he was ever there. Pope Gelatius, and Innocent the firſt tell us, that he did not perform that promiſe, and it is very certain, that the Goſpel was preached ſomewhat later on this ſide the Alpes.

(o) In the year 61 according to the vulgar computation.] All Authors are agreed, that St Paul was beheaded at Rome, but however they are not agreed about the year. Some of them tell us, that he ſuffered Martyrdom with St. Peter, others place it a year, and ſome two years lower; ſome pretend, that this happened in the laſt year of Nero's Reign, which was the ſixty eighth of our Bleſſed Saviour; but moſt Men think, that St. Peter and St. Paul ſuffered Martyrdom at the time of Nero's Perſecution, which began in the fourth year of that Emperor, after the burning of Rome, Anno Dom. 63. and therefore according to this account theſe two Princes of the Apoſtles ſuffered Martyrdom in the 64th year of the Vulgar Æra.

(p) The moſt received opinion is, that it was written by St. Paul.] This opinion ſeems to be the moſt probable. The Epiſtle to the Hebrews does not belong to St. Barnabas, having a different Title from that of this Apoſtle. There is no reaſon to attribute it to St. Luke. The ſtyle and the thoughts very much reſemble thoſe of St. Clement in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians: and upon this account I am apt to believe, that we ought to attribute the Compoſition or Tranſlation of it rather to him than any other, although it is written in the name of St. Paul, and by that Apoſtle: for it was written at Rome by a Perſon that enjoyed his liberty, and who had Timothy for his Collegue. Theſe three Characters ſhew plainly, that it was written by St. Paul, who did not put his name to it for fear of offending the Jews, who were prejudiced againſt him. Grotius believes, that it was written after the taking of Jeruſalem, becauſe it is obſerved, ſays he, in the third Chapter, that there were certain Chriſtians, who ſuppoſed the Day of Judgment was very near; an Opinion that was not common till after Jeruſalem was taken, but this is a bare conjecture upon weak grounds. St. Jerome anſwers the uſual Objection about the diverſity of ſtile, that is alledged to prove, that this Epiſtle was not written by St. Paul, by ſaying, that it was occaſioned either by him that compoſed it under St. Paul, or elſe by the Interpreter. [But if Mr. Lowth's Opinion be true, the Controverſy muſt be at an end: For in his Vindication of the Authority of the Holy Scriptures againſt the five Letters publiſhed by the Anſwerers of Mr. Simon, p. 24. He ſays, that St. Peter quotes the 37th Verſe of the 10th Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, in the 15th verſe of the 2d Chapter of his 2d Epiſtle, where he ſays that St. Paul often ſaid thoſe things which the unlearned and unſtable wreſt as well as the other Scriptures to their own deſtruction.]

(q) In Hebrew to the Hebrews.] St. Clemens Alexandrinus is of another opinion, as alſo St. Jerome, Theodoret, Oecumenius, and ſeveral others. Eſtius, and ſome of the moderns believe, that it was written in Greek, 1. becauſe the Scriptures there cited follow the Septuagint, and not the Hebrew; 2. becauſe there is no probability that the Copy ſhould be loſt. Theſe reaſons are exceeding weak, for ſuppoſe the Citations are not to be charged upon the Interpreter, yet, why might not St. Paul, when he was writing in the Syriack Tongue, tranſlate the Septuagint into that Language, rather than cite the Hebrew Text, ſince the Septuagint was more familiar to him? This may ſerve by way of anſwer to the firſt Reaſon. The ſecond is yet weaker, for why might not the Hebrew Copy of this Epiſtle be loſt, as well as the Original Hebrew of the Goſpel of St. Matthew?

(r) But of St. James the Brother of the Apoſtle St. Jude, and Couſin of our Bleſſed Saviour.] This James is he, that is called in the Goſpel the Son of Alpheus, for there were but two in all: He is called the Brother of our Lord, either becauſe he was the Son of Joſeph by another Wife, or becauſe he was very nearly related to him.

(ſ) It was written from Babylon.] Euſebius, l. 2. c. 5. of his Hiſtory ſays, that it is Rome that St. Peter calls Babylon in this place. Some have thought that Papias and St. Clemens, cited by Euſebius, were of this opinion, but he does not cite them upon this Subject. St. Jerome received this opinion from Euſebius, and carried it farther with ſtrong Reaſons. Tho' after all this Interpretation is falſe, and it is more natural to ſay, that he wrote this Epiſtle from Babylon.

(t) St. Peter diſcovers himſelf ſo plainly there, that we cannot with the leaſt colour attribute it to any other Author.] The Author of this Epiſtle tells us, that he was with Jeſus Chriſt upon the Mountain, he calls St. Paul his Brother, and makes himſelf Author of a former Epiſtle written to the ſame Perſons. Now all this agrees very well to St Peter, and it is viſible, that he, who compoſed it, was no Impoſtor. The Character of this Epiſtle is perfectly Apoſtolical, and the Style is not ſenſibly different from that of the firſt.

SECT. VI.

Of the Canon of the Books of the New Teſtament, and particularly of thoſe Books that were formerly doubted of.

THE firſt Canon of the Holy Books of the New Teſtament was not compoſed by any Aſſembly, or by any one Perſon in particular, but by the Unanimous Conſent of all the Churches, that were agreed upon the Authority of certain Books, and conſidered them as Sacred and Divine. 'Twas this Conſent of all the Churches, that in the Primitive Times ſerved for a Rule to diſtinguiſh the Canonical Books from thoſe that were Doubtful and Suppoſititious. 'Tis in purſuance of this Rule that Euſebius, who is the firſt Man that made an exact Enquiry into theſe Matters, diſtinguiſhes three ſorts of Books that belong in ſome manner to the New Teſtament. The firſt Claſs comprehends thoſe, that have been always received by the Unanimous Agreement of all Churches, ſuch as the four Goſpels, the fourteen Epiſtles of St. Paul, if we except that of the Hebrews, (which ſome Authors did not number amongſt the reſt, becauſe they ſuppoſed it was not St. Paul's,) and the firſt Epiſtles of St. Peter and St. John. The ſecond Claſs comprehends thoſe, that having not been received by the whole Catholick Church, yet nevertheleſs were looked upon by ſome as Canonical Books, and cited as Books of Scripture by Eccleſiaſtical Authors. But this Claſs does yet branch it ſelf into two Diviſions, for ſome of theſe Books have been ſince received by all the Churches, and acknowledged for Genuine, ſuch as the Epiſtle of St. James, the Epiſtle of St. Jude, the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, the ſecond and third Epiſtle of St. John: The other on the contrary have been univerſally rejected, either as Spurious, or unworthy to be placed in the number of Canonical Books, though they might otherwiſe be uſeful enough, ſuch as the Book of the Paſtor, the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas, the Goſpel according to the Ægyptians, another according to the Hebrews, the Acts of St. Paul, the Revelation of St. Peter. In ſhort, the laſt Claſs contains thoſe Books that were deviſed by the Hereticks, and were always diſowned by the Church, ſuch as the Goſpels of St. Thomas and of St. Peter, &c. As for what concerns the Apocalypſe, of which we have not as yet diſcourſed, Euſebius obſerves that ſome Perſons place it in the firſt Claſs, that is to ſay, in the number of thoſe Books that are unqueſtionably Canonical, and that others reckon it amongſt the Books of the ſecond Claſs.

This obſervation of Euſebius, which is confirmed by the Teſtimonies of the Ancients, whom he cites in ſeveral places of his Hiſtory, ſhews, that the Canon of the Books of the New Teſtament was almoſt the very ſame in all Times: For although there were ſome of the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, that at firſt were not received by an Unanimous Conſent of all Churches, yet they were always conſidered as Books of great Authority, and ſoon after they received the ſame Authority with the reſt. This is confirmed by the ancient Catalogues of the Holy Books of the New Teſtament, where the Books, which we receive at preſent, are compriſed: You will find all of them, except the Revelation, in the Canon of the Council of Laodicea, which St. Cyril of Jeruſalem follows. They are all received by St. Athanaſius, St. Jerome, St. Gregory Nazianzen, by Amphilochius, the Council of Carthage, the Council at Rome, by Pope Innocent, and all the other Greek and Latin Authors ſince Euſebius. They are all cited as Holy Books by thoſe Authors that lived neareſt the time of the Apoſtles. In ſhort, 'tis beyond Controverſie, as we have already demonſtrated above, that theſe Books were written by thoſe Perſons, whoſe Names they bear: The Epiſtles themſelves that were formerly queſtioned, contain nothing diſagreeable to the Faith and Doctrine contained in the other Books, that have been received and acknowledged by all the Churches from the beginning.

The Epiſtle to the Hebrews has been received as Canonical, with the Conſent of almoſt all Churches. They were only a few Latins that queſtion'd its Authority, becauſe they did not believe it to be written by St. Paul: But although it was not compoſed by him, which is not probable, as we have already ſhewn, yet it ought nevertheleſs to paſs for Canonical, it being a conſtantly received Tradition, that it was written by one of his Diſciples, and that it was owned by almoſt all the Churches of the World, as ſoon as it appeared in publick. It is cited by Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Tertullian and Origen, by St. Cyprian, and all thoſe that came after, as a Writing undoubtedly Canonical. We cannot find out the particular Author, that queſtioned the Epiſtle of St. James as doubtful; it is cited by all the Ancients, and placed in the number of Canonical Books in all the Catalogues that we have. The ſame Obſervation may be made upon the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Peter, which was certainly written by that Author, as we have elſewhere ſhewn. It is cited by St. Auſtin, by Origen, and by many other ancient Writers. The Epiſtle of St. Jude was rejected by ſome, not becauſe they had any lawful Grounds to doubt that St. Jude was the Author of it, but only becauſe there is a Citation out of the Book of Enoch to be found there: And yet notwithſtanding that, it was ſet down in the ancient Catalogues of the Books of the New Teſtament, and it has been cited by Tertullian, by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Origen, by St. Cyprian, by St. Gregory Nazianzen, and by ſeveral other Authors. St. Jerome tells us, that although ſeveral rejected it, by reaſon of the Citations out of the Books of Enoch; yet it was received in his time, becauſe it was ancient, and approved by the uſage of the Church, Autoritatem vetuſtate jam, & uſu meruit. The two laſt Epiſtles of St. John being very ſhort, and containing nothing that is diſagreeable to what we find in the firſt, cannot occaſion any difficulty. They are written without queſtion by the Author of the firſt, as may plainly be proved by the likeneſs of Style: The ſecond is cited by St. Irenæus in his firſt Book, ch. 12. and in the third Book, chap. 18. by Tertullian, by Origen, by St. Dionyſius of Alexandria, and by many others. In a word, they are both of them reckoned in the number of Canonical Books in all the ancient Catalogues of the Volumns of the New Teſtament.

Nothing more remains for me to diſcourſe of but the Apocalypſe, which ſome of the Ancients, according to the Teſtimony of Euſebius, placed in the rank of indubitable Books, others in the number of doubtful Books, or rather ſpurious. It was rejected by Caius an ancient Prieſt of Rome, who attributed it to the Heretick Cerinthus, as Euſebius teſtifies in the third Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 28. On the contrary, St. Juſtin, St. Irenæus, Origen, St. Cyprian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian, cite it in abundance of places, and attribute it to St. John the Evangeliſt. St. Dionyſius of Alexandria obſerves, that ſeveral Perſons before him diſowned and confuted the Apocalypſe as a Book full of Fictions and Falſities, but that many others approved of it; that as for himſelf he durſt not preſume to reject it, that he believed it had a hidden meaning, but that he was fully perſuaded it was not written by St. John, as he endeavours to prove by ſeveral Reaſons. St. Jerome tells us in his 129th Epiſtle, that in his time the greater part of the Greek Churches did not receive this Book, no more than the Latins did the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, but that he received both the one and the other, not minding the Cuſtom of his own Time, but the Authority of the Ancients. Amphilochius alſo obſerves, that in his time ſome received it, but that there were great numbers that rejected it, and indeed it is not to be found, as we have already taken notice in the Catalogue of the Council of Laodicea, nor in that of St. Cyril. But it has been ſince acknowledged by the Greek and Latin Churches, and cited by St. Epiphanius, by St. Chryſoſtome, by St. Ambroſe, by St. Hilary, by St. Jerome, by St. Auſtin, and by all thoſe that have written ſince. It was reckoned amongſt the Canonical Books by the Council of Carthage, by the Roman Council under Gelaſius, and by Pope Innocent. The fourth Council of Toledo held in the year 633, in the ſixteenth Canon has determined, That it was written by St. John, and that it ought to be placed in the number of the Holy Books. And the Council of Trent, by whoſe Deciſions we ought to be determined, reckons is amongſt the Canonical Books of the New Teſtament.

We ought here to diſcourſe a little concerning the Apocryphal Books of the New Teſtament, that were forged either by the Catholicks or Hereticks. But theſe not being of the number of Canonical Books, ought to be ranged amongſt the Books of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers: Wherefore we will now begin our Library of Eccleſiaſtical Authors with them.

New Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory

OF THE

Firſt three Centuries of Chriſtianity:

CONTAINING

An Account of the LIVES and WRITINGS of the Primitive FATHERS, with Cenſures upon all their BOOKS, determining which are Genuine, and which Spurious.

Of the Letter ſuppoſed to be ſent by Jeſus Chriſt to King Agbarus, and of that of Agbarus to Jeſus Chriſt.

The Letters of Jeſus Chriſt and Agbarus.

EUSEBIUS gives us an Account in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, of a certain King of Edeſſa (a), named Agbarus (b), who having heard the report of the Miracles that were wrought by Jeſus Chriſt, ſent a Letter to him, the purport whereof was, To intreat him to cure a Diſtemper with which he was afflicted: And that our Saviour did not then grant his Requeſt, but wrote a Letter back to him, wherein he promiſed to ſend one of his Diſciples to heal him: And laſtly, that St. Thomas the Apoſtle immediately after the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, deputed Thaddeus one of the 72 Diſciples, who went and performed the promiſe that had been made by our Saviour to Cure his Diſeaſe, and at the ſame time Converted him, together with his whole Family. Euſebius grounds his ſtory upon the Letters of Jeſus Chriſt, and Agbarus, which were taken out of the Archives of the Church of Edeſſa, which he likewiſe produceth Tranſlated out of Syriack into Greek. Now it is probable, that Euſebius credited thoſe Records that were exhibited to him too eaſily, as alſo, that theſe Letters are forged, and that this whole Hiſtory is fabulous. For firſt, how can it be imagined that the King of Edeſſa, upon the bare rehearſal of the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhould addreſs himſelf to him, as one that was convinced of his Divinity, and inſtructed in the Principles of his Religion: Having heard (ſays he) of the Miracles which thou haſt wrought, I am perſwaded that thou art God, or the Son of God. It is evident, that theſe Words could not be written but by a Perſon already perſwaded and trained up in the Doctrine of Chriſtianity, who makes Agbarus ſpeak almoſt the ſame Expreſſions as he himſelf would have uſed on the like occaſion. The following Words that are likewiſe attributed to this King, viz. That being informed, that the JEWS laid Snares for Jeſus Chriſt, he deſigned to moleſt them, and invited him to come to his City, which, although it were ſmall, might be ſufficient for them both, more clearly demonſtrate the falſhood of this Letter: For who can believe, that a King ſhould offer the Moiety of his Kingdom at once, to a Man that was altogether unknown to him?

The Letters of Jeſus Chriſt and Agbarus.

Neither is it more difficult to diſcover the forging of the other Letter that is attributed to Jeſus Chriſt, beginning with theſe Words; Thou art happy, Agbarus, for having believed in me, without ſeeing me; for it is written of me, That they that ſee me ſhall not believe in me, to the end, that they that believe on me without ſeeing me, may receive Eternal Life. To what purpoſe are theſe Words written? Is it not apparent, that he that compoſed this Letter, alludes to the expreſſion of Jeſus Chriſt to St. Thomas, happy are they that have not ſeen, and yet have believed? Which Words being not ſpoken by our Saviour till after his Reſurrection, nor written till a long time after, it evidently appears that this Letter is counterfeit.

(b) Named Agbarus.] Others read Abgarus, and he is ſo called in ſome ancient Medals; but it is written Agbarus in the moſt correct Manuſcripts, and it is pronounced ſo in Arabick.

The Hiſtory, which is afterwards produced concerning theſe two Letters, and taken from the ſame Archives, is no leſs fabulous. It is reported that Jude the Apoſtle (c), who is alſo called Thomas, ſent Thaddeus the Apoſtle, one of the 72 Diſciples, to King Agbarus: That this Prince, being inform'd, that there was a Man in his City that wrought many miracles, and doubting whether he were not the Diſciple whom Jeſus Chriſt had promiſed to ſend, gave orders to one named Tobias to bring him into his Preſence: And that he had no ſooner ſeen him, but his Countenance ſeeming to him to be Divine, he proſtrated himſelf at his Feet to worſhip him, deſiring to know, whether he were that Diſciple whom Jeſus Chriſt had promiſed to ſend to cure his Diſtemper. Thaddeus having anſwered that he was, and that if he believed in Jeſus Chriſt, he ſhould be ſaved, Agbarus replied, I have believed ſo firmly in him, that I intended to proclaim War againſt the Jews who Crucified him, and utterly to deſtroy that Nation; if the fear of the Roman Empire had not deterred me from this Undertaking. Certainly the Perſon (whoſoever he be) that cauſed this petty Prince of Edeſſa to utter theſe Words, was endued with very little judgment, in inſcribing to him a Deſign ſo extravagant as this; for is it not an egregious piece of folly to imagine, that a Prince only of one ſingle City ſhould undertake to maintain a War againſt a Nation ſo powerful as that of the Jews, and ſhould hope to deſtroy it, to revenge the Death of a Man, whom he knew only by hear-ſay? What prohabbility is there, that nothing but the fear of the Romans was able to divert him from ſo raſh an Attempt? I ſhall not proceed to make any Reflection on the other Circumſtances of this Relation, which appear to be no leſs fabulous than thoſe that we have even now recited: I ſhall only add, that the time wherein it is affirmed that theſe Occurrences happened, ſhews this whole Hiſtory to be Supoſititious. They take notice at the end of this Record, that theſe Things were Tranſlated into the 430th Year of the Edeſſenian Æra, now the 430th Year of the Edeſſenians is the 15th of Tiberius, in which the Ancients believed that Jeſus Chriſt died and roſe again. And we muſt ſay according to this Epocha, and what we find recorded in the Acts, that this happened immediately after our Saviour's Reſurrection, and that Agbarus, and ſeveral other Gentiles of Edeſſa, received the Goſpel before Cornelius, which is plainly contrary to the Acts of the Apoſtles; and conſequently we may be certain that this Hiſtory is falſe, and that theſe Letters are forged. The Authority of Euſebius is not to be regarded in this caſe, ſince it is evident, that he hath too raſhly given credit to the Memorials that were tranſmitted to him taken from the Archives of the Church of Edeſſa. And none can be ignorant, that this ſort of Records ought not too much to be relied on, eſpecially with reſpect to Hiſtories of ſuch a nature.

The Letters of Jeſus Chriſt and Agbarus.

But in regard that theſe Fables are always augmented in proceſs of time, it hath been likewiſe feigned that Jeſus Chriſt, in writing to Agbarus, ſent him his Picture drawn on an Handkerchief. Evagrius is the firſt that makes mention of this Effigies in Book IV. Cap. 27. of his Hiſtory, relying on the Authority of Procopius, who nevertheleſs takes no notice of this Relation. However ſince the time of Evagrius, the Defenders of Image-Worſhip have often cited it, and the modern Greeks ſo firmly believed it, that they keep a Feſtival on the 16th of Auguſt in Commemoration thereof.

(c) That Jude the Apoſtle who is alſo called Thomas.] Thomas the Apoſtle was not ſirnamed Jude, but Didymus, and Jude the Apoſtle was not called Thomas; which is a farther Proof of the Falſhood of this Hiſtory.

Of ſome Letters attributed to the Virgin Mary.

Letters of the Virgin Mary.

THere are ſeveral Letters likewiſe aſcribed to the Virgin Mary, which being not ſo ancient as thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt to Agbarus, may more eaſily be proved to be falſe; the Letter of the Virgin Mary to St. Ignatius is ſuppoſititious, as we ſhall hereafter take an occaſion to ſhew in diſcourſing concerning the Epiſtles of that Saint. That to the Florentines publiſhed by Caniſius, as alſo another which the Inhabitants of Meſſina pretended to keep in their poſſeſſion, have more evident Marks of their Falſhood, and are generally rejected; inſomuch that there is no neceſſity to prove them to be Apocryphal.

Of the Counterfeit Goſpels.

Counterfeit Goſpels.

NOthing more clearly evinceth the truth of this Maxim of Holy Scripture, That the Father of Lies often changes himſelf into an Angel of Light, than the great number of Books, that have been heretofore forg'd in imitation of the Sacred Writings. For as the Holy Ghoſt hath cauſed Goſpels, Acts, Epiſtles, and a Revelation to be written, ſo in like manner the Devil to counterfeit the Truth, hath procured ſeveral Goſpels, Acts, Revelations, and Epiſtles, to be deviſ'd by his Miniſters, which have alſo been attributed to the Apoſtles. To begin with the Goſpels, beſides the four that are Canonical and true, there were in the Primitive Ages of the Church ſeveral others that were fictitious and ſubſtituted in their room as well by the Hereticks as by ſome Catholicks.

Among theſe laſt, we may reckon the Goſpel according to the Egyptians, and that according to the Hebrews, which though ſpurious, yet have been quoted by Catholick Authors as Works compos'd by the Orthodox. The Goſpel according to the Egyptians is cited by (a) Clemens Alexandrinus, as alſo by Epiphanius (b), who declares, that the Sabellians made uſe of this Goſpel to confirm their Error, becauſe it contain'd divers Myſtical Expreſſions concerning Jeſus Chriſt, ſome whereof might perhaps be applied by them to prove, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt were but one Perſon.

Counterfeit Goſpels.

The Goſpel according to the Hebrews, written (as it is reported by St. Jerome) in the Syriack Tongue with Hebrew Characters, is yet more remarkable among the Ancients; It is quoted by Hegeſippus (c), by Ignatius (d), by Clemens Alexandrinus (e) and by Origen in ſeveral places,

(a) Quoted by St. Clemens.] Stromat. Lib. 3. pag. 452. St. Clement cites an Expreſſion of Jeſus Chriſt to Salome, taken from this Goſpel: I am come to deſtroy the Works of the Woman, and by the Woman he underſtands Concupiſcence. Moreover, in pag. 465, after having produced another paſſage on the ſame ſubject, cited by the Heretick Caſſianus, he replies, firſt, that it is not found in the four Goſpels that are acknowledged by us, and afterward endeavours to apply a good ſenſe to it.

(b) By St. Epiphanius.] Hareſ. 26. The Valentinians likewiſe made uſe of this Goſpel.

(c) By Hegeſippus.] In Euſebius, Lib. 4. chap. 22.

(d) By St. Ignatius.] In this Epiſtle to the Inhabitants of Smyrna, where he cites two paſſages that are obſerved by St. Jerome; the firſt is, In carne eum poſt Reſurrectionem vidi, & ſcio eſſe; I ſaw him in the fleſh after his reſurrection, and I know that he is. The ſecond is this, Palpate, quia non ſum dæmonium incorporale; Handle me, and you ſhall perceive that I am not a phantom without a body.

(e) By St. Clement.] Stromat. Lib. 2. pag. 380. where we read this Sentence, ὁ θαυμάσας βασιλεύσει, καὶ ὁ βασιλεύσας ἀναπαύσεται.

Counterfeit Gospels.

particularly in his Eighth Treatise on St. Matthew, where he produced a considerable Fragment out of it (f); St. Jerome (g) translated it into Greek and Latin, as he has often told us, observing likewise in one place, that some were of opinion, that this Gospel was the Original of St. Matthew's, which was reputed to have been written in Hebrew; nevertheless it is certain, that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was different from that of St. Matthew, as well on the account, that all these things which are related by the Ancient Writers concerning this Gospel, and among others, the History of the Woman accused before Jesus Christ (h) are not to be found in St. Matthew's Gospel, as in regard, that they are clearly distinguished by Eusebius and St. Jerome, who had a perfect knowledge of both those Gospels. Add to this, that St. Jerome translated the Gospel according to the Hebrews, whereas the Author of the Version of St. Matthew's Gospel is unknown, and that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Scriptures of the Old Testament are cited according to the Hebrew Text, whereas St. Matthew in his hath followed the Translation of the Septuagint. This Gospel is not different from that which is called by Origen, The Gospel of the Twelve, nor from the Gospel of the Nazarenes, as appears from the Testimony of St. Jerome, by whom they are often confounded: Moreover the Ebionites made use thereof to prove their Doctrine.

Besides these two Gospels so often cited by the ancient Writers that are lost, there is yet extant a Book, Entituled, Proto-Evangelium Jacobi, published by Neander, and inserted in the Orthodoxographa. This Book is full of idle Tales and frivolous Relations concerning (i) the Nativity, Life, and Delivery of the Virgin Mary; The Gospel of Nicodemus likewise, annexed to that of St. James in the same place, is equally full of Fables relating (k) to the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, as the former is of those that belong to the Life of the Virgin Mary. Counterfeit Gospels.

However, although these Gospels are unworthy of Credit because they are so foolish, yet they do not contain any gross Errors, as those do that were forg'd by the Hereticks, no part whereof now remains in our possession; such were the Gospels ascrib'd to St. Peter, to St. Thomas, and to St. Matthias, mentioned by Eusebius, Book 3. Chap. 25. as also those of St. Bartholomew, and of the Twelve Apostles, cited by St. Jerome in his Preface to St. Matthew; The Gospel of Philip, which was that of the Gnosticks, (according to the Testimony of Epiphanius, Hær. 26.) and was used by the Ebionites, Basilides, and Apelles. The Gospel of Judas substituted by the Gajanites, who honour'd that Traitor, as St. Epiphanius and Theodoret assure us, when they speak of these Hereticks. And lastly, the Gospels of Thaddeus, Barnabas, and Andrew, and those that were counterfeited by Hesychius, together with a Book concerning the Infancy of Jesus Christ, and another relating to the Genealogy of the Virgin Mary, attributed to St. Matthew, and reckon'd by Gelasius in the number of Apocryphal Writings that were forg'd by Hereticks.

(f) Where he produced a considerable fragment.] It is a passage that contains the Answer of Jesus Christ to the rich young Man mentioned in St. Mark's Gospel, chap. 10. and in St. Luke chap. 18. expressed in other words. Moreover Origen in his Eleventh Tome upon St. John, cites another passage of this Gospel, wherein the Holy Ghost is call'd the Mother of Christ.

(g) St. Jerome.] St. Jerome quotes it very often in his Catalog. Voce Ignat. & voce Jacobus, Lib. 2. in Matth. chap. 7. and 12. Lib. 3. contra Pelagianos.

(h) The History of the Woman accused before Jesus Christ.] Eusebius, in Hist. Lib. 3. declares, that the History of the Adulterous Woman was recorded in this Gospel. Moreover St. Jerome affirms, that it was related therein, that Jesus Christ appear'd to St. James, who had bound himself with an Oath not to eat, until he had seen our Saviour risen from the dead; and in his Third Book against the Pelagians, he informs us, that it was written in this Gospel, that the Mother of our Lord, and of St. John the Baptist spoke to him thus: John the Baptist baptized for the remission of sins, let us go and be baptized; and that Jesus Christ replied to them, have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized?

(i) This Book is full of idle Tales and frivolous Relations.] Here's a Specimen of the Fables contain'd in the Protevangelium Jacobi. JOACHIM was elected among the nations of the Twelve Tribes, RENBEN admonished him, that it was not lawful for him to offer sacrifice, because he had no incense, whereupon he retir'd for grief into the Wilderness, and fasted there 40 days. ANNE mourned, and her Servant JUDITH advis'd her to take a Laurel Tree: therefore she went into a Garden, where she lamented, that she was not like unto a Bird that had a Nest in the Laurel Tree. The Angel appear'd unto her, and told her, that she should have a Son; This Angel descended and delivered the same thing to JOACHIM; he beheld himself in the Plate, or in the Ephod of the High-Priest, and saw not that he had sinned. The Virgin was able to go when she was six months old; she was bred up by Angels in the Temple; she was Married to JOSEPH, because a Dove flew out of a little Staff, that was given to him by the High-Priest. St. JOSEPH having perceived that she was with Child, caused her to drink the Water of Jealousie according to the Law, &c.

(k) Is equally full of Fables.] Here's another Specimen of the Fables received in the Gospel of Nicodemus. PILATE sent for him by a Messenger, this Messenger worshipped him; all the Soldiers did so in like manner against their wills; and the Ensigns bowed themselves twice before him. The History of the Evangelists is intermix'd with divers fables. Jesus Christ is made to answer Pilate's Question. What is Truth? Nicodemus is represented speaking, as also those whom our Saviour had healed; and the Woman that was cured of the issue of Blood is called Veronica. Moreover the Author of this Gospel describes the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, adding many things concerning him; he introduceth the dead that were raised at his Resurrection, entertaining one another with absurd and impertinent Discourses, declaring, that they made the sign of the Cross, he introduces the Devil reasoning very ridiculously concerning our Saviour's descent into Hell; And lastly, he feigns, that after his Resurrection, Pilate having commanded the Jewish Books to be brought to him, they acknowledged that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, and rehearseth several other Tales of the like nature.

Of the counterfeit Acts of the Apostles, and of the false Revelations.

Counterfeit Acts of the Apostles, and false Revelations.

FOrasmuch as the Acts of St. Luke contain only a very small part of the Transactions of some of the Apostles, since he gives no account of the proceedings of all, neither doth he describe at large even all the Actions of those that are mentioned by him; They that applied themselves to the counterfeiting of these Records, were furnished with great variety of matter, wherein they might exercise their deceitful Arts. The first that practised this Artifice, was a certain Priest and a Disciple of St. Paul, who being inflamed with a false Zeal for his Master, forged under the name of St. Luke the Acts of Paul and Thecla, and was convicted of this Imposture by St. John, as we are assured by Tertullian, and after him by St. Jerome. However, the simplicity of this ancient Priest might be more easily excused, in regard that he had no ill design; but we cannot but be seized with horror when we reflect on the enormous practices of the Hereticks, who have presumed to write the Acts of divers Apostles at their pleasure, wherein they have obtruded their detestable Errors. Such were the Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul devised by the Manichees, and mentioned by Philastrius, in which the Apostles were introduced, affirming, that the Souls of Men and Beasts were of the same nature, and working Miracles to cause Dogs and Sheep to speak: The Acts of St. Andrew, of St. John, and of the Apostles in general, substituted by the same Hereticks, according to the Testimony of St. Epiphanius, Philastrius, and St. Augustin (a): The Acts of the Apostles counterfeited by the Ebionites, and cited by St. Epiphanius in his description of their Heresie: The Doctrine, Preaching, Voyages, and Disputes of St. Peter, falsely attributed to St Clement, containing the Errors of the Ebionites, and the (b) History of St. Paul's being snatched up into Heaven, being a Work compiled by the Gajanites; whereof the Gnosticks likewise made use, and St. Epiphanius assures us, Hæres. 8. Counterfeit Acts of the Apoſtles, and falſe Revelations.

Laſtly, there are ſeveral counterfeit Apocalypſes or Revelations, as the Revelations of the great Apoſtle forged by Cerinthus: The Apocalypſe of St. Peter, which Euſebius in Book 3. chap. 25. of his Hiſtory reckons in the number of thoſe ſpurious Books that are not Heretical, and which (as Sozomen affirms) was read every year about the time of Eaſter in the Churches of Paleſtine. And the Revelation, or the Secrets of St. Paul, which was heretofore very much eſteemed by the Monks: The Egyptians (according to the Teſtimony of Sozomen) boaſted that they had it in their poſſeſſion, and it is inſerted in the Catalogue of Apocryphal Books by Gelaſius, together with the Revelations of St. Thomas and St. Stephen. None of theſe Books are now extant, neither ought we to be troubled for their loſs.

Counterfeit Acts of the Apoſtles, and falſe Revelations.

Of the Epiſtle to the Laodiceans, and ſome others attributed to St. Paul.

St. Paul's Letter to the Laodiceans.

BEſides the fourteen Epiſtles of St. Paul, ſome of the ancient Writers have likewiſe cited one directed to the Laodiceans, and indeed, we have at preſent an Epiſtle mentioned by St. Anſelm, Sixtus Senenſis, and Stapulenſis, which is inſerted in ſome German Bibles (a), and is written in St. Paul's Name to the Laodiceans. It is not certain whether this be the ſame with that which was uſed when St. Jerome lived (b), however it is evident, that that which we now have in our poſſeſſion, doth not appertain to St. Paul (c), and that that which was extant in St. Jerom's time, was generally rejected, as he declares in his Catalogue; ab omnibus exploditur. That which gave occaſion to the forging of this Letter (as is obſerved by Theodoret) is, that St. Paul at the end of his Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, exhorts them to cauſe the Epiſtle that he had ſent to them to be read by the Laodiceans, and to read among themſelves that from Laodicea; this hath induced ſome to believe, that there was an Epiſtle written to the Laodiceans at the ſame time with that to the Coloſſians; and this alſo gave Marcion the opportunity of altering the Title of the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, and giving it the name of the Epiſtle to the Laodiceans. But this error is founded on the ignorance of the Greek expreſſion; for no mention is made in this place of any Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans, but of one written from Laodicea. Some are of opinion that this is the Epiſtle to Timothy, which they imagine to have been written from that City. But it may be much more probably affirmed with St. Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Photius, and Oecumenius, that it was an Epiſtle written to St. Paul from Laodicea, by the Chriſtians of that City, and for this Reaſon it is called in the vulgar Tranſlation the Epiſtle of the Laodiceans.

St. Paul's Letter to the Laodiceans.

Moreover, as it hath been concluded from this place in the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians miſ-interpreted, that St. Paul wrote a Letter to the Laodiceans; ſo in like manner ſome have inferred, that he wrote a third Epiſtle to the Chriſtians of Corinth, from a paſſage taken out of his firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, ch. 5. v. 9, 10, and 11. viz. I wrote unto you an Epiſtle, not to company with Fornicators, &c. But (as St. Chryſoſtome obſerves) this Epiſtle is the very ſame that he then wrote, and the ſenſe is, When I even now wrote unto you this Letter, not to keep company with Fornicators, I do not mean the Fornicators of this World.

(a) Inſerted in ſome German Bibles.] It was publiſhed in Latin by Piſtorus, and afterwards annexed to the German Bibles printed at Ausburg, Wormes, and Amſterdam; [Particularly in thoſe Bibles which Elias Hutterus ſet out in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German, in Quarto.]

(b) Whether this be the ſame as that which was uſed when St. Jerome lived.] That which gives occaſion to doubt, whether this Epiſtle be the ſame with that which was publiſhed heretofore, is that Philaſtrius affirms in ch. 88. That that which was extant in his time contained ſeveral Errors; and there are none in that which we now have. Moreover, that which is cited by St. Epiphanius was compoſed out of ſeveral Sentences of the Epiſtle to the Epheſians.

(c) That which we now have in our poſſeſſion, doth not appertain to St. Paul.] It is not conformable to the ſtyle of St. Paul; it is extreamly conciſe, even ſhorter than that to Philemon, neither hath it any one particular ſubject.

Of the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

JOSEPH, Sirnamed by the Apoſtles Barnabas, that is to ſay, the Son of Conſolation (a), who was a Levite, and a Native of the Iſle of Cyprus (b), laboured even as much as the Apoſtles themſelves in eſtabliſhing the Foundation of the Chriſtian Religion. Some of the ancient Writers (c) affirm, that he was one of the 72 Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt; but St. Luke makes mention of him after ſuch a manner, as induceth us rather to believe, that he was not admitted into the Fellowſhip of the Apoſtles until after our Saviour's Death. However it be, it is evident, that ever ſince that time he hath been reputed as one of the principal Preachers of the Goſpel, and was deſervedly reckoned in the number of the Apoſtles. We have no certain account of his Life, but only what we find ſet down by St. Luke in the Acts.

The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas.

He hath written (ſays St. Jerome) an Epiſtle, which is full of Edification for the Church, although it be not Canonical: This Epiſtle is often cited by St. Clemens Alexandrinus (d) and Origen (e), who do not in the leaſt

(b) A Native of the Iſle of Cyprus.] This Iſland of Cyprus was full of Jews, and a very great number of them were maſſacred therein under the Reign of the Emperor Trajan, according to the Teſtimony of Dio, Euſebius, and Oroſius,

But Venerable Bede rejects their opinion, becauſe St. Luke in the 4th Chapter of the Acts declares, That Barnabas was one of thoſe that laid the Price of the Lands, and other Poſſeſſions that were then ſold, at the Apoſtle's Feet; for though this doth not abſolutely hinder, but that he might have been one of the Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt; yet St. Luke ſeems thereby to inſinuate, that this was the beginning of his Converſion to Chriſtianity.

(d) By St. Clemens Alexandrinus.] Stromat. lib. 2. p. 373, 375, 389, 396, and 410. Lib. 5. p. 571, 572, 577, and 578.

Celſum*; and Lib. 3. περὶ ἀρχῶν; and Euſebius, lib. 3. Hiſt. c. 25. Lib. 6. c. 13. and c. 14. Tertullian in his Book De Pudicitiâ tells us, That St. Barnabas's Epiſtle was more generally received by the Catholick Church than the Paſtor. But he takes St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Hebrews to have been written by St. Barnabas.

doubt,

The Epistle of St. Barnabas.

doubt, but that it belongs to him whose Name it bears. It is true indeed that Eusebius and St Jerome place it in the rank of Apocryphal Books (f), nevertheless they do not deny that it was written by St. Barnabas; on the contrary they attribute it to him, declaring only, that it ought not to be esteemed of the same Authority as the Canonical Books, because although it really belongs to St. Barnabas, yet it is not generally received by the whole Catholick Church.

And it is upon this account that this Epistle is not amongst the Canonical Writings, because to cause a Book to be placed in this rank, it is not only sufficient that it was composed by an Apostle, or a Disciple of the Apostles, but it is likewise requisite that it should be received as Canonical throughout all the Churches of Christ; otherwise the Treatise of Hermas, and the Epistle of St. Clement, ought also to be inserted in the Catalogue of Canonical Books. Therefore it is a very weak Argument to affirm that the Epistle of St. Barnabas doth not appertain to this Apostle, because that if it were certainly his, it would have been reckoned in the number of the Canonical Writings; since before a Book can be owned as Canonical, it is necessary, whosoever is the Author thereof, that it should be acknowledged by the whole Church; because there are Books written by the Apostles, or their Disciples, that were not heretofore, and are not as yet placed in the rank of Canonical Writings; and on the contrary there are others, the Writers whereof are not certainly known, that have been formerly, and are now, inserted in the Canon of Holy Scripture, as in the New Testament, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Revelation; and several Books in the Old, the true Authors of which cannot be positively shewn. Besides, though it were true, that all Books are Canonical, which we know to have been written by Men who had Authority to make them so, yet who hath assured us, that St. Barnabas ought to be included in this number, rather than St. Clement, or Hermas? The Catholick Church hath a Right to declare it, and since she has not done it, this is a sufficient warrant to reckon his Epistle amongst the Apocryphal Writings, though it be really his.

Furthermore it hath been objected, that this Epistle is unworthy of St. Barnabas, and that it is not credible that so great an Apostle who was full of the Holy Ghost, and the Collegue of St. Paul, should be the Author of the most part of those things that are therein contained; such are the forced Allegories, the extravagant and incongruous Explications of Holy Scripture, the various Fables concerning Animals, and several other Conceits of the like nature that are comprised in the first Part of this Epistle. To this I answer, that notwithstanding these Defects, St. Clement, Origen, Eusebius, and St. Jerome, attributed it unto him; and I am of the opinion, that it is a very great piece of Impudence for any one to imagine himself to be more clear-sighted in this matter, than those exquisite Criticks of Antiquity: they lived much nearer the time of the Apostles than we do: They had a great number of Books composed by their Disciples which are now lost; and consequently, they were more capable than we are of judging of the style and manner of writing of the Apostles, and their Companions and Disciples. If then they have found that the Allegories, Mystical Explications and Fables, that are found in the Epistle of St. Barnabas might be his, with what right can we positively assert, that they cannot be his? Certainly they must needs have but a very little knowledge of the Genius of the Jewish Nation, and of the primitive Christians that were educated in the Synagogue, who obstinately believe that these sorts of Notions could not proceed from them; on the contrary, this was their Character; They had learned of the Jews to turn the whole Scripture into Allegory, and to make remarks on the peculiar Properties of those living Creatures that were prohibited to be eaten; therefore it is not to be admired that St. Barnabas, being by Nation a Jew, and writing to his own Countrymen, hath allegorically explained divers Passages of the Old Testament, in applying them to the New, and found out several Moral Reflections upon the Properties of those Creatures that were not permitted to be eaten by the Jews. The Epistle of St. Clemens Romanus, and the Stromata of St. Clemens Alexandrinus, are full of this kind of Allegories and figurative Expressions. The History of the Phœnix, related by St. Clement in his Epistle to the Corinthians, so much celebrated among the primitive Christians, seems to be more fabulous than that which is alledged by St. Barnabas in his Epistle concerning the Properties of certain Animals; and the Allegory of the Blood of Jesus Christ typified by the Scarlet Thread of the Harlot Rachab, in the Epistle of St. Clemens Romanus, is as far fetch'd as the greatest part of those of St. Barnabas. But what necessity is there to produce farther Proofs of a Matter of Fact that is so evident, since it is sufficiently known to all Men, that the Writings of the Primitive Christians are generally full of such Fables and Allegories?

The Epistle of St. Barnabas.

Lastly, the Author of this Epistle is accused for representing the Apostles as the most flagitious Persons in the World before their Conversion; but his Words have been taken in too strict and literal a sense; for he intended not to say, that they were the wickedest Men in the World, but only that they were great Sinners (g).

It is not known to whom the Epistle of St. Barnabas is directed, because we want the Title; it appears from the Body of this Letter, that it was written to some converted Jews that adhered too much to the Law of Moses: It is divided into two Parts, in the first of which he shews the unprofitableness of the Old Law, and the necessity of the Incarnation and Death of Jesus Christ, producing divers passages of Scripture relating to the Ceremonies and Precepts of the Old Law, which he explains Allegorically when he applies them to our Saviour and the New Law: The second Part comprehends particular Moral Instructions, containing several Rules and Directions concerning what ought to be done, and what ought to be avoided.

This Epistle was first published (h) in Greek, together with the ancient Version by Menardus, and this Edition was printed at Paris by Pigit in the Year 1645.

Afterwards the famous Dr. Isaac Vossius caused it to be reprinted with the Epistles of St. Ignatius revised and corrected from three Manuscripts, Anno Dom. 1646.

Lastly, Cotelerius published it, adding a new Translation è Regione, together with the old Version, entire, and certain Critical Remarks at the end. It is prefixed at the beginning of his Collection of the Works of the ancient Fathers, printed at Paris by Petit, Anno 1672.

The Greek Text of the four or five first Chapters is wanting in all these Editions, but they are extant in Latin in the ancient Version, which, although barbarous and defective, hath nevertheless served to correct the Greek Original in some places.

(f) In the Rank of Apocryphal Books.] Eusebius divides the Apocryphal Books into three Ranks, the first contain those that come nearest to the Canonical Writings, that is to say, those that are rejected by some, and received by others as Canonical, ἀντιλεγομένων ἢ ὑπ' ὄμως τοῖς πολλοῖς. In the second are comprehended those Books that are not allowed as Canonical by any; but such as were not forged by Hereticks, as those are that belong to the third Rank. The Epistle of St. Barnabas ought to be reckoned among the first of these sorts, at least among the second; which, although Apocryphal, may nevertheless belong to those to whom they are attributed, as the Book of the Pastor, and others. And although St. Jerome declares in his Epistle to Leta, that those Books are Apocryphal, that do not belong to the Authors whose Name they bear, yet he too often makes use of this Term in another signification. Now that Eusebius, and St. Jerome believed that the Epistle of St. Barnabas was written by him, appears from hence that they constantly impute it to him; Euseb. lib. 6. chap. 13. Item ex Barnaba, Clementis, & Judæ Epistolis. It is certain, that he judged that the Epistles of St. Clement and St. Jude were really composed by those whose Names they bear; and in another place, Judæ Epistolam intelligo, item Barnabæ Epistolam, & Revelationem quæ dicitur Petri. Where he makes a particular Mark on this last Book, viz. That it is ascribed to St. Peter, but he doth not declare the same thing with respect to the Epistle of St. Barnabas; on the contrary, he barely affirms, that it is his, as the Epistle of St. Jude belongs to St. Jude. St. Jerome likewise speaks expressly to the same effect; Barnabas unam ædificationem Ecclesiæ continentem Epistolam composuit, quæ inter Apocryphas numeratur. Which plainly shews, that he did not believe it to be Apocryphal, because of its being falsly attributed to St. Barnabas, since on the contrary he himself imputes it to him, in affirming that it is Apocryphal.

(g) That they were great Sinners.] Thus the following Words ought to be interpreted, Super omne peccatum peccatores. Many very devout Persons have often used this Phrase, I am the greatest Sinner that ever lived in the World, and other Expressions of the like nature, which are not to be understood Literally.

(h) Was first published in Greek, &c.] It is said, that there was an older Edition than Menardus's printed in England by the order of the Learned Usher, but that the whole Impression was burnt. We may add to these, another Edition of this Epistle published by Maderus in Germany at Helmstadt. [There have been two other Editions of this Epistle, one at Oxon 1685. in Duodecimo, wherein, all that is in the old Latin Version that is not in the Greek, as also all that is in the Greek that is not in the old Version, is printed with Red Letters: Lastly, Mr. Le Moyne has set it out in his Varia Sacra with large Comments at Leyden, in Quarto, 1685.]

Of the Liturgies that are falſely attributed to the Apoſtles.

The Liturgies of the Apoſtles.

WE need only to reflect on what we find Recorded in the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, concerning the Adminiſtration of the Holy Sacrament of the Euchariſt, and upon the Accounts of St. Juſtin, and other Primitive Fathers of the Church, to be perſwaded that the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors celebrated the Euchariſt with great Simplicity. This hath been obſerved by all thoſe that have written concerning Liturgies (a), who have unanimouſly agreed, that the Celebration of the Maſs was performed in thoſe Primitive Ages without much Ceremony, and that they uſed but few Prayers; but by little and little others were added, and ſeveral viſible Ceremonies were annexed, to render the Service more venerable to the People. In fine, the Churches afterwards regulated, and committed to Writing, the manner of Celebrating it, and this is what they called Liturgies, which being compiled conformably to the various Cuſtoms of divers Places, are likewiſe found to be different. And foraſmuch as Men are naturally inclined to make ſome Alterations in their Exterior Habit, many things from time to time have been ſucceſſively added to them.

This ſingle Remark is ſufficient to ſhew, that the Liturgies, that bear the Name of the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts, were not actually compoſed by them: But to prove this clearly, and beyond contradiction, we ſhall only examine them one after another.

The Liturgy, or Greek and Latin Maſs, attributed to St. Peter, and publiſhed by Lindanus in the year 1589. from a Manuſcript of Cardinal Sirlet's, that was not very ancient, and which was afterwards Printed at Paris by Morellus, Anno 1595. cannot be St. Peter's for the following Reaſons, ſince mention is made therein of St. Sixtus Cornelius, and St. Cyprian: The Virgin Mary is called the Mother of God, a Term that was not generally in uſe, until after the Condemnation of the Neſtorian Hereſie; The Canon of the Latin Maſs, which is reputed by St. Gregory, to have been compoſed by a Scholaſtick, that is to ſay, a Learned Man of the Fifth Century, is entirely inſerted therein: Moreover it contains divers Litanies taken from the Sacramentarium of St. Gregory and the Liturgies of St. Baſil and St. Chryſoſtome: There are alſo Prayers for the Patriarch, a term altogether unknown before the end of the Fourth Age of the Church, and for the moſt religious Emperors. In ſhort, if St. Peter had been the Author of this Liturgy, it would have been uſed by the Church of Rome, neither would it have lain hid during ſo many Ages. Theſe Reaſons made the Learned Cardinal Bona ſay, that this Liturgy was forged, and that it was in all probability compiled by a Grecian Prieſt Latinized, becauſe it is collected partly from the Greek Liturgy, and partly from the Latin, and the name of St. Peter was prefixed to it, either that it might obtain more Authority, or becauſe a great part of the Liturgy of the Church of Rome was comprehended therein.

The Maſs of the Ethiopians that bears the name of St. Matthew, appears more evidently to be forged. There are Collects for Popes, Kings, Patriarchs, and Arch-Biſhops: The Twelve Apoſtles are therein invocated: The Four Evangeliſts are cited, as alſo the Synods of Nice, Conſtantinople, and Epheſus: The Nicene Creed is inſerted with the Particle Filioque: Moreover mention is likewiſe made of St. Athanaſius, St. Gregory, and St. Baſil, together with the Epact, the Golden Number, and the Triſagion; which plainly ſhews, that this Liturgy is of a very late date. The Liturgies of the Apoſtles.

One ought to give the ſame Judgment of the Liturgy of St. Mark, publiſhed by Cardinal Sirlet, and Printed at Paris by Morellus; for we find therein the word Conſubſtantial, and the Triſagion: There are alſo ſeveral Prayers for the King, and even for St. Mark himſelf, and mention is made of Chalices, Deacons, Subdeacons, Chanters, Monks, Religious Perſons, &c. which Circumſtances are apparent Demonſtrations of its novelty.

There remains only the Liturgy attributed to St. James, which divers Learned Men have taken much pains to vindicate, but to no purpoſe; for although it is more ancient than thoſe that we have already examined, ſince it is cited in the Synod that was holden in the Emperor's Palace in Trullo, after the Fifth General Council, yet we ought not to ſay, that St. James was the Author thereof, or that it was compoſed in his time. For, 1. The Virgin Mary is call'd in this Liturgy the Mother of God; and the Son and the Holy Ghoſt are ſaid to be Conſubſtantial with the Father, terms that were altogether unknown in St. James's time: But ſuppoſing that they were not, is it credible, that this Authority ſhould not be alledged in the Councils of Nice, Epheſus, and Conſtantinople? 2. We find therein the Triſagion and the Doxology, that is to ſay, the Sanctus and the Gloria Patri, which were not generally recited in the Church until the Fifth Century; for though it might be proved that they were in uſe before, yet it muſt be confeſſed, that it was not the general cuſtom of the Church. 3. There are Collects for thoſe that were ſhut up in Monaſteries: Can any man ſay, that there were Monaſteries in the time of St. James? 4. There is mention made of Confeſſors, a term that was not inſerted in the Divine Offices, till a long time after St. James, even according to the Confeſſion of Bellarmin. 5. In this Liturgy there is mention made of Churches, Incenſe, Altars, &c. can it be imagined that theſe things were uſed in St. James's time? 6. We find therein very many Citations of the Epiſtles of St. Paul, the greateſt part whereof were written after St. James's death; neither ought we to object with the Cardinals Bona and Bellarmin, that theſe things were afterwards inſerted, becauſe it is not probable, that they ſhould be added in ſo many places; beſides, the Connexion and the Ceremonies of this whole Liturgy do not agree with the time of the Apoſtles.

I ſhall not here ſpeak of other Liturgies cited by ſome Authors, ſuch are thoſe of the Twelve Apoſtles mentioned by Abraham Ecchellenſis, and that of St. Barnabas quoted by a certain Monk, becauſe they are unknown to me; neither ſhall I examine that which is compriſed in the Conſtitutions of St. Clement, nor that which is extant in the Writings that are attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, in regard that theſe Books being forged, as I ſhall hereafter ſhew in another place, it is not to be doubted but that the Liturgies which they contain, are in like manner fictitious.

Of the Apostles Creed.

Of the Apostles Creed.

HAving already Discourſed of the Works of every one of the Apoſtles in particular, it remains, that we ſhould now give ſome account of thoſe that are reputed to be compoſed by them in general; The moſt Authentick among theſe is the Apoſtles Creed, which is generally believed to have been made by all the Apoſtles. But Authors are not agreed about the time wherein it was written by them, nor concerning the manner how it was compiled, nor the deſign they had in making it. Some are of Opinion with Ruffinus (a), that they compiled it in the very ſame year that Jeſus Chriſt died, a little after the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt; whereas Baronius and others conjecture, that they did not finiſh it till the Second year of the Reign of the Emperor Claudius, a little before they were ſeparated. As to the manner of their drawing it up, ſome have imagined, that every one of the Apoſtles pronounced (b) his Article, and that for this reaſon it is called a Symbol, as conſiſting of divers Sentences: Others believe, that it was compiled by them after they had conferred all together; and there are ſome alſo who aſſert, that all the Diſciples had a ſhare therein. Laſtly, as to their deſign in compoſing it, ſome determine that it was, that they might be all found unanimouſly to agree in one and the ſame Doctrine (c), and others, that it was for the benefit of the People, that they might be able to propound to them an Abridgment of the Chriſtian Faith, which ſhould be eaſie to be underſtood, and to be retained in their Memory. The Etymology of the word Symbol is yet more uncertain (d); for ſome affirm, that the Creed is ſo called, becauſe it is as it were the diſtinguiſhing Mark and Character of Chriſtians (e); others, becauſe it was compoſed of the Sentences of ſeveral Perſons; and laſtly others, on the account of its being made in a general Conference.

However, although it is an Opinion eſtabliſhed on very good grounds, that this Creed was made by the Apoſtles, and it cannot be denied, that they all preached and taught the Articles therein contained after one and the ſame manner, as the main Points of the Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, in which it was neceſſary that all Chriſtians ſhould be inſtructed; yet it may be juſtly doubted without incurring the imputation of raſhneſs, whether they were aſſembled together to compoſe this Creed, and whether they wtote it word for word, as it is now received in the Church of Rome; nay there are very weighty Reaſons, whereby it appears, that this Opinion, though commonly received, is nevertheleſs very improbable.

For firſt, neither St. Luke in the Acts, nor any Eccleſiaſtical Author before the Fifth Century hath made any mention of this Aſſembly of the Apoſtles, and none ever affirmed, that they compoſed the Creed of the Church of Rome, either by conferring together, or by pronouncing every one a particular Article.

Secondly, the Fathers of the Three firſt Ages diſputing againſt the Hereticks, endeavour to demonſtrate by many Arguments, that the Doctrine contained in the Creed, is that of the Apoſtles, but they do not affirm, that it was compiled by them; and yet there could not have been a ſtronger, or more convincing proof brought againſt thoſe Hereticks, than to have ſaid thus to them; You impugn the Doctrine of the Creed, and yet it is certain, that the Apoſtles were the Authors thereof, therefore you impugn the Doctrine of the Apoſtles. However they did not argue after this manner; On the contrary they prove by Tradition, and the Conſent of the Apoſtolical Churches, that the Doctrine compriſed in the Creed, is that of the Apoſtles.

Of the Apoſtles Creed.

Thirdly, if the Apoſtles had made a Creed, it would have been every where the ſame throughout all Churches, and in all Ages; all Chriſtians would have learnt it by heart; all Churches would have repeated it after the very ſame manner; in fine, all Authors would have expreſſed it in the ſame terms. Now the contrary is evident; for it is certain, that not only in the ſecond and third Centuries, but alſo in the fourth, there were many Creeds, and all, though the ſame as to the Doctrine, yet different in the Expreſſion. In the ſecond and third Ages of the Church, we find as many Creeds as Authors (f), and the ſame Author ſets the Creed down after a different manner in ſeveral places of his Works, which plainly ſhews, that there was not then any Creed that was reputed to be the Apoſtles, nor even any regulated and eſtabliſhed Form of Faith. Ruffinus in the fourth Century compares three ancient Creeds of the Churches of Aquileia, Rome, and the Eaſt, and we may obſerve in theſe three Creeds, none of which perfectly agrees with the common one, very conſiderable differences in the terms, as appears from the Table that is ſubjoyned at the end of this Article. St. Cyril of Jeruſalem in his Catechetick Lectures produceth a particular Creed, that was uſed by the Church of Jeruſalem when this Father wrote. The Authors that have written Commentaries on the Creed, as St. Auguſtine in his 119th Sermon, St. Maximus, Petrus Chryſologus, Fortunatus, and others, omit divers Expreſſions that are inſerted in our Apoſtolical Creed, among others this at the end, The Life Everlaſting; and St. Jerome obſerves in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, that the Creed concludes with theſe words, The Reſurrection of the Body.

It is evident from theſe Reflections, that although the Creed be the Apoſtles as to the Doctrine which it contains, nevertheleſs it is not theirs, as to all the terms, and that they did not draw up any one form of Faith comprehended in a ſet number of words, which they were all obliged to uſe: But that having learned the ſame Faith from Jeſus Chriſt, they likewiſe taught it to all thoſe that were converted to the Chriſtian Religion, and inſtructed them all in the ſame Myſteries. That they that were thus trained up in this Faith, had it ſo deeply imprinted on their mind, (as St. Juſtin and St. Irenæus obſerve) that they were always ready to give an account thereof, and as often as they ſhould be required to do it, without making uſe of any one particular form; and from thence proceeds the difference of the Creeds that are ſet down by the Fathers. And laſtly, that for the aſſiſtance of the Memory, certain forms of theſe Articles of Faith, were afterwards compiled, which were found to be different

(a) Ruffinus.] In Expoſit. Symboli: Iſidore, lib. 2. de Off. c. 22.

(b) Every one of the Apoſtles pronounced his Article.] This is the opinion of the Author of the 115th Sermon, De Tempore apud Aug. Of St. Leo, Ep. 13. now 27. Of Venant. Fortunat. in Exegeſi Symb. Apoſt.

(c) Some determine that it was, that they might be all found unanimouſly to agree in one and the ſame Doctrine.] The former opinion is maintained by Ruffinus, and the later by the modern Authors.

(d) The Etymology of the Word Symbol, is yet more uncertain.] The Greek Word Σύμβολον, properly ſignifies a Note, Sign, or Mark; therefore the Myſtical Signs and Notes of Pythagoras were called Σύμβολα Πυθαγόρεια. Herodian uſes the Word to denote a Military Signal. Other Authors, as Dion Caſſius, and Suetonius, apply it to ſignifie Signs or Marks, and certain Tickets that were given to thoſe that were to be admitted to publick Shews, and for the diſtribution of Largeſſes. Some ſay that the Word Symbolum among the Latins ſignifies an Entertainment where every one pays his Club, or even the Club it ſelf; But this does not belong to the Neuter Symbolum, but to the Feminine Symbola, and in Greek Συμβόλη, as may be ſeen in Ariſtophanes's Scholiaſt, in Athenæus and Plutarch; therefore it ought to be read in Terence's Andria, Symbolam dedit, and not Symbolum. Aulus Gellius, lib. 6. c. 1. makes uſe of the Word Symbola to ſignifie one Man's ſhare in a Reckoning; and declares, that this Term was alſo attributed to thoſe Queſtions that were Expounded by Taurus the Philoſopher in the Preſence of divers Perſons. St. Cyprian is the firſt that applied the Word Symbol to denote an Epitome or Abridgment of the Chriſtian Faith. Ep. 45. Optatus calls the Hereticks, The Deſerters of the true Symbol, alluding to a Military Signal. And, and to the ſame effect, St. Chryſologus, in Hom. 62. declares, That the Symbol is the Covenant that we make with God in Baptiſm.

(e) The diſtinguiſhing Mark and Character of Chriſtians.] This Etymology is produced by Maximus Taurinenſis, and Venantius Fortunatus. It hath been likewiſe obſerved by Ruffinus, Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, lib. 2. de Off. c. 22. and Durandus de Mende, lib. 4. Rationalis, c. 25. But the ſecond and third Etymology are more common; and the laſt is maintained by Ruffinus; St. Aug. Serm. 181. de Tempore; Iſidore, lib. 2. div. Off. c. 22. Rabanus Maurus, lib. 2. Init. Clerical. cap. 56. Durandus ſupra: Eucherius, Homil. de Symb. and Innocent. III. lib. 2. De Sacris Miſſæ Myſteriis, c. 49. The firſt however is the moſt probable.

(f) As many Creeds as Authors.] St. Irenæus exhibits a Creed, l. 1. c. 2. and another in lib. 2. c. 1. Tertullian made uſe of three different Creeds in three ſeveral places, In præſcript. lib. contra Praxeam, & de Virginibus velandis. See Origen. lib. 1. Peri Arch. & in Dialog. contra Marc. Optat. lib. 1. All which Creeds are different from the Vulgar.

Of the Apoſtles Creed.

according to the diverſity of the Churches wherein they were uſed. For I doubt not in the leaſt, that beſides the above-cited Creeds, there were many others of which we have no knowledge, from whence it muſt be inferred, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Author of the Doctrine contained in the Creed, and that the Apoſtles preached and publiſhed it throughout the whole World; but that it cannot be determined by whom theſe Forms were collected, wherein this Doctrine is compriſed.

It may be objected, that St. Irenæus, Tertullian, Lucifer Calaritanus, and St. Jerome affirm, that the Creed is the Rule of Faith, which the Church hath received from the Apoſtles; That St. Ambroſe ſays, that the Church of Rome hath preſerved the Apoſtolical Creed in its purity without Alteration; That St. Auguſtine, Ruffinus, Leo, Maximus Taurinenſis, Fortunatus, Petrus Chryſologus, and a great many others (g) have taken it for granted as a thing beyond Controverſie, that the Creed was compoſed in an Aſſembly of the Apoſtles, that this Opinion is Authoriſed by the Church, and that it ſeems to be a raſh Preſumption to doubt of it; And laſtly, that all Catholicks are agreed in this Judgment, and that none but Hereticks, or at leaſt Perſons that are ſuſpected of Hereſie, durſt preſume to call it in queſtion.

To theſe Objections I anſwer, firſt, that the Teſtimonies of St. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Lucifer, rather overthrow the vulgar Opinion, than eſtabliſh it; for theſe Fathers do not aſſert, that we have received the form of Faith from the Apoſtles, but only the Faith and Doctrine that was communicated to them by Jeſus Chriſt; therefore if there were any force in the Objection, it muſt be concluded, that our Saviour is the Author of the Creed. Moreover, it is further to be obſerved, that by the Phraſe Rule of Faith uſed by Tertullian, a ſet Form of Faith is not to be underſtood, but the Faith it ſelf, which he declares to have been founded by Jeſus Chriſt; and Lucifer Calaritanus doth not diſcourſe of the Creed, but only of the Faith of the Church as it relates to our Saviour's Divinity. Laſtly, when St. Jerome ſays, that the Faith of the Creed, which is an Apoſtolical Tradition, was not written on Paper, or with Ink, but was engraved on the Fleſhly Tables of the Heart; he gives us to underſtand, that he meant nothing elſe, but that the Faith and Doctrine comprehended in the Creed proceeds from the Apoſtles, who have taught it to all the Faithful. After the ſame manner, when St. Ambroſe aſſures us, that the Creed was preſerved in its purity by the Church of Rome, he doth not ſpeak of the form of the Creed, but of the Doctrine therein contained. As for the other Authorities that are alledged, they are of little moment. Ruffinus is the firſt, and the only Perſon among the Authors of the Fifth Century, that aſſerts, that the Creed was compoſed by the Apoſtles, and yet he propoſes this Opinion, as a matter that depended only on a popular Tradition; St. Auguſtine never approved it, for he doth not ſo much as mention one word thereof in his 119th Homily, and the 115th which might be cited to this purpoſe, cannot be proved certainly to be his: In fine, the other Authors who lived after Ruffinus, have taken this Hiſtory from him, and are too modern to give a certain Teſtimony of a matter of Fact ſo ancient as this is; We may alſo add, that it is related by none but the Latins; that the Greeks never ſpoke of it, and that even they that produce it, do in no wiſe agree among themſelves, concerning its Circumſtances, as hath been already ſhewn. To conclude, there is no raſhneſs in departing here, from the vulgar Opinion, ſince it is merely a Critical Queſtion, that hath no regard to Faith, becauſe it is granted on all ſides, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Author of the Doctrine compriſed in the Creed, and that the Apoſtles taught it to all the Chriſtians. Beſides, they that maintain the common Opinion, are at laſt obliged to ſubſcribe to our determination when they are urged; and to acknowledge, when it is objected to them, that the ancient Roman Creed was different from our Vulgar; that our Creed is not the Apoſtles as to the words, but as to the Senſe, which comes to our Opinion at laſt. And beſides it is not unuſual in Critical Matters to forſake an Opinion that hath been generally received, and to embrace that of ſome Learned and Judicious Men, even of thoſe that are ſuſpected not to be Orthodox. Thus all the World is at preſent agreed in this, that the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions and Canons were not written by the Apoſtles, as we ſhall ſhew in the following Article, and yet ſcarce any Man preſumed ſo much as to doubt thereof, before Eraſmus.

Of the Canons and Conſtitutions attributed to the Apoſtles.

Apoſtolical Canons and Conſtitutions.

THE Opinions of Authors are extreamly divided, as to the Canons that are commonly called Apoſtolical. Turrianus and ſome others have determined, that they were all compoſed by the Apoſtles: Baronius and Bellarmine except the 35 laſt, which are rejected by them as Apocryphal, but they have made no difficulty to admit the firſt 50. Gabriel Albaſpinæus Biſhop of Orleans, and others, have believed, that although theſe Canons are not written by the Apoſtles, yet that they were very ancient, as being properly a Collection of the Canons of divers Councils that were holden before that of Nice; this Opinion is likewiſe maintained by the Learned Dr. Beverege, in a Book lately publiſhed by him, Entituled, Vindiciæ Canonum, &c. calling by this Name the Collection of 85 Canons attributed to the Apoſtles. Laſtly, M. Daillé affirms, that theſe Canons are not only falſly aſcribed to the Apoſtles, but are alſo of a much later date, and were not Collected until about the end of the Fifth Century. We ſhall now proceed to examine theſe Opinions, and to eſtabliſh that of Albaſpinæus, which ſeems to be moſt probable.

It is not very difficult to prove, that theſe Canons were not compiled by the Apoſtles themſelves; we need only peruſe them, to be convinced, that they contain divers things that never were, nor indeed could be decreed by the Apoſtles (a); ſome whereof relate to certain Queſtions that were not debated until many years after their death (b). But it ought to be obſerved, that they are uſually ſtyled by the ancient Writers, Ancient Canons, Canons of the Fathers, and Eccleſiaſtical Canons; Titles that are likewiſe prefixed to them in ſeveral Manuſcripts, as Cotelerius has obſerved: And if they are ſometimes called or entituled Apoſtolical, it cannot be upon the account of their belonging to the Apoſtles; but it is ſufficient that ſome of them have been made by Biſhops that preſided over the Church a little after the Apoſtles, becauſe they that lived at that time were generally called Apoſtolical Men. The Author of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions is the firſt that attributed theſe Canons to the Apoſtles, and he hath ſaid ſome things to induce us to believe, that they were actually compoſed by the Apoſtles (c). Therefore theſe Canons are not the Work of an Impoſtor, who hath forged them under the Name of the Apoſtles, but only a Collection that hath been falſly imputed to them, that it might be eſteemed more Authentick: And I am apt to believe, that no Perſon was more capable of performing this Artifice (d), than the above-cited Author of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, who hath in like manner aſcribed many other Writings to the Apoſtles, and hath inſerted theſe Canons entire in his third Book. Apoſtolical Canons and Conſtitutions.

As for the Antiquity of them, it is apparent that they are very ancient, and that a great part of them (if not all) were decreed by Councils that were holden before that of Nice: For firſt, they do not contain any thing (according to my judgment) but what is conformable to the Diſcipline that was obſerved in ſome Churches at the end of the ſecond Century, throughout the third, and in the beginning of the fourth. Secondly, they comprehend certain Ordinances that are known to have been made in thoſe times: As for example; There is a Canon that prohibits the Celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter with the Jews, now we are aſſured, that this was Decreed in divers Synods aſſembled in the time of Pope Victor. Moreover there are three, wherein the Baptiſm of Hereticks is rejected, as void and of no effect, which is declared by Firmilian and Dionyſius Alexandrinus to have been determined in the Councils of Synnada and Iconium, that were holden ſome time before them. But who can believe, that theſe Canons were made or counterfeited at a time when Perſons baptized by Hereticks were generally admitted without re-baptizing them? And it cannot be imagined, that they were forged by St. Cyprian, or Firmilian, on purpoſe to authorize their Diſcipline; It is much more reaſonable to believe, that they really are the very Canons of the Synods of Iconium and Synnada, which have been falſly attributed to the Apoſtles, not by theſe Saints, but by later Authors. Thirdly, It is clearly proved, that the greateſt part of theſe Canons are more ancient than the Council of Nice, becauſe they are often cited (e) in this Council, and thoſe that were conven'd not long after, as well as by the Authors who wrote in the fourth Century under the name of Ancient Laws, Canons of the Fathers, Eccleſiaſtical Canons, and even Apoſtolical, which is different from what they call Cuſtoms, Manners, or Diſcipline, concerning which there are no written Rules or Injunctions. Therefore it is certain, that theſe Canons are ancient, that they have been erroneouſly aſcribed to the Apoſtles, and that they are a Collection of Ordi-

(a) Diverſ things that never were, nor indeed could be eſtabliſhed by the Apoſtles.] In the firſt Canon it is Decreed, that a Biſhop ſhould not be Ordained but by two or three Biſhops; whereas it is certain, that in the time of the Apoſtles one ſingle Biſhop was ſufficient to Ordain another. In the third it is determined, that the Firſt-Fruits ſhould be ſo preſented to the Biſhop and Prieſt, as that they ſhould be brought immediately to them, and not offered on the Altar. In the fourth it is provided, that Oil and Incenſe only ſhould be offered on the Altar. Now it is not probable, that any ſuch things were offered in the time of the Apoſtles. In the fifth Canon it is ordained that the Feaſt of Eaſter ſhould not be celebrated after the Jewiſh manner: If this had been determined by the Apoſtles, the Controverſy between Victor and the Aſiaticks might have been eaſily decided; but it was not, and Victor only alledged the Tradition of his Anceſtors: In like manner the 21. Canon againſt thoſe that made themſelves Eunuchs would have been produced by Demetrius againſt Origen, and Origen's action would not have been juſtified by Alexander and Theoctiſtus, if there had been then extant a Canon of the Apoſtles, that had ſo preciſely forbidden it. In the 34th and 35th Canons mention is made of the right of Metropolitans, and of the diſtinction of Biſhopricks, which were not fixed at that time. In the 50th Canon it is decreed, that he that did not baptize or dip a Child twice in the water ſhould be depoſed; This practice, though very ancient, is later than the Apoſtolical times. The 52d is againſt the Errors of the Montaniſts and Novatians. The 60th is againſt Books forged by the Hereticks after the death of the Apoſtles. And the 66th is againſt the Sabbatical Faſt. The 69th regulates faſting in Lent. In the following Canons are contained ſeveral Injunctions concerning Oil, Veſſels of Gold and Silver, and Vails conſecrated in Churches, things that were not known in the time of the Apoſtles. The laſt Canon comprehends a Catalogue of Sacred Books which could not be written by the Apoſtles. In the 45th, 46th, and 47th Canons the Baptiſm of Hereticks is rejected as null and void. This queſtion was not reſolved by the Apoſtles. Moreover the ſtyle of theſe Canons is not like the Apoſtles; and the matter is very different from that which was uſually treated by them; neither were the names of Clerk, Biſhop, Altars, Sacrifice, &c. ſo common in the Apoſtolical times.

(b) Queſtions that were not debated until many years after their death.] Viz. The queſtions relating to the Feaſt of Eaſter, the Baptiſm of Hereticks, as alſo concerning thoſe that make themſelves Eunuchs; thoſe that would not admit Sinners to repentance; thoſe that faſt on Sundays, &c. Vide ſupra.

(c) To induce us to believe that they were actually compoſed by the Apoſtles.] As for example in the 29th Canon, where it is ordained, that thoſe Biſhops that ſhould obtain the Epiſcopal Dignity by Money, ſhould be depoſed, as Simon was by St. Peter; he hath added by me Peter. For theſe words are not found in the Epiſtle of Taraſius to Pope Adrian, nor in the Edition of Dionyſius Exiguus. Moreover in the 5th Canon, we read at preſent the Lord hath declared unto us; whereas in the Greek Manuſcripts, and in the Edition of Zonaras and Balſamon, it is ſimply expreſſed, the Lord hath declared; and in that of Joannes Antiochenus, Our Lord hath declared. Laſtly, in the 82d Canon there is this expreſſion, as our Brother Oneſimus, and in the laſt, our Acts, where it ought to be read ſimply as in the Arabick Paraphraſe, as Oneſimus, and the Acts of the Apoſtles.

(d) I am apt to believe that no perſon was more capable of performing this Artifice.] It is ſuitable to the temper of this Author who deſigned to paſs every where for a Diſciple of the Apoſtles; for which reaſon he has given us divers Conſtitutions under their name, attributing to every Apoſtle ſome particular Conſtitutions and Liturgies, at the end whereof he annexed theſe Canons with the above-mentioned additions; and he likewiſe adds in the name of the Apoſtles: This is what we thought fit to command you O ye Biſhops, continue to obſerve theſe things.

(e) they are often cited.] In the firſt Canon of the Council of Nice, the ſecond of the Apoſtles is alledged, concerning thoſe that make themſelves Eunuchs, and in the fifth Canon of the ſame Council, the 12th and 32d is cited relating to Excommunication. In the ninth Canon of the Council of Antioch the 34th is quoted concerning the Metropolitan; in the 20th Canon of the ſame, the 10th about Excommunication; in the 21ſt Canon, the 14th prohibiting Biſhops to nances of divers ancient Synods that were holden before the Council of Nice, but it is not known when this Collection was made, nor who collected it, nor even whether it consists of those 85 Canons that are now extant, or of a lesser number. However, it is probable, that it was compiled at several times, and that some Canons have been successively added, because no order is observed therein, as also because that the Canons relating to one and the same Subject are often found separated, besides some Contradictions.

The Objections propounded by M. Daillé against the Apostolical Canons, manifestly prove against Turrianus that they were not composed by the Apostles, but they do not in the least impugn our opinion. As for Example; It is objected by him, That there are in these Canons certain terms that were not usual in the time of the Apostles, as Clerk, Lecturer, Laick, Metropolitan, &c. But he cannot deny that these terms were used in the third Age of the Church. That which is ordained concerning Lent, and against fasting on Sundays or the Sabbath, may belong to the third Century since the same things are found in the Works of Tertullian. The Canons against those that make themselves Eunuchs, might be composed by Demetrius against the Error of Origen. The Canons concerning Easter, are apparently those of the Councils of Synnada and Iconium. Upon the perusal of all the Objections alledged by M. Daillé, it will appear, that although they are extremely weighty against the Opinion of Turrianus, yet they are of no force against ours (f).

It ought then to be esteemed as certain, that not only the first 50 Canons, but likewise the following 35 are very ancient, though they do not belong to the Apostles. Therefore they have been always much esteemed by the Greeks, as being of great Authority. Joannes Antiochenus, who lived in the time of the Emperor Justinian, hath inserted them in his Collection of Canons; and they are commended by Justinian, himself in his sixth Novel. They are in like manner approved in the Synod that was holden in the imperial Palace after the fifth General Council; cited in the seventh Oecumenial Council, and allowed by St. Joannes Damascenus, and Photius, but with this difference, that the first, who was no great Critick, attributed them to the Apostles, and the other that was more quick-sighted in these matters, doubted whether they belonged to them. However they have not always met with the same Reception among the Latins. Cardinal Humbert hath rejected them, and Gelasius hath placed them amongst the Apocryphal Books, as well because they were falsely ascribed to the Apostles, as because he found among them some Canons, that authorised the opinion of St. Cyprian concerning the Baptism of Hereticks. Hinchmar favourably explains Gelasius's Notion, declaring, that he did not insert them among those Books that were Apocryphal and full of Errors, but only in the number of those with respect to which this Rule of St. Paul ought to be observed, Try all things, and hold fast that which is good. Dionysius Exiguus hath translated the first 50, and hath prefixed them to his Collection, taking notice however, that some Persons would not acknowledge them; and perhaps this is the reason that Martinus Braccarensis would not admit them into his Collection of Canons; but Isidore hath made no difficulty to afford them a place in his, and ever since they have been always accounted as a part of the Canon Law. It is further to be observed, that as soon as they appeared in France, they were generally well received there, and were first urged in the cause of Prætextatus under the Reign of King Chilperic, wherein their Authority was allowed, as we are informed by Gregorius Turonensis in the fifth Book of his History, Chap. 19. where he takes notice, that there was an Appendix added to the Collection of Canons, which contained certain Canons, as being writ by the Apostles, quasi Apostolicos, and cites one of them, which is the 25th Apostolical, but according to a different Version from that of Dionysius Exiguus. Lastly, Hinchmar Bishop of Rheims observes, that they were annexed to the beginning of a Collection of Canons compiled for the use of the Church of France, separately from the others and as for their Authority and Antiquity, he is altogether of our opinion, which he explains in these words, in the 24th Canon. The Canons (says he) that are called Apostolical, collected by some Christians, were written in a time when the Bishops could not freely assemble together, nor hold Councils; they contain many things that may be allowed, but they likewise establish others that ought not to be observed.

Apostolical Canons & Constitutions.

I cannot say the same thing of the Apostolical Constitutions, as I have done of the Canons, viz. that they are not suppositious, but that in process of time a false Title happened to be attributed to them; for the Author of the Constitutions is an Impostor, that endeavours every where to pass for Clement a Disciple of the Apostles, and who imputes to them all in general, and to every one in particular, divers Ordinances that leave their Dioceses; and in the 23d Canon the 76th, that a Successor ought not to be elected. In the Synod of Constantinople convened in the year 394, the 14th Apostolical Canon is quoted, of the Jurisdiction of Bishops. In the Council of Ephesus, Acts 7. col. 788. we find the 35th cited concerning Ordinations; and in Act. 1. the 74th is alledged relating to the three Admonitions that ought to precede Ecclesiastical Censure. Moreover Alexander in Theodoret, lib. 1. c. 4. cites the 12th, as also Athanasius, Epist. ad omnes Orthodoxos, where he likewise alludes to the 29th, 30th and 75th Canons. The 34th is alledged by Arsenius, in like manner the 30th, 35th, and 81st are quoted by Pope Julius in his Epistle. St. Basil in the 43d Canon plainly cites the 24th of the Apostles, under the name of an ancient Canon; in the 12th Canon the 77th concerning Bigamy; and in the first the 47th relating to the Baptism of Hereticks. Lastly Theodotius in Cod. Lib. 3. de summâ Trinitate quotes the 17th under the name of an Apostolical Canon.

M. Daillé replies, that all these Quotations do not relate, to the Apostolical Canons, but to the Discipline, Customs and Traditions that proceeded from the Apostles; however this answer hath no probability; for the word Canon signifies written Laws, and the Council of Nice distinguisheth Canons from Customs, which are therein called ἀρχαία ἔθη. Moreover M. Daillé adds, that certain Canons and ancient Laws are often cited that are not included in the Apostolical, and he produceth two Examples, the first whereof is taken from the 13th Canon of the Nicene Council, and the 2d from the 21st of that of Ancyra. But first, the Apostolical or Ecclesiastical Canons are not cited by name in these two, but only in the first an ancient and Canonical Law or Custom, παλαιὸν καὶ κανόνικον νόμον, and in the second πρότερον ὅρον, an ancient definition. Secondly, nothing hinders but that these words may be understood of some ancient definitions of Synods; as for example, the Law wherein it was ordained to receive the Lapsi at the point of death, cited in the first Canon, was made in the Eastern and African Churches before the Council of Nice, if we may give credit to the Testimony of Dionysius Alexandrinus in Ep. ad Stephanum, produced by Eusebius, Lib. 7. chap. 4. and 5.

(f) They are of no force against ours.] However, some of the most material of M. Daillé's Reasons may be objected to us; for instance, he affirms that St. Athanasius in the matter of Leontius the Eunuch, cites the Canon of the Council of Nice, and not the Apostolical, which shews (says he) that it was not as yet known: Moreover, that it is not quoted by St. Epiphanius against the Valesian Hereticks: That St. Basil reckons the triple Immersion in Baptism amongst the unwritten Traditions, and consequently, that the Canon of the Apostles in which it is ordained, was not composed in the time of this Father: That this Canon was made against those Hereticks that Baptized with a single Immersion, and that the Eunomians were the first that followed this practice. These are the Arguments of M. Daillé that can be urged against us, but it is very easie to refute them. St. Athanasius cites the Apostolical Canon rather than that of Nice. St. Epiphanius produceth no Canon against the Valesians, but only the Holy Scripture. St. Basil and the other Fathers understand by unwritten Tradition all those matters that are not contained in the Sacred Writings. Lastly, the Canon concerning triple Immersion was not made against Hereticks, but to prevent the negligence of Priests. The 84th Canon might indeed be objected with much more probability, wherein we find the Books of the Maccabees, together with the Epistles and Constitutions of St. Clement among the Canonical Writings. But it must be replied to this Objection, that this Canon is corrupted, that the Books of the Maccabees are not extant in the Greek Copy of Joannes Antiochenus, and it may easily be discerned, that the Epistles and Constitutions of St. Clement, have been added by the Author of the Apostolical Constitutions, who endeavoured to pass for St. Clement, to raise the reputation of this Book. It may be proved that this Canon is ancient, because the Books of the Old Testament that were not inserted in the Canon of the Jews, and the Revelation are omitted. Lastly, It is asserted against us, that these Canons were unknown to the Authors of the Fifth Century, that they are not cited by Eusebius, nor included in the Codex Canonum of the Catholick Church; but all these Objections are frivolous, for the Ecclesiastical Writers of the fourth Age have often referred to these Canons. Eusebius indeed hath not mentioned them, but neither doth he take notice of the Canons of the Nicene Council, and in fine it is not to be wondred at that they are not found in the Code of the universal Church, which did not contain all the ancient Canons, no more than that of the African Church comprehended those that were made by St. Cyprian or Agrippinus.

Apoſtolical Canons & Conſtitutions.

are in no wiſe conſonant to the Apoſtolical ones; ſuch are thoſe concerning Churches built in the form of Temples, Catechumens, Energumens, Faſts, Liturgies, Unction, Prayers for the Catechumens and Energumens; The Ordination of Deacons and Deaconeſſes; Virgins, Confeſſors, Subdeacons; The Benediction of Oyl and Water; The Firſt-Fruits of Tyths, Feſtival Days, the Celebration of Eaſter, and many other things that were not practiſed in the time of the Apoſtles, not to mention a great number of Abſurdities and Miſtakes of time, together with ſome Errors that are contained therein (g), which evidently demonſtrates beyond contradiction, that theſe conſtitutions were not compoſed by Apoſtles, and even that they do not belong to St. Clement, as we ſhall ſhew more at large in diſcourſing concerning the Works of this Father, where we ſhall likewiſe endeavour to diſcover at what time they were forged.

Apoſtolical Canons & Conſtitutions.

I ſhall add nothing concerning the Nine Canons that are alſo attributed to the Apoſtles, and are reported to have been made by them in a certain Council of Antioch unknown to all Antiquity; becauſe there is no queſtion but that they are fictitious; neither are they at preſent maintained by any (h).

(g) A great number of Abſurdities and Miſtakes of Time, together with ſome Errors that are contained therein.] As in Book 1. That the Beards of Women ought to be ſhaved, and not thoſe of Men. In Book 2. Chap. 1. That all Biſhops ought to be 50 years old. In Chap. 57. it is ordained, that the Goſpel according to St. John ſhould be read; which was not written until the 97th year of our Lord, after the death of the Apoſtles. In Chap. 11. the Author aſſerts, That the Biſhop preſides over Kings and Magiſtrates; and in Book 3. Chap. 2. That third Marriages are an Intemperance, and the fourth a manifeſt Debauchery. In Book 6. Chap. 6. mention is made of the Ebionites, whoſe Errors ſprang up after the deceaſe of the Apoſtles. In the 14th Chapter, James the Son of Zebedee is introduced as preſent at Jeruſalem after the time of his death. In Book 8. Chap. 4. it is declared, That the Conſtitutions were made in the preſence of St. Paul and the Seven Deacons; now it is certain, that St. Stephen, one of the ſaid Seven Deacons, died before the Converſion of St. Paul. In Book 1. Chap. 32. Female Slaves are permitted to ſuffer themſelves to be deflowred by their Maſters. Moreover this Author is accuſed of Arianiſm.

(h) Neither are they maintained at preſent by any.] This Synod is unknown to St. Luke, and to all the Ancients; for although it is ſaid to be cited by Innocent I. Ep. 18. it is a miſtake, ſince he only mentions the Council of Jeruſalem; and whereas it is written, Antiochenam Eccleſiam quæ meruit apud ſe celeberrimum Apoſtolorum Conventum. The Church of Antioch, which deſervedly had the moſt famous Convention of the Apoſtles celebrated there, it ought to be read propter ſe, near that City; for it is apparent, that this Pope ſpake concerning the Synod of Jeruſalem, which was the moſt famous Convention of the Apoſtles. Moreover, not ſo much as one of the ancient Authors makes mention of theſe Canons, and indeed they are altogether abſurd: It is ſaid in the firſt, that the Chriſtians were called Gallileans, a Name that was not attributed to them until after the death of the Apoſtles. In the third Canon it is decreed, that the Chriſtians ſhould live Anagogically, a harſh and inſignificant Term. In the 9th Canon the Synagogue is called Belluine; and in the 8th it is ordained, that there ſhould be Images in the Churches, a practice that was not in uſe in the time of the Apoſtles. This Canon is cited by Gregorius Peſſinuntius in the ſecond Council of Nice, but it is well known that many Apocryphal Records were alledged in that Council.

Of ſeveral Books attributed to Prochorus, Linus, and Abdias, and of the Acts of the Paſſion of St. Andrew.

Prochorus, Linus, Abdias, &c.

IN the time of the Apoſtles there lived a certain Perſon named Prochorus, one of the ſeven firſt Deacons, and there is now extant a Book under his name, containing the Life of St. John, which is Printed among the Orthodoxographa, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum. But Baronius, Bellarmin, Lorinus, The Maſter of the Palace, and in a word, all thoſe that have written concerning Eccleſiaſtical Authors both Roman Catholicks and Proteſtants unanimouſly agree, that it is a ſuppoſititious Book, and unworthy of him whoſe Name it bears; and indeed, it is a Narrative full of abſurd Fables and Tales. It is related there, that St. John caſt himſelf at the Feet of the Apoſtles, deſiring to be exempted from going into Aſia; That after he was taken out of the Caldron of boiling Oyl, a Church was built in Honour of him; That he compoſed his Goſpel in the Iſle of Patmos, &c. The Stile of this Book argues its Author to be a Latin or a Greek, and not an Hebrew. Laſtly, we find therein the words Trinity and Hypoſtaſis.

The two Books attributed to Linus concerning the Paſſion of St. Peter, and St. Paul are likewiſe generally rejected, as fictitious and full of Fables. They ſay, that Agrippa was Governor of Rome in the time of St. Peter, who ſuffered Martyrdom without the knowledge of Nero; That this Emperor was offended that he was put to death; That part of the Roman Magiſtrates were Chriſtians; and that the Wife of Albanus departed from her Husband againſt his Will, following the advice of St. Peter. In fine, both theſe Books are full of Errors, Falſities, Fictions, and notorious Untruths; in the laſt of which mention is made of the Epiſtles of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul.

We muſt likewiſe give the ſame Judgment upon the Book imputed to Abdias, that contains divers extremely fabulous Relations concerning the Lives of the Apoſtles, and was Printed by it ſelf in the years 1557, 1560, and 1571; at Baſil, Anno 1532, and at Paris in 1583; it is alſo inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. At firſt they tried to make it paſs for a Book compoſed in Hebrew, by a Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, named Abdias of the City of Babylon, Tranſlated into Greek by Eutropius, and into Latin by Julius Africanus; but now the whole World is convinced of this Error, and it is generally agreed, that it was forged by an Impoſtor, that falſly pretends to be a Diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, who nevertheleſs cites Hegeſippus, and Julius Africanus, whom he could not have ſeen if he had lived in our Saviours time; and laſtly, he relates many fabulous Narrations concerning the Life of Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles, which it would be too tedious here to rehearſe.

Prochorus, Linus, Abdias, &c.

Men are divided in their Cenſures upon the Acts of the Paſſion of St. Andrew written by the Prieſts of Achaia, which are inſerted in the Hiſtory of the Saints publiſhed by Surius: Baronius, Bellarmin, and ſome other Criticks of the Church of Rome admit them as Authentick, but they are rejected by many. The ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers know no other Records of St. Andrew than thoſe that were corrupted by the Manichees, mentioned by St. Auguſtine, Philaſtrius, and Pope Innocent (a), and which are reckoned by Gelaſius in the number of Apocryphal Books. But it is certain that thoſe were different from theſe whereof we now diſcourſe; It is alſo evident, that theſe laſt Acts of the Paſſion of St. Andrew, have been cited by none but Authors that lived ſince the Seventh or Eighth Century, as by Remigius Altiſſiodorenſis, Petrus Damianus, Lanfrank, St. Bernard, and Ivo Carnutenſis, which is the cauſe that we can have no aſſurance that they are very ancient. Thirdly, the Myſtery of the Trinity is not only explained in theſe Acts after ſuch a manner as gives us occaſion to ſuſpect, that he that wrote them lived after the Council of Nice; but he likewiſe propagates the Error of the modern Greeks, in affirming, that the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from the Father, and remains in the Son. It is indeed objected, that there are Manuſcripts wherein theſe words are not expreſſed, but who knows, whether they have not been omitted in ſome, rather than added in others? Therefore this Hiſtory ought at leaſt to be eſteemed, as a dubious Writing, that cannot be applied (as St. Jerome declares) to prove any Doctrine of Faith.

The account of the Life and Death of St. Matthias was forged by an Author who pretends to have received it from a Jew that tranſlated it out of the Hebrew Tongue. We ought alſo to place in the rank of Apocryphal and Fabulous Books, the Life of St. Mark, and the Hiſtory of St. Clement, together with that of Apollinarius, ſet down in the Collection of ancient Hiſtories compiled by Laurentius de la Barre. And we need only read them over to be convinced of their Falſity.

Of

Of the Books of the Sibyls, Trismegistus, and Hystaspes: Of the Letters of Lentulus and Pilate, concerning Jesus Christ: Of the Epistles of Seneca to St. Paul, and of those of St. Paul to Seneca: And of a Passage in the History of Josephus.

Sibyls.

WE join all these prophane Records together, that have been heretofore alledged in favour of the Christian Religion, that so we may examine them; and although we should reject them, yet we do not believe that we do any wrong to Religion, which is sufficiently furnished with solid and convincing Proofs, without standing in need of those that are false or dubious. We begin with the Verses that are attributed to the Sibyls, which are frequently cited by the ancient Writers to convince the Pagans of the Truth of the Religion of Jesus Christ; but before we proceed to examine them, it would be expedient to give some account of these Sibyls and their Books.

It is difficult to assign a true Etymology of the Word Sibyl; Lactantius, and after him St. Jerome, affirm, that the Sibyls were so called, because they were the Interpreters of the Decrees of the Gods; and that their Name consisted of two Greek Words (a), signifying the Counsel of the Gods, which being written in the Æolick Dialect compose that of Sibyl. It is derived by some from an Hebrew Word, and by others from an obsolete Latin Adjective (b), that signifies, subtil or acute; but this later Conjecture is false, since the Word Sibyl was used by the Greeks before the Latins. The most probable opinion is, that the Name Sibyl, which was proper to the famous Delphick Prophetess, afterwards became common to others, as that of Cæsar, peculiar only to Julius, was after him appropriated to all the succeeding Emperors.

Nothing is so uncertain as the Number and Names of the Sibyls (c), many of the ancient Writers mention but one; some speak of her of Cuma, and others of her of Delphos. Strabo and some others distinguish two Erythræan. Solinus produceth three, her of Delphos, her of Erythræ, and her of Cuma. Pausanias names four, the Libyck, the Delphick or Erythræan, the Cuman and the Babylonian. Ælian, Varro, Lactantius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and most other Writers, reckon ten, and some add others to the number, but they do not agree about their Names, nor the Place of their Habitation, and they often confound them one with another. Sibyls.

However it is certain, that the Name of Sibyls was given to certain Women, who being transported with Enthusiasm (d) and an extravagant Fury, caused either through a violent Inflammation of Choler, or by the possession of Dæmons, pronounced divers obscure and enigmatical Sentences that passed among the Heathens for Oracles and Predictions. It is reported, that the Sibyl of Cuma wrote them on the Leaves of Trees (e), and that a Collection of them was offered by a certain Woman to Tarquinius (f) King of the Romans, who bought part thereof, which he caused carefully to be laid up in an Urn or Stone-Pot, and to be placed in the Capitol, having created Officers on purpose, whom he called Duumviri, whose Office it was to keep those Oracles with care, and to consult them upon urgent Occasions. The number of those that executed this Commission was by little and little encreased, for there were afterwards ten, and at last fifteen, constituted for this purpose; and very severe Punishments were inflicted on these persons, if they suffered the Books of the Sibyls to be seen. It is related by Dionysius Halicarnassæus, and Valerius Maximus, that one of these Duumviri was put to Death as a Parricide, that is to say, he was sow'd up alive in a Sack, and thrown into the Sea, for permitting some of the Sibylline Verses to be transcribed. These Books were thus preserved until the year 671, after the Foundation of Rome, which was the 83d before the Nativity of Jesus Christ. But the Capitol being burnt in that year, these Books were likewise consumed with the rest of the Ornaments of this Palace, as is observed by Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Pliny, and other Authors. When the Capitol was rebuilt, the Consuls made a Proposition to the Senate, to send Ambassadors into Greece to Erythræ, as also into Asia, to collect the Oracles of the Sibyls, and to transmit them

(a) Consisted of two Greek Words.] These two Words are σὺ βάλλω, and in the Æolick Dialect σὺ ϝάλλω, Lactantius Lib. 1. c. 6. Hierom. Lib. 1. in Jovin. It is objected against this Etymology that the Adjective σιϐυλλιακὸς, the three last Syllables whereof compose a Dactyl, make it manifest that the word Sibylla cannot be derived from σὺ ϝάλλω.

(b) From an obsolete Latin Adjective.] this Adjective is Sibus, which according to Festus signifies the same as Acutus, or Callidus; a quick, or crafty Man.

(c) Nothing is so uncertain as the Number and Names of the Sibyls.] Plato in his Phædrus mentions but one Sibyl, neither doth he declare to what place she appertained. The Author of the Book de mirabilibus Auscultationibus in Aristotle speaks of her of Cuma. Diodorus Siculus lib. 4. gives an account of her of Delphos, affirming that she was named Daphne, and was the Daughter of Tiresias; but Virgil, Pausanias and Suidas call her by the Name of Manto, and St. Clement by that of Artemis. Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Pliny, Juvenal, &c. mention but one Sibyl: However it doth not follow, that they knew no others. Strabo lib 13, and 17. assures us, that there were two at Erythræ, and that the second called Athenais lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Stephanus de Urbibus and Capella, Lib. 2. de Nuptiis Philologiæ reckon likewise two, Erophile a Native of Troy, who came to Cuma, and Symmachia of the City of Erythræ. Solinus in Polyhist. c. 8. produceth three, the Delphick named Eriphile, who was more ancient than Homer, the Erythræan, and the Cuman. Ælian Var. Hist. Lib. 2. c. 35. reckons ten, the Erythræan, the Samian, the Egyptian, the Sardian, the Cuman, the Jewish and four others. St. Clement, Stromat. Lib. 1. Manto (says he) and a multitude of Sibyls; the Samian, the Colophonian, the Thessalian, the Thesprotick, &c. Lactantius in Lib. 1. recites ten after Varro: The first is that of Persia mentioned by Nicanor, who wrote the History of Alexander the Great: The second of Lybia, cited by Euripides. 3. The Delphick alledged by Chrysippus, in Lib. de Divinatione. 4. The Cuman in Italy, whom Nævius and Piso mention, the former in his History of the Punick War, and the later in his Annals. 5. The Erythræan, whom Apollodorus Erythræus affirms to have lived in his City. 6. The Samian, concerning whom Eratosthenes hath written. 7. The Cuman, called by some Amalthea, and by others Demophile, or Herophile. 8. The Helespontick born in the Country about Troy, and in the Town of Marpessus. 9. The Phrygian, who Propheſied at Ancyra. 10. The Tiburtine named Albunea, who uttered her Oracles at Tybur, near the River Anio now called il Teverone, at the bottom whereof it is reported, that her Statue was found holding a Book in her hand. Isidore hath followed the Catalogue of Lactantius, but Suidas reckons up twelve: Some with Pausanias, confound the Erythræan with the Delphick, the Phrygian, the Samian and the Colophonian. Others as Capella, and the Author de Mirab. Auscultat. joyn the Cuman, and the Erythræan, St. Justin makes no Distinction between the Babylonian and the Cuman; according to the Opinion of some, the Persick is the most ancient, others attribute the greatest Antiquity to the Cuman, and St. Clement to the Delphick.

(d) Transported with Enthusiasm.] We need only read the Description that is made by all the ancient Authors of the manner how the Sibyls uttered their Oracles: See Virgil in Æneid. Lucan. Claudian in Panegyrico Honorii Plutarch. de Orac. Pythiæ, &c. It was so evident among the Heathens, that they were possessed, that they applyed the Word σιϐυλλαίνειν, to signifie, to play the Madman, Diod. Lib. 4. Now this fury that deprived them of their Senses, cannot be esteemed as an Inspiration of the Holy Ghost, but as an Effect of their being possessed with a Dæmon, and intoxicated with the Exhalations of inflamed Choler; for in my Opinion, it is an Imagination without any Ground to affirm with St. Jerome, that they received the Gift of Prophecying from God, in recompence of their Virginity.

(e) Wrote them on the Leaves of Trees.] Virgil. Æneid. 6. Foliis tantum ne carmina manda. Juvenal. Credite me folium recitare Sibyllæ.

(f) Was offered by a certain Woman to Tarquinius.] This History is recorded by many ancient Authors; some affirm, that those Books were presented to Tarquinius Superbus, and others, to Tarquinius Priscus. It is reported, that the Woman who brought them had Nine Volumes, which she offered to Sell at a dear Rate, but perceiving that Tarquin would not give her what she required, she burnt Three of them; that afterwards having demanded as much for the other Six, as she had done for the Nine, and being repulsed, she burnt Three more, when at last the King being astonished at her boldness, bought the Three that were left at the same Price that she had asked for the Nine. See Dionysius Halicarnassæus. Antiquit. Lib. 4. Aulus Gellius and Lactantius. Pliny reckons but Three Books instead of Nine; and affirms that Two of them were burnt, Sibyls. to Rome: Whereupon Octacilius Craſſus, and L. Valerius Flaccus were deputed to go unto Attalus King of Pergamus, who brought out of Aſia a thouſand Verſes attributed to the Sibyls, which they had gathered together throughout all the Parts of that Region from the Copies of divers private Perſons. But foraſmuch as there were many things therein that ſeemed to be falſe or ſuperfluous, fifteen Men were appointed to reviſe and correct them, and after this Correction they were placed in the Capitol in the room of the others. In the time of Auguſtus, theſe Books were again reviewed, above two thouſand Verſes attributed to the Sibyls were burnt by the Command of this Emperor, and thoſe that were allowed to be Genuine, were encloſed in two golden Boxes in the Temple of Apollo. Some are of opinion, that theſe Writings were burnt in the Conflagration of Rome under Nero, but they have not produced any convincing Proofs of this matter. However, it is certain, that as long as there were Pagan Emperors at Rome (g), the Oracles aſcribed to the Sibyls were carefully preſerved there, to which they had Recourſe on all extraordinary and emergent Occaſions, and Julian the Apoſtate deſigning to re-eſtabliſh all the ancient Heathen Superſtitions, cauſed the Sibylline Books to be diligently ſought for, and conſulted.

There are now extant many Greek Verſes attributed to the Sibyls, which are divided into eight Books; but at preſent it is almoſt generally agreed throughout the whole World, that they are a fictitious Work, as the Time in which they were written (h), the Style (i), and the Things therein contained (k), do moſt clearly demonſtrate. And if it be certain, that the eight Books, which we now have in our poſſeſſion under the Name of the Sibyls, are counterfeit, it is no leſs true, that thoſe that were in the hands of the Fathers, and which they cited, were equally ſpurious, and alſo that they were not much different from thoſe that we have at this day; I affirm therefore, Firſt, That the Books of the Sibyls, alledged by the Fathers, were not really thoſe Sibylline Oracles that the Romans preſerved, with ſo much Care; For beſides that theſe laſt were ſo ſtrictly kept, that a Copy of them could not be procured by any means whatſoever, much leſs common, as thoſe were that are quoted by the Fathers, which were every where viſible; it is plain, that they comprehended ſuch matters as were altogether different from thoſe that are uſually found in the Writings of the Fathers. For in the former prophane Things were only compriſed, concerning the Ceremonies of the Heathens, whereas the later were full of Predictions and Inſtructions relating to Chriſtianity. The Books of the Sibyls were never conſulted among the Romans, without extracting from them ſome Superſtitions perfectly Pagan (l). They were informed therein, that they ought either to offer ſome ſort of Sacrifice to the Gods, or to faſten a Nail in the Capitol, or to celebrate ſome particular Games to the Honour of Jupiter. At another time it was found to be neceſſary to cauſe the Statue of Æſculapius to be brought to Rome, to erect a Temple to Venus, to offer Sacrifices to the Infernal Deities, and to appeaſe the Heathen Gods with peculiar and extraordinary Solemnities. Laſtly, Nothing was ever gathered from theſe Books, but Ceremonies that were abſolutely prophane. On the contrary, the Fathers alledge nothing out of the Writings of the Sibyls, but what relates to the Chriſtian Religion, and to the true Worſhip of God. Is there any probability, that theſe Propheteſſes ſhould have uttered Things ſo different, and that they ſhould have taught in one and the ſame Book, the way of Worſhipping the True God, and the greateſt Superſtitions of the Gentiles? Who can imagine that theſe Books, that were kept by the Romans to Authorize all their Superſtitious Rites, and which they eſteemed as the moſt ſublime and refined part of their Religion, ſhould contain far clearer Prophecies concerning Jeſus Chriſt, than all that was ever declared by the Jewiſh Prophets? Moreover, not only the Books of the Sibyls that are now extant ſpeak of our Saviour in ſuch plain Expreſſions, as look more like a Hiſtory than a Prohecy; But the ſame thing may be ſaid of the Books cited by the Fathers, that comprehend the ſame Predictions, and even more diſtinct. For can there be a plainer Prediction concerning Jeſus Chriſt, than the Verſes produced by Euſebius in the Prayer attributed to Conſtantine?

There is but one God, who is alſo the Saviour;
Who hath ſuffer'd for us;
Who is mark'd out in theſe Verſes.

Sibyls.

The Acroſtick quoted in the ſame place is not more obſcure. Can any thing be ſpoken more expreſly concerning the Creation of the World, the laſt Judgment, and the Life Everlaſting, than what is produced by Theophilus Antiochenus, as proceeding from a Sibyl? All the other Sibylline Verſes recited by the Fathers, are written almoſt after the very ſame manner on every particular Subject, and this obliged the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, attributed to St. Juſtin, to affirm, that the Sibyl had foretold the Advent of Jeſus Chriſt in clear and evident Terms, σαφῶς καὶ ῥητῶς. Now what an abſurdity is it to believe, that the Heathens, from whom God had concealed the Coming of his Son, and whom he ſuffered to walk in Darkneſs, ſhould have more notable Prophecies among them, than all thoſe of the Jews, to whoſe Cuſtody he had committed the Sacred Writings, and to whom he had given the knowledge of the Meſſiah?

Moreover, this Argument might be urged farther, and it might be demanded from whence the Sibyls could receive the knowledge of the Meſſiah. It is alledged by ſome, that they were Inſpired by God; and by others, that they took from the Holy Scripture, all that they uttered concerning Religion; but there is no probability (g) As long as there were Pagan Emperors at Rome.] See Dio in Tiberius and Nero, Spartian in the Life of Adrian, Julius Capitolinus in that of Gordian, Trebellius Pollio, in that of Gallienus, and Vopiſcus in that of Aurelian. Aurelius Victor, Ammianus Marcellinus, Lib. 24. Zozim. Lib. 2. Procop. Lib. 1.

(h) As the time in which they were written.] It is certain, that the Sibyls were later than Moſes, however the Author of this counterfeit Work affirms, that the Sibyl was in Noah's Ark, and nevertheleſs it is declared in Book III, that theſe Oracles were written 1500 years after the Grecian Empire was Eſtabliſhed. Now after whatſoever manner this may be underſtood, it follows that all theſe Predictions concerning the Jews and Moſes, are forged, ſince theſe 1500 years continue till the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem. In Book V. we are informed by the Author, that he ſaw the ſecond Ruin of the deſirable Houſe; which is plainly to be underſtood of the laſt Deſtruction of Jeruſalem. He ſays in Book VIII. That after Trajan, intimated by the Letter T, one ſhould Reign whoſe Name was to be taken from the Adriatick Sea, this is Adrian; and that after him Three ſhould Govern at a time, that is to ſay, Antoninus, Marcus and Lucius, and that the laſt ſhould obtain the Supreme Government, which ſhews that this was written at the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Aurelius, or at the end of that of Antoninus; for in regard that Lucius was the youngeſt, it was natural to foretel that he ſhould live longeſt.

(i) The Stile.] It appears, that he that counterfeited theſe Books, was not really tranſported with Enthuſiaſm, but only pretended to be ſo: The Verſes of the Sibyls were obſcure and without Order, whereas theſe are not very Irregular: The Affairs of the Emperors are therein Hiſtorically digeſted, and not after a Prophetical manner: The ſtyle contains nothing of that Impetuoſity and Enthuſiaſm that is every where Conſpicuous in the Expreſſions of the Sibyls, neither is it like that of Homer who took many Verſes from thoſe Propheteſſes, if we may believe Diodorus: Moreover the Author of theſe Sibylline Books was illiterate; for he derives the Name of Adam from ἀδω; in the Second Book he affirms, that the Four Letters of his Name ſignifie the four Quarters of the World; tho' in Hebrew and Chaldee there are but three; he feigns that the Letters of the Name of God, Compoſe the Number 1697. which is not true, unleſs it be written in Greek after a Barbarous manner; from the Name of JESUS, which he makes to conſiſt of four Vowels, and two Conſonants, he extracts the Number of 888 years, and from that of Rome 948. He vouches the Fables of the Titans, as true Hiſtories; Moreover he ſays, that the Mountain Ararat is in Phrygia; that the River Eurotas is in Epirus, and that Gog and Magog are Ethiopians, which ſhews that this Impoſtor was ignorant of the Hebrew Tongue, of Geography and Hiſtory, which we cannot ſay of the Sibyl.

(k) And the things therein contained.] There are certain Principles in theſe Books, that were not imbibed by any but the ancient Chriſtians; the Author is of the Opinion of the Millenaries, he believes Nero to be Anti-Chriſt, that the Souls of Men ſhall remain in Hell until the Reſurrection, that the Fire of the Judgment ſhall ſerve inſtead of Purgatory, that the Terreſtrial Paradiſe ſhall be preſerved, and that at laſt the wicked ſhall be delivered from Hell fire: he likewiſe maintains divers other Opinions of the ancient Chriſtians. Laſtly, it cannot be doubted, but that the Accounts in theſe Books, of the Nativity, Life and Actions of Jeſus Chriſt, have been taken from the Hiſtory of the Evangeliſts: And indeed, the Prophets have ſaid nothing that comes near the Plainneſs, that appears in the Books of the Sibyls. I ſhall omit many other Reaſons.

neither in the one nor the other Assertion; For what likelihood is there that God should inspire Sorceresses and Priestesses of false Gods, that deluded Mankind, to cause them to adore the Dæmons with which they were possessed? Or who can imagine, that God should make use of such Instruments to reveal his Mysteries so clearly to the World? And on the other side, how could they draw those Truths out of the Old Testament, that are but very obscurely expressed therein, and which the Jews themselves could scarcely understand?

It remains only for a more full demonstration of the falsity of the Sibylline Oracles that were used by the Fathers, to shew, that they differed very little from those that still bear the same Title. To evince this, it will be sufficient to observe, that excepting three or four Passages, all the others quoted by the ancient Authors, being very numerous, are expressed in equivalent Terms in the Sibylline Books that are read even at this day. Now the strongest Argument that can be alledged to prove that a Work is ancient, is, that those Passages that have been cited by the ancient Writers are found therein. Do we not frequently demonstrate the Antiquity of an infinite number of Books, only because a particular Passage recited by some ancient Author, is there to be found? Why then may it not be concluded after the same manner, that the Sibylline Books, tho' forged, are the same with those that were formerly extant? And this Proof is of so much the more force, because this may be urged not only against one single Passage, but very many, that are alledged by different Authors, and also because the Sibylline Oracles still remain in the same Language in which they were cited. Moreover it is not to be admired, that there are some Passages which are not found therein, and that there are others which are not Verbally expressed, because some places in these Books are wanting; and it hath been often observed, that the ancient Writers are not usually very exact in their Quotations, but adhere to the Sense rather than the Literal Expression. It might likewise be added, that all that is related by the ancient Fathers concerning the Books of the Sibyls that were heretofore in use, is conformable to these: The Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles affirms, that the Style of the Sibylline Writings was not very polite; these are of the like nature; they were then reported to contain divers Anachronisms, and this Defect is also at present observable among them, They Treated concerning Jesus Christ, the last Judgment, Hell, &c. all these Things are in like manner comprised in those that we now have in our possession. Lastly, these last are very ancient, and belong to the time of the most ancient Fathers; for some Opinions may be found there, that could not be maintained but in the Primitive Ages of the Church: Such are the Errors of the Millenaries; That Nero is Anti-Christ; that the End of the World was near at hand; that it should happen in the time of Antoninus; that Rome should soon be destroyed 948 years after its Foundation, and many other Things that could never be asserted by later Christians, who would have been very far from admitting such Notions, when they were convinced of the falsity of these Predictions. Upon the whole matter it ought to be concluded, that the Books of the Sibyls were certainly forged in the Second Century, but it is difficult to determine the precise time, and by whom this was done; all that can be alledged as most probable is, that they began to appear about the end of the Reign of the Emperor Antoninus Pius (m).

M. Vossius in his last Book gives us an Hypothesis of the Sibylline Oracles somewhat different from this; he acknowledgeth that the ancient Writings of the Sibyls which were preserved until the burning of the Capitol, were entirely prophane, and differed from those that are cited by the Fathers; But he maintains, that among those that were brought from Greece by Octacilius Crassus, there were some Prophecies inserted that had been received from the Jews, who pretended that they were written by the Sibyls, in which the Coming of the Messiah was foretold, and that these were cited by the Fathers under the Name of The Books of the Sibyls, which Title was actually attributed to them.

This Hypothesis, which is well enough contrived, yet lies liable to many Difficulties; for first, the Collection of Oracles ascribed to the Sibyls, that was made after the burning of the Capitol, related no less to the Pagan Superstitions, than the ancient Verses ascribed to the Sibyl of Cuma. Secondly, Since the Predictions concerning Jesus Christ, expressed in the passages of the Sibylline Books, and quoted by the Fathers, are clearer than those that were contained in the Prophecies of the Jews, there is no probability that they could proceed from any of that Nation. Lastly, the Doctrine comprised in the Books of the Sibyls, seems rather to be that of a Christian than of a Jew, since the Coming of Jesus Christ is therein manifestly foretold; the Resurrection of the Dead, the Last Judgment, and Hell Fire are expressly described in plain Terms; and mention is made of the Millennium, of the appearing of Anti-Christ, together with many other Things of the like nature, which could not be related, but by one that had been instructed in the Christian Religion. Therefore it is much more probable, that the Writings attributed to the Sibyls were forged by a Christian, than by a Jew.

Sibyls.

However, none ought to be surprised that we reject those Books as suppolititious, which have been quoted by the Ancients as real, and it must not be imagined, that we thereby contemn the Authority of the Fathers, or that we impugn the Truth; on the contrary, we should do an Injury to it, if we should endeavour to support it by false Proofs, especially when we are convinced of their Forgery. The Fathers are to be excused for citing the Sibylline Verses as true, because they had not examined them, and finding them published under the Name of the Sibyls, they really believed that they were theirs; but they that are certainly informed of the contrary, would be inexcusable if they continue to rely on such Testimonials, or refused ingenuously to confess what the Truth obliged them to own. And indeed it ought not to be admired, that the Fathers did not examine these Books critically; it is sufficiently known, that they wholly applied themselves to Matters of the greatest Consequence at that time, and that they often happened to be mistaken in prophane Histories, and to cite fictitious Books; such are the Works of Hystaspes, and Mercurius Trismegistus, which they almost always joyned with those of the Sibyls; as also the Acts of Pilate, Apocryphal Gospels, divers Acts of the Apostles, and a great number of other Records that have been undoubtedly forged.

But altho' the most part of the ancient Writers cited the Oracles of the Sibyls, yet there were even then many Christians that rejected them as Counterfeit, and could not be perswaded to approve the practice of those that made use of their Testimony, whom in derision they called by the Name of Sibyllists. This is attested by Origen, in his Fifth Book against Celsus: Celsus (says he) objects, that there are Sibyllists amongst us, perhaps, because he hath heard it reported, that there are some amongst us who reprove those that affirm, that the Sibyl is a Propheteſs, and call them Sibyllists. St. Augustine hath likewise acknowledged the falsity of these pretended Oracles; and as often as he makes mention of them, he declares that he is not convinced of their Truth, particularly in Lib. 18. c. 45. De Civit. Dei. Were it not (says he) that it is affirmed, that the Prophecies that are produced under the Name of the Sibyls and others concerning Jesus Christ, were feigned by the Christians. And in cap. 47. It may be believed, that all the Prophecies relating to Jesus Christ, that are not contained in the Holy Scriptures, have been forged by the Christians: Wherefore there can be nothing more solid in confuting the Pagans, than to alledge those Prophecies that are taken from the Books of our Enemies.

But the Heathens (say they) doubted not of the truth of the Predictions of the Sibyls that were urged by the Fathers; they only put another sense upon them, nay they even proceeded so far as to own, that the Sibylline Verses foretold the Nativity of a certain new King, and a considerable Revolution. This is mentioned by Tully in divers places; moreover when Pompey took the City of Jerusalem, it was commonly reported, that the Sibyl had foretold, that Nature designed a King for the People of Rome; the Senate was likewise astonished at it, and by reason of this Prediction, refused to send a General, or an Army, into Egypt. Lentulus (according to the Testimony of Cicero and Salust) flatter'd himself, that he should become this King that was intimated by the Sibyl. Others have interpreted this Prophecy, with respect to Julius Cæsar or Augustus, as is observed by Cicero and Suetonius. Virgil, in his Fourth Eclogue, produceth the Verses of the Cuman Sibyl, foreshewing the Birth of a new King that should descend from Heaven. In short, it is most certain, that the Gentiles acknowledged that the Books of the Sibyls were favourable to the Christians, (m) They began to appear about the end of the Reign of Antoninus Pius.] Possevinus affirms, that these Books were written under the Reign of Commodus; but he is deceived in taking the Conflagration mentioned in Book V. for the Fire of the Temple of Vesta, that happened in the time of that Emperor; for the Temple of Jerusalem is to be understood in this place, which is called the desirable House, and the Guardian Temple of God. We have already shewn, that the Author had seen Lucius and Marcus, but that he knew not the later Emperors. All the Fathers that have quoted the Sibylline Books, wrote either under the Reign of Antoninus Pius, or after that time, Josephus indeed and Hermas cite the Sibyls, but in general Terms, and there were possibly some Verses extant under their Names, even in the time of Josephus, who produceth one of them concerning the Tower of Babel, Lib. 1. Ant. c. 5.

Sibyls. inſomuch that the later were prohibited to read them, as appears from the Words of Aurelian to the Senate, recited by Vopiſcus. I admire, (ſays he) Gentlemen, that you ſhould ſpend ſo much time in conſulting the Writings of the Sibyls, as if we were debating in an Aſſembly of Chriſtians, and not in the principal place of the Roman Religion.

Theſe Arguments ſeem to be very plauſible, but if we examine them, we ſhall find that they contain nothing that is ſolid: The Pagans never ſubmitted to the Authority of theſe Books of the Sibyls that were quoted by the Fathers; on the contrary it is manifeſt, that Celſus was perſwaded that they were forged by the Chriſtians; and St. Auguſtine plainly declares, that this was the general Opinion of all the Gentiles. The Sibylline Verſes mentioned by Tully were Paracroſticks, that is to ſay, the firſt Verſe of every Sentence comprehended all the Letters in order, that began the following Verſes; now among all the Verſes of the Sibyls, only thoſe cited by Conſtantine are compoſed in Acroſticks. As for the Aſſertion, that in the time of Pompey, Julius Cæſar, and Auguſtus, there was a general report, that it was foretold in the Sibylline Books, that a new King ſhould be born within a little while; we may eaſily reply with Tully, that the Verſes attributed to the Sibyls by the Heathens were made after ſuch a manner, that any ſenſe whatſoever might be put upon them; and that, perhaps, mention might be made therein of a certain future King, as it is uſual in this kind of Prophecies. Therefore when the Grandeur of Pompey began to be formidable to the Roman Empire, they thought it fit to make uſe of this pretence, to prevent him from going into Egypt with an Army. And Lentulus, to whom this Charge was committed, being Governour of Syria, vainly flattered himſelf with this Prediction, which might peradventure be further confirmed by the Prophecies of the Jews, who expected the Coming of the Meſſiah, believing that he ought to be their King.

Afterwards when it happened that Julius Cæſar, and Auguſtus after him, actually made themſelves Maſters of the Roman Empire, the Prophetical Expreſſions of the Sibyls were interpreted in their favour; neither was it neceſſary on this account, that they ſhould clearly point at the Coming of Jeſus Chriſt, as it is expreſſed in the Writings of the Sibyls that are alledged by the Fathers; but it was ſufficient, that they mentioned a future King, which is the uſual practice of all thoſe that undertake to utter Predictions of extraordinary Events. This gave occaſion to Virgil, who intended in his fourth Eclogue to compoſe Verſes in Honour of Pollio his Patron, as alſo to Extol Auguſtus at the ſame time, and to deſcribe the Felicity of his Reign; this, I ſay, afforded him an opportunity to do it with greater Majeſty, to make uſe of the name of the Sibyl, and to pronounce theſe Verſes:

Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas;
Magnus ab integro ſæclorum naſcitur ordo:
Jam nova progenies Cœlo demittitur alto;
Jam redit & Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna.

By which nothing elſe is meant, but that at the Nativity of Saloninus the Son of Pollio, under the Conſulate of his Father, and the Reign of the greateſt Prince in the World, the Golden Age ſhould return, as it was foretold by the Sibyl; That Plenty and Peace ſhould flouriſh throughout the whole Univerſe, and that the Virgin Aſtræa, the Goddeſs of Juſtice, who had abandoned the Earth at the beginning of the Iron-Age, ſhould deſcend again from Heaven: What is there in all this, that reſembles the Prophecies concerning Jeſus Chriſt? Or rather, what is there that is not altogether prophane, and feigned by an Heathen Poet, who only makes uſe of the Sibyl's Name to flatter the Ambition of Auguſtus, and to add greater Authority and Luſtre to that which he ſays in his Commendation? Laſtly, the Words of Aurelian do not intimate that the Chriſtians were forbidden by the Pagans to read the Sibylline Books, but only that the Chriſtians looked upon them as prophane Writings, which in no wiſe related to their Religion, and to which they gave no Credit. Sibyls.

Hyſtaſpes, and Mercurius Triſmegiſtus.

THE Books that are attributed to Hyſtaſpes and Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, and cited likewiſe by the ancient Fathers are not more Genuine than the Verſes of the Sibyls. There is nothing now extant of Hyſtaſpes, and this Author was altogether unknown to the ancient Heathens; but the ſame thing cannot be ſaid of Mercurius Sirnamed Triſmegiſtus (n), who is mentioned by the moſt ancient Pagan Writers (o) as an incomparable Perſon, and an Inventer of all the Liberal Arts and Sciences. He was an Egyptian, and more ancient than all the Authors, whoſe Works are ſtill extant: He is believed to be as old as Moſes; he either wrote, or at leaſt it is ſaid that he wrote, Twenty five, or Thirty Thouſand Volumes. But we have only two Dialogues at preſent under his Name, one whereof is called by the Name of Pœmander, and the other of Aſclepius, who are the principal Speakers. The firſt Treatiſe is concerning the Will of God, and the ſecond treats of the Divine Power; theſe have been cited by the ancient Fathers, to prove the Truth of our Religion, by the Authority of ſo famous an Author. But it is certain that they cannot be his (p), for the Author of theſe Treatiſes is a modern Platonick Chriſtian, who argues from the Principles of that Philoſophy, and hath taken from the Holy Scripture, that which he writ concerning the Word of God, and the Creation of the World.

A Letter of Lentulus.

IT were needleſs to ſhew the falſity of a Letter attributed to Lentulus, and directed to the Senate and People of Rome, concerning the Actions of Jeſus Chriſt, ſince the Forgery is apparent: It is pretended to have been written by Lentulus, as Governour of Jeruſalem, altho' he never was ſo; the Superſcription thereof is inſcribed To the Senate and People of Rome; whereas ever ſince there were Emperors, it was the general Cuſtom among the Governours of Provinces to write immediately to them: Moreover the Contents of this Letter are ridiculous, there is a mean and unworthy Deſcription of the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt; as particularly it is ſaid, that his Hair was of a light Colour, long and looſe after the manner of the Nazarenes; the ſtyle is alſo very far from the Purity and Elegancy of the Age wherein Auguſtus lived. In ſhort, this Letter is not ſo much as mentioned by any of the ancient Writers.

Pilate's Letter.

THE Letter of Pilate to Tiberius on the ſame Subject, concerning the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt ſeems to be more Authentick; for it is recorded by Tertullian in his Apologetick, that Tiberius being informed of the ſupernatural and wonderful Operations, that were performed by our Saviour in Paleſtine, which were ſo many Teſtimonies of his Divinity, made report thereof to the Senate, and determined, that he ought to be enrolled among the Gods; but that the Senate having rejected this Propoſition, Tiberius, nevertheleſs perſiſted in his Opinion, and forbad his Subjects to perſecute the Chriſtians. It is added, a little after by the ſame Author, that Pilate being a Chriſtian in his Heart, wrote to Tiberius concerning the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt. Euſebius in the ſecond Book of his Hiſtory Chap. 2. produceth this paſ-

(n) Sirnamed Triſmegiſtus.] In Greek Τρισμέγιστος, the Egyptians call him Thaaut; ſome affirm, that he was ſtyled Triſmegiſtus by the Grecians, becauſe he was a great King, a great Prieſt, and a great Philoſopher; others as Lactantius, that his Name was attributed to him, by reaſon of his incomparable Learning.

(o) Mentioned by the moſt ancient Pagan Writers.] Plato in Phædrus declares, that he invented the Characters of Letters together with Arts and Sciences. Cicero in lib. 3. de Natura Deorum aſſures us, that he governed the Egyptians, and that he gave them Laws and found out the Characters of their Writings; It is recorded by Diodorus Siculus, that he taught the Grecians the Art of diſcovering the Secrets of the Mind. And we are informed by Jamblichus, who quotes Manetho and Seleucus, that he wrote above Thirty five thouſand Volumes. St. Clemens Alexandrinus in Stromat. lib. 6. makes mention of Forty two Books of this Author, and gives an Account of the Subject of ſome of them. The Works of Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, are cited as favourable to the Chriſtian Religion by the Author of the Exhortation to the Gentiles, ſaid to be St. Juſtin, by Lactantius, in the fourth Book of his Inſtitutions, by St. Clement, in Lib. 1. Stromat. by St. Auguſtine, in Tract. de 5. Hæreſ. and in Lib. 8. De Civit. Dei, ch. 23. by St Cyril of Alexandria, in Lib. 1. contra Julianum, and by many others.

(p) But it is certain that they cannot be his.] The Eternity and Divinity of the Word is clearly explained in the Pœmander, and the Author of this Book attributes to the Son, the Quality of being Conſubſtantial with the Father; he declares, that he is the Son of God our God, who proceeds from the Intellect of the Father, and he makes uſe of the very words of the Septuagint, in deſcribing the Creation of the World: he diſcourſeth of the Fall of the firſt Man. In ſhort, he copies out ſeveral paſſages of the Old and New Teſtament and follows the Principles of the Modern Platonick Philoſophy. But the Book Entituled Aſclepius hath not quite ſo great a Tincture of Chriſtianity: The Author treats therein of Idolatry after an exquiſite manner; he explains the Greek Word Λόγος, he tranſcribes many things out of the Holy Scriptures, and the Works of the Grecian Writers: Laſtly, he foretels the Extirpation of the Egyptian Religion.

Pilate's Letter.

sage of Tertullian, and giving a large Account how the fame of our Saviour was spread abroad, and came to the Ears of Tiberius, he says, that Pilate sent a Letter to the Emperor, according to the usual Custom of the Governours of Provinces, who were obliged to give an account of the most remarkable Occurrences that happened within their Jurisdiction, and that he wrote to him concerning the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, avouching that he had been informed of his Miracles by many, and that a great number of People esteemed him as a God, after he rose again from the Dead. We find in the Orthodoxographa, after the Epistle of Lentulus another attributed to Pilate and directed to Tiberius, wherein the same things are contained. But it is difficult to determine whether this Letter was extant in the time of Eusebius, or afterwards forged from his Story. However, there are divers learned Men, that doubt of the Truth of this History, which hath but very little probability in its Foundation; for what likelihood is there that Pilate should transmit these things in writing to Tiberius, relating to a Man whom he had condemned to death? And altho' he had written them, is it credible that Tiberius should have made a Proposition to the Senate, for the admitting this Person into the number of the Gods upon the bare report of a Governour? And if he had propounded it, who can doubt but that the Senate would have immediately submitted to his Judgment? Therefore, tho' this Relation cannot be absolutely charged with Falshood, yet it ought at least to be accounted as dubious. [Dr. Pearson late Bishop of Chester in his Lectures upon the Acts of the Apostles (p. 64, 65.) vindicates the Truth of this Story against the Objections of Tanaquil Faber so fully, that I shall set down his Reasons at large: And 1. He says, that Tertullian might have taken his Information from the Acts of the Senate, wherein the Votes and Acts of every day were constantly set down. 2. He observes from Suetonius, that Tiberius acquainted the Senate with every thing that he was informed of, whether publick or private, of great or of little concern. 3. He observes that Tiberius often took no notice when the Senate decreed things against his own Opinion; and this also is expresly affirmed by Suetonius. 4. The Senate refused to rank Jesus Christ amongst the Gods out of a complement to Tiberius, who had before refused Divine Honours, Commanding that no Statues of his should be erected in their Temples, unless for Ornament; they might probably therefore suspect that this was proposed by Tiberius, who never spoke his mind plainly in any thing, to ensnare them, who could not attribute those Honours to any Body else which Tiberius had forbidden to be paid to himself, without making that Person greater than Tiberius. 5. It is not probable that Pontius Pilate should neglect so remarkable a thing, as the Crucifixion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, when all the Governours of particular Provinces were obliged to send relations of every one that was considerable under their Governments to the Emperors who sent them: And the Question is not, as Faber misunderstood it, whether the Christians then made any considerable Figure in the World; but whether upon Pilate's transmitting an Account to Tiberius, of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ at Jerusalem, when he was Procurator of Judæa, the Emperor did not propose to the Senate that this Jesus Christ might be ranked amongst the Gods; which being positively asserted by Tertullian, cannot be disproved by any Negative Arguments that may at this time of day be brought against it.

Pilate's Letter.

But tho' these Reasons which are urged by this great Man against Tanaquil Faber, sufficiently vindicate the Truth of Tertullian's Authority in this Matter; yet that is no Argument why the Epistle that goes under Pilate's Name should be Genuine. Pilate sent this Account of Jesus Christ in the Acts of his Administration, not in a particular Letter to the Emperor. The Acts are quoted by Justin Martyr, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and St. Chrysostome, and this Letter was made in all probability when the Original Acts were lost.]

Epistles of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca.

BUT we have reason to reject the Thirteen Epistles, as well those of Seneca to St. Paul, as the others of St. Paul to Seneca, as undoubted Forgeries; altho' St. Jerome and St. Augustine seem to own them as Authentick. For (1) These Epistles are not written according to the Style of St. Paul, nor in that of Seneca (q). 2. It is declared therein, that in the Fire that happened in Rome under Nero, there were only 132 Houses burnt, which is a manifest Falshood, since it is certain, that a great part of the City was consumed as Tacitus informs us (r). 3. The Date of these Letters is false (s). 4. They contain nothing that is worthy of Seneca, or of St. Paul (t). Lastly, it may be easily discerned, that they were feigned by some Persons, merely to gratifie their Fancy, and to exercise their Faculty of Invention.

A late Author acknowledging, that the Epistles extant at this day under the Name of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St Paul to Seneca are counterfeit, and yet not daring to affirm, that St. Jerome and St. Augustine, who believed them to be Genuine were deceived, hath imagined that the real Letters of St. Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to St. Paul were lost since their time; and that those that we now have in our Possession, were substituted in their room. But besides that the respect that we have for these two Fathers, ought not to hinder us from believing, that they might be mistaken in a matter of so little moment (u): it is also to be observed, that they do not positively assert, that those Epistles were Authentick, but only that they were generally reputed to be so (x); and that they were read under their Names: Moreover it might be easily demonstrated, that the Letters which remain in our hands at present, and those that were extant in the time of St. Jerome, are the same, for he declares that Seneca wished in one of his Epistles, to be among his Followers, what St. Paul was among the Christians, which bears a great Analogy with what we find in the 11th Letter of Seneca to St. Paul (y). It is not known, when or by whom these Epistles were forged, and it is difficult to determine, whether it were on their Account, that there is this passage in the false Acts of the Passion of St. Linus, that Seneca, and St. Paul wrote divers Letters one to another; or whether the Narrative of this Author, gave the hint to those that forged these Letters, as Cardinal Baronius conjectures.

A Passage of Josephus, concerning Jesus Christ.

LAstly, among all the prophane Monuments that might be quoted for the Confirmation of the Truth of the Christian Religion, none seems to be more considerable than this passage of Josephus, taken from Book 18. chap. 4. of his Jewish Antiquities, wherein he declares: That, at that time there was a wise Man named JESUS, (if we may only call him a Man; for he wrought many Miracles,

(q) Are not written according to the style of St. Paul, nor in that of Seneca.] The Style of those that are attributed to Seneca is barbarous and full of Words that are scarce Latin. The Epistles ascribed to St. Paul, do not suit with the Gravity of this Apostle, and contain Complements rather than solid Instructions.

(r) As Tacitus informs us.] He informs us, that of Fourteen quarters of the City of Rome, there remained but Four entire; that there were Three, the Houses whereof were wholly consumed; that very little was left in the other Seven, and that those that were left were half burnt.

(s) The Date of these Letters is false.] One of them is dated under the Consulate of Aprianus and Capito, that is, Vipsanius and Capito, Five Years before the burning of Rome, and the other under the Consulate of Phrygius and Bassus. But it was under the Consulate of Lecanius Bassus, and Licinius Crassus, that this Fire happened: And the Letter is dated in March, whereas the Fire did not begin (according to the report of Tacitus) till May following.

(t) They contain nothing that is worthy of Seneca or of St. Paul.] There is scarcely one Moral Notion in those of Seneca, or one Christian Precept in those of St. Paul.

(u) In a Matter of so little moment.] It is certain, that the Fathers have often cited Apocryphal and counterfeit Books, as we have already shewn; Natalis Alexander himself the Author of the Opinion, which we now confute, Confesses it, and on the very same Account rejects the Epistle of Jesus Christ to Agbarus, and that of Agbarus to Jesus Christ, that are more Authorized by the ancient Writers than those Letters of Seneca.

(x) But only that they were generally reputed to be so.] St. Jerome in Catalog. I reckon Seneca in the number of Ecclesiastical Authors, by reason of certain Letters which are read by many under the Name of Seneca to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to Seneca. St. Aug. Ep. 14. now the 153. Seneca of whom certain Letters are read written to St. Paul. But in Lib. de Civit. Dei, Chap. 11. He declares that Seneca neither commended nor censured the Christians, and that he hath made no mention of them; therefore he did not believe that these Letters were his.

(y) Which bears a great Analogy with that which we find in the 11*th Letter of* Seneca to St. Paul.] According to St. Jerome; Optare se dicit servus ejus esse loci apud suos, cujus sit Paulus apud Christianos. In the 11th Letter of Seneca we find the following Expression. Cum sis vertex, & Altissimorum montium cacumen haud te indignum in prima facie Epistolarum nominandum censeas---nam qui meus tuus apud te locus, qui tuus velim ut meus. If apud tuos were put instead of apud te, these words would express St. Jerom's Sense; and they seem not to be capable of admitting any other; however it is evident, that he alludes to this place.

A Paſſage of Joſephus concerning Jeſus Chriſt.

and taught the truth to thoſe that received it with joy,) who had a great number of Diſciples, as well among the Jews as the Gentiles; that he was the CHRIST, and that being accuſed by the chief of his Nation, he was crucified by Pilat's Order: That nevertheleſs, he was not abandoned by thoſe that loved him, becauſe he had appeared unto them alive on the Third day, as was foretold by the Prophets, and that he was the Author of the Sect of the Chriſtians, which remains at this day.

This Teſtimony of Joſephus is produced by Euſebius, St. Jerome, and ſeveral others after them, as a Record very important for the eſtabliſhing of the Chriſtian Faith; but in theſe later times, when Matters began to be examined more accurately, there have been, and there are even at preſent many learned Men, who maintain that this paſſage doth not really belong to Joſephus, and it muſt be Confeſſed, that their Conjectures are not altogether to be diſallowed, for they affirm,

1. That the ſtyle is intricate, not very fluent, and different from that of Joſephus, whoſe Expreſſions are generally clear and elegant.

2. That it is evident, that this paſſage was inſerted afterwards into the Text of Joſephus; becauſe the Coherence of the following Sentence is interrupted; for immediately after the end thereof, we read, About that time the Jews began to be afflicted again, with another Calamity, words that have no manner of Relation to what went before, concerning our Saviour: but which manifeſtly appertain to the Account of the Maſſacre of the Jews, whom Pilate had cauſed to be ſlain in Jeruſalem, that came juſt before this paſſage concerning Jeſus Chriſt; which plainly ſhews (ſay they) that it doth not belong to Joſephus, and that it hath been afterwards added.

3. They argue, that in caſe this paſſage were taken ſeparately, yet even then it might be eaſily perceived, that thoſe are the words of a Chriſtian, and not of a Jew; ſince Jeſus Chriſt is therein called God, his Miracles and Reſurrection is acknowledged, and it is declared, that theſe things were foretold by the Prophets; How can it be imagined that this ſhould proceed from a Jew, eſpecially Joſephus, who ſeems to doubt of the Miracles recorded in the Books that were written by Hebrew Authors?

4. What probability is there, that Joſephus a Perſon extremely addicted to the Intereſt of his own Nation, ſhould ſpeak ſo honourably of Jeſus Chriſt, whom he did not believe to be the Meſſiah, (as is obſerved by Origen in his Book againſt Celſus) and that he ſhould accuſe his Country-men, as having unjuſtly put him to Death?

5. Joſephus deſcribing in the ſame Book, Chap. 8. the Martyrdom of St. James, declares, that he was the Brother of Jeſus Chriſt; now if he had made mention of him in ſome of his preceding Chapters, he would not have failed to take notice thereof, or at leaſt, he would in this place have added ſomewhat in his Commendation.

A Paſſage of Joſephus concerning Jeſus Chriſt.

6. This Teſtimony (ſay they) is not only unknown to the Authors that lived before the time of Euſebius: but Origen expreſly denies, that Joſephus wrote any thing concerning our Saviour; It is very ſtrange, (ſays he in Tom. 2. in Matth.) That Joſephus who did not acknowledge Jeſus Chriſt as the Meſſiah, ſhould give ſo Authentick a Teſtimony concerning the Innocency of St. James. Would he have ſpoken to this effect, if there had been in his time ſo remarkable an Evidence of the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt in the Works of Joſephus, as that which is now extant therein? Theodoret hath alſo obſerved, that Joſephus knew not our Saviour. But nothing is more conſiderable than the ſilence of Photius as to this Matter, who making an exact Epitome of the Books of Joſephus, takes no notice of this paſſage concerning Jeſus Chriſt, which he would not have omitted, if it had been then found in all the Copies of the Writings of Joſephus, and if he had believed that it was written by him. Biblioth. Cod. 238.

Laſtly, that which deſerves a more particular Reflection is, that it is remark'd by Photius in another place, that there was extant in his time a Book concerning the Univerſe attributed to Joſephus, which he judged to be fictitious, in regard that Jeſus Chriſt is too honourably mentioned therein, and he adds afterwards, that he hath been ſince informed that this Book was written by Caius a Prieſt of Rome; Perhaps this paſſage, which is at preſent in his Antiquities, was taken from this Caius, who bore the Name of Joſephus.

Huetius replies to theſe Teſtimonies of Origen, Theodoret and Photius, that theſe Authors happened to meet with certain Manuſcripts of Joſephus, in which this paſſage had been ſtruck out by the Jews: But this Anſwer ſeems rather to weaken its Authority; for if there were ancient Manuſcripts, wherein it was not expreſſed, we have yet more reaſon to doubt of its Veracity; and the Arguments that have been already produced ſufficiently ſhew, that it is more probable, that it hath been added in ſome Manuſcripts by the Chriſtians, than left out in others by the Jews. However, I ſhall not undertake to decide this Queſtion, but ſhall leave it to the Judgment of the Reader to determine; whether the Authority of Euſebius, St. Jerome, and all the Manuſcripts of Joſephus that we have at preſent in our Poſſeſſion, ought to be preferred before the above-cited Conjectures of the learned, the general Teſtimonies of Origen, Theodoret and Photius, and perhaps ſome ancient Manuſcripts of Joſephus, that are long ſince loſt.

HERMAS.

Hermas.

THERE are Three things to be examined in this Book of the Paſtor, attributed to Hermas, which is one of the moſt famous Books of Antiquity (a). 1. Who is the Author thereof? 2. Whether it be Canonical or not? 3. Whether it be a uſeful Book; as alſo, whether it deſerves the Eſteem and Reputation that it formerly had?

The firſt Queſtion may be eaſily determined. It bears the Name of Hermas, and all the ancient Writers have cited it under this Name; it appears likewiſe from the Antiquity thereof, that it might poſſibly be written by that Hermas, whom St. Paul ſalutes at the end of his Epiſtle to the Romans. Origen, Euſebius and St. Jerome have made no difficulty of aſſerting it; however, it cannot be doubted, but that the Author of this Book was called Hermas, and that the Name of Hermes hath been attributed to him by ſome Authors through a miſtake, which gave occaſion to certain Modern Writers, to aſ-

Hermas.

(a) ONE of the moſt famous Books of Antiquity.] The Book of Hermas entituled the Paſtor, hath been admitted by many Churches as Canonical. St. Irenaus cites it under the Name of Scripture, Lib. 4. chap. 3. Bene ergo pronunciavit Scriptura quæ dicit primò omnium crede, quoniam unus eſt Deus, &c. This Paſſage is found in the Paſtor, Lib. 2. Mand. 1. Clemens Alexandrinus produceth ſeveral other Expreſſions, as taken from a Book of great Authority, Lib. 1. Stromat. p. 311, and 356. Lib. 2. p. 360, 379, 384, and 385. Lib. 4. p. 503. Lib. 6. p. 679. It is likewiſe cited by Origen as a Book of Holy Scripture, Homil. 10. in Joſ. Homil. 1. in Pſal. 37. Homil. 13. in Ezek. Lib. 1. Περὶ Ἀρχῶν, c. 3. Lib. 2. c. 1. Lib. 2. in Matth. c. 4. 42. t. 1. Comment. in Joannem, Lib. 10. in Ep. ad Rom. where he declares, that the ſame Hermas mentioned in this place of the Epiſtle of St. Paul, is the Author of the Paſtor, item in Oſeam, Philocal. c. 8. Although he obſerves in other places, that it was not generally received in Homil. 8. in Numb. Lib. 4. Περὶ Ἀρχῶν, Philocal. c. 2. and Homil. 35. in Luc. It is reported by Euſebius, Lib. 3. ch. 3. that ſome reckoned it among the Canonical Writings, and others in the number of good Eccleſiaſtical Books that were neceſſary for new Converts, Lib. 3. c. 25. He placeth it amongſt the Apocryphal Books, and obſerves, Lib. 5. c. 8. that it is quoted by St. Irenaus. St. Athanaſius cites it in Lib. de Incarnat. Verbi, and in Lib. de Decret. Synodi Nicænæ, p. 252. Edit. Pariſ. 266. where he expreſly declares, that it is not included in the Canon. He quotes it again in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Phrygia, p. 396. and in his Paſchal Epiſtle he inſerts it in the Catalogue of Books that are not Canonical. St. Jerome, in Lib. de Scriptoribus, affirms, that it is a uſeful Book, but almoſt unknown to the Latins. In his Prologue, he placeth it in the rank of Books that are not Canonical. In Comment. in Hoſeam, c. 7. v. 9. he cites it, adding theſe words, Si cui tamen placet ejus recipere Lectionem. In his firſt Book on Habakkuk, ad c. 1. v. 14. he calls it Apocryphal, and finds fault with a fooliſh Thought in the Book. Ruffinus on the Creed reckons it among the Eccleſiaſtical Books, though not Canonical. It is cited by Caſſian. Collat. 8. c. 12, 13, and 17. And St. Proſper rejects it as a Book of no Authority, Ut nullius Autoritatis, contra Collat. c. 30. Gelaſius inſerts it in the Liſt of Apocryphal Books. And laſtly, Maximus cites it in Lib. 4. De divinis nominibus. This ſhews, that notwithſtanding its various fortune, it hath been always very famous.

cribe this Book to one Hermes, the Brother of Pope Pius I (b). But this Imagination is sufficiently refuted by the Testimony of all the ancient Fathers, who constantly call him Hermas, besides the Author of this Book was a Greek, and his Writings were more known amongst the Greeks, than the Latins, as is observed by St. Jerome, which would not have happened, if it had been Composed by the Brother of Pope Pius.

As for the Authority of this Book, it is certain that it hath been heretofore received in many Churches as Canonical, and that St. Irenæus, St. Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and even Tertullian in Lib. de Oratione, cite it as a part of Holy Scripture; nevertheless it cannot be doubted, that it hath been rejected by divers other Churches, (c) and esteemed only as a Treatise, that might be used to very good purpose for the Edification of Christians: But there have been very few ancient Authors, that have not set a high Esteem on this Book, and it hath been almost always cited by the Fathers, as a Work of great Authority (d).

It hath not been so much valued by Modern Authors, and there are very few at present that commend it; or that have the same regard to it, as those that lived in the primitive Ages of the Church. And indeed, if we may judge by the Method according to which it is written, and by the things therein contained, it doth not seem to deserve much Esteem. The First part Entituled the Visions is full of many Revelations, that are explained to Hermas by a Woman representing the Church; they all relate to the State of the Church, and the manners of the Christians. The Second part which is most useful, is called the Ordinances, wherein are comprized divers Precepts of Morality, and pious Instructions, which the Pastor or Angel of Hermas prescribes to him. The Third Part is called The Similitudes, because it begins with several Similes or Comparisons, and concludes with Visions. These three Books comprehend very many Moral Instructions concerning the Practice of Christian Virtues; but the great number of Visions, Allegories, and Similitudes, make them tedious, and all these Moral Truths would, in my opinion, have been more useful, if the Author had propounded them simply, as the Apostles have done in their Epistles.

Hermas.

We have lost the Original Greek Text of these three Books; and there remains only a Version which is printed in the Orthodoxographa, as also in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and hath been likewise published separately by Barthius, and lastly by Cotelerius, together with the Greek Fragments extracted from ancient Authors. It is not known when, nor by whom this Translation was composed; some attribute it to Ruffinus; and others affirm, that it was made in the Primitive Ages of Christianity, when the Writings of Hermas were not altogether unknown to the Latins. However it be, this Version is not amiss, since it exactly agrees with the Greek Passages cited by St. Clement, Origen, Antiochus, and some other ancient Writers.

[There have been other Editions of Hermas's Pastor, besides these which Mr. Du Pin mentions: It was first published by Jacobus Faber at Paris, 1513. Then at Strasburg, 1522. And it was lately published from two MS. Copies at Oxon, with short Notes in 12°. A.D. 1685.]

(b) To ascribe this Book to one Hermes, the Brother of Pope Pius I.] The Author of Damasus's Pontifical, Regino, the Author of the Letter of Pope Pius I. and some other modern Writers, are in this Error, and they seem to have taken it from the Author of the Poem against Marcion, who affirms, that Hermas, who wrote this Book, was the Brother of Pius; Post hunc deinde Pius, Hermas cui Germine frater Angelicus Pastor cui tradita verba locutus. But he calls him, Hermas and not Hermes; It is true indeed, that we find in the Version of Origen Περὶ Ἀρχῶν made by Ruffinus, Lib. 1. c. 3. and Lib. 4. c. 2. Hermes instead of Hermas; but it is a fault of the Transcriber, for in the Greek Text of the last Fragment that is extant of the Philocalia, it is read Hermas, and not Hermes; and Ruffinus himself in other places calls him Hermas. Moreover all the ancient Writers, as St. Clement, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, St. Jerome, and others above-mentioned, always call him Hermas, and never Hermes. Baronius and some others distinguish two Books, one written by Hermes the Brother of Pius, which Treated of Easter, and the other by our Hermas; but since they ground their Opinion only on the Authority of modern Writers, in attributing a Book to this pretended Hermes, a Person unknown to all Antiquity, their Conjecture seems to be without any probability.

(c) It cannot be doubted, that it hath been rejected by divers other Churches.] Origen acknowledgeth, that it was Thrown out of the Canon of Holy Scripture by many Christians; Tertullian, in Lib. de Pudicitiâ, replies to certain Persons, who objected it to him, that this Book was rejected by divers Orthodox Churches. Eusebius, St. Athanasius, St. Jerome, and Ruffinus above-cited, reckon it among those Writings that are not Canonical, yet such as may be useful for the Instruction of Christians; and Gelasius placeth it amongst the Apocryphal Books.

(d) It hath been cited as a Book of great Authority.] Tertullian censures it, but after he turned Montanist, Origen observes that it was contemned by some Christians, but that he had a great Esteem for it. St. Jerome in one place accuseth it of Nonsense, but in others he commends it. St. Prosper throws it aside as a Book of no Authority; but it was because he scarce knew it.

St. CLEMENS ROMANUS.

St. Clemens Romanus.

ST. Clement the Disciple, and Coadjutor of the Apostles (a), was ordained Bishop of Rome after St. Anacletus (b), in the year of our Lord 93. Divers Books are attributed to him, some of which are really his, others are ancient tho' supposititious, and others are both counterfeit and modern: And indeed we can only reckon among those that were certainly composed by this Bishop the two Epistles to the Corinthians, the first whereof, so famous among the ancient Authors (c), was undoubtedly written by him. Irenæus Book 3. chap. 8. speaks thus. In the time of St. Clement, (says he) upon occasion of a great Division that happened in the Church of Corinth, the Church of Rome wrote a very pathetical Letter to the Corinthians, to restore them to Peace, wherein she strengthens their Faith, and preacheth those Traditions that they had lately received from the Apostles. This Epistle which is cited by St. Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Eusebius, St. Jerome, and Photius, was for a long time concealed, until at length Mr. Patrick Young having found it in an ancient Manuscript (d), caused it to be printed at Oxford, Anno Dom. 1633.

St. Clemens Romanus.

After the Holy Scriptures, it is in my opinion one of the most eminent Records of Antiquity. St. Clement, therein exhorts the Faithful of the Church of Corinth, that was in a Disturbance by the revolt of some Christians, who refused to submit to their lawful Pastors, he exhorts them, I say, to a Re-union, and to seek after Peace; particularly he admonisheth them to persevere in the Obedience and Submission that they owed to their Spiritual Guides, he censures those that disturbed the Church, and that promoted secret Cabals against their Ministers on purpose to supplant them; He begins with putting them in mind of the Happiness of that Peace which they had formerly enjoyed; afterwards he represents to them the misfortune of their present Divisions, and proceeds to shew by many Examples, what lamentable Consequences have always attended it, and how displeasing it is to God: Moreover he adviseth them to repent,

(a) ST. Clement the Disciple and Coadjutor of the Apostles.] This is the same Clement whom St. Paul mentions, Phil. 4. v. 3. reckoning him in the number of those that had laboured together with him in propagating the Gospel, and that had assisted him in his Ministry; With Clement also, and with other my Fellow Labourers, whose Names are in the Book of Life.

(b) Was ordained Bishop of Rome after St. Anacletus.] He is reputed by St. Irenæus, Eusebius, and other ancient Writers, to have been the third Bishop of Rome, tho' some affirm, that he was the immediate Successor of St. Peter; but it is better in my opinion to adhere to St. Irenæus.

(c) So famous among the ancient Authors.] St. Irenæus hath cited it, Lib. 3. chap. 3. St. Clemens Alex. Lib. 1. Stromat. p. 289. and Lib. 4. p. 516. Lib. 5. p. 686. Lib. 6. p. 647. Origen, Lib. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν; chap. 3. In Joan. 1. chap. 29. Euseb. Lib. 3. chap. 16, and 36. Lib. 4. chap. 22, and 23. St. Cyril Catech. 18. Epiph. Haref. 27. N. 7. Hieron. in Lib. de Viris illustribus, and Lib. adversus Jovin. c. 7. Comment. in Isaiam, Lib. 14. chap. 52. vers. 13. Comment. in Ep. ad Ephes. Lib. 1. chap. 2. v. 2. Lib. 2. ad chap. 4. vers. 1. Autor. Resp. ad Orthodox. apud Just. Quæst. 74. Photius, Cod. 113.

(d) In an ancient Manuscript.] It is called The Manuscript of Thecla, because it was written with the hand of an ancient Virgin called Thecla, who lived, (as is generally believed) in the time of the first Council of Nice. These Epistles have been since printed in the Collection of Cotelerius, in Labbee's Edition of the Councils, and at Helmstadt in the year 1654. [As also at Oxford in 1677.]

in practiſing Humility, Obedience, and Charity, in imitation of the Humility of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Mercy of God, through the Hope of a Reſurrection: From thence he takes an occaſion to recommend to the Faithful the Practice of many Chriſtian Virtues, and the Obſervation of a Regular Diſcipline: He declares to them, that it was very ill done to riſe up againſt the Paſtors and Biſhops that were Conſtituted by the Apoſtles, or Elected by the Faithful after their Death: He aggravates the heinouſneſs of their Crime that were the firſt promoters of this Diviſion, and earneſtly ſollicits them to return to their Duty by obeying their Miniſters, and by reuniting themſelves with the reſt of the Believers. Thus you have an account of the Subject of this Epiſtle written by St. Clement in the name of the Church of Rome to that of Corinth, about the end of the Perſecution raiſed by the Emperor Domitian. The Style thereof (ſays Photius) is ſimple and clear, and it comes very near the natural and artleſs manner of Expreſſion uſed by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Authors. I ſhall add, that one may diſcern a great deal of Energy and Vigour, accompanied with much Prudence, Gentleneſs, Zeal, and Charity.

The ſecond Epiſtle of St. Clement is not ſo certainly known to be his; Euſebius, St. Jerome, and Photius obſerve, that there is reaſon to doubt of its being Genuine, becauſe it is not mentioned by the ancient Writers; nevertheleſs ſome of the Fathers have cited both theſe Epiſtles, as if they were of equal Authority (e). The Fragment that is now extant of this laſt Letter publiſhed in Latin by Wendelinus, and in Greek by Mr. Young, is an Exhortation to the Practice of Repentance, and of divers Chriſtian Virtues on the account of the Mercy of God, and the Reward that is promiſed to the Faithful.

Beſides theſe two Epiſtles, ſeveral voluminous Books have been attributed to St. Clement even in the Primitive Ages of the Church, that were not his; ſuch were (as Euſebius declares in the third Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 38.) the Diſputes of St. Peter and Appion, whereof the ancient Authors have made no mention, and which contain Matters that are far from the Purity of the Apoſtolical Doctrine: We may conjecture, that theſe Writings were part of the Book, Entituled, Recognitiones Clementis, which is likewiſe called, The Voyages, Itinerary, or Acts of St. Peter: This Work, tho' fictitious, is ancient, being cited by Origen (f), Euſebius, St. Athanaſius, St. Epiphanius, St. Jerome, and the Author of The Commentaries on St. Matthew, aſcribed to St. Chryſoſtome; Ruffinus hath made a Tranſlation thereof which is ſtill extant; Gelaſius hath inſerted it in the Catalogue of Apocryphal Books; and Photius obſerves, that there are Abſurdities and Errors to be found in it: And indeed it is a Writing full of Fables, Tales, Conferences, and ridiculous Diſputes, feigned at pleaſure, and pretended to be holden between St. Peter and Simon Magus, concerning certain Events and Occurrences that are related after a childiſh manner; But that which is more dangerous, is, that we may eaſily diſcover in ſeveral Paſſages thereof the Opinions of the Ebionites, tho' much palliated, together with many other Errors. In ſhort this Book is of no uſe, if we reflect on the Style and Method in which it is written, or on the Things that are compriſed therein. S. Clemens Romanus.

I ſhall not paſs the ſame cenſure upon the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions that are likewiſe falſly imputed to St. Clement, and which, tho' written by a later Author (g), yet contain many things very uſeful to the Diſcipline of the Church; It is not known by whom, nor when they were compoſed (h); All that can be certainly affirmed, is, that they are cited by St. Epiphanius (i), and the Author of The Commentary on St. Matthew, falſly attributed to St. Chryſoſtome; but the paſſages which are produced by them not perfectly agreeing with thoſe that are found in the Conſtitutions which are extant at this day, we may be induced to conjecture that they have been ſince corrupted, and ſo much the rather, becauſe they are infected with the Arian Hereſie (k), and ſeveral other Errors. This is the Judgment that was given concerning them by the Greek Biſhops in the Synod that was conven'd in the Imperial Palace of Conſtantinople after the fifth General Council. However I admire that the Learned Photius (l) hath not made this Obſervation, and that he hath imputed the Errors of this Book to its Primitive Author.

It remains only to enquire, whether this Book be the ſame as that which is mentioned by Euſebius (m) and St. Athanaſius, Entituled, The Doctrine, or the Precepts of the Apoſtles, ἡ διδαχὴ τῶν ἀποστόλων or διδαχὴ. This is the Opinion of Nicephorus (n), Zonaras, and Matthew Blaſtares; but it ſeems to me to be moſt probable, that The Conſtitutions of the Apoſtles, and the Book called their Doctrine, were two different Works which the likeneſs of their Titles hath cauſed to be confounded (o).

(e) Some of the Fathers have cited both theſe Epiſtles, as if they were of equal Authority.] The Author of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, c. ult. St. Epiphan. Hareſ. 27. chap. 6. and 30. chap. 15. St. Jerome, adverſus Jov. chap. 7. Photius Cod. 126. Damaſus, Lib. 4. Orth. Fidei. St. Dionyſius of Corinth takes notice but of one ſingle Epiſtle, and there is ſome difference in the ſtyle of the ſecond, which makes us doubt of its Veracity. The Sibyls were heretofore cited therein, if we may give Credit to the Author of the Queſtions attributed to St. Juſtin; but he doth not declare, whether it were in the firſt Part, or in the ſecond, and part of the ſecond is loſt. Moreover St. Epiphanius ſeems to mention other Epiſtles of St. Clement.

(f) Being cited by Origen.] Tom. 3. Comment. in Geneſ. in Philocal. chap. 22. and in Matth. ch. 26. Euſeb. lib. 3. Hiſt. chap. 3, and chap. 38. Athanaſ. in Synopſ. Epiph. Hareſ. 30. chap. 25. Hieron. in Catalog. and Lib. 1. in Jovin. chap. 14. and Comment. in Ep. ad Galat. Lib. 1. chap. 18. Ruffinus de Adulterat. Lib. Orig. Autor op. imp. in Matth. chap. 10. verſ. 15, 16, 24, and 42. Photius, Cod. 112, and 113.

(g) Tho' written by a later Author.] The Author of the Recognitions is not the ſame with the Author of the Conſtitutions, tho' ſome have been of this Opinion; for their ſtyle is different; the later is well verſed in the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion, and in the Rites of the Church, but the other is ignorant of theſe matters; moreover they maintain a contrary Doctrine: The Author of the Conſtitutions, in lib. 8. c. 46. reckons the Sun, Moon, and Stars, in the number of inanimate Creatures; whereas the Author of the Recognitions imagineth, that they have a Soul, in lib. 5. chap. 16. Laſtly, the Author of the Conſtitutions was not an Ebionite, but he that writ the Recognitions was.

(h) It is not known by whom, nor when they were compoſed.] It is certain that they do not belong to the Apoſtles, as we have already evidently demonſtrated.

(i) They are cited by St. Epiphanius.] In Hareſ. 45. this Father produceth a paſſage that is found in the beginning of the Conſtitutions, and in Hareſ. 80. he cites another, which we read in Lib. 1. Conſtitut. chap. 3. concerning the Beards of Prieſts. In Hareſ. 25. he quotes a paſſage taken from Lib. 5. chap. 14, and 17. relating to the Faſts enjoyned on Wedneſday and Friday, as alſo on the Days before Eaſter. In Hareſ. 70. he obſerves, that the Audians made uſe of certain Conſtitutions, which, tho' dubious, ought not altogether to be rejected, as containing nothing contrary to the Faith or Diſcipline of the Church. This may induce us to believe, that the Conſtitutions which are now extant, have been corrupted ſince the time of Epiphanius, becauſe the ſame thing could not be affirmed of thoſe. Add to this, that in the ſame place Epiphanius cites a paſſage concerning Eaſter, wherein the Chriſtians are admoniſhed to celebrate that Feaſt together with the Jews, and the contrary is expreſly declared in Conſtitut. Lib. 5. chap. 17. Moreover in the ſame place, he produces other Teſtimonies, out of the Conſtitutions that are not found therein: Perhaps St. Epiphanius had not ſufficiently examined this Work, or perhaps he cited it without Book, or on the Report of another; However it be, he acknowledgeth it to be dubious.

(k) Becauſe they are infected with the Arian Hereſie.] In lib. 6. chap. 25. the Author reckons in the number of Hereticks, thoſe that believe that JESUS is the ſame with the God of the Univerſe, but this might have been ſaid in oppoſition to the Sabellians; and ſo much the rather ſince he adds, and do not diſtinguiſh the Son and the Holy Ghoſt. Many other Paſſages are likewiſe alledged, wherein he affirms, that the Son and the Word is the Servant, and Miniſter of God the Father. Theſe are the Phraſes uſed by the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers, but they have been ſuſpected ever ſince the Council of Nice.

(l) That the Learned Photius.] He cenſures them on three ſeveral Accounts, in Cod. 112. Firſt ex malaſſicione, from which (as he ſays) they may be vindicated; Secondly, by reaſon of ſome Expreſſions uſed by the Author, which are contradictory to the Book of Deuteronomy, and for theſe he might likewiſe be excuſed; and laſtly, he chargeth him with Arianiſme, from which he cannot be cleared without offering him ſome violence.

(n) Of Nicephorus.] Nicepb. in Stichometria. Zonaras in Ep. Ath. Mat. Blaſtares in a Collection of Canons that is not Printed.

(o) Which the likeneſs of their Titles hath cauſed to be confounded.] There are many Reaſons to prove, that theſe are two different Books, for firſt St. Athanaſius reckons the Book of the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, among thoſe that were uſually read to the Catechumens, whereas the Conſtitutions were compoſed rather for the uſe of Biſhops, and we find it prohibited in the laſt Canon to publiſh them, or to diſcover the Contents thereof to all ſorts of People. Secondly, the Book of the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, contained only Two hundred Verſes according to the Stichometria of Nicephorus, which cannot agree with the Conſtitutions, that are more voluminous.

It is therefore extremely difficult to determine when the Constitutions ascribed to the Apostles first appeared, since the Author of them is absolutely unknown, neither can it be proved whether they were at first the same as they are now. We can only conjecture, that it is most probable that the Constitutions ascribed to the Apostles, or St. Clement belong to the third, or rather the fourth Century, and that they have been from time to time corrected, altered, and augmented, according to the various Customs of different Ages and Countries (p).

Those that we have at present are not in Greek. Crabb gives us a Latin Epitome of them in his second Edition of the Councils, Printed Anno 1557. The first entire Version that ever appeared, was made by Bovius, and inserted by Surius in the Collection of Councils, which he set forth in the Years 1567, and 1585. Nicolinus published another Translation of the Constitutions composed by Turrianus, together with the Annotations of the same Author; this was printed at Venice in 1563, and at Antwerp in 1578. Afterwards Binius caused it to be Reprinted in his first Edition of the Councils, Anno Dom. 1606. but he did not think fit to allow it a place in his second Edition of the Year 1608. Fronto Ducæus, a Jesuit, is the first that published a Greek and Latin Edition of those Constitutions at the end of Zonaras, which was annexed to the new Collection of Councils. They are divided into eight Books, containing a great number of Precepts relating to Christian Duties, especially to those of Pastors, and concerning the Ceremonies and Discipline of the Church, of all which it would be too tedious to give a particular account. They that are desirous to be further informed, may have recourse to the Titles of the Chapters that are prefixed to these Tracts.

The last Work attributed to St. Clement, is a Collection of divers Pieces, Entituled, Clementinæ, and there hath been a Book under this Title for some time: The Author of the Epitome of the Holy Scriptures attributed to St. Athanasius mentions them, and after him the Chronicle of Alexandria, Nicephorus Callistus in the third Book of his History, chap. 18. St. John Damascen, and some others (q).

Perhaps this is the second Part of the Recognitions cited by Ruffinus, for it is a continuation of the Preachings and Acts of St. Peter. The Greek and Latin Collection, published by Cotelerius under this Name, contains divers Tracts full of Errors in Philosophy, as also of the Heresie of the Ebionites, and is such another Book as the Recognitions. There must needs have happened some Alteration in these Clementinæ, as well because they do not agree with that which is cited from them by Maximus, and by the Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria, as because they are infected with the Errors of Eunomius; besides, there is a Passage cited by an Author in the Library of the College of Clermont which is not to be found there; and we are inform'd by Nicephorus, that the Clementinæ are an Orthodox Work, whereas this (as we have already shewn) abounds with Errors. It contains, first, two Apocryphal Letters, one of which is attributed to St. Peter as written to St. James, wherein he adviseth him not to deliver the Book of his Preachings to the Gentiles, which is followed by a Protestation of St. James. The other is a Letter of St. Clement to St. James, which tho' it be ancient, and translated by Ruffinus, yet is certainly counterfeit; as we shall hereafter shew when we give an account of the Forgeries of the Decretals of the Popes. To these two Epistles there are nineteen Homelies annexed relating to the Voyages, Preachings, and Disputes of St. Peter. Moreover at the end of this Work is likewise inserted an Epitome of the Actions of St. Peter extracted from the Clementinæ, the Recognitions, and the Epistle of St. Clement. Cotelerius found three of them in the King's Library, and hath published but one, which is the shortest, formerly published by Turnebus, and Printed at Paris Anno Dom. 1555. All these Writings, which are of very little use because they are full of Errors, are only a Contexture of Fables and idle Tales. Lastly, Cotelerius hath added the Records of the Martyrdom of St. Clement, concerning the Antiquity whereof we have no assurance, and which appear on the contrary to have been composed by the modern Greeks (r).

S. Clemens Romanus.

Thirdly, in the Index of Scripture made by Anastasius Nicenus, διδαχαὶ and διδασκαλία κυριακῶν are mentioned as distinct Books, and in some Manuscripts the Constitutions are Entituled διδασκαλία. Fourthly, in the Epitome of St. Athanasius διδαχὴ and διατάξεις are distinguished; therefore this Work was not attributed to St. Clement. Fifthly, when Eusebius Discourses of the Writings of St. Clement, he takes no notice of the Apostolical Constitutions, neither have the Ancients mentioned them. The Arians might have objected them, in vindication of their Heresie, and the Orthodox would have been obliged to make a Reply, but this is not done by either Party; therefore they are of a later Date, than the Doctrine of the Apostles, that was known to Eusebius, and St. Athanasius. These Reasons howsoever probable they may seem to be, are not altogether Irreprehensible; to the First it is replyed, that the Constitutions were made for the use of all Christians, as appears from the first Words thereof; that the last Canon might perhaps be of a later Date; that St. Athanasius observes only, that this Book was useful for the instructing of Catechumens in the Discipline, and Faith of the Church, tho' it was not Canonical, which may be very safely affirmed of these Constitutions. In answer to the Second it is alledged, that there were two Editions of the Constitutions, one more large, being that which is now extant; and another, that was an Epitome thereof, and perhaps Nicephorus makes mention of this last under the Name of The Doctrine of the Apostles: Besides that there are some Manuscripts wherein there are 6000 Verses, and besides the Length of every particular Verse is not known. Thirdly, that the Distinction of διδαχὴ and διδασκαλία is nothing to the purpose, the one possibly was an Abridgment of the other, neither is it certain, whether The Constitutions, be the Books now called διδασκαλία. Fourthly, the Clementina are a Work different from the Constitutions, as well as The Doctrine of the Apostles. Lastly, the ancient Writers have not cited every thing that occurred to them; the Arians have not made all the Objections that were obvious; and the Orthodox have not replyed to every particular Circumstance that might be objected against them. These are the Answers, that are propounded to those that distinguish this Book of The Doctrine of the Apostles from The Constitutions, and I shall leave it to the Determination of the Reader, whether they do not cause greater Difficulties; for my part, I believe the former Opinion to be more probable.

(p) That they have been from time to time Corrected, &c. according to the various Customs of different Ages and Countries.] It is on this Account, that the Ethiopians have certain Constitutions different from Ours, which are cited by Anastasius Nicenus, Cod. 189. in the King's Library, and in his Questions, Q. 160. where they are much commended.

(q) St. John Damascen and some others.] St. Epiphanius seems to quote Hæres. 26. n. 16. as also Anastasius, Q. 20. p. 242. Maximus in Homil. 53. and 55. Cedrenus in Compend. Hist. p. 170. and 171. Moreover it is cited in a Collection of the Works of the Fathers, which is in the Library of the Jesuits College at Clermont, and by Nicon in his Pandect.

(r) Which appear on the contrary, to have been Composed by the Modern Greeks.] It is related in these Acts, that St. Clement was sent beyond Sea, (ultra mare) and afterwards into a Desart near the City, (in Desertum urbi vicinum). That he found there 2000 Christians condemned to hew Marble out of the Quarries, who entreated him, saying, Ora pro nobis Pontifex, ut digni efficiamur promissione Christi; Pray for us O Priest, that we may be made worthy of the Promise of Christ. That St. Clement caused a Spring to rise up in that place, because these Christians were obliged to fetch Water six Miles off from thence, that they built there within one Year 75 Churches, that they demolished the Temples, and cut down consecrated Trees to the Number of 300000, that the Emperor Trajan being astonished at these Actions, sent thither the President Aufidianus, who caused St. Clement to be drowned; that whilst his Disciples sought after the Relicks of his Body, the Sea withdrew, and they found it laid in a Tomb of Stone, and that it was revealed to his Disciples, that his Body should not be taken away, and that the Sea should retire after the same manner every Year during seven Days, which it continues to do (says the Author of these Acts) even unto this Day, and this was accompanied with divers Miracles. Here are many Fables that do not agree with the time of St. Clement. Who can imagine that People condemned to hew Stones should find means to Erect 75 Churches, and to pull down an infinite Number of Temples? St. Ephrem, or rather the Author of the Narrative, which is falsly said to be his, gives an Account of the same Miracle, concerning the Sea that was dryed up, to discover the Body of St. Clement, and adds that his Child being left in a Tomb, was found alive, and in good health, at the end of the Year following: But this pretended Ephrem is an Author no less addicted to Fables, who calls himself Arch-bishop of Chersona, tho' he never was in that place.

[There have been several Editions of St. Clement's Epistles to the Corinthians, besides Mr. Young's and Cotelerius's: Joachim Maderus Printed it at Helmstadt 1654. in Quarto; Colomesius likewise set it out at London in Octavo, with some few Notes, 1687; and it was Printed at Oxon in 1677, in Twelves. All these Editions are in Greek and Latin; Mr. Burton who writ Notes upon Antonius's Itinerary, as far as it concerned Britain, Translated it into English, and Printed it with Notes in Quarto 1647, at London.]

S. Clemens Romanus.

Now it will not be amiſs briefly to recollect all that hath been ſaid concerning the Works of St. Clement, and to declare our Opinion in this matter. The firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians was certainly written by him, and is a good and uſeful Treatiſe. The ſecond is very ancient, tho' not of the ſame Authority. The Conſtitutions are an ancient and uſeful Book falſly imputed to St. Clement, in which many things have been added and altered in proceſs of time, for which Reaſon ſeveral Errors have crept in amongſt them. The Recognitions are an Apocryphal Work, ancient indeed, but abounding with Errors and Fables. The ſame Judgment ought to be given concerning the Clementinæ, which are not perhaps ſo ancient, as alſo the ſecond Part of the Recognitions. The Book Entituled, The Doctrine of the Apoſtles, may be the ſame with the Original Conſtitutions, but it is more probable that they are a different Work. We can give no account of the Book that bears the Title of The Precepts of St. Clement, Διδασκαλια Κλημεντος. The Voyages or Itinerary of St. Peter are the ſame as the Recognitions and the Clementinæ. The Epitome is an Abridgment of theſe Apocryphal Writings. The Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Clement were compoſed by the modern Greeks. The Diſcourſe of Ephrem is likewiſe of a later Date. There were alſo certain Sermons aſcribed to St. Clement concerning the juſt Judgment of God and Divine Providence cited by Anaſtaſius Antiochenus, Queſt. 96. but there is no probability of their being his. The five Decretals are counterfeit; and the Revelations or Apocalypſe of St. Peter, heretofore thought to have been written by St. Clement, is likewiſe ſuppoſititious. Thus we have given in ſhort the Judgment that (according to our Opinion) ought to be given of all the Books that are, or have been, attributed to St. Clement Romanus, and all that we judge neceſſary to be propounded or explained concerning them in this place. S. Clemens Romanus.

St. DIONYSIUS the Areopagite.

St. Dionyſius the Areopagite.

DIONYSIUS the Areopagite; who is reputed to have been a Native of Thrace (a), after he had been converted by St. Paul, as it is recorded in the Acts (b) of the Apoſtles; was made Biſhop of Athens (c), and ſuffered Martyrdom (d) in that City. I ſhall not ſpend time in proving that he never came into France, and that St. Denys who was the firſt Apoſtle of this Kingdom, is different from the Areopagite; this Queſtion hath been ſo clearly diſcuſſed in our time (e), that there is ſcarcely any one, tho' never ſo incredulous that can queſtion it. I could alſo very willingly forbear to give any Account of the Books that are attributed to him, or to ſhew how they have been forged, were it not that the Deſign of my Work obligeth me to this Undertaking; therefore I ſhall do it with as much Brevity and Moderation as is poſſible.

We muſt obſerve firſt, that the manner of the firſt appearing of thoſe Books ought to be ſuſpected; for it is certain, that being unknown to all Antiquity, they were firſt quoted by the Severian Hereticks, in a Conference holden between them, and the Orthodox Biſhops at Conſtantinople in the Palace of the Emperor Juſtinian, 532 Years after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſilence of all the ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers, is without doubt a very great prejudice to them; for who can imagine that ſo conſiderable an Author as St. Denys (if theſe Books had been really Compoſed by him) ſhould have been unknown to Euſebius and St. Jerome. And who can believe, that if they had known them, they ſhould take no notice of them, when they Compoſed an exact Catalogue of all the Authors, of whom they had any knowledge; not omitting even thoſe, that had ſo little Reputation that they were ſcarcely heard of in the World? Is it poſſible that Euſebius in making mention of Dionyſius the Areopagite in two ſeveral places, ſhould not have obſerved according to his uſual Method, that he had written ſeveral Books? St. Jerome in his Epiſtle to Magnus doth not omit the Teſtimony of one ſingle Author, to prove that it is lawful to make uſe of prophane Books, whereas the Writings of St. Denys, might have ſerved as a notable Proof; why then doth he not ſpeak ſo much as one word concerning them? He gives us an Account in his Catalogue, of Quadratus Biſhop of Athens, and of Ariſtides the Athenian Philoſopher; is it poſſible that St. Denys ſhould be more obſcure than theſe two Writers, or leſs eſteem'd by St. Jerome? How could it happen, that all the ancient Writers that mention St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, as Dionyſius Corinthius, St. Chryſoſtome, St. Ambroſe, St. Auguſtine, and the Author of the Dialogues aſcribed to St. Cæſarius the Brother of St. Gregory Nazianzen, ſhould give us no Intimation of theſe Books? In ſhort, why were theſe Books which contain many things relating to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Chriſtian Church, and that would have been of great Authority, as proceeding from ſo ancient and conſiderable an Author as St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, never cited, either for or againſt any Heretick, or for the Illuſtration of any point of Diſcipline before the ſixth Age of the Church? Furthermore admitting, that they had appeared even at that time, as Books of whoſe Antiquity and Truth there could be no ſcruple; if they had been then produced by the Orthodox as ancient Records, if they St. Dionyſius the Areopagite.

(d) And ſuffered Martyrdom.] Ariſtides in Uſuardus, and the other ancient Writers of Martyrologies.

(e) This queſtion hath been ſo clearly diſcuſſed in our time.] Sirmondus publiſhed a Diſcourſe wherein he proves it beyond contradiction; after him Launoy wrote ſeveral Tracts to confirm his Opinion, and to ſhew the falſhood of the Records produced by Hilduinus, which are urged to authorize the vulgar Opinion; and in a word, to confute all the Arguments that are uſually brought. To which we may add what Morinus had ſaid concerning this Queſtion in the beginning of his Book of Ordinations; And though I inſerted nothing relating to this matter in the Text, yet I thought it convenient to ſet down the Opinions of the Learned Men abovementioned, for the benefit of thoſe that have not read their Works. Their firſt Proof is, That it is certain that the Gotpel was preached later in France, than in the other Regions of the World, and that there was no Perſecution in that Country before that of Valerian, as it is expreſly atteſted by Sulpicius Severus an Author who lived in the fourth Century. Now if St. Dionyſius the Areopagite had been in France, the Chriſtian Religion would have been introduced there very early, and there would have been many Martyrs in that Kingdom before the Perſecution of Valerian. Secondly, It is evident that Pothinus was the firſt that propagated Chriſtianity in France; that during his Life, and that of his Succeſſor Irenæus, the Faith was only eſtabliſhed in the Provinces of Vienna and Lyons, and that there were no Martyrs but in theſe two Churches in the time of the Perſecution of Marcus Aurelius; therefore there were no other Churches then planted among the Gauls. And indeed Euſebius mentions no other Churches, or any other Martyrs in France, no more than the Chriſtians of the Church of Lyons in the Epiſtle that they wrote concerning their Martyrs called by them Proto-Martyrs. Thirdly, It is related by Gregory of Tours in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 28. on the Credit of an ancient Author that compoſed a Treatiſe concerning the Paſſion of St. Saturnius, that St. Denys and his Companions the Apoſtles of France, came thither under the Reign of the Emperor Decius, about the Year of our Lord 250, to re-eſtabliſh the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt in that Country, which was almoſt entirely extinct after the Death of St. Irenæus. Fourthly, There are great numbers of Martyrologies, in which the Feſtivals of St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, and of St. Denys the Apoſtle of France, are deſcribed as on two different Days, and wherein the place and circumſtances of their Martyrdom are diſtinguiſhed. We may likewiſe draw the ſame Argument from the ancient Breviaries, Miſſals, Kalendars and Litanies in which St. Denys the Apoſtle of France is reckoned after the Saints that ſuffered under Marcus Aurelius. Fifthly, The Author of the Life of St. Fuſcianus, Fulbertus, Carnutenſis, and Lethaldus, diſtinguiſh two Denys's. Sixthly, The Opinion of thoſe that affirm, that St. Denys the Apoſtle of France is the ſame with the Areopagite, was unknown before the Ninth Century, neither doth the Monk that wrote the Life of our St. Denys in the Year 750, ſay one word concerning this matter. Hilduinus, who is the firſt that mentions it, is a very fabulous Author, who tells abundance of Lies, and cites a Book written by one named Visbius, which is plainly forged; on the credit of which wretched Author he builds up the Opinion of thoſe that confound the two St. Denys's.

had been rejected by none, would not this be a matter of great moment? But who are they that produce them? They are Hereticks who have been used to quote counterfeit Records. How do they cite them? As uncertain Books, sicut suspicamini, say the Catholicks. To what end do they produce them? To establish their Errors. Against whom do they cite them? Against the Orthodox. And what do they reply? This ought to decide the Controversy; let us then hearken to them, and let us give Credit to their Testimony, rather than to that of the Hereticks: How can you prove (say the Orthodox Bishops to the Severian) that these Records which you affirm to belong to St. Dionysius the Areopagite, are Genuine, as you imagine; for if they were his, they could not have been unknown to St. Cyril of happy Memory; but why do we only mention St. Cyril? If St. Athanasius had believed that they had been written by St. Dionysius, would not he have made use of their Authority in the Council of Nice, to prove the Consubstantiality of the Trinity against the blasphemies of Arius? If they have not been cited by any of the ancient Writers, how can you demonstrate, that they were written by him? Thus the Orthodox then argued; but having since perused these Books, and finding nothing therein, that is contrary to the Catholick Faith, they admitted them without much Examination; tho' there have always been some Criticks, who have questioned them. Photius says in the beginning of his Bibliotheca, that one Theodorus wrote a Book by way of Reply to the Objections that were generally urged against these Books, and he produceth the Objections that were propounded by this Author, but takes no notice of the Answers that he had annexed to them, which is an Argument that he thought them to be of no great strength.

St. Dionysius the Areopagite.

2. The style and method of these Books, is very far from the manner of writing used in the First and Second Centuries, as being swelling and too much affected; the Author purposely leaves ordinary and natural Expressions, to make use of these that are lofty and figurative; he amplifies every thing, even that which ought to be recited after the most simple manner, he uses a great deal of Artifice in the disposing of his Periods, and observes an exact Method in the Order of his Arguments; which shews that it was written by a Philosopher, who had leisure to revise and Polish it with much Care and Study, which doth not agree with the Character of St. Dionysius the Areopagite, nor with the way of writing in his time.

3. Neither are the Contents of these Books conformable to the Genius of the Age, wherein St. Dionysius the Areopagite lived. The Christians were employed in these primitive Times, in composing three sorts of Books, Apologies for their Religion, Epistles for the Instruction of the Faithful, and to exhort them to suffer Martyrdom; and Lastly, Treatises against the Hereticks: Now these Writings attributed to St. Denys plainly relate to another Subject, and have a quite different Design; for his principal Intention is to treat of Mysteries after a curious and exquisite manner, and to expound them according to the Principles of Plato's Philosophy, and even in Platonick Terms. He is not content to propound them with the simplicity of the Ancients, but he applies himself nicely to enquire into all the difficulties that might occur therein, and to raise divers Questions more curious than useful concerning the Nature of God, and the different Orders of Angels: He explains the Doctrine of the Trinity more distinctly, even than St. Athanasius himself: He plainly rejects the Errors of the Nestorians, Eutychians, Anthropomerphites. He speaks of the Church as in a prosperous Condition, and enjoying Peace; neither doth he make any mention of Persecutions or Martyrs; He distinguishes the several Orders of Angels, and observes their Difference, things that were unknown to the ancient Writers, and concerning which they were not sollicitous to be informed, as St. Irenæus assures us, in Lib. 2. Chap. 55. and St. Cyril, Catech. Illum. 11. Upon the whole matter, if we compare these Writings, with those of the other ancient Authors, we shall find that there can be nothing more different, either as to Style, and Method, or as to the Matters therein contained.

We shall now proceed to give particular Proofs whereby it will plainly appear, that these Books were not written by St. Dionysius the Areopagite, and there are two sorts of these, some proving that they cannot belong to St. Denys, others shewing that they were composed by an Author who lived after the Fourth Century. I shall begin with the Arguments which prove that those Books do not belong to St. Denys. 1. The Author of the Book, de Divinis Nominibus, dedicates it to Timothy, and then cites an Epistle of St. Ignatius. Now Timothy was dead when St. Ignatius wrote his Epistles, and Onesimus succeeded him; and besides, he calls Timothy his Son, and yet he must needs be older than St. Denys. 2. He cites and explains the Gospel according to St. John, and the Apocalypse, which were scarcely written when St. Dionysius the Areopagite was alive: and yet he declares in those Books, that he was but a young Man. He cites the Revelation, as undoubtedly included in the Canon of Holy Scripture, and yet it was very much questioned in the primitive Ages of the Church, whether it were Canonical or not. The same Reflection may be likewise made upon his Citations, taken from the second Epistle of St. John, and that of St. Jude. 3. He rejects the Error of the Millenaries which could not have appeared in his time. 4. He expresly produceth in Lib. de Divinis Nominibus. ch. 4. certain Passages out of the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Romans, written by this Bishop a little before his Martyrdom; whereas St. Ignatius was put to death under the Reign of the Emperor Trajan, and St. Dionysius the Areopagite, under that of Domitian, and consequently the later was dead, when the former wrote this Epistle. Maximus replies that this Citation is added, but there are three or four entire Lines that relate to this matter, which there is no reason to disallow. 5. This Author affirms, that he was present at the Death of the Virgin Mary, but St. Dionysius the Areopagite was not converted at that time; for it is generally believed, that she died fifteen years after the Crucifixion of Jesus Christ, and St. Paul who converted St. Denys came not to Athens till seventeen years after our Saviour's Passion.

St. Dionysius the Areopagite.

Lastly, there are many Reasons, by which it may be proved, that this Author wrote after the Fourth Century; For, 1. He treats of the Mysteries of the Holy Trinity, and the Incarnation in such Terms as were not known till after the Fourth Age of the Church; he used the Word Hypostasis to signifie the Divine Persons, (c. 7. Cæleſt. Hier. c. 1. de Divinis Nominibus) whereas it is well known, that this word was not used in this sense till after the end of the Fourth Century. 2. In Lib. de Cæleſt. Hier. c. ult. He confirms the Baptism of Infants by an ancient Tradition: We declare that (says he) which our Bishops have taught us according to ancient Tradition. Could this have been written by St. Dionysius the Areopagite, or rather, doth not this shew, that he who discourseth thus, is a much later Author than this Bishop of Athens? 3. He describes the solemn Administration of Baptism as it was, when the Church being delivered from Persecution, began to practise the ancient Ceremonies with exteriour Pomp and Splendour. 4. He speaks of Churches built on purpose, wherein there was a Sanctuary separated from the rest of the Churches; as also of the perfuming of Altars with Incense, and of divers Ceremonies relating to the Energumens, Catechumens, and Penitents, which were not observed in those Primitive times. 5. It is certain, that the Institution of Monks is not so ancient as St. Denys, and that they were not consecrated till long after the Age wherein he lived: Yet the Author of the Divine Hierarchy in ch. 6. mentions them, as being more ancient than himself, and adds, that his Instructers called them Therapeutæ or Monks; and he gives an Account of the manner of their Consecration, and distinguisheth several sorts of them. 6. He often cites the Ecclesiastical Authors that lived before him, who wrote concerning matters that were only debated in the Fourth Century, such were the distinctions between Love and Charity, the Opinions relating to the several Functions and Orders of Angels, as also the Lot by which St. Matthias was elected, the Prayers that were recited at Mass, which he declares to have been received from their Ancestors by Tradition; The Baptism of Infants, of which he affirms the same thing; The Funeral Rites and Solemnities, the Ceremonies of Baptisin, and many other Customs. Lastly, he cites St. Clemens Alexandrinus under the name of Clement the Philosopher, and the passage of this Author produced by him, is taken from Stromat. lib. 8. which shews that he speaks of St. Clement, who lived in the third Age of the Church.

However many Arguments are alledged to prove the Verity and Antiquity of these Books, which nevertheless may be very easily confuted in a few words. It is objected first, That it is affirmed, by Maximus, Anastasius Sinaita, and Cyparissiota, that St. Dionysius Alexandrinus composed Scholia or Annotations on the Books of Dionysius the Areopagite, de Nominibus Divinis. 2. That St. Athanasius in Quest. 4. ad Antiochum, and Origen, in his first Homily on St. John quotes the Writings of Dionysius the Areopagite, and that St. Gregory the Great calls him an ancient Father; St. Gregory Nazianzen seems likewise to cite him in Hom. 38, and 42. where after having declared that the repetition of the Word Holy thrice, relates to one and the same Lordship, and to one and the same Divinity, he adds, as another hath very excellently and very clearly philosophized before us, which may well be applied to the Author of the Hierarchy, who lived before the time of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and whose Philosophy was very sublime: Moreover St. Denys is cited by St. Chrysostome in his Sermon of false Prophets;

Where is (ſays he) St. Ignatius the Tabernacle of God, where is Dionyſius the Areopagite, the Eagle of Heaven? deſigning by this Expreſſion to ſet forth the magnificence of his ſtyle. There is a compariſon in lib. de Divinis Nominibus, chap. 3. of an Anchor that attracts us to it more than we drew it to us, which St. Clemens Alexandrinus ſeems to have taken from St. Denys. Laſtly, Nicephorus affirms, that Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who aſſiſted at the Council of Chalcedon, in replying to Pulcheria concerning the Sepulchre and Death of the Virgin Mary, made uſe of the words of St. Dionyſius the Areopagite. All theſe Arguments ſeem to prove, that the Books de Hierarchia & de Nominibus Divinis, were written by St. Denys, or at leaſt that they are more ancient than the Fourth Century.

St. Dionyſius the Areopagite.

But if we examine theſe Objections, they will appear all very weak: For, 1. We ought not to believe on the Teſtimony of Anaſtaſius and Maximus, that Dionyſius Alexandrinus, the Diſciple of Origen, compoſed any Annotations upon the Writings of Dionyſius the Areopagite, ſince Euſebius and St. Jerome, who took a Catalogue of the Works of this Saint, did not mention it; whence we ought to infer, either that it was another Dionyſius Alexandrinus, or that ſome Grecian hath forged Commentaries on the Books attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, under that name. 2. The Book Entituled, Queſtiones ad Antiochum, cited under the name of St. Athanaſius, and the Homilies on ſeveral places of the New Teſtament aſcribed to Origen are alledged to no purpoſe, becauſe it is certain that theſe Books are falſely attributed to St. Athanaſius and Origen, as it is generally agreed. 3. St. Gregory Nazianzen doth not cite St. Denys by name; Elias Cretenſis is of opinion that St. Athanaſius is here meant, and indeed the paſſage quoted by St. Gregory Nazianzen concerning the Triſagion is found word for word in one of the Homilies of St. Athanaſius, who living before St. Gregory might be cited by him. 4. The Sermon quoted under the name of St. Chryſoſtome, was without queſtion not written by this Father, but by John the Faſter, Patriarch of Conſtantinople; and though it really belonged to the former, yet he takes no notice of the Writings of St. Denys, but only extols him as a great Saint. Laſtly, it is more probable that the Author of the Treatiſe de Divinis Nominibus, hath borrowed the ſimilitudes from St. Clemens Alexandrinus, whom he cites in another place, than that St. Clement ſhould have taken them from him.

As for the Authority of Nicephorus and other modern Writers, it proves nothing elſe, but that theſe Books were attributed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite when they wrote, and this is agreed on all ſides, for after they firſt appeared in the beginning of the ſixth Century, they ſoon got a great deal of Reputation and Authority; They are cited by St. Ephrem in a Treatiſe that he compoſed in vindication of the Synod of Chalcedon; The Monk Johannes, Andreas Cæſarienſis, Leontius, Anaſtaſius Sinaita, Suidas, Nicephorus, and many other modern Greeks, make honourable mention of them; and Joannes Scythopolitanus, Maximus, and Pachymeres, wrote Commentaries on this Author. Among the Latins, Gregory the Great cites them with great applauſe; Joannes Scotus Erigena tranſlated them into Latin, and Anaſtaſius the Library-Keeper ſent this Verſion to Charles the Bald, with a Preface and Annotations. But the Teſtimony of theſe modern Authors is of very little moment in this matter, and only proves, that theſe Books were then thought to belong to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite; On the contrary, the Reaſons that we have already alledged are ſufficient to convince all Perſons that are Ingenuous and of a clear Judgment, that they were forged about the end of the Fifth Century, or at the beginning of the Sixth, for the time when they firſt appeared cannot be preciſely determined; but it is certain, that they were written ſince the Fourth Century, and before the middle of the Sixth. Moreover it cannot be affirmed, that the Works of ſome other Denys might accidentally be imputed to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, it being evident that the Author of theſe Books affects to ſeem to have lived in the time of the Apoſtles.

St. IGNATIUS.

St. Ignatius.

IGNATIUS Sirnamed Theophorus (a), was the Succeſſor of Evodius (b) in the Epiſcopal See of Antioch, about the year of our Lord 70. He governed this Church for the ſpace of almoſt Forty years with admirable Prudence and Conſtancy, and at laſt ſuffered Martyrdom in the Tenth year of the Reign of Trajan, when this Holy Prelate having profeſſed the Faith even in the preſence of the Emperor himſelf with great Courage, (if we may believe the Acts of his Martyrdom) was condemned to be expoſed to wild Beaſts in the Amphitheatre at Rome: And he is reputed to have wrote his Epiſtles to ſeveral Churches in the way as he was carried a Priſoner in Chains to that City, for maintaining the truth of the Chriſtian Religion; but ſince there are very great difficulties concerning the number and different Editions of theſe Epiſtles, it will be neceſſary to draw up their Hiſtory, and to produce the Teſtimony of Authors that have mentioned them ſince his time.

St. Ignatius.

Immediately after the Death of this Holy Martyr, Polycarp Biſhop of Smyrna, his Diſciple, collected theſe Epiſtles, and ſent them to the Chriſtians of Philippi, as appears from a Letter that he wrote to them, and which cannot be queſtioned without contradicting not only Euſebius, St. Jerome, and Photius, the moſt renowned Criticks of Antiquity, but alſo St. Irenæus himſelf the Diſciple of St. Polycarp, who cites this Epiſtle, and commends it in theſe words: There is an Epiſtle of Polycarp to the Chriſtians of Philippi, which is extremely accurate,

(a) Sirnamed Theophorus.] This is not an Epithet, but his Sirname. Some have believed, that he was that young Child, whom Jeſus Chriſt placed in the middle of his Apoſtles, and that from thence he took the Name of Theophorus, but this is a vain Imagination without any Ground, not ſupported by the Teſtimony of any ancient Author; and beſides, it contradicts the Opinion of St. Chryſoſtome, who declares that St. Ignatius never ſaw our Saviour in the Fleſh.

(b) The Succeſſor of Evodius.] St. Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, and the Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria affirm, that he was ordained by St. Peter; but Euſebius, St. Jerome, and the other ancient Eccleſiaſtical Writers place Evodius between St. Peter, and St. Ignatius.

and very proper to shew the character of the Faith, and the Doctrine of the Truth, to those that take any care of their Salvation. Moreover, we have not only an approbation of St. Polycarp's Epistle by St. Irenæus, to prove the Authority of St. Ignatius's, but it is likewise evident, that this Father had read these Epistles: Irenæus (says Eusebius) was not ignorant of the Martyrdom of St. IGNATIUS, and mentions his Epistles in these words: Thus one of our Brethren being condemned for maintaining the Faith, to be exposed to the wild Beasts, said, (c) I am the Wheat of God, and shall be ground by the Teeth of wild Beasts, that I may become the Bread of Jesus Christ. The words recited by St. Irenæus in Lib. 5. contra Hæres. cap. 28. are also found at present in the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Romans. Origen hath cited the Epistles of St. Ignatius, and that which he produceth in two several places, is read in those that are now extant. I have found it written (says he in his 6th Homily on St. Luke) in the Epistle of a certain Martyr, I mean Ignatius Bishop of Antioch, who was exposed to wild Beasts at Rome, I have found it written (I say) very elegantly, that the Virginity of Mary was unknown to the Prince of this World. This passage is word for word in the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Ephesians. The Second passage quoted by Origen is in his Commentary on the Canticles. We remember (says he) the Expression of a Saint named Ignatius in speaking concerning Jesus Christ, my Love is Crucified, and I do not believe that he ought to be reprehended on this Account. These are the Testimonies taken from Authors who wrote in the Second and Third Centuries; in the Fourth, Eusebius cites the Epistles of St. Ignatius, declares their number, and gives us a Catalogue of them. He says in the Third Book of his History, chap. 36. that this Holy Martyr being carried from Asia into Italy confirmed the Churches of the several Cities, through which he passed, in the Faith, and admonished them to avoid Heresies by constantly adhering to the Tradition of the Apostles; and that being arrived at Smyrna, where Polycarp was then Bishop, he wrote four Letters; The first to the Church of Ephesus, wherein he mentions Onesimus their Pastor; The second to the Magnesians, wherein he speaks of Damas their Bishop; The third to the Trallians, where he names Bishop Polybius; And the last to the Church of Rome, wherein he intreats the Romans not to deprive him through the fervour of their Prayers of the Crown of Martyrdom. Afterwards he recites a large Fragment of this Epistle, and adds, that being departed from Smyrna, and arrived at Troas, he wrote to the Philadelphians, as also to the Church of Smyrna, and particularly to St. Polycarp their Bishop, recommending to him the care of the Church of Antioch, as unto a good Pastor worthy of those Apostolical times. He cites likewise a Fragment of the Epistle to the Inhabitants of Smyrna, and confirms what he had before alledged by the Attestations of St. Irenæus and St. Polycarp. It is evident from this passage, that in the time of Eusebius there were Seven Letters, which were esteemed undoubtedly to be St. Ignatius's, and that they were the very same with those that are still extant, because they were written from the same places, to the same Persons, and on the same Subject, and contain all the Passages that are produced by Eusebius word for word, after whom these very Epistles were unanimously allowed by the whole Church, and cited by an infinite number of Ecclesiastical Authors. St. Athanasius who could not be led by the Authority of Eusebius, whose History perhaps he had never seen, sets down in his Book of the Synods, a passage of this ancient Bishop, which is in the Epistle to the Ephesians. St. Chrysostome in the Oration, that he made in Commendation of St. Ignatius, recites this famous Sentence taken from his Epistle to the Romans: Would to God that I might ere long fight with Beasts, and in another Oration, if that be really his (d), he quotes a passage of the Epistle to St. Polycarp.

St. Jerome acknowledgeth the Seven Epistles of St. Ignatius mentioned by Eusebius to be Genuine: they are reckoned in his Catalogue of Authors, and cited by him in divers other places of his Works. The Learned Theodoret uses the Authority of the Letters of this Father, as certainly written by him, against the Hereticks, and in his Dialogues produceth many large Passages out of the Epistles to the Smyrneans, Ephesians, and Trallians, that are expressed after the very same manner, as they are Printed in the Editions of Vossius and Bishop Usher. Gelasius likewise cites a passage of the Epistle to the Christians of Smyrna on the same Subject in his Treatise concerning the two Natures of Jesus Christ: The Author of the Book of the Divine Attributes, ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite, produceth a Sentence taken from that to the Romans. St. Ephrem in the sixth Century (according to the report of Photius, Cod. 228.) hath cited the Writings of St. Ignatius: Gildas de Excidio Britanniæ, produceth a large passage of the Epistle to the Romans: The Monk Jobius (as it is related by Photius, Cod. 222.) quotes another of that to the Smyrneans: Leontius opposeth the Authority of St. Ignatius to the Hereticks in Lib. de Sect. Act. 3. Anastasius Sinaita of the Seventh Century, in his Book Entituled ὁδηγὸς, (The Guide) sets down a passage taken from the Epistle to the Romans, and Antiochus a Monk of Palestine, in his 124th Homily to Eustathius, concerning the Honour that is due to the Bishops, recites many passages of those to Polycarp, the Philadelphians and Trallians. St. Maximus acknowledgeth the Works of St. Ignatius, and Theodorus in the Eighth Century (whom Photius mentions Cod. 1.) produceth divers passages thereof, as also Andreas Cretensis a Writer of the Ninth Century, in Hom. 2. de Virgine; and Singelius, in his Panegyrick upon St. Dionysius the Areopagite: To these may be added, Simeon Metaphrastes in the Tenth Century, Honorius Bishop of Autun in the Twelfth, Nicetas Choniates in the Thirteenth; and Lastly, Nicephorus Callistus in the Fourteenth: This shews that the Epistles of St. Ignatius have been allowed by the Church in all Ages, as authentick Records; but the modern Grecians since the time of St. Joannes Damascen have used other Letters, that are not named by Eusebius, whereas before, the Seven Epistles mentioned by Eusebius and St. Jerome were only cited.

St. Ignatius.

Having reduced the several Testimonies of the Ancients, concerning the Epistles that are attributed to St. Ignatius, we shall now proceed to shew what Judgment hath been given by the Moderns concerning the same, and for the better understanding of this matter, it seems to be necessary in the beginning, to set down a Catalogue of the different Editions of these Epistles that have been made in our time.

The first Edition of the Epistles of St. Ignatius, was published at Paris, Anno Dom. 1494. which did not contain any of the Seven that are recited by Eusebius, but only the Three Latin Letters, one whereof was written to the Virgin Mary, and the other two to St. John. In the Year 1498, Eleven were Printed in Latin, which being revised by Clictovæus were Reprinted at Strasburg in 1502, 1515, and 1527, as also by Henry Peter at Basil, in 1520. Not long after Champerius added three others, and one written to Maria Cossobolita, which he caused to be Printed at Colen, by Quentelius in 1536. together with the Commentaries of Dionysius Carthusianus on the Works attributed to St. Dionysius the Areopagite; afterwards they were Printed at Antwerp in 1540. at Alcala in 1541. at Basil in 1530, and 1540. at Zurick in 1546, 1550, 1557, and 1560. at Paris in 1569, 1575, and 1610. at Colen in 1570. at Basil in 1569, and 1628. at Louvain in 1568. and at Antwerp in 1572. In the Year 1557, they were set forth at Colen, according to the Version of Perionius, Pacæus gave us the Greek Text. In 1557, 1558, and 1562, Morellus procured them to be Printed in Greek, at Paris in Octavo. Moreover Gesner published them in Greek, in 1559, with the Translation of Brunnerus. In the Year 1566. they were published at Antwerp, being corrected from certain Manuscripts by Vairlenius, and Printed by Plantin. Mestræus set forth a new Edition of them in 1608. Vedelius a Protestant caused them to be Printed with large Annotations in Quarto, at Geneva, Anno Dom. 1623. Lastly, Usher having observed, that three English Divines had formerly quoted a passage of St. Ignatius, in the very same words as it is expressed by Theodoret, which was not inserted in the Greek Text, nor in the Vulgar Translations, judged that it might not be difficult to find some Manuscripts of the Original Epistles of St. Ignatius in England; Whereupon having made Enquiry, he happened to meet with two, one in the University of Cambridge, (in Caius College Library,) and another in a (c) Wild Beasts, said.] In citing the Testimony of any Author, we say, as he says, or as he writes, without using any Choice; and it ought not to be concluded from thence, that St. Irenæus only produced a remarkable Expression of St. Ignatius, without taking it from any of his Works, for it is much more probable, that he took it from his Epistle to the Romans, because it is found there word for word.

(d) If that be really his.] We find this Oration in the sixth Tome of his Works, it is Entituled, Quod unus sit Veteris & Novi Testamenti Legislator. It hath been cited by Pope Adrian I. in his Epistle to Charles the Great. Epiphanius the Deacon hath likewise alledged it against Gregorius Neocæsariensis; it is quoted also by Theodosius in the Second Council of Nice. The style doth not seem to be that of St. Chrysostome, as being full of Allegories; some say that it seems to have been written about the time of the declining of the Roman Empire, through the Incursions of the Barbarous Nations, which are mentioned therein; nevertheless, it may be understood of the inroads of the Arabians that were made under the Reign of the Emperor Valens. Others think that this passage is put in since.

St. Ignatius.

private Library of one Richard Mountague, which contained an ancient Verſion of thoſe Epiſtles very different from the Vulgar; and afterwards having compared this Tranſlation, with the paſſages recited by the Fathers, he perceived that it exactly agreed with them, quite through; for which reaſon, when he ſet out a new Edition (e) of the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius, he uſed them, and cauſed the places that were added by the Modern Greeks, to be diſtinguiſhed, in the Greek Text by red Characters. Not long after, the Learned Iſaac Voſſius found in the Library of Florence a Greek Manuſcript of the ſame Epiſtles, which had been peruſed about an Hundred years before by Turrianus, wherein the Greek Text perfectly anſwered to the Verſion publiſhed by Uſher, and ſo he publiſhed the Greek Original of St. Ignatius (f).

We may Learn from the knowledge of theſe Editions, that the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius ought to be divided into three Claſſes. The firſt contains thoſe Three that are only extant in Latin, written to the Virgin Mary and St. John. The Second comprehends thoſe that are in Greek, whereof Euſebius and St Jerome make no mention, which being five in number (g), are cited by ſome Modern Greeks. In the Third Rank, are comprized thoſe Seven Epiſtles mentioned by Euſebius (b), but theſe are either ſuch as were publiſhed before the Editions of Voſſius and Uſher; or ſuch as are conformable to their Copies, that is to ſay, more conciſe, and more ſimple.

We muſt likewiſe diſtinguiſh three ſeveral Opinions concerning theſe Epiſtles: The firſt is, of thoſe that allow them all, even the three which are written only in Latin, as Faber, Roffenſis, Driedo, Marianus Victorius, Caniſius and Halloixius. The laſt of whom, tho' Living in a clearer Age than the former; yet was not a better Critick than any of them that were before him. We may alſo reckon almoſt in the ſame Rank, thoſe that admit all the Greek Letters, wherein they follow the Opinion of Cardinal Bellarmin, Baronius and Poſſevin. The Second is of thoſe who reject all. Calvin was the chief Promoter of this Opinion, being followed by the Centuriators, by Socinus, and even, after the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius, by Salmaſius, Blondel, Albertinus and Daillé, who have uſed their utmoſt Endeavours to ruin the Credit of their Copies. The Third Opinion is that of thoſe who keeping the middle way, aſcribe to St. Ignatius only the Seven Epiſtles, that are recited by Euſebius and St. Jerome, diſallowing all the reſt as Suppoſititious, and owning that there were ſome Additions in the others. This has been formerly obſerved by very Learned Men, even before the Editions of Voſſius and Uſher appeared, as by Chemnitius, Perkins, Cook and Vedelius, who tho' ſeparated from the Communion of the Church of Rome, yet were very able Criticks. But ſince their Editions, the judicious of both perſuaſions as Rivet, Grotius, Petavius, Labbæus, and the Author of the Offices of the Holy Sacrament, have acknowledged that the Seven Epiſtles of St. Ignatius, which had been corrupted by many Additions, were reſtored to their Original purity in Voſſius's Greek Edition, and in the Verſion publiſhed by Uſher. Morinus is the only Perſon among the Learned, that maintains the contrary Opinion, affirming that the Original Text of thoſe Letters is contained in the ancient Greek Edition, whereas it is retrenched and corrupted in the later of Voſſius. I had almoſt forgotten to obſerve, that Uſher and ſome others after him, have rejected the Epiſtle of St. Ignatius to St. Polycarp; and therefore reckon only ſix as Genuine. Thus we have repreſented the different Opinions concerning the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius; let us now conſider which ſide we ought to take.

St. Ignatius.

Firſt it is certain, that the Three Latin Epiſtles, whereof two are written to St. John, and the Third to the Virgin Mary are forged. St. Bernard is the firſt that quotes them in his 7*th* Sermon, on the Pſalm Qui habitat; they were unknown to the ancient and modern Grecian Writers; they were never extant in Greek, and the affected gingling of Words that appears therein, ſhews that they were Compoſed in Latin, and by one of that Nation. Beſides they are written in a mean Style, and they are full of uſeleſs Notions, unworthy of St. Ignatius.

Secondly, Neither can it be doubted, but that the Five Greek Letters, which are not quoted by Euſebius and St. Jerome are in like manner counterfeit. For had they been extant when theſe Authors lived, it were impoſſible but they ſhould have ſeen or heard of them. And is it credible that having ſeen them, they ſhould take no Notice of them, when they made a Catalogue of the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius? 2. They were not only unknown to Euſebius and St. Jerome, but likewiſe to all the Greek Fathers, whoſe Teſtimonies we have produced, and who have all cited only the Seven Epiſtles mentioned by Euſebius, the others being quoted only by the more modern Writers. They contain many things that do not agree with the time of St. Ignatius, for there are ſome Hereſies named which did not appear until a great while after his Death: We find an account of Subdeacons, Lecturers, Chanters, Porters, Exorciſts, and of thoſe that were called among the Grecians ἀναγνῶσται or Readers. Now who knows not that theſe Orders were eſtabliſhed after the Deceaſe of St. Ignatius? They mention alſo Aſſemblies of Virgins, Lent, the Sabbath, Feſtivals, &c.

Thirdly, It muſt be confeſſed that the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius ſuch as they were before the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius, were corrupted, and different from thoſe that are cited by the ancient Writers. 1. Becauſe the paſſages cited by Theodoret and others, are not conformable to thoſe which we may find in the vulgar Edition. 2. Becauſe if we compare the ancient Edition with Voſſius's, it will evidently appear, that the later is not an Epitome of the former, but that the other is a kind of a Paraphraſe of this laſt: for the greater part of the Paſſages which are extant in the ancient Edition, and are not to be found in Voſſius's, are Explanations and Paraphraſes, or thoughts added afterward, that have no manner of coherence with the reſt, and wherein one may find a plain difference in the Style and Doctrine. 3. There are divers things contained in the vulgar Edition, that cannot belong to the time of St. Ignatius, and which might give an occaſion juſtly to doubt of their Authority, before the Editions of Uſher and Voſſius were publiſhed. As for Example, in that to the Trallians we find the Names of Theodotus and Cleobulus; there are certain paſſages that confute the Opinion of Saturninus concerning Marriage, and the Errors of Praxeas, mention is alſo made therein of the Nicolaitans, of the leſſer Orders, &c. things that by no means ſuit with thoſe primitive Ages of the Church.

I have now only to enquire whether the ſeven Epiſtles, according to the Edition of Voſſius were written by St.

(e) He made uſe thereof in preparing a new Edition.] The firſt Edition of Uſher was Printed at Oxford, Anno Dom. 1644. It contains. 1. A preliminary Diſſertation. 2. The Six Epiſtles of St. Ignatius in Greek, wherein all that is not in the ancient Verſion is diſtinguiſhed by Red Characters. 3. The counterfeit Letters. 4. The ancient Latin Tranſlation. 5. Several Notes. In the Year 1647. he publiſhed another Edition which he calls Appendix Ignatiana, in which he inſerted the Greek Text, publiſhed by M. Voſſius in 1646. as alſo a new Tranſlation. He added therein. 1. The ancient Records of the Martyrdom of St. Ignatius, which bear the Name of Philo. 2. The Letters of Tiberianus, Pliny and Trajan concerning the Conſtancy of the Martyrs. 3. The entire Epiſtle of the Church of Smyrna, concerning the Martyrdom of St. Polycarp. 4. Annotations on the Acts and the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius.

(f) Publiſhed the Greek Original of St. Ignatius.] His Edition was Printed at Amſterdam, Anno Dom. 1646. It contains, 1. The Seven Original Epiſtles, excepting that to the Romans, as they were written in his Greek and Latin Manuſcripts. 2. The Greek Epiſtles falſly attributed to St. Ignatius, which are not cited by Euſebius. 3. The three Latin Letters to the Virgin Mary, and St. John. 4. The ſeven Greek and Latin Epiſtles, as they were in the former Editions. 5. The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas, together with Notes on the whole Work. The Editions of Cotelerius and of Maderus at Helmſtadt in Octavo, are not different from that of Voſſius, which hath been lately Reprinted at London, in 1680.

(g) Which being five in Number.] We find at the beginning, the Epiſtle of Maria Caſſobolita: afterward the firſt Epiſtle of St. Ignatius to this Mary; the Second to the Inhabitants of Tarſus; the Third to the Antiochians; the Fourth to Hero a Deacon of the Church of Antioch; and the laſt to the Philippians.

(b) The ſeven Epiſtles mentioned by Euſebius.] They are written according to the Order obſerved by M. Voſſius, Firſt to the Chriſtians of Smyrna; the Second to St. Polycarp; the Third to the Epheſians; the Fourth to the Magneſians; the Fifth to the Philadelphians; the Sixth to the Trallians, and the Seventh to the Romans. Moreover we may diſtinguiſh Four ancient Editions of the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius; the Firſt contained only theſe ſeven that were known to Euſebius, and the other ancient Writers without any Additions; the Second comprehended only theſe ſeven Epiſtles, but with ſeveral Additions; Pearſon had a Manuſcript of them; which Copy had been uſed by Gobarus, Anaſtaſius Antiochenus, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, in the Third there are the ſeven Authentick Epiſtles without Interpolations, together with the counterfeit; ſuch are thoſe of the Verſion of Uſher, and the Greek Manuſcript of M. Voſſius, and theſe were peruſed by St. Joannes Damaſcenus and Antonius: The Fourth is that of the ſeven Genuine Epiſtles, together with the Additions, and the others that were forged, which is the Vulgar.

St. Ignatius.

Ignatius, and the first Question that offers it self to our Examination, is whether this Father wrote any Epistles at all: To which I reply, that it cannot be reasonably doubted: For, 1. This matter of Fact is attested by all Antiquity. 2. It is proved by the above-cited Tradition, that the Authors who saw St. Ignatius, as St. Polycarp, and those that lived immediately after him, as Irenæus and Origen, knew and quoted these Epistles. Now to believe that they were falsly attributed to him even in their time, is in my opinion great Nonsense; therefore it ought to be taken for granted, that St. Ignatius wrote Epistles: And who can imagine, that those are not Genuine that were collected by St. Polycarp? Or what likelihood is there that they were lost between St. Polycarp's death, and Eusebius's time, and that others were substituted in their room? Wherefore Eusebius had the Original Epistles of St. Ignatius, and they that succeeded him, whose Testimonies we have already alledged, having without doubt preserved the seven that are mentioned by him, it cannot be affirmed with any probability that they have cited fictitious Epistles. From whence we ought to conclude, that since all the Passages produced by them may be found word for word in the Editions of Usher and Vossius, it is very probable that they contain the Authentick Epistles of St. Ignatius in their Original Purity. And this Argument is of so much the more force, because this is not only true in the resemblance of one or two Passages, for it were not to be admired that they should agree, since they might have been inserted by an Impostor; but in a very great number that are cited by different Authors, which makes it much more certain. Besides, there is nothing in these Epistles that does not agree with the Person, and Time of St. Ignatius; there are no Defects in the Chronology, nor any Anachronisms, which are usually found in Suppositious Works; there is no mention made of any Heretick that lived after St. Ignatius; the Errors that are refuted belong to his time, as that of the Simonians and Ebionites concerning the Passion and Divinity of Jesus Christ; the Tradition of the Church is confirmed according to Eusebius: He speaks of those Gifts of the Holy Spirit that were visible in the Church; he cites very few Passages out of the Holy Scriptures; he imitates the Style of St. Paul, and intermingles nothing of prophane Learning. Upon the whole matter, these Epistles are written with great simplicity, and bear an Apostolical Character; thus all the Arguments that evince the Falsification, or the Corruption of the other Epistles, invincibly prove the Truth and Purity of these. But this will appear yet further from the Answers to the Objections propounded by Salmasius, Blondel, and Daillé, which we shall set down and confute in a few words, replying only to those that may be alledged against the seven Epistles, as they are Printed in the Edition of Vossius, and omitting the others which do not relate to our Opinion.

Objection 1. Our Adversaries not being able to produce any considerable Testimonies, at least such as can be esteemed to be of sufficient Authority, and being unwilling to appear to be the first Authors of the Opinion which they maintain, have sought for the Author of the Stichometria, which is prefixed to the Works of Syncellus and Theophanes, and is commonly attributed to Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople, tho' it is not certain whether it is his or not. This Stichometria is a Catalogue of the sacred Books both Canonical and Apocryphal, together with the number of their Verses, at the end whereof are annexed, The Apocryphal Books of the New Testament, the Voyages of St. Peter, and The Doctrine of the Apostles, of St. Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Hermas; from whence M. Daillé concludes, that this Author hath inserted the Epistles of St. Ignatius among the Apocryphal and counterfeit Writings.

Answer. First, this Author calls all those Books Apocryphal that are not Canonical, and in this sense the Epistles of St. Ignatius may be reckoned under this Denomination, as the Book of the Pastor, which is styled Apocryphal by those that do not receive it as Canonical, tho' it is very ancient, and was certainly written by him whose Name it bears.

Secondly, This Author doth not mention the Epistles of St. Ignatius or St. Polycarp, and there is no probability that he intended to do it, because his design is to make a Catalogue of the sacred Writings both Genuine and Apocryphal; now what Analogy is there between this and the Epistles of St. Ignatius, which being written a long time after the Death of the Apostles, could not be comprized amongst the Books of the Holy Scripture? And indeed if the Epistles of St. Ignatius, and St. Polycarp ought to be rejected as fictitious, because this Author hath inserted their Names among the Apocryphal Books of the New Testament, we must likewise reject the Epistle of St. Clement, whose Name is found immediately before; therefore it must necessarily be inferred, that he intended to reject some other Books that were ascribed to St. Clemens, to St. Ignatius, and to St. Polycarp, and that the Word διδαχὴ ought to be understood with relation to these three last, for after having said διδαχὴ ἀποστόλων, The Doctrine of the Apostles, he adds without specifying any thing else, of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp, that is to say, the Books in like manner Entituled, The Doctrine of Clement, The Doctrine of Ignatius, The Doctrine of Polycarp; this is the plain sense of that Passage. St. Ignatius.

Thirdly, Altho' it were granted, that this Author had rejected the Epistles of St. Ignatius, which is not true, of what weight could his Testimony be, against the Tradition that we have even now alledged?

Object. 2. It is said, that these Epistles were unknown to St. Justin, to St. Clement of Alexandria, and to all the ancient Writers before Eusebius.

Answ. Tho' this were true, yet there are many Books whose Truth is not called in question, that are mentioned by Eusebius alone, and by no other ancient Author; but besides, we have already shewn, that these Epistles are cited by St. Polycarp, St. Irenæus, and Origen, and that the Passages which they produce, are found in those Letters that we have.

Object. 3. The style (say they) of the Epistles attributed to St. Ignatius, is very different from that of this Father; it is full of lofty Expressions and affected Epithets, which is very far from the simplicity of the Apostolical Times. They say moreover, that the Inscriptions of these Letters are long and full of pompous Epithets.

Answ. The Objections taken from the style are of little moment; for who hath informed these modern Criticks how St. Ignatius writ? However it is not true, that the style of these Epistles is far from the simplicity of the ancient Christians; on the contrary, it is very simple, and extremely natural: It must be confessed indeed, that there are some Epithets and compound Words, but this agrees with the Asiatick stile, which is generally more florid than that of other Nations? It might also be added, that we find the like Epithets in the Epistle of St. Clement, and in other ancient Authors. The inscriptions are not longer than St. Paul's Epistles, and in the Editions of Usher and Vossius they are not so large nor so magnificent as in the Vulgar, as well as in that of the Epistle to the Romans recited by Metaphrastes.

Object. 4. This Objection is the first of those that are taken from the Contents of the Epistles themselves. It is said, that the Author writes against the Opinion of Saturninus, who believed that Jesus Christ suffered only in Appearance; and of Theodotus, who imagined that our Saviour was a mere Man. Now these two Hereticks are later than St. Ignatius.

Ans. The first of these Errors was maintained by Simon Magus and Menander; the other was asserted by Cerinthus and Ebion, Hereticks who lived in St. Ignatius's time.

Object. 5. This is the principle, or the only Objection that hath any difficulty, it is taken from an Expression in the Epistle to the Magnesians, That the Eternal Word proceeded not from Silence, ὃς ἀπὸ σιγῆς προελθών, which seems to be said purposely against the Errors of the Valentinians, who first used the word Silence as a Term of Art.

Ans. If there were no Answer to be given to this Objection, I should rather chuse to affirm, that this Passage is added, than merely on this account to reject the Epistles that are acknowledged as Authentick by all the Ancients. There are many Books wherein some Editions have been made, which make them appear later than they really are; and we find some of this sort in the Bible, in Homer, and in almost all the Ecclesiastical and Prophane Authors. But there is no necessity to make use of this answer, since we have several others that are sufficient to afford reasonable Satisfaction to the Impartial and Judicious Reader.

For, 1. It is not true that St. Ignatius here speaks of the Silence of the Valentinians, or of any other Notion of Hereticks that is like it, he only declares, that the Word of God is not like unto that of Men, which comes from, or follows after Silence. These are his Words: There is but one God who hath made himself manifest by his Son Jesus Christ, who is the Eternal Word of God, that doth not proceed from Silence, and that is in all things like unto him that sent him. The main design of St. Ignatius in this place, is to establish our Saviour's Divinity against the Ebionites. He shews that he is God, because he is the Word or the Speech of God, which being eternal, is not preceded by Silence as that of Men. This Explication is natural and liable to no difficulty, though M. Daillé hath thought fit to censure it as Impertinent; however there is none that reads this Paſſage but will readily grant, that this Senſe is moſt proper and very conformable to the Intention of the ancient Writers, who endeavoured to demonſtrate the Difference that there is between the Word of God and that of Men. St. Auguſtine, in his Homily concerning the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, makes uſe of the very ſame Compariſon, without having any regard to the Valentinians; Quod eſt (ſays he) hoc Verbum? Quod dicturus antea non ſilebat, quo dicto, non ſiluit qui dicebat: And St. Fulgentius, Lib. 3. ad Traſim. cap. 28. Idem Verbum nullo potuit coerceri ſilentio, quia ipſe Patris eſt ſempiterna locutio. That which is affirmed by M. Daillé, that the word προϊλθειν was uſed by the Valentinians, may be true, but they oftner uſed the word προβάλλεσθαι, neither is the word προϊλθειν peculiar to the Valentinians, it is commonly applied in Greek to ſignifie To go or come forth. Beſides, St. Ignatius ſays not ἐκ σιγῆς, but ἀπὸ σιγῆς, which may ſignifie, that the Word of God came not forth after Silence as that of Men.

2. Valentinus and his Diſciples did not affirm, that the Word came from Silence. The Word according to their fantaſtical Imagination, came from the Spirit and the Truth, and not from the Deep and from Silence.

3. The Opinion of Valentinus concerning Silence, was deviſed and propagated before his time, for all that ſpeak of his Hereſie, obſerve, that he revived the ancient Errors of the Gnoſticks. Euſebius declares in Lib. 2. de Theolog. Eccleſ. cap. 9. that Simon Magus often talked of Silence among his Followers: Secundum impium (ſays he) Hæreticorum principem, qui, impia dogmatizans, pronunciavit dicens, erat Deus, & Sige; which comes nearer to the Error, that is ſuppoſed to be confuted by St. Ignatius. St. Irenæus attributes this Opinion to all the Gnoſticks, as alſo Tertullian, St. Epiphanius, and St. Auguſtine, St. Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. 23. and after him Ellas Cretenſis, charge it upon the Gnoſticks. This ſhews, that tho' the Author of the Epiſtle to the Magneſians ſhould have oppoſed the Error of thoſe that maintain that the Word proceeded from Silence, yet this doth not hinder but that it might have been written by St. Ignatius.

4. It is not certainly known, whether Valentinus had not already begun to divulge his Errors even before the Death of St. Ignatius, ſince it is evident that St. Polycarp ſurvived this Arch-Heretick, and tho' he was not declared to be the Ring-leader of this Party till afterwards, yet he might even then have taught ſome of his pernicious Doctrines, to which St. Ignatius might allude. Theſe four Anſwers are ſolid, and every one of them ſeparately might be ſufficient to convince any Man; but the firſt in my opinion is moſt natural.

Object. 6. In the Epiſtle to the Chriſtians of Smyrna, mention is made of certain viſible Princes that ſhall be judged, if they do not believe in Jeſus Chriſt. Now what probability is there, (ſay they) that St. Ignatius ſhould ſpeak this of the Emperors and Kings of his time?

Anſw. Why may not this be affirmed of the Unbelieving Emperors and Kings that were Contemporary with St. Ignatius? Since Tertullian and St. Juſtin have declared as much of the Emperors of their time, and that too in the preſence of the Emperors themſelves. Moreover it is not neceſſary to underſtand the word Ἀρχοντες only of Emperors and Kings, ſince it may ſignifie all that are inveſted with any Authority.

Object. 7. In the Epiſtle to the Romans we find this Expreſſion, That he was led by the Leopards, which are Soldiers. This Explication (ſay they) is needleſs, and the Compariſon is childiſh.

Anſw. And I ſay that the ſimilitude is very natural, and that the Explication was neceſſary. Bochart indeed affirms, that the word Leopard was not uſed until the time of Conſtantine; but how does he know it? It is in the Acts of the Paſſion of St. Perpetua and St. Felicitas; Ælius Spartianus, in the Life of Geta, thinks, that it was an old Word at the time when he wrote his Hiſtory.

Object. 8. In the Epiſtle to the Philadelphians, he ſpeaks of Penitents that were publickly received by the Church, whereas (ſay they) in the firſt Ages, they that had once fallen were not afterward re-admitted into the Communion of the Church; neither was there any Pennance that ended in Reconciliation.

Anſw. There is nothing in the Epiſtle to the Philadelphians concerning publick Penitents who had committed enormous Crimes; this is a mere Imagination. It is only declared, that they that had departed from the Church ſhould obtain Pardon for their Fault, if they repented thereof by re-entring into it, that is to ſay, if they re-united themſelves to the Church, from which they were ſeparated. It is certain, that Hereticks and Schiſmaticks returning to the Church were always re-admitted. Beſide, the Example of the young Man who was reconciled by St. John, after he had been for a long time Captain of a Troop of Highway-men, and of many others, ſhew, that Pennance was then in uſe; and Morinus evidently proves, that in the two firſt Centuries Abſolution was granted more eaſily than in the third.

St. Ignatius.

Object. 9. Oneſimus Biſhop of Epheſus, who died before St. Ignatius, is cited by Name in this Epiſtle.

Anſw. This Oneſimus is not he that was the Diſciple of St. Paul, whom others affirm to have been Biſhop of Berœa: And beſides, even the Oneſimus mentioned by St. Paul might be living when St. Ignatius wrote this Epiſtle, ſince that of St. Paul to Philemon was written from Rome about the Year of our Lord 64, therefore tho' Oneſimus might be 26 Years old then, yet he could not have been above 70 Years of age about the Year 107, or 108, when St. Ignatius Compoſed theſe Works, which is no very extraordinary thing.

Object. 10. The Author of the Epiſtles attributed to St. Ignatius cites (as they ſay) ſeveral Apocryphal Books. He produceth in the Epiſtle to the Smyrneans a Sentence concerning Jeſus Chriſt, taken from the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. Who can believe this of St. Ignatius?

Anſw. This is no unuſual thing among the Ancients. St. Jerome gives us the ſame paſſage of St. Ignatius, and Papias hath likewiſe quoted the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. St. Clement in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, uſes ſome Expreſſions as taken from the Holy Scriptures which are not there, as is obſerved by Photius, Cod. 126. St. Jude alſo cites the Book of Enoch. And beſides, we cannot poſitively affirm, that the Goſpel according to the Hebrews is cited by St. Ignatius, for he only produceth a Sentence, as knowing by Tradition that it was uttered by Jeſus Chriſt. Thus St. Clement and St. Barnabas ſet down the Words of our Saviour, which they had either heard ſpoken by him, or had received from thoſe by whom he was ſeen in the Fleſh. Laſtly, this Paſſage in St. Ignatius is quoted by St. Jerome, as belonging to the Goſpel according to the Hebrews; but Origen produces it out of the Book, Entituled, The Doctrine of St. Peter, which ſhews that it was a very common Expreſſion.

Object. 11. The ardent deſire of ſuffering Martyrdom, expreſſed by St. Ignatius, is (according to their Judgment) too exceſſive.

Anſw. This hath been admired in the Epiſtle to the Romans, by the ancient Chriſtians; the ſame Ardor appears likewiſe in St. Cyprian, in Germanicus a Martyr of Smyrna, and in many others. Certainly they muſt needs have but a very little knowledge of Antiquity, who deny that the Primitive Chriſtians were inflamed with a fervent deſire of ſuffering Martyrdom, and a Man ſhews that he is but meanly skilled in Divinity, if he blames this Paſſion, when it neither does, nor ſays any thing that is impudent or indecent. And this is the caſe of St. Ignatius, who, in teſtifying an earneſt deſire of becoming a Martyr, uttered no Expreſſions but ſuch as were very prudent, and very moderate: Let us read his Epiſtle to the Romans with the ſame ſpirit as he wrote it, and we ſhall be ſo far from cenſuring it with the modern Criticks, that we ſhall admire it as much as the Ancients did.

Object. 12. St. Paul doth not mention the Epheſians in all his Epiſtles, as it is affirmed by the Author of the Epiſtle to the Epheſians: Therefore, &c.

Anſw. He doth not ſay that St. Paul mentioned the Epheſians in all his Epiſtles, but throughout the whole Epiſtle that he wrote to them, (ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ) and compoſed altogether for their uſe.

Object. 13. He declares that he ſaw Jeſus Chriſt, which, St. Chryſoſtome ſays, is not true.

Anſw. The paſſage which is meant by them ſignifies only, that he knew and believed the real Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt. And after all, it was not impoſſible for St. Ignatius to have ſeen our Saviour.

Object. 14. He gives an account of the Errors of certain Hereticks that abſtained from the Euchariſt; now there were not any ſuch (ſays M. Daillé) in the time of St. Ignatius, but afterwards when theſe Epiſtles were counterfeited.

Anſw. Who hath informed him, that there were no ſuch at the time when theſe Epiſtles were forged, and none before? Theſe Hereticks are the Docetæ, who believed that Jeſus Chriſt ſuffered only in appearance, whoſe Hereſie was very ancient.

Object. 15. He affirms, that the Romans might eaſily have delivered him from his perſecutor, why then did they not do it.

Anſw. He doth not declare that they were abſolutely able to deliver him, but only that he was ready to undergo Martyrdom, if they did not prevent it; that they might eaſily do whatever they thought fit, that is, uſe their endeavours to reſcue him from Death; but for his part, he could not find a better opportunity of ſuffering for Jeſus Chriſt.

Object.

St. Ignatius.

Object. 16. He promiseth to send a Book to the Ephesians; but how could he do it when he was going to be put to Death?

Answ. His meaning is, that he would write a second Letter to them, Δεύτερον βιβλίον, a second small Volume, upon two Conditions; First, if God should permit; and Secondly, in case the Ephesians should want it. He might well hope to write another, having had the liberty to write the former.

Object. 17. There appears (say they) too much Arrogance and Affectation in these Epistles; the Author boasts, that he hath the knowledge of Celestial things, Se multa sapere in Deo, and that he knew the Orders, Offices, and Stations of the Angels.

Answ. All this might be affirmed by an ancient Bishop, that had acquired the Reputation of St. Ignatius; all the Christians might likewise boast that they were endued with the knowledge of Celestial Things, and more especially Bishops. St. Ignatius immediately adds after the Words cited in the Objection, Whatsoever knowledge I have, I am not puffed up, but I measure my self. He says nothing of Angels, but what had been said before by St. Paul.

Object. 18. What reason is there, that St. Ignatius should be sent to Rome to be exposed to wild Beasts in the Amphitheatre of that City, as if Persons condemned to this sort of Punishment, were not executed in all the great Towns, where Shews were exhibited? Why must he be brought thither by Sea and Land, a way so far about?

Answ. If we may believe the History of the Martyrdom of St. Ignatius, he was sent to Rome by the express Command of the Emperor. However, if this were not true, it is ordained by the Law, Ad bestias tit. de Pœnis: That Criminals, condemned to be torn in pieces by wild Beasts, should be conveyed to Rome with the Emperor's Permission; (which ought to be understood of considerable Malefactors;) such were the Ring-leaders of Factions, and the Bishops among the Christians, especially so famous a Bishop as that of Antioch. The way through which he was conducted thither was the ordinary Road; for to come to Rome out of Syria, it is necessary to go to Smyrna or to Ephesus, afterward to cross the Hellespont, and so to Brundusium, and from thence to Rome.

Object. 19. The last Objection which is the cause why all the others were made, is taken from the different Orders of Bishops and Priests, who are often distinguished in the Epistles that are attributed to St. Ignatius: It is supposed that this distinction was not made until the third Age of the Church, from whence it is concluded that these Epistles are none of his.

Answ. This Supposition being false, the whole Objection must consequently fall of it self, and tho' we had no other Proofs of the distinction of Bishops and Priests in the second Century, than the Epistles of St. Ignatius, yet we ought not to doubt thereof, and instead of inferring from thence that these Letters are Counterfeit, it may well be concluded on the contrary, that the different Orders of Bishops and Priests, were established in St. Ignatius's time, since they are found in the Epistles that have been acknowledged by all the ancient Writers as certainly belonging to him: But there are many other Testimonies which make it appear, that there was a distinction between Bishops and Priests even in the second Age of the Church. Hegesippus, for Example, gives us a Catalogue of the Bishops of Jerusalem; can this be said to be a List of the Priests of that City? Polycrates hath made another of the ancient Bishops of Asia, and Eusebius hath compiled that of the principal Cities throughout the whole World since the time of Jesus Christ. Therefore there must of necessity have been always in the Church, Persons called Bishops, who presided over Churches and Priests. The Martyrs of Lyons style Pothinus Bishop, and St. Irenæus Priest. The anonymous Author, cited by Eusebius against the Cataphrygians, distinguishes Priests from Bishops. And there are infinite numbers of Testimonies and Arguments, by which it may be proved that there was some difference made between Priests and Bishops even in the second Century; but we shall insist no longer on this Subject: And I am afraid that I have already tired the Reader's patience in refuting all the Objections that have been alledged against the Epistles of St. Ignatius, but I judged it necessary for the confirmation of their Authority.

It remains only, for the conclusion of our Critical Enquiries concerning these Epistles, to give some account of that to St. Polycarp. I know not what reason Usher might have to reject it, since it plainly belongs to the number of the Seven that are mentioned by Eusebius, who clearly distinguisheth it from that which was written to the inhabitants of Smyrna. St. Jerome follows Eusebius in this particular. Et propriè (says he) ad Polycarpum. It is true indeed, that there he cites a Passage of the Epistle to the Smyrneans as appertaining to that of Polycarp, but this may only be an Error as to matter of Fact, and it very frequently happens, that in Citations one Work is taken for another. A notable mark of the Truth of this Epistle is that in the Manuscript of Florence, it is found to be different from the vulgar Edition, as well as the six others which are esteemed Authentick, whereas all the rest which are forged do not vary in this Manuscript from the ordinary Editions; this shews, that the Author of these Letters, is the same Person that made the Additions in the real Epistles of St. Ignatius, and that all those that are purged from these Additions in the above-cited Manuscript of Florence, and in the Edition of Vossius, are undoubtedly genuine.

St. Ignatius.

The Chronological Order of these seven Epistles is this: First, it is certain that they were all written by St. Ignatius when he was in Bonds, and as he was conveyed from Antioch to Rome to be exposed to wild Beasts in that City. Secondly it is likewise evident, that four of them were made at Smyrna, where he resided, perhaps, for some considerable time; these four in the Edition of Vossius and in St. Jerome are put in this following Order; the Epistle to the Ephesians, to the Magnesians, to the Trallians, and the last to the Romans. It cannot be precisely determined, whether this be the Order wherein they were written, or whether they were all composed at the same time. It is probable that the Epistle to the Romans is the last, because he declares therein, that he wrote to the other Churches, and that he went chearfully to suffer Martyrdom: It seems to have been made when he was ready to depart, being wearied with the long stay of his Guards in that place; so great was his Passion to suffer Martyrdom.

He wrote the three others at his departure from Smyrna whilst he stayed at Troas, from whence he was obliged to go to Naples. The Epistles to the Smyrneans and to St. Polycarp seem to have been written together, and that to the Philadelphians last, because it is expressed in the later, that the other Cities had sent several Bishops and Priests into Syria; and in the Epistle to St. Polycarp, he chargeth him to depute a fit Person for the Episcopal Function in that Country. However there is a more probable conjecture to prove, that the two others were written after that to the Philadelphians, according to St. Jerom's Opinion, because St. Ignatius declares therein, that he was ready to embark for Naples, and that this was the reason why he could not write to the other Churches, which shews, that the time of his departure drew near when he composed them. He there mentions his Martyrdom, as a thing certainly to be accomplished. St. Ignatius in his Epistle to the Christians of Smyrna, confutes the Error of those that denied that Jesus Christ took upon himself the human Nature; that he assumed a real Body, and that he actually suffered: He affirms, that those Hereticks neglected the Poor and the Widows, and separated themselves from the publick Prayers of the Church, and from the Eucharist, because they did not believe that it was the Body of Jesus Christ, which had been nailed to the Cross for our sakes, and afterwards rose again from the Dead: He admonisheth the Smyrneans to avoid Divisions as the Original of all Evil, to obey their Bishop, to honour the Priests and Deacons, and to do nothing contrary to the Precepts of their Bishop, without whose Assistance (saith he) it is not lawful even to Baptize, or to celebrate the Agapæ or Love-feasts.

In the Epistle to St. Polycarp, he gives excellent Counsels to this Bishop; he advises him to endeavour to preserve Union in his Church, to watch continually over his Flock, and to apply convenient Remedies to their Distempers, to reprove those that offend, with Charity and Gentleness, to pray to God incessantly and to sue for his Grace. In short, to labour without Intermission as a faithful Servant and Soldier of Jesus Christ, who being invisible and impassible, made himself visible and mortal for our sakes. He admonisheth him to take care of the Widows, not to despise the meanest People, not to suffer any thing to be done without his Concurrence, and to do nothing himself but what is conformable to the Will of God, to enjoyn Women to please their Husbands, and Husbands to love their Wives, as also to recommend to them Chastity, accompanied with Humility, and to inform the Christians, that their Marriage when performed, according to the Will of God, ought to be solemnized in the presence of the Bishop. Afterward he exhorts all the faithful, to submit to their Bishop, Priests and Deacons, and to work out their own Salvation. Lastly, directing his Discourse to St. Polycarp, he adviseth him to call a Synod, and to ordain a Bishop to be sent into Syria.

In the Epistle to the Ephesians, he testifies his Joy in seeing Onesimus their Bishop, who came to him with a St. Ignatius. Deacon named Burrus, and two other Believers; he admoniſheth them to live Holily, in perfect Unity among themſelves, and in Obedience to their Biſhop and Prieſts; he declares, that they that do not joyn with the Biſhop and are not preſent at the publick Service of the Chriſtians, over which the Biſhops preſide, are without the Pale of the Church, and deprived of the Celeſtial Food. Afterward he warns them to beware of Hereſies, to avoid the Company of Hereticks, and to believe that Jeſus Chriſt is God, who was incarnate, that he is impaſſible as he is God, and paſſible as he is Man. Laſtly, after having commended their Piety, he exhorts them to pray to God for all ſorts and conditions of Men, frequently to aſſemble together, to make publick Prayers and Supplications, and inviolably to preſerve Faith and Charity; he affirms that the Prince of this World, that is to ſay, the Devil, was ignorant of the Virginity of Mary, of her Child-birth, and of the Death of our Lord: He promiſeth to ſend to them a little Book, that is to ſay, a Letter concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and he intreats them to pray to God for him.

In the Epiſtle to the Magneſians, he exhorts the Chriſtians of that Church to be obedient to their Biſhop Damas who came to ſee him, to do nothing without him, and to live in Unity one with another. He admoniſheth them not to ſuffer themſelves to be led away with vain Opinions, not to live like Jews but as Chriſtians, to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Word of God that doth not proceed from ſilence, but was ſent by God the Father, and is our only hope. At laſt he deſires them to remember him in their Prayers.

In the Epiſtle to the Philadelphians, he congratulates their Union, he exhorts them to avoid corrupt Doctrines, and adviſes them not to follow thoſe that are the Abettors of Schiſms and Diviſions amongſt them, and to concur in every thing with their Biſhop. Laſtly, he refutes the Arguments of thoſe that refuſed to believe any thing, but what was written in the Old Teſtament, and declares that the Goſpel is the Perfection of that which was prefigured in the old Law. St. Ignatius.

In the Epiſtle to the Trallians, he commends their Union, and the Submiſſion and Reſpect that they ſhewed towards their Biſhop, Prieſts and Deacons, and exhorts them to perſevere in this Union, and to beware of Hereticks. He expounds the Orthodox Doctrines of the Catholick Church, that Jeſus Chriſt was born of the Virgin Mary, that he was really Man, that he actually ſuffered and died, and not in appearance, as ſome Hereticks ſaid.

Laſtly, in the Epiſtle to the Romans, he expreſſeth his Zeal, and ardent deſire of ſuffering Martyrdom, and entreats them not to take this glorious Crown from him, by preventing his being expoſed to wild Beaſts in the Amphitheatre of Rome.

Upon the whole matter, all theſe Epiſtles are full of very wholſom Precepts, and uſeful Exhortations; they are extremely worthy of a Chriſtian, of a Biſhop, and of a Martyr, and are all full of Warmth and Piety. One cannot read them, without perceiving every where, that this Holy Man, was animated with a Zeal truly Divine for the Salvation of Souls, for the fulfilling of the Law of Jeſus Chriſt, and for the Preſervation of his Doctrine. In every thing that he ſays, he appears to be full of Love to our Saviour, of Affection towards his Brethren, of Care for the Diſcipline of the Church, and of Ardour for the Bleſſing of Peace. In ſhort, let Criticks that are of a contrary Opinion ſay what they pleaſe, I dare maintain that theſe Epiſtles deſerve to be well eſteemed, and to be admired by all thoſe who profeſs to have any Reſpect for Books of Piety.

St. POLYCARP.

St. Polycarp. ST. Polycarp (a) the Diſciple of St. John the Evangeliſt (b), and by him ordained Biſhop of Smyrna, was after the deceaſe of this Apoſtle, eſteemed as the Head of the Churches of Aſia (c); when he went to Rome, under the Pontificate of Anicetus, about the year 160 (d) he converted ſeveral Marcionites, and obliged them to return to the Boſom of the Church. He had ſeveral Conferences with Pope Anicetus, probably about ſeveral particular Cuſtoms of the Church of Rome; They debated the queſtion of the day when they ſhould keep Eaſter, which was afterwards diſputed under the Pontificate of Pope Victor, but each of them having judged it to be moſt convenient to obſerve his own cuſtom, they amicably communicated one with another; and Anicetus to do the greater honour to St. Polycarp cauſed him to officiate in his own Church (e), and in his own place.

This Holy Biſhop always abhorred Hereticks; and he uſed to tell a ſtory, that St. John having ſeen Cerinthus entring into a Bath, ſpeedily fled from thence without bathing himſelf therein, fearing leſt the building ſhould fall becauſe Cerinthus the Enemy of the Truth was there; and he himſelf having once accidentally met with Marcion, who deſired that he would vouchſafe to take notice of him, he replied, I know that Thou art the eldeſt Son of the Devil. He had a very particular reſpect for the Memory of St. John; he took much delight in telling over the Diſcourſes that he formerly had with him, and with others that had ſeen Jeſus Chriſt in the fleſh; he related every thing whereof he had been informed by them concerning his Doctrine and Miracles, and if he had heard any one maintaining any Principles contrary to the Apoſtolical Faith, he was wont to cry out, O God to what times haſt thou reſerved me! and would immediately depart from the place where he was. All this is recorded by St. Irenæus, and cited by Euſebius in the fourteenth Chapter of the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, and in the twentieth Chapter of the fifth Book. St. Polycarp.

The illuſtrious Martyrdom of this Saint, which happened in the year 167. after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt on the 23d day of February, is deſcribed after a moſt elegant manner in the excellent Epiſtle of the Church of Smyrna to thoſe of Pontus, produced in part by Euſebius, in the fifteenth Chapter of the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, and publiſhed entirely firſt by Archbiſhop Uſher, and afterward by Valeſius. They there give an account that (a) St. Polycarp.] Halloixius ſays, that St. Polycarp was originally of Smyrna; that he was born in the Eaſt, and that he was a Slave in his youth, that he was bought by a certain Lady named Caliſtione, who gave him his Liberty, and cauſed him to be inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion; that ſhe afterwards made him her Steward, and at laſt her Heir. He enlarged on the liberal Donations of this Lady; he affirms that Bucolas Biſhop of Smyrna was at firſt Tutor to St. Polycarp, and afterwards St. John; he writes much in the Commendation of this fictitious Bucolas, and declares, that he ordained St. Polycarp who is the Angel of Smyrna. Theſe Tales and many others are extracted from the falſe Acts of the Life of St. Polycarp forged under the name of Pionius from the Menologium Græcorum by the modern Greeks.

(b) The Diſciple of St. John the Evangeliſt.] St. Irenæus tells us, lib. 3. cap. 3. that he was conſtituted Biſhop of Smyrna by the Apoſtles; and this could be done by no other than St. John.

(c) The Head of the Churches of Aſia.] St. Jerome ſays that he was Princeps Eccleſiarum Aſiæ, that is to ſay, that he was the moſt conſiderable Biſhop, and (as I may ſay) ſucceeded in the Authority of St. John.

(d) About the year 160.] He died in the Seventh year of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius in the year 167. he had then ſerved Jeſus Chriſt 86 years, as he declares himſelf in the Acts of his Martyrdom; Thus he might have begun to ſerve God in the year 81 after the Nativity of our Saviour, and then he might be ten years old. He converſed with all the Apoſtles, if we may believe the Teſtimony of St. Irenæus. St. John died in the year of our Lord 101, and in the ſecond of Trajan; he was baniſhed in the fourteenth of Domitian, An. Dom. 95, and returned into Aſia after the death of this Emperor. Theſe Obſervations may ſerve to fix the Chronology of the Life of St. Polycarp. He was born about the year of our Lord 70, he began to conſecrate himſelf to the ſervice of God in the year 81. At that time he converſed with the Apoſtles, and became the Diſciple of St. John; after the return of this Apoſtle he was ordained Biſhop of Smyrna, however it is not preciſely known in what year, but this muſt of neceſſity have happened before the year 101, ſince St. John died that year: He undertook his Journey to Rome in the beginning of the Pontificate of Anicetus, who preſided in that See from the year 158 to the year 169.

(e) In his own Church.] All theſe Circumſtances are related by St. Irenæus. There are ſome who affirm, that the Expreſſion of St. Irenæus ſignifies only, that Anicetus adminiſtred the Holy Sacrament of the Lords Supper to St. Polycarp, but he would not thereby have done him much honour; it may be better underſtood according to our Explication.

St. Poly-

St. Polycarp.

St. Polycarp did not voluntarily ſurrender himſelf to his Executioners, but that he waited after the example of our Saviour, until he was delivered into their hands; that many Chriſtians ſuffered before him with admirable conſtancy all the Torments imaginable; that there was only one Quintus, who had perſuaded the others to preſent themſelves before the Tribunal of the Judge, that was overcome in the great Tryal, which ſhews (as it is obſerved in the ſame Epiſtle) that although we cannot but admire the conſtancy of thoſe that have generouſly ſuffered, after they had preſented themſelves, yet their conduct ought not to be approved, ſince it is condemned in the Goſpel. That St. Polycarp being informed of what had happened, determined to remain in the City; but being conſtrained to retire into a little Houſe in the Country, he there continually prayed to God night and day for all the Churches, and for all men; that three days before he was apprehended, being fervent in Prayer, he ſaw a Viſion, wherein he perceived that his Bedſtead was all on fire, which cauſed him immediately to foretel that he ſhould ere long be burnt alive; that although he was removed from the place of his abode, yet he was ſeized by the Soldiers of the Provoſt-Marſhal, led into the City and brought before the Pro-Conſul, who endeavoured to perſuade him to ſwear by the Genius of Cæſar, and to curſe Jeſus Chriſt, whereupon Polycarp being encouraged by a Voice from Heaven, openly declares that he was a Chriſtian; That the Pro-Conſul having cauſed his profeſſion to be proclaimed with a loud Voice, all the People who were in the Amphitheatre, cryed out, that he ſhould be burnt alive: That being tied to a ſtake, he prayed to God, and concluded with bleſſing the moſt Holy Trinity; that when the Fire was kindled it made a kind of a Circle round about the Body of this holy Martyr, who remained in the midſt thereof without receiving the leaſt hurt; and laſtly, that the Pagans perceiving that the Fire could not burn or conſume him, ſent an Officer to run him thorough with a Sword; and would not ſuffer the Chriſtians to carry off his Body, which continued whole and entire, leſt (as theſe deluded Heathens affirmed) they ſhould adore it inſtead of Jeſus Chriſt. Fools, as they were, (theſe are the words of the Epiſtle of the Church of Smyrna) they did not know that the Chriſtians worſhip none but Jeſus Chriſt becauſe he is the Son of God, and only honour the Martyrs who are his Diſciples and Followers, becauſe of the Love which they teſtifie to have for their King and Maſter. The Centurion having cauſed the Body of this Martyr to be burnt, the Chriſtians carried away his Bones being more valuable than the moſt precious Stones, and more pure than Gold, which they buried in a place where they aſſembled together, to celebrate with joy and chearfulneſs the day of his Martyrdom, thus honouring the memory of thoſe that have fought gloriouſly for the defence of their Religion, and to confirm and inſtruct others by ſuch Examples. Theſe were the Notions of the Primitive Church concerning the Reſpect due to Martyrs and their Relicks, explained after a clear and exact manner, which are as far removed from the aſperſions that are caſt on them by the Proteſtants of our time, as from the ſuperſtition of ſome Roman Catholicks.

[There is nothing in this Declaration of the Church of Smyrna which the Proteſtants ever diſallowed: They are far from thinking that thoſe are not worthy of extraordinary Honours here below, who are ſo peculiarly graced by God himſelf. But yet if they are jealous of the Honour which is only due to Jeſus Chriſt, and afraid of doing any thing which may derogate from it, they think this to be a thing which needs no excuſe; ſince we have a poſitive command for the one, whereas the other is wholly diſcretionary: And we can never err in aſſigning the Bounds of that Reſpect which is due to Saints and Martyrs if we conſider that their great Honour ariſes from their inviolable Fidelity to our common Maſter; and that the chiefeſt reaſon why the Church at firſt commanded the anniverſaries of Saints and Martyrs to be obſerved with ſo much Splendour, was to encourage the reſt of the Faithful to imitate them as they imitated Jeſus Chriſt.]

St. Irenæus aſſures us in his Letter to Florinus, that St. Polycarp wrote ſeveral Epiſtles to the neighbouring Churches to confirm them in the Chriſtian Faith, and others to ſome of his Brethren to encourage and exhort them to perſevere in the Truth. We have at preſent but one ſingle Epiſtle written by him to the Philippians, and particularly cited by St. Irenæus, Euſebius, St. Jerome and Photius (f), who have all commended and approved it as really belonging to this primitive Biſhop. And it cannot be doubted that it is the ſame with that which was extant in the time of theſe ancient Writers; wherefore I ſhall make no difficulty to affirm that it would be great raſhneſs to reject it, as M. Blondel and M. Daillé have done; for by whom have theſe modern Authors been informed that this Letter was not compoſed by St. Polycarp? What Reaſons can they alledge? Do they know St. Polycarp's ſtyle better than St. Irenæus his Diſciple? have they a greater inſight into this matter than Euſebius, St. Jerome or Photius? Beſides, if the Arguments produced by them had any weight, one might ſet them in the balance with the Authority of thoſe ancient Writers, but they are ſo weak that they ſcarcely deſerve to be mentioned. This Epiſtle (ſays M. Daillé) is diſallowed by Nicephorus in his Stichometria: This is indeed an Authority of great moment fit to be ſet againſt the Teſtimony of Euſebius, St. Jerome and Photius! It is not certainly known by whom this Stichometria was compoſed, and although we ſhould allow that it was written by Nicephorus, yet he is a late Author, and of very little Authority in compariſon of thoſe that we have now cited. After all, he doth not reject the Epiſtle of St. Polycarp, but only a certain Work that was attributed to him, and the Book of the Doctrine of St. Polycarp (as we have elſewhere obſerved) ought to be thereby underſtood, after the ſame manner as the Book of the Doctrine of St. Ignatius, and the Book of the Doctrine of St. Clement. Otherwiſe we muſt likewiſe diſallow the Epiſtle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, whoſe name is found among the Apocryphal Writings immediately before that of St. Polycarp. It is certain alſo, that there was extant a Book, entituled, The Doctrine of St. Polycarp, as well as one called, The Doctrine of St. Clement, ſince it is cited by Maximus, Bede, Ado, Uſuardus, Metaphraſtes, Pachymeres, Honorius, and Nicephorus Caliſtus.

St. Polycarp.

M. Daillé perceiving the weakneſs of his objection againſt the Epiſtle of St. Polycarp, is obliged to aſſert, that tho' the firſt part is genuine, yet the ſecond wherein he mentions thoſe of St. Ignatius, is ſuppoſititious: And to prove this he ſhews, that the Epiſtle was concluded with the Invocation of Jeſus Chriſt, and that which follows ought to be eſteemed as an addition made afterwards, being of no Authority. But M. Daillé cannot maintain this Hypotheſis, without rejecting the Teſtimony of Euſebius and Photius, who cite this ſecond Part, and more eſpecially that which relates to the Letters of St. Ignatius; neither doth it ſignifie any thing to urge that the Epiſtle was concluded before, becauſe, it is evident, that the Invocation of Jeſus Chriſt is frequently inſerted in the middle of an Epiſtle, which is nevertheleſs continued after this ſort of concluſion; this is very often to be found in St. Paul's Epiſtles, particularly in the fifteenth Chapter of his Epiſtle to the Romans. The only objection alledged by M. Daillé that hath any manner of probability is this; It is manifeſt (ſays he) that the Author who wrote that part wherein St. Ignatius is mentioned, ſuppoſeth him to be yet living, ſince he requires the Philippians to inform him concerning the Tranſactions of St. Ignatius, and of thoſe that were with him; De ipſo Ignatio & de iis qui cum eo ſunt (g) quod certius agnoveritis ſignificate. But if we obſerve theſe words, it will appear, that they might as well be written after the death of St. Ignatius, as when he was alive, and that St. Polycarp only deſired an account of the particular Circumſtances of the Life and Martyrdom of that eminent Biſhop, which were not unknown to the Chriſtians of Philippi, through which City he had paſſed in his Journey to Rome.

This Epiſtle being full of admirable Counſels, Precepts, and Exhortations taken from the Holy Scriptures is written with a great deal of elegancy and ſimplicity, as Photius has obſerved already. It was Printed in Latin together with the Epiſtles of St. Clement and St. Ignatius in the years 1498, 1502, 1520, 1536, and 1550. at Baſil in 1579, at Colen in 1530, at Paris in 1569 with the Works of St. Irenæus, at Ingolſtadt in 1546, at Paris in 1562, and at ſeveral other times, it is likewiſe inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum ſet forth by La Bigne. Beſides it was Printed at Colen in 1557 of the Tranſlation of Perionius, with the Works of Dionyſius the Areopagite, and in 1585, with them and the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius. Halloixius firſt publiſhed part thereof in Greek from a Manuſcript which Sirmondus had tranſcribed from (f) By St. Irenæus, Euſebius, St. Jerome, and Photius.] St. Irenæus in lib. 3. contr. Hæreſ. ſays thus, There is extant an Epiſtle of Polycarp to the Chriſtians of Philippi, which is extremely accurate, and very proper to ſhew the Character of the Faith, and the Doctrine of the Truth, to thoſe that take any care of their Salvation. Euſebius adds in lib. 4. cap. 14. that St. Polycarp in this Epiſtle makes uſe of ſome Teſtimonies taken from the Firſt Epiſtle of St. Peter: Theſe References are found in that which we now have under his Name. St. Jerome affirms, that this Epiſtle was read in the Aſſembly of the Faithful of Aſia. See Photius, Cod. 126.

a Copy written by Turrianus. Uſher hath printed it in Greek and Latin afterwards with the Epiſtles of St. Ignatius in the year 1644. Cotelerius put it into his Collection of the ancient Records of the Fathers. Moderus hath likewiſe procured it to be reprinted at Helmſtadt, and laſtly it was Printed in Holland in 1687, with a Diſſertation concerning the Life and Writings of St. Polycarp, in a Collection of Treatiſes, entituled, Varia Sacra, ſet forth by M. Le Moine.

There are ſeveral other Works attributed to this ancient Biſhop, as an Epiſtle to St. Dionyſius the Areopagite, quoted by Suidas, and a Treatiſe concerning the Union of St. John, which is pretended to be kept in the Abby of Fleury; ſome Paſſages or Notes on the Goſpels are likewiſe produced for his, which are taken from the Catena of Feuardentius under the name of Victor Capuenſis. But it is very probable that theſe Tracts are fictitious. St. Jerome in his 28th Epiſtle to Bæticus declares, that it was commonly reported in his time, that the Authentick Works of Joſephus, Polycarp, and Papias, were brought to him, but that it was a falſe rumour.

PAPIAS.

Papias.

Papias, Biſhop of Hierapolis (a), a City of Aſia, was a Diſciple either of St. John the Evangeliſt (b), or of ſome other Perſon who bore the ſame name: He wrote five Books, intituled, The Explications of our Lords Diſcourſes, which were extant even in the time of Trithemius; but at preſent we have only ſome few fragments in the Writings of the ancient and modern Authors. He was the firſt that promoted the famous Opinion, or rather Dotage of Antiquity (c), concerning the Temporal Reign of Jeſus Chriſt, which they fancied ſhould happen on Earth a thouſand years before the day of Judgment, when the Elect ſhould be gathered together after the Reſurrection in the City of Jeruſalem, and ſhould enjoy there all the Delights imaginable during theſe thouſand years.

St. Irenæus produceth a fragment taken from the fourth Book of Papias, wherein he endeavours to prove this Opinion by a paſſage of the Prophet Iſaiah: And Euſebius having cited a Paragraph of his Preface to theſe Books, in which he ſhews the great care that he took to be informed of the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, by interrogating their Diſciples, adds; That this Author hath ſet down many things, which he pretended to have learnt by an unwritten Tradition, of which ſort there are ſeveral new Parables and Inſtructions of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, that are not contained in the Goſpels, together with other fabulous Hiſtories, among which we may reckon the Reign of Jeſus Chriſt on Earth during the ſpace of a thouſand years after the Reſurrection of the Body; That which led him into this error (continueth Euſebius) is that he underſtood the Diſcourſes and Inſtructions of the Apoſtles too literally, not underſtanding that a myſtical ſenſe ought to be given to this ſort of Expreſſions, and that the Apoſtles only made uſe of them as Illuſtrations; for he was a Man of a very mean capacity, as appears from his Books, who nevertheleſs gave occaſion to many of the ancient Fathers, and among others to Irenæus, to follow this Error, which they maintained by the authority of Papias. Euſebius in the ſame place relates two Miracles, the account whereof Papias declares that he had received from the Daughter of Philip the Deacon, who reſided at Hierapolis; That a dead Man was raiſed at that time, and that Barſabas, ſirnamed Juſtus, Elected to be an Apoſtle, together with St. Matthias, having ſwallowed deadly Poiſon, was not hurt by it: Moreover he aſſures us, that Papias had collected in his Books divers Explications on ſome words of Jeſus Chriſt compoſed by Ariſtion a Diſciple of the Apoſtles, and the Traditions likewiſe of the venerable Elder St. John; but omitting theſe things, he is content only to recite a paſſage wherein this ancient Writer affirms, that St. Mark compiled his Goſpel from what he had heard St. Peter tell of the Actions and Diſcourſes of Jeſus Chriſt, and this is the reaſon that he hath not obſerved an Hiſtorical Method; That St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel in Hebrew, and that it was afterward Tranſlated into Greek. Laſtly, Euſebius affirms, that he cited the firſt Epiſtles of St. Peter and of St. John, and that he explained the Hiſtory of a Woman that was accuſed before our Saviour of ſeveral Crimes, which was found in the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. Thus we have given an account of all that is recorded by Euſebius concerning Papias. Andræas Cæſarienſis and Oecumenius have likewiſe produced ſome Paſſages (d) of his Works in their Commentaries on the Holy Scripture, but it is not certain whether they were Papias's or no.

Papias.

The Judgment that ought to be given concerning him, is that which hath been already given by Euſebius, that is to ſay, that he was a good Man, but very credulous, and of very mean Parts, who delighted much in hearing and telling Stories and Miracles. And ſince he was exceedingly inquiſitive, and inclined to believe every thing that was told him, it is not to be admired that he hath divulged divers Errors and Extravagant Notions as the Judgments of the Apoſtles, and hath given us fabulous Narratives for real Hiſtories, which ſhews, that nothing is ſo dangerous in Matters of Religion, as lightly to believe, and too greedily to embrace, all that hath the appearance of Piety, without conſidering in the firſt place how true it is (e).

(a) Hierapolis.] There are ſeveral Cities of that Name, but this lies between Phrygia and Lydia near Laodicea, being famous for Springs of hot Water.

(b) A Diſciple of St. John the Evangeliſt.] St. Irenæus, Lib. 5. cap. 33. Hæc Papias Joannis auditor Polycarpi contubernalis. St. Jerome, Ep. 29. Ad Theodorum: Refert Irenæus vir Apoſtolicorum temporum & Papiæ auditoris Evangeliſtæ Joannis Diſcipulus. In the Martyrologies of Beda, Uſuardus, and Ado, as alſo in the Roman, in the Works of Trithemius and Andreas Cæſarienſis, in Anaſtaſ. Sinait. Lib. 7. in Hexamer. Oecumen. in Act. cap. 2. he is called The Diſciple of St. John the Evangeliſt. Euſebius on the contrary reciting a Paſſage of Papias in Hiſt. Lib. 3. cap. ult. wherein he ſpeaks of two Johns, obſerves that the Maſter of Papias was not John the Evangeliſt, but the other John called the Elder. His Reaſon, or rather Conjecture, is that this Author in the beginning of his Books doth not aſſure us, that he was the Diſciple of the Apoſtles, or that he had learn'd any thing from them, but only that he had received that which he declares from thoſe that were familiar with the Apoſtles, and who knew them. However, in the Paſſage alledged by Euſebius to prove his Aſſertion, Papias only affirms, that he interrogated the ancient Men who had ſeen the Apoſtles, demanding of them, What ſays Andrew? What ſays Philip? What ſays St. John? What ſays John the Elder? Therefore if it may be inferred from thence, that he was not the Diſciple of St. John the Evangeliſt, becauſe he informs us, that he enquired of thoſe that had ſeen him what were the Opinions of this Apoſtle; it may as well be inferred that he was not the Diſciple of John the Elder. However, the words of Papias may be interpreted after ſuch a manner, as to ſignifie nothing elſe, but that he was careful whenſoever he happened to meet with any one that had familiarly converſed with the Apoſtles, to deſire of them a particular account of their Doctrine or Judgment; Which makes me believe, that he was the Diſciple of the Evangeliſt, and this is confirmed by the Authority of St. Irenæus, who certainly means St. John the Evangeliſt; for St. Polycarp was his Diſciple, and he aſſerts that Papias was the Companion of Polycarp, Polycarpi Contubernalis.

(c) The famous Opinion, or rather Dotage of Antiquity.] This was the opinion of St. Juſtin, Athenagoras, St. Irenæus, St. Clement, Tertullian, Lactantius, and many other ancient Writers.

(d) Andræas Cæſarienſis and Oecumenius have likewiſe produced ſome Paſſages.] Andræas Cæſarienſis in Serm. 12. in Apocalypſ. cites a Paſſage of Papias, wherein he ſays, that the diſpoſing of Sublunary Things was committed to the Care of the Angels that are round the Earth, but that they did not perform their Duty as they ought to do; Oecumenius upon the Acts obſerves, that Papias believed that Judas did not end his Life by hanging, but that he was run over with a Chariot, which is the Opinion of Theophylact, Euthymius and Oecumenius.

(e) Without conſidering in the firſt place how true it is.] This is conformable to an excellent Paſſage of St. Auguſtin: Non ſit Religio noſtra in Phantaſmatibus noſtris; melius eſt enim qualecumque verum quàm omne quicquid pro arbitrio fingi poteſt, melior eſt vera ſtipula, quàm lux inani cogitatione pro ſuſpicantis voluntate formata: De ver. Rel. c. 55.

QUA-

QUADRATUS and ARISTIDES.

Quadratus & Aristides.

THese two Defenders of the Faith presented Apologies for Christians to the Emperor Adrian: The first was a Disciple of the Apostles (a), and it is said, that he had the Gift of Prophecy (b). Eusebius assures us, that the Apology of this Author was extant in his time, and that it shewed the Genius of this Man, and the true Doctrine of the Apostles. But we have only a small Fragment produced by Eusebius in the fourth Book of his History, chap. 3. wherein the Author declares, that none could doubt of the Truth of the Miracles of Jesus Christ, because the Persons that were healed or raised from the Dead by him, had been seen, not only when he wrote his Miracles, or whilst he was upon Earth, but even a very great while after his Death: So that there are many (says he) who were yet living in our time (c).

Quadratus & Aristides.

We have also lost the Apology of Aristides which was preserved till St. Jerom's time. This Aristides was a very Eloquent Athenian Philosopher, (says the same St. Jerome) who when he changed his Religion, did not alter his Profession, and presented unto the Emperor Adrian, at the same time as Quadratus, a Volume in form of an Apology, wherein he produced the Proofs of our Religion, and being still extant, shews the Learned how excellent a Writer this Author was. The same St. Jerome observes in another place, that this Work was full of Philosophical Notions, and that it was afterward imitated by St. Justin.

(a) A Disciple of the Apostles.] Hieron. Ep. 84. ad Magnum. This appears from the Fragment that is set down afterward. We must not confound this Quadratus with another of this Name who was Bishop of Athens, and the Successor of Publius mentioned by Eusebius, Lib. 4. cap. 23. St. Jerome makes no distinction between them in his Catalogue, nor in his Epistle to Magnus; and they are likewise confounded in the Menologium Græcorum: But Valesius clearly proves that they are different; for the first was not a Bishop, as appears from the Testimony of Eusebius, Lib. 3. c. 37. and Lib. 4. c. 3. Besides, the former Quadratus was a Disciple of the Apostles, and lived in the time of the Emperor Adrian, whereas the other never saw the Apostles, as being Contemporary with Dionysius Corinthius under the Reign of Antoninus. And it cannot be doubted, but that it was the Elder who presented the Apology to Adrian.

(b) It is said, that he had the gift of Prophecy.] Eusebius, Lib. 3. cap. 37. assures us, that he was endued with the Gift of Prophecy, as were the Daughters of Philip the Deacon, and Miltiades in Eusseb. Lib. 5. cap. 17. reckons him in the number of the Prophets of the New Testament.

(c) In our time.] Eusebius Thessalonicensis cites this Author against Andreas Cretensis, and Phot. Cod. 335. Bede, who hath confounded him with the Bishop of Athens, declares, that he determined that there was no Meat from which a Christian ought to Abstain, which is likewise Recorded in the Menologium Græcorum upon the 21*st* day of September.

AGRIPPA.

Agrippa.

AT the same time, and under the Reign of the same Emperor, lived Agrippa Sirnamed Castor, a Learned Man, who wrote a very convincing Book against the Heresie of Basilides, in which he confuted the Errors of this Heretick, after he had discovered them, and detected all his Devices and Frauds. He observes, (says Eusebius) that Basilides, had written twenty four Books on the Gospels, and that he forged several Prophets that never were in the World, to whom he attributed extraordinary Names, such as Barsabas and Barcoph, on purpose to amuse the Minds of his Auditors. He affirmed also, that this Heretick taught his Followers, that it was a thing indifferent to eat Sacrifices that were offered unto Idols; that it was lawful to Renounce the Faith in the time of Persecution; and that, in imitation of Pythagoras, he imposed Silence on his Disciples for the space of five years. We have no further knowledge of this Author, since his Book is lost, and I know not whether we have any considerable Fragment of it left.

Agrippa.

HEGESIPPUS.

Hegesippus.

HEgesippus appeared in the World a little after the Death of the Apostles, about the beginning of the Second Age of the Church (a). He left the Jewish Religion, in which he was born (b), to Embrace that of the Christians; he took a Journey to Rome under the Pontificate of Pope Anicetus, and remained there until that of Eleutherus (c) that is to say, from the year 165, until the year 180, or thereabouts; he is the first Author that hath Composed an entire Body of Ecclesiastical History, which he divided into five Books (d), wherein he relates the principal Occurrences which happened in the Church from Jesus Christ's Passion to his own time. This Work was written in a simple Style (e), because he resolved (says St. Jerome) to imitate the Phrases and Dialect of those, whose Lives he wrote. We have only some few Fragments left, which are inserted by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History.

Hegesippus.

The first Fragment extracted from the Writings of Hegesippus, and produced by Eusebius in the second Book of his History, Chap. 23. contains a Relation of the Martyrdom of St. James Bishop of Jerusalem, but his way of telling it looks more like a fabulous Narrative, than a true History (f).

(a) About the beginning of the second Age of the Church.] Euseb. Lib. 2. cap. 23. Ὁ Ἡγήσιππος ὅτι μὲν ἐφ' ἡμῶν τῶν ἀποστόλων χρόνων διαδοχῆς. St. Hieron. Hegesippus vicinus Apostolicorum temporum omnes à Passione Domini usque ad suam ætatem Ecclesiasticorum Actuum texens Historias, multaque alia ad utilitatem legentium pertinentia hinc inde congregans, quinque libros scripsit Sermone simpliciori, ut quorum vitam sectabatur, dicendi quoque exprimeret characterem.

(b) He left the Jewish Religion in which he was born.] Euseb. Lib. 4. c. 22. Nonnulla item in Hebræorum Evangelio, & ex Hebraica Linguâ profert in medium, satis per hæc aperte significans se ex Hebræis ad Christi fidem transisse.

(c) And remained there until that of Eleutherus.] So St. Jerome says; but Hegesippus only declares that he came to Rome, and resided there during the Pontificate of Anicetus, whose Deacon Eleutherus was at that time; that Soter succeeded Anicetus, and Eleutherus Soter. This shews, that he lived in the time of the Antonines, and wrote his History at least under the Pontificate of Eleutherus. In the Chronicle of Alexandria it is observed, that he died under the Reign of the Emperor Commodus.

(d) Which he divided into five Books.] According to the Testimony of Eusebius and St. Jerome; this Work was entituled, ὑπομνήματα τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραξέων, Apud Euseb. & Gobarum apud Phot. c. 232.

(e) This Work was written in a simple Style.] This Eusebius, Lib. 4. c. 8. and St. Jerome de Script. Eccles. both bear witness.

(f) But his way of telling it, looks more like a fabulous Narrative than a true History.] Scaliger proves by many Arguments that this Relation is fabulous, some whereof are not very solid, but others are so convincing, that the Answers of Halloixius and Petavius are not sufficient to give satisfaction to any Man of a sound Judgment; for to omit the particular Circumstances of the Life of St. James recited by Hegesippus, which cannot be true; as that he alone was permitted to enter into the Sanctuary, because he was not cloathed in Woollen but in Linnen, and other Things of the like nature; the account of his Martyrdom being contrary to that of Josephus, the verity of whose History was never suspected by any, furnishes us with Arguments against which it is almost impossible to dispute. See Valesius his Notes on Eusebius.

Hegeſippus. The ſecond Fragment of Hegeſippus is likewiſe to be found in the Hiſtory of Euſebius, Book 3. Chap. 20. He therein informs us, that the Emperor Domitian cauſed a ſtrict Search to be made after the Poſterity of David, who were the Children of St. Jude the Brother of our Lord, but that perceiving them to be extremely poor, and very far from being able to make any attempt againſt the Empire, he ſoon diſmiſſed them without any moleſtation (g).

The third is alſo found in the ſame Book, Ch. 32. where he gives an account of the Martyrdom of Simeon the Son of Cleopas Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who was Crucified under the Reign of Trajan, and adds, that hitherto the Church had remained a Virgin (h), but that after the Death of thoſe that had heard and ſeen Jeſus Chriſt in the Fleſh, the firſt Hereſiarchs began openly to divulge their deteſtable Errors.

The fourth Fragment concerning Antinous, whom Adrian cauſed to be Regiſtred amongſt the Gods, is cited, Book 4. Chap. 8. only to ſhew, that Hegeſippus lived after the time of that Emperor.

The fifth is in Book 4. Chap. 22. where Hegeſippus ſpeaks of his Journey to Rome in paſſing through Corinth, where he ſaw Primus the Biſhop of that City; he deſcribes the Election of Simeon in the room of St. James, and makes mention of a certain Perſon named Thebutis, whom he affirms to have been the firſt that rent the Church by his Errors, being incenſed becauſe he was not made a Biſhop; he obſerves, that this Thebutis had collected his Doctrines from the ſeven Sects that were among the Jews, as well as the other Hereticks.

Euſebius adds, that Hegeſippus produced divers Paſſages out of the Hebrew and Syriack Goſpels, and that he ſpeaks of ſeveral Traditions of the Jews; it is likewiſe obſerved by him, that he cites the Proverbs of Salomon, as well as St. Irenæus, under the Name of the Book of Wiſdom, and that he mentions certain Apocryphal Writings compoſed by the Hereticks of his time. This is all that is extant of the five Books of the Hiſtory of Hegeſippus, the order of which is alſo unknown to us; but, as far we can judge by the remaining Fragments of this Work, it was not very exact, and was rather filled with feigned and fabulous Relations, than with ſolid and real Hiſtories.

We have beſides, under the Name of Hegeſippus an Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews, and of the taking of the City of Jeruſalem, divided into five Books, which hath been often publiſhed, and particularly at Colen with the Notes of Galterius, in the year 1559. It was likewiſe printed in a Collection of the Works of the Fathers, ſet forth by Laurentius de la Barre, A. D. 1583, as alſo in the Bibliotheca Patrum of La Bigne, &c. But it is certain that this Work does not belong to Hegeſippus, it being evident that it was written by an Author who lived after the Reign of Conſtantine the Great. For firſt, The Hiſtory of Hegeſippus was merely Eccleſiaſtical, whereas this is an Hiſtory of the Jews copied out in part from Joſephus. Secondly, We do not find therein any of the Paſſages of the true Hegeſippus that are produced by Euſebius. Thirdly it is Recorded by this Author in Book 3. Chap. 5. that the City of Antioch, which was reckoned as the third in Order and Dignity among thoſe of the Roman Empire, became the ſecond ever ſince the City of Byzantium was called by the name of Conſtantinople. It is plain therefore, that the Author of this Book lived after Conſtantine. Some with Gronovius attribute it to St. Ambroſe, by reaſon of the Conformity of its Style to that of the Writings of this Father; others, as Labbé, are of opinion, that it is a Greek Verſion; and laſtly, others, as Voſſius and Miræus, affirm, that this Book was Compiled ſince the time of Nicephorus Phocas, that is to ſay, after the tenth Century, becauſe the Author diſcourſing concerning the City of Antioch, declares, that it formerly belonged to the Perſians, and that at preſent it was a Bulwark againſt them, which may be underſtood of the taking of this City by the Emperor Phocas. However it be, this Author is only a Tranſcriber, or an Interpreter of Joſephus, who hath made a kind of an imperfect Epitome of his Hiſtory. The Latin Interpreter, who hath Tranſlated it from Joſephus, gave it the Title of Joſeppi or Joſippi, and the Tranſcribers not underſtanding this Word, have ſubſtituted Igiſippi or Egeſippi in its room, as it appears from ſome ancient Manuſcripts. Hegeſippus.

Father Mabillon obſerves in his Voyage into Italy, that he found in the Ambroſian Library at Milan an ancient Manuſcript of this Book, wherein it is ſaid, that it was Tranſlated by St. Ambroſe, in the Titles whereof it is ſometimes written Joſippi; he ſaw another likewiſe at Turin that appeared to be about 700 years old, and that was entituled Egeſippi. If theſe Manuſcripts are as ancient as Mabillon would have them to be, this Book muſt of neceſſity be of greater Antiquity than Voſſius and Miræus have imagined. It was Printed by it ſelf at Paris in the years 1511, 1589, 1610; and afterwards inſerted in the Bibliothecæ Patrum.

(g) He ſoon diſmiſſed them without any moleſtation.] This Narrative is likewiſe accuſed of Falſhood by Scaliger, but his Arguments are not ſo conſiderable as thoſe which he urges againſt the former: The Anſwers of Halloixius and Valeſius are indeed of ſome weight; yet I can ſcarcely perſuade my ſelf of the truth of this Relation.

(h) Hitherto the Church had remained a Virgin.] Not but that the Church always remains in this ſtate. Therefore the meaning of Hegeſippus is this; That until that time ſhe was not torn in pieces by Hereſies and Schiſms, and that all thoſe who were called by the Name of Chriſtians, had one and the ſame Faith, whereas afterward the Arch-Hereticks divided the Profeſſors of Chriſtianity, rent the Church, and propagated their pernicious Errors. It were a manifeſt Abuſe of this Paſſage to interpret it otherwiſe.

St. JUSTIN.

St. Juſtin. ST. Juſtin was a Native of the City of Sichem, otherwiſe called Naples of Paleſtine (a), which even at this day bears the Name of Napolous; his Father was called Priſcus Bacchius; he was a Grecian by Birth and Religion (b), but having in vain ſought for the Knowledge of the true God among all the Sects of the Pagan Philoſophers, (tho' he chiefly adhered to the Platonick) was Converted to the Chriſtian Faith in a private Conference that happened between him and a certain ancient Man unknown to him, as himſelf tells the Story in his Dialogue with Tryphon; however being turned Chriſtian he did not lay aſide his Habit nor his Profeſſion, but added to his Skill in the Heathen Philoſophy, a profound Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He was at Rome when the Perſecution, that was raiſed under the Reign of Antoninus Pius the Succeſſor of Adrian, began to break forth, where he Compoſed an excellent Apology in behalf of the Chriſtians, and Dedicated it to the St. Juſtin.

(a) Of the City of Sichem, otherwiſe called Naples of Paleſtine.] In Dialog. 2. à p. 212. ad p. 223. Juſt. Apol. 2, p. 53. Ιυστῖνος Πρίσκου τοῦ Βακχίου τῶν ἀπὸ Φλαυίας νέας πόλεως τῆς Συρίας, Juſtin the Son of Priſcus Bacchius of Flavia, the new City, or Naples of Syria. This was one of the principal Cities of the Samaritans, and it hath had four Names. The firſt and moſt ancient is that of Sichem; thus it is uſually called in the Holy Scripture, and in the Works of Joſephus. The Second is Mabobortha, or Mamortha, in Joſeph. Lib. 5. de bello Judaico, c. 4. and in Plin. Lib. 5. Nat. Hiſt. c. 13. The Third is Naples, and the Fourth is Flavia, which Name it has had ever ſince one of the Emperors (it is not certainly known, whether it were Veſpaſian or Domitian) cauſed a Colony of the Greeks to be Tranſported thither. Moreover this Name is to be found, not only in the paſſage of St. Juſtin, that we have even now cited, but alſo in ancient Medals and particularly in one of Domitian's Φ ΒΙΟΠΟΛΕΙΤΩΝ ΣΑΜΑΡΕΙΤΩΝ.

(b) He was a Greek by Birth and Religion.] St. Epiphanius ſeems to believe, that St. Juſtin was of the Extraction and Religion of the Samaritans, when he ſays, that he paſſed from the Samaritan to the Chriſtian Religion, ἀπὸ Σαμαρίτων εἰς Χριστὸν πεπιστευκώς. But when St. Juſtin himſelf mentions his Converſion, he declares, that he had been Educated in the Greek Religion, and that having diſcovered the Falſhood thereof he readily embraced the Chriſtian. It is true indeed that he calls the Samaritans in his Dialogue, and in his firſt Apology, his Stock, his Nation, and the like: But it was becauſe he was born among them, in a City the Original whereof was Samaritan, as St. Paul is ſaid to be a Citizen of Rome, and of the City of Tarſus, tho' he was a Jew, and of the Tribe of Benjamin; and perhaps Epiphanius meant nothing elſe in this place. St. Juſtin.

Emperor,

St. Justin. Emperor, and to the Cæsars his Sons (c), about the year 150 after the Nativity of Jesus Christ (d).

This Apology is commonly called the second, but is really the first, whereas the other commonly so called is actually the second (e), nay, (if we may give Credit to the Testimony of Eusebius) it was not presented unto the Emperor and the Senate (f) until the time of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher and Successor of Antoninus Pius. The Subject of these two Apologies is almost the same. St. Justin in the former, to shew the Injustice of their Proceedings in punishing and persecuting the Christians, and that they were Innocent of the Crimes laid to their Charge, gives an exact account to the Emperor and his Sons, of their Doctrine, Manners, and Ceremonies, which Qualifications render this Apology one of the most considerable Records of Antiquity, and one of those wherein many things are contained relating to our Religion: We there find the Doctrine of the Church concerning the Trinity, the Incarnation of our Saviour, and Eternal Life, as also the Proofs of the Christian Faith, the Holiness of the Conversation of its Professors, together with a Description of their Assemblies, and the Ceremonies used by them in the Administration of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The second Apology, whereof some few Sentences are lost, doth not comprehend such variety of Matter, as being properly a Complaint or Remonstrance directed to the Emperor, the Senate, and all the People of Rome, concerning the Injuries that were unjustly offered to the Christians. In this last Apology he describes the Snares that were laid for him by a certain Cynick Philosopher named Crescens, whom he had convinc'd of Ignorance and Debauchery. I expect (says he) that those who falsly call themselves Philosophers, should lie in wait for me, and should cause me to be bound with Chains; perhaps through the Instigation of this ignorant Crescens, who delights more in vain Glory than in the Truth. This really happened just as he foretold; for not long after, Tatian the Disciple of Justin observes(g), this Crescens caused him to be condemned to Death in the sixth year of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher (h), in the year 166. It is not certainly known what kind of Punishment was inflicted on him, unless we stand by the Accounts which are given us in the Menologium (i) of the Greeks, or the Acts of his Martyrdom (k) related by Metaphrastes, which seem to be very ancient; wherein it is declared, that he was beheaded by the command of Rusticus the Prefect or Governor of the City of Rome, under whom St. Epiphanius (l) likewise affirms, that St. Justin suffered Martyrdom. St. Justin.

Besides these two Apologies, there are several other Books of this ancient Father, as, his excellent Dialogue against Tryphon the Jew, which was composed by him after his first Apology, since he expressly assures us therein, that he had informed the Emperor, in a particular Writing, that some Samaritans were led away with the Impostures of Simon Magus; (m) which passage is in his Apology, dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus, from whence it follows that it was written before this Dialogue. Eusebius says, that this Conference was holden at Ephesus, but whether St. Justin ever had any Discourse with Tryphon, or whether he only feigned it, as Plato, Cicero and many others have done, this Book is very considerable. This Author proves against the Jews by an infinite number of passages taken from the Old Testament, that Jesus Christ is the Messiah and the Word; who first appeared unto the Patriarchs, and afterward condescended so far as to be made Man, and to be born of the Virgin Mary, for our Salvation. Of all the Writings of this ancient Martyr cited by Eusebius, these only that we have now mentioned remain entire; to which may be added, a Fragment of his Treatise of Monarchy, wherein (says Eusebius) he demonstrated the Unity of one God, not only by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, but also by the Testimony of prophane Authors. The first part of this Work is lost, but I am persuaded, that there is no reason to doubt, but that the Tract which is at present Entituled, Of Monarchy, is the second part (c) To the Emperor, and to the Cæsars his Sons.] The Inscription of this Apology is, To the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus, Antoninus Pius, Augustus Cæsar, and to his Son Verissimus, and to Lucius the Philosopher, the natural Son of Cæsar, and the Adoptive of Antoninus Pius. To understand this Inscription it is requisite to know, that the Emperor Antoninus Pius, the Adoptive Son of Adrian, adopted Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher; and Lucius Verus, the Son of Ælius Verus, whom some affirm to have been adopted by Marcus the Philosopher; therefore the first, who is named in this Inscription, is the Emperor Antoninus Pius; the Second called Verissimus, is Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, the Adoptive Son of Antoninus; the Third is Lucius Verus, the Son of Ælius Verus, who had been Cæsar, and was the adoptive Son of Antoninus Pius; he affects to call them Philosophers, and Pious, that so he might insinuate himself into their Favour, and that he might oblige them patiently to hearken to the Reasons of the Christians.

This Reason is by no means true: St. Justin designed only to give these Emperors those Titles, by which they themselves desired to be called: This Family of the Antonines from Adrian to Commodus affected the Title of Philosophers, as much as of Fathers of their Country, or any other Title by which the flattering Romans endeavoured to get the Favour of their Masters whom they Courted.

(d) About the Year 150 after the Nativity of Jesus Christ.] It could not be written before this time, because he mentions in two several places, the Followers of Marcion, who came not to Rome, till the Death of Pope Hyginus in the Fourth year of Antoninus, and did not begin to propagate his Heresie, until about the end of the Reign of the same Emperor. St. Justin himself says, that it was 150 Years after the Birth of Christ, when he wrote it, Dici a nobis Christum ante centum quinquaginta annos natum sub Cyrenio. It is observed by Eusebius in his History, that it was Composed under the Pontificate of Anicetus, wherefore St. Jerome is deceived when he asserts, that it was presented in the Fourth year of Antoninus, and Scaliger is yet more mistaken, when he maintains that it was written in the beginning of his Reign; and the Argument alledged by him, that St. Justin mentions the War raised against the Jews under Adrian, as a thing that lately happened, ἀπὸ τοῦ γεγενημένου πόλεμου, is not considerable, since this might very well be affirmed of a War that was made ten or twelve Years before.

(e) Is actually the second.] It is not to be doubted but that the Apology which is commonly called the first is really the second, for besides the authority of Eusebius, and Anastasius the Library Keeper, it is evident that it was written a little before the Martyrdom of St. Justin, since he therein describes the snares that were laid for him by the Philosopher Crescens. But there is only the testimony of Eusebius to induce us to believe that it was Composed in the time of Marcus Antoninus. Valesius affirms, that Eusebius is mistaken in this point; 1. Because he affirms in this Apology, That a certain Woman that was desirous to live separately from her Husband, presented a Petition to the Emperor, σοὶ τῷ αὐτοκράτορι, and not to the Emperors which she ought to have done, if this had happened in the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, who had Lucius Verus for his Associate in the Empire. 2. Because he there says that a certain Person named Lucius reproved a Judge in these words: This is not worthy of a pious Emperor, nor of him who is the Son of a Cæsar and a Philosopher; or, as it is expressed by Eusebius, Of a Philosopher the Son of a Cæsar, ὁ τρίτωνα εὐσεβῆ αὐτοκράτορι, καὶ φιλοσόφου Καίσαρος παῖδι, Eusebius, καὶ φιλοσόφου. This pious Emperor (says Valesius) is Antoninus Pius, and the Philosopher the Son of Cæsar can be no other than Marcus Antoninus surnamed the Philosopher. The third objection is, that Urbicus who is mentioned in this Apology, as Præfectus or Governor of the City of Rome, exercised this Office under Antoninus, as appears from the third Oration of Apuleius, and from the Inscriptions of Gruter, p. 38. These are the Reasons or rather Conjectures of Valesius, which nevertheless seem not to deserve to be preferred before the attestation of Eusebius, and in my opinion they may be easily answered; for, 1. Mention is only made of one Emperor in this Apology, because Lucius was absent, and might be engaged in his Expedition against the Persians. 2. The Epithet of Pius might likewise be attributed to Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, and his Son Commodus might well be called the Son of the Philosopher. Lastly, Urbicus might be Governor of Rome in the beginning of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, as well as at the end of that of Antoninus Pius.

(f) And the Senate.] Valesius affirms, that it was directed to the Emperor alone, and not to the Senate, however it is not only addressed to the Senate, but the Author likewise in the sequel of his Discourse makes application to the Romans in the plural number.

(g) Tatian the Disciple of Justin observes.] In Lib. contr. Gr. ὡς δὲ Ἰουστῖνον, κακόνοιᾳ μεγάλῃ κακῶ τὸν θάνατον περιβαλεῖν σπουδάσαι. He procured that Justin should be condemned to death, as if to dye were the greatest of all evils.

(h) In the sixth year of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher.] The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle sets the death of St. Justin down in this year, and we have not any certainer proof.

(i) In the Menologium.] In Menolog. Kalend. Junii.

(k) Or to the Acts of his Martyrdom.] These Acts are very plain, and contain the Replies of St. Justin and of six other Companions of his Martyrdom, which are very generous and pathetical; which makes me think that they are ancient.

(l) St. Epiphanius.] It ought to be observed that St. Epiphanius is deceived in referring the Martyrdom of St. Justin to the Reign of the Emperor Adrian; but he is not mistaken as to the name of Rusticus, who lived in the time of Marcus Antoninus, and was much esteemed by him.

(m) Pag. 342.

St. Juſtin. thereof, and ſo much the rather, becauſe it begins after this manner (n); Having already produced Divine Authority; I ſhall alſo make uſe of human Allegations, from whence it evidently appears, that this Book which we now have, is the ſecond part of that mentioned by Euſebius.

We might likewiſe attribute to St. Juſtin, two Orations which are prefixed at the beginning of his Works, wherein he exhorts the Gentiles to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, in ſhewing the Abſurdity and Novelty of that of the Pagans, and the Truth and Antiquity of ours. Theſe two Diſcourſes are undoubtedly ancient, and tho' they are not quoted by Euſebius, and the Style of them ſeems to be a little different from that of St. Juſtin, yet we may affirm them to have been written by him, without any injury to his Reputation. The ſame Judgment may likewiſe be given of the Epiſtle to Diognetus (o), which was alſo compoſed by an ancient Author, who lived in a time when the Chriſtians were under Perſecution: But the other Epiſtle written to Zena and Serenus, does not agree in the leaſt with the Style of St. Juſtin, and contains many Precepts, which rather concern Monks than ſimple Chriſtians (p).

As for the other Works that bear the Name of this Father; beſides that they are not cited by Euſebius, nor any of the ancient Writers, we have poſitive Proofs that they are counterfeit. The firſt of theſe is a Treatiſe purely Philoſophical, the Compiler whereof produceth divers paſſages of Ariſtotle's Phiſick; which he confutes very dryly, and in a ſtyle altogether different, not only from that of St. Juſtin, but even from that of the Age wherein he lived. At the end of this Tract there is another written, after the ſame manner, and probably compoſed by the ſame Author, wherein are comprehended five Queſtions, which he calls Chriſtian, tho' they have a much greater Tincture of the ſubtility of a Philoſopher, than of the ſimplicity of a Chriſtian. Beſides the Author of this Book reſolves theſe Queſtions, after the method of the Pagan Philoſophers; and afterwards diſallows of the firſt Anſwer, by accommodating Chriſtianity to Philoſophy; to this are annexed ſeveral Philoſophical Axioms together with divers Queſtions and Anſwers concerning incorporeal things, and the Reſurrection. All theſe Books are written in the ſame ſtyle and by the ſame Author after the Hereſie of the Manichees was ſprung up, which is often mentioned therein; now ſince this Hereſie was not known till above an hundred years after the Death of St. Juſtin, it muſt neceſſarily be affirmed that they were not written by him.

The Book of Anſwers to the Queſtions of the Orthodox, containing 146 that are very curious, is much more uſeful, and more worthy of a Divine than the preceding; but neither can this belong to St. Juſtin, tho' it is aſcribed to him by Photius; for beſides that this ſort of Queſtions and Anſwers was not uſual in his time, in which no regard was had to matters of Curioſity, ſuch as the moſt part of thoſe that are compriſed in this Work, Origen is cited in Queſt. 82. and 88. St. Irenæus in the 115. and the Manichees in the 127. The Author diſcourſeth there of the Myſteries of the Trinity, and of the Incarnation, in ſuch Expreſſions, and with ſuch Precautions as were not in uſe, until thoſe Hereſies were ſtarted in which theſe Truths were called in queſtion. We find the Words Hypoſtaſis, Perſon, Conſubſtantial, in Queſt. 16, 17, 139, 144. according to the Senſe that was attributed to them by the Church, in the Fifth and Sixth Centuries. In Queſt. 126, he ſays, that at the time when this Book was written, Chriſtianity was no longer under the Dominion of Paganiſm, which evidently ſhews that the Author of theſe Queſtions is much later than St. Juſtin, not to mention that there are ſome things in this Work, which are not conformable to the Doctrine of this Father; as for Example, in Queſt. 52. he denies that the Witch of Endor cauſed the Soul of Samuel to return, which is aſſerted by St. Juſtin, in his Dialogue againſt Tryphon; in Queſt. 112. he ſays that it was a created Angel that communed with Moſes and Jacob, which is expreſly contrary to the Doctrine of this Father, and of the reſt of the Writers of that Age, who believed it to be the Word himſelf. Some attribute theſe Queſtions to Theodoret, as well becauſe they come near his way of Writing, as becauſe there are ſeveral Phraſes uſed by this Writer, which are alſo frequently found in Theodoret. However it be, this Book was written by an Author, who lived about the Fifth or Sixth Age of the Church. Laſtly, the Expoſition of Faith, attributed to St. Juſtin, and cited by Leontius, and Euthymius Zagabenus too plainly refutes the Errors of the Arians, Neſtorians and Eutychians to be written near the Age, in which this Father lived. St. Juſtin.

It were to be wiſhed, that inſtead of theſe Books which are falſly aſcribed to St. Juſtin, we had thoſe that were really compoſed by him, whereof the Titles only remain at preſent. He wrote as he himſelf declares (q), a Treatiſe againſt Hereſies; and it is difficult to determine, whether the Book againſt Marcion, cited by St. Irenæus in two ſeveral places, was part of this Tract; or whether it were a diſtinct Work, according to the Opinion of St. Jerome; however there is nothing now extant, except two paſſages quoted by St. Irenæus. We have alſo entirely loſt two Books that were compoſed by St. Juſtin, againſt the Gentiles, in the firſt of which, after having diſcourſed of divers Queſtions that are uſually debated, as well by the Chriſtians, as among the Pagan Philoſophers, he treated of the Nature of Dæmons; the other was called Ἔλεγχος and contained a Confutation of the Errors of the Heathens. It may perhaps be ſuſpected by ſome, that thoſe two Treatiſes are the Orations prefixed at the beginning of the Works of St. Juſtin, immediately before his two Apologies, but beſides that they have different Titles, there is not any Deſcription in either of the two, of the Nature of Dæmons. Moreover there was another Work called Ψάλτης, that is to ſay, the Pſalmiſt, and a Book of Collections concerning the Soul, wherein he produced the Opinions of the Pagan Philoſophers, promiſing to give his own in another Diſcourſe on this Subject. Theſe are all the Writings of St. Juſtin mentioned by Euſebius, St. Jerome and Photius; beſides which (ſays Euſebius) There are many other Works written by him, in the hands of the Chriſtians; Perhaps the Epiſtle to Diognetus, and the two Books againſt the Gentiles belong to this Number. Anaſtaſius Sinaita and Glycas, cite a Commentary of this Father upon the Hexameron. Methodius, Leontius and St. John Damaſcen quote a Book of his concerning the Reſurrection of the Body, but it is very probable, that theſe Writings are none of his.

This Author (ſays the Learned Photius, ſpeaking of St. Juſtin) was perfectly skilled in the Chriſtian Philoſophy, and yet more in the Prophane; he had acquired an univerſal Learning, and a perfect knowledge of Hiſtory; but he hath taken no care to adorn the Natural Beauty of Philoſophy, with the Artificial Ornaments of Eloquence; Therefore his Diſcourſes tho' very Learned, have not the Elegancy and Grace of Eloquent Diſcourſes. This Character appears throughout all his Works, which are extremely full of Citations, and of paſſages taken from the Holy Scriptures and prophane Authors, with little Order, and without any Ornament. He had joined to his exquiſite Skill in the Pagan Philoſophy, an admirable knowledge of the Sacred and Prophetical Writings, as alſo of the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion; that there is ſcarce any one of the ancient Fathers who ever diſcourſed more accurately, than he hath done of all its Myſteries. It is which although exceeding uſeful, yet ſuit more with another Age different from that wherein St. Juſtin lived, and ſeem to have been given to Monks rather than Ordinary Chriſtians. The Author gives an account there of a Letter which he had written to a certain Pope, and to his Superiors, which further confirms our conjectures.

(n) It begins after this manner.] Pag. 103. φιλοδίκῳ τῇ γνώμῃ κεχρήμενοι φιλανδρίαν χρήσομαι τῇ φωνῇ.

(o) The Epiſtle to Diognetus.] This Letter is written very much after St. Juſtin's way. There is mention made of a certain Perſon named Diognetus an able Painter in the Writings of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and in thoſe of Julius Capitolinus.

(p) Rather concern Monks than ſimple Chriſtians.] Such are theſe following Inſtructions; That they ought not to give occaſion to Diſcord; That they ought not to withdraw themſelves from the publick Prayers on the account of any Difference; That they ought not to ſeek after the chiefeſt and the moſt honourable Employments; That they ought to keep ſilence, and to preſerve Modeſty; That they ought not to diſcourſe of the affairs of the World, but that they ought to look upon them as out of their way, and not to retain them in their minds; and many other Admonitions of this nature,

(q) As he himſelf declares.] Apol. 2. Pag. 70. Ἔτι δὲ ἡμεῖς ὑπογεγράφαμεν καὶ πρὸς πάσας τὰς γενομένας αἱρέσεις ὃ εἰ βούλεσθε ἐλθεῖν δώσομεν. We have alſo compoſed a Book againſt all the Hereſies that have appeared, which we ſhall preſent unto you if you deſire it. St. Irenæus lib. 4. cap. 14. Præterea Juſtinus in eo libro, quem ſcripſit contra Marcionem ait, quoniam ipſe quoque Domino non credidiſſet alterum Deum annuncianti, and Lib. 5. Item Juſtinus in ſuo libro ait, quoniam ante adventum Domini nunquam auſus eſt Satanas blaſphemare Deum, quippe nondum ſciens ſuam damnationem.

true

St. Justin. true indeed, that as to the Doctrine of the Trinity (r), he seems to differ from us in following the Platonick Maxims; but it will appear to those who shall throughly examine his Opinions, and those of the ancient Fathers, that in the main they agree with ours (s), and that they are only different in the manner of Expression. He asserts with many of the ancient Writers, that the Souls of Men after their Separation from the Body, shall wait for the Day of Judgment, to be either entirely happy or miserable (t); but at the same time he acknowledgeth, that during this interval they shall receive Punishments or Rewards, according to their Deserts. Moreover he believes (according to the Opinion of the most part of the primitive Christians) that the Just after the Resurrection shall remain for the space of a Thousand years in the City of Jerusalem where they shall enjoy all lawful Pleasures (u). He seems to have thought that the Souls of the wicked should at last become capable of dying (x); tho' in other places (y) he affirms that their Torments shall be Eternal. He has a peculiar Opinion concerning the Souls of the righteous; which he affirms to have been before the coming of Jesus Christ, under the power of the Devil, who could cause them to appear whensoever he should think fit (z). He hath asserted, as St. Irenæus assures us (aa), that the Devils were ignorant of their Damnation until the coming of our Saviour; nay, he goes further in his Apology to the Emperor, affirming that they are not as yet thrust down into Eternal Flames (bb) &c. Lastly, he seems not to despair of the Salvation of those who have lived vertuously among the Gentiles, having only the knowledge of God without that of Jesus Christ (cc). These are almost all the particular Points wherein he hath departed from the present Opinions of the Catholick Church.

The Works of St. Justin were first printed altogether in Greek (dd), by Robert Stephen in the years 1551 and 1571; except the second Treatise against the Gentiles, and the Epistle to Diognetus, which were printed by themselves, by Henry Stephen in the years 1592, and 1595. This Edition was soon followed by that of Commelinus in Greek and Latin, published by Fridericus Silburgius, Anno Dom. 1593. It comprehends the entire Works of St. Justin, divided into Three Parts, the first whereof contains the Books against the Gentiles, the second, the Dialogue against Tryphon, and the third, the Tracts that were composed for the Instruction of the Christians: They are translated by Langus; except the second Oration against the Gentiles, and the Epistle to Diognetus, which are of Henry Stephen's Translation: at the end are subjoined some Notes of Silburgius, Stephens, and other Learned Men. Morellus followed this Edition in the Impression of the Works of St. Justin, which he caused to be made at Paris in the years 1615, and 1656. only he added the small Tracts of Athenagoras, Theophilus, Hermias and Tatian. This last Edition is thought to be the best, and yet it is very imperfect, and it were to be wished that another might ere long be published; to this end a new Version ought to be made of all St. Justin's Works, because Langus's hath many defects, the ancient Manuscripts ought to be consulted (if any such can be found) and exactly compared with the Greek Text, which was not corrected by Silburgius from any Manuscript: Lastly, some Annotations ought to be added, and many of those that are already Printed should be cut off.

St. Justin.

As for the disposing of these Works, the following Order may be observed; They should be divided into Three Classes. 1. Those that were really composed by St. Justin. 2. Those that may be his, tho' we cannot certainly affirm it. And, 3. Those that are manifestly supposititious. His Apology to the Emperor Antoninus, that which ought to be called the first Apology, that so for the future it may always be cited under that Name, ought to be placed in the Front: The other Apology that immediately follows, should be Entituled the second; after this might be inserted the Fragment of the Books concerning Monarchy; the excellent Dialogue against Tryphon, should be the last Treatise of this Class, at least, till some of those that are lost, happen to be found. The second Class should contain the two Orations to the Greeks, and the Epistle to Diognetus. The third may take in all the Books that are undoubtedly forged, which also might be distinguished into two Parts; in the first whereof should be placed those Writings, that may be in some manner useful, such are the 146 Questions, the Exposition of the Faith, and the Epistles to Zena and Serenus; and then in the second, one may add the Philosophical Tracts above-cited, if it should not be thought more convenient to omit them altogether.

(r) As to the Doctrine of the Trinity.] The most difficult passage concerning the Trinity is that which we read in his Dialogue, pag. 356, and 357, wherein he declares, That the Father is invisible and the Son visible, and that the Majesty of the Father is greater than that of the Son. But if we reflect a little on this matter it will appear that St. Justin and the other Fathers who said the same thing, yet do not affirm that the Father is of a different Nature or Substance from the Son; but only, that it is the Son who manifested himself unto Men, or rather, that the Father hath not discovered himself unto Men but by his Son. Their Principle is this, That the Father performs no exteriour Action but through his Word, which is his Son; that it was the Son who created the World, who revealed himself under several Figures to the Patriarchs and Prophets, and who at last was made Man. It is on this account that they assert, that the Son is visible and the Father invisible, because the Father is not visible but through the Son; But this doth not hinder them from being of the same Nature. We find the like expressions in St. Athanasius, Orat. 4. contra Arian. who cannot be suspected of maintaining any Heterodox Opinions concerning the Divinity of the Word.

(s) In the main they agree with ours.] We need only examine his Discourse concerning the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity in his Apology to the Emperor, p. 36, 93, 94. as also concerning the Divinity of the Word, p. 67, 96. and in his first Apology, p. 44, 45. and more especially his Declaration concerning the Word in his Dialogue, p. 267. where he not only confutes the Opinion of those that imagined that Jesus Christ was a mere Man, but he likewise proves that he is really God; and in p. 358. where he plainly asserts, that the Word was begotten of the Father without dividing his Substance.

(t) To be either entirely happy or miserable.] In his Dialogue, p. 223. he declares, that the Souls of the just and of the wicked wait for the day of Judgment in a place where they suffer more or less, proportionably to the good or evil that they have done in the World.

(u) Where they shall enjoy all lawful Pleasures.] See p. 306. of his Dialogue; This Opinion is common to him and almost all the ancient Fathers, and it was a fancy set on foot by Papias, and from him spread among the Primitive Christians, of the vanity whereof we are at present convinced.

(x) That the Souls of the wicked should at last become capable of dying.] We find this notion in the beginning of his Dialogue, p. 222, 223, 224. where the old Man that instructs him, refutes the Opinion of Plato, that Souls are incorruptible of their own Nature, and maintaining that they are so only through Grace; from whence he concludes, that the Souls of the wicked are only tormented as long as it shall seem good to the Will of God; insomuch that after many Ages they shall cease to be.

(y) Although in other places, &c.] In his Apology to the Emperor, p. 57. he affirms, that the torments of the damned shall not only last for a thousand years, as these mentioned by Plato, but that they shall be everlasting. Observe likewise what he says concerning these torments in p. 64, 65, 66. and in other places, wherein he always calls them Eternal, opposing this word Eternal to the Pains that shall one day have an end.

(z) Who could cause them to appear, &c.] He asserts this in speaking of Samuel, whose Soul the Witch really caused to return, according to his Opinion in his Dialogue p. 332, and 333.

(aa) As St. Irenæus assures us.] This passage is set down above.

(bb) That the Devils are not as yet thrust down into Eternal Flames.] We find this in his Apology to the Emperor, p. 71.

(cc) Having only the knowledge of God without that of Jesus Christ.] In his second Apology, p. 83. he declares that they that lived according to the Principles of Natural Reason, as Socrates, Heraclitus, Azarias, Misael, &c. might be called Christians, and he seems to suppose that they were saved by living up to the Law of Nature.

(dd) The Works of St. Justin were first printed all together in Greek.] I do not speak of the several Editions of the Versions which are common, and whereof there are three besides that of Langus. The first was composed by Picus Mirandula, and printed at Basil by Henry Peter in the years 1518, and 1551. The second by Perionius, and printed by Nivelle at Paris in 1554. The third by Gelenius was printed at Basil in 1555. Lastly, a Translation of all the Works of St. Justin was set forth by Langus, and printed at Basil in 1565, and at Paris in the same year, and in 1578, together with large Commentaries. The Book of the Confutation of the Opinions of the Aristotelians was translated by Postellus, and printed by it self by Nivelle in 1552. A Greek Edition of his Apologies and several other little Tracts of the Greek Fathers were printed at Rome by Zannetus. The Exhortation to the Greeks in Greek is printed by it self by Guillard at Paris.

MELITO.

Melito. MElito Biſhop of Sardis in Aſia, is one of thoſe Fathers, who wrote the moſt concerning the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church; but there remains nothing of them at preſent but the Titles, and a few ſmall Fragments produced by Euſebius in the Fourth Book of his Hiſtory, chap. 26. The Titles are theſe; Two Books of the Feaſt of Eaſter, one of the Lives of the Prophets (a), one of the Church, one of the Lords-Day, one concerning the Nature of Man, another of his Creation, one of the ſubmiſſion of the Senſes unto Faith (b), a Book concerning the Soul, the Body, and the Spirit, one of Baptiſm, another of Truth, another concerning the Generation of Jeſus Chriſt, one of Prophecy, one of Hoſpitality, another entituled the Key, one of the Devil, another of the Apocalypſe, one of God incarnate (c), and a Collection taken out of the Holy Scriptures. Laſtly, an Apology preſented to the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, whereof we have a fragment in Euſebius, wherein Melito intreats the Emperor, that he would vouchſafe to examine the accuſations that were alledged againſt the Chriſtians, and to cauſe the Perſecution to ceaſe by revoking the Edict that he had publiſhed againſt them: He repreſents to him, that the Chriſtian Religion was ſo far from being deſtructive to the Roman Empire, that it was very much augmented ſince the propagation thereof; that this Religion was perſecuted only by wicked Emperors, ſuch as Nero and Domitian; that the Emperors Adrian and Antoninus had written ſeveral Letters in its behalf, and therefore he hoped to obtain of his Clemency and Generoſity, the favour which he ſo earneſtly requeſted. Euſebius alſo gives us another little Fragment out of the Book concerning Eaſter, to ſhew the time when this Author wrote, in which he mentions Sagaris Biſhop of Laodicea, whom he affirms to have ſuffered Martyrdom under Servilius Paulus the Proconſul of Aſia. As alſo another Fragment more conſiderable, which is the Preface to his Collections, wherein he gives us a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament, omitting thoſe that are not included in the Canon of the Jews; theſe are the Books of Eccleſiaſticus, Wiſdom, (for he calls the Book of the Proverbs by the Name of Wiſdom) Judith, Eſther, and the two Books of the Maccabees. Melito.

There is alſo another Fragment of Melito's preſerved by the Author of the Chronicle commonly called the Alexandrian in Olympiad 236. wherein he ſays, that the Chriſtians do not adore inſenſible Stones, but that they worſhip one God alone; who is before all things, and in all things, and Jeſus Chriſt who is God and the Word before all Ages. It is not known from what Book this Fragment was taken; but it is probable, that it is in his Apology to the Emperor. Some other paſſages are likewiſe attributed to him, which are taken out of a Catena of the Greek Fathers upon Geneſis, but they ſeem to me to be unworthy of this Author (d); we find alſo in the Bibliotheca Patrum, another Book under his Name Entituled, Of the Paſſage or Death of the Virgin Mary, which is inſerted by Pope Gelaſius amongſt the Apocryphal Writings, and rejected by Bede; but it is at preſent generally agreed, that this Book, as not being cited by any of the ancient Writers, and containing many untruths and abſurdities, is a counterfeit Work. Melito lived under the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, he preſented his Apology in the ſecond year of this Emperor, that is to ſay, in the year of our Lord 182. and died before the Pontificate of Victor, as appears from the Epiſtle of Polycrates to this Pope, wherein he mentions him, as already dead in theſe Words: Why ſhould not I ſpeak of Melito, whoſe Actions were regulated by the Motions of the Holy Ghoſt, who lyes enterr'd at Sardis, where he expects the Judgment and Reſurrection? This ſhews that Melito was eſteemed as a Prophet, that is to ſay, as a Man inſpired by God, according to the Teſtimony of Tertullian produced by St. Jerome. If the ſame Tertullian had not aſſured us, that this Author wrote elegantly and was a good Orator, it would be very difficult to give any Judgment concerning his Style, by that little of his Writings which is yet extant.

(a) A Book of the Lives of the Prophets.] Some reckon two Books on this Subject, but it is plain from the Greek Text of Euſebius, and the Authority of St. Jerome, that there was but one.

(b) One of the Submiſſion of the Senſes unto Faith.] St. Jerome, and Ruffinus diſtinguiſh the Book of Faith, from that of the Senſes, but it is more probable, that it was but one Book bearing the above-mentioned Title, as being compoſed againſt ſome Hereticks, who aſſerted that we ought to believe only according to our Senſes.

(c) Of God incarnate.] It is expreſſed in Greek. Περὶ σαρκωμένου Θεοῦ, of God incarnate, or inveſted with a Body. Others expound this paſſage after another manner, imagining that he maintained that God was corporeal; but this laſt is not the proper ſignification of the Greek Word. However, Origen, cited by Theodoret in Queſt. 20. in Exodum, ſays that Melito wrote a Book περὶ τῆς σαρκωμένου τοῦ Θεοῦ, that God was corporeal, which anſwers to the other Interpretation.

(d) Unworthy of this Author.] One of theſe paſſages is produced by Halloixius, being a Compariſon between Iſaac and Jeſus Chriſt, full of childiſh Notions and Expreſſions, that are more agreeable to the Modern, than the ancient Writers.

TATIAN.

Tatian. TAtian Sirnamed the Aſſyrian (a), from the Name of his Country, was an able Orator, and St. Juſtin's Scholar. He remained in the Communion of the Church during the Life of his Maſter but after his Martyrdom being puffed up with Pride, which often attends the Opinion of Knowledge, he became Head and Author of a new Sect (b), which was called the Hereſie of the Encratites, or of the Continent, becauſe theſe Sectaries condemned Marriage, as alſo the uſe of divers ſorts of Meats and Wine, leading a ſober and auſtere Life in appearance; beſides this, they maintained ſome of the Errors of the Valentinians, and affirmed that our Fore-Fathers were damned: This Sect was afterwards augmented by Severus (c), from whom they took the Name of Severians: theſe later rejected the Epiſtles of St. Paul, and the Acts of the Apoſtles. But to return to Tatian; he having got a great facility in Writing, compoſed a great number of Books, and among others an excellent Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, which is moſt eſteemed of all his Works, as alſo a Goſpel collected from the four Evangeliſts. Tatian.

There is yet extant the Treatiſe of Tatian againſt the Gentiles, which was firſt printed at Zurick, in the year 1646. together with the Verſion of Conradus Geſner, afterwards inſerted in the Bibliotheca Patrum; and Laſtly, annexed to the Works of St. Juſtin; the Title thereof is as follows: The Diſcourſe of Tatian againſt the Gentiles, proving that the Greeks are not the Inventors of any of the Sciences, as they boaſt themſelves to be, but that they were all invented by thoſe whom they call Barbarians. This is indeed the Subject of the beginning of his Diſcourſe, but then he adds, that the Greeks corrupted the Sciences, which they received from the Barbarians, and more eſpecially Philoſophy. Afterwards he proceeds to the Explication and Defence of the Chriſtian Religion; he treats of the Nature of God, of the Word, of the Reſurrection of the Body, and Freedom of the Soul: He confutes the Opinion of Fate, he diſcourſeth of the Nature of the Soul,

(a) Sirnamed the Aſſyrian.] At the end of his Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, he declares that he was born in Aſſyria, and that he had been inſtructed in the Theology of the Grecians.

(b) Of a new Sect.] St. Irenæus Lib. 1. Euſeb. Lib. 4. c. 29. St. Jerome, in Catalogo.

(c) This Sect was afterward augmented by Severus.] St. Epiphanius affirms, that Severus lived before Tatian, but he is miſtaken.

and of Devils, discovering the Snares that they lay for Men. He intermixeth all these things with several satyrical Reflections on the ridiculous Theology of the Pagans, and the corrupt Manners of their Gods and Philosophers, shewing at the same time, that the Writings of Moses, are more ancient than all other Histories, and giving an admirable Description of the holy Conversation of the Christians. This Work is extremely full of prophane Learning, and the Style thereof is elegant enough, but exuberant, and not very elaborate; and the Matters therein contained are not digested into any Order. It was certainly composed by Tatian, before he fell into Heresie, tho' after St. Justin's Death, since he doth not condemn the State of Matrimony in that Book (d). He argues concerning the Generation of the Word, in such Expressions as do not agree with our manner of explaining it, but they may be interpreted in a sense which is not Heretical (e). He maintains that the Angels, and Devils consist of Bodies and Souls: He denies the Immortality of the later, affirming that they die, and that they shall hereafter rise again with their respective Bodies, which is a considerable Error.

As for the Gospel that was compiled by Tatian, St. Epiphanius in his Description of the Heresie of the Nazarenes, hath confounded it with that which was Entituled, The Gospel according to the Hebrews; and indeed they had this in common, that the Genealogy of Jesus Christ was not in either of them: But the Gospel according to the Hebrews was older than Tatian's; besides the later was only a kind of a Catena or Concordance, wherein this Author had gathered together, what he judged proper to be collected out of the four Evangelists. St. Ambrose seems to mention it in the Preface to his Commentaries on St. Luke; when he declares, that some Writers had made one single Gospel out of the Four, by collecting those passages, which they believed to be most favourable to their Opinions, and omitting the rest. The Gospel of Tatian was composed after this manner; in which he retrenched the Genealogy of Jesus Christ, together with all that which relates to his human Nature, and his Extraction from the Stock of David. Baronius thought that that was the Work of Tatian which is in the Seventh Tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum, under the Name of Ammonius; but this is a distinct Book; for as Valesius observes, it is an Historical Epitome of the Gospels, written by an Ancient Orthodox Author, containing many passages, wherein Jesus Christ is called the Son of David; whereas Tatian's Gospel was a Rhapsody of the passages taken out of the four Evangelists, on purpose to induce us to believe that our Saviour was not descended from the Lineage of David. Tatian lived after the Death of St. Justin, and died about the time when St. Irenæus wrote his Book concerning the Heresies. St. Clement in the third Book of his Stromata, cites a Treatise of this Author Entituled, Of Perfection according to the Saviour, written by him after his Fall into Heresie; he produceth a passage out of it against Marriage, which he confutes in Page 460.

Tatian.

(d) He doth not condemn the State of Matrimony in that Book.] On the other hand, Pag. 168. he seems to approve it.

(e) A Sense which is not Heretical.] He asserts that the Word was begotten in the time of the Creation of the World; altho' he was from all Eternity, calling the Generation of the Word, his Application, (if we may so term it) to the exteriour Works: He adds, that the Word was not begotten by way of Separation, but after the same manner, as one Fire is lighted or kindled by another; so that God did not remain without the Word, but that the Word proceeded from him, and remained in him altogether, or at the same time; this he explains by the Instance of human Speech. These are the Principles of some of the ancient Christians. The Version of this Treatise was printed together with the Greek Text at Basil, in the years 1564, 1569, 1575, 1593. and at Geneva, in 1592.

ATHENAGORAS and HERMIAS.

Athenagoras and Hermias.

Athenagoras an Athenian Philosopher, lived in the time of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, to whom he presented an Apology for the Christians (a). This Work and its Author, were unknown to Eusebius, St. Jerome, and Photius, but it is cited by St. Epiphanius in the Heresie of Origen. In this Apology he refutes the three principle Calumnies that were alledged against the Christians, as 1. That they were Atheists. 2. That they eat human Flesh. 3. That they committed horrible Crimes in their Assemblies. To the first Accusation he makes Answer, that the Christians were not Atheists, since they acknowledged and adored one God in Three Persons, and lived conformably to his Laws and Commandments, believing that he sees and knows all things; that they refused to worship Idols, and to offer Sacrifice to them, as being persuaded that they were not Deities. He replys to the two last Objections, in shewing that the Life, Laws and Manners of the Christians were very far from Murther and those infamous Crimes whereof they were accused. He plainly establisheth the Unity of the Essence of God, and the Trinity of the Three Divine Persons: He affirms that the Word, that remained in God from all Eternity departed from him, (if we may use such an Expression) to create and govern all things: He maintains the Worship of Angels, and declares that they were created to take care of Affairs here below. He asserts that the Devils were ruined through the Love that they bore unto Women; he admits Free-will in its utmost Latitude; he makes divers Descriptions of the Holiness of the Conversation of the Christians; he commends Virginity; he condemneth second Marriages, calling them an honest Adultery; Lastly, he treats of the Resurrection, and of the last Judgment.

Athenagoras and Hermias.

There is another Treatise of this Father extant, concerning the Resurrection of the Dead, wherein he endeavours to prove, that it is not only not impossible, but even extreamly credible: These two Books are written in a Dogmatical Style, they were printed separately in Greek and Latin (b), translated by Gesner, Nannius, Marsilius Ficinus and Suffridus, and are inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, as also in Greek, in the Supplement to the Bibliotheca; and Lastly, after the Works of St. Justin, with the Annotations of Gesner, and Henry Stephen; there is another imperfect Tract annexed to them, which is a continual Series of Satyrical Reflections, on the Opinions and Philosophical Notions of the Gentiles, composed by Hermias, a Christian Philosopher. But this Author is not known, nor the precise time when he wrote, however it is not to be doubted but that he is ancient, and that he lived before the Pagan Religion was extirpated. This little Book was printed by it self in Greek and Latin, at Basil, Anno Dom. 1553.

(a) IN the time of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, &c.] He joyns Lucius Aurelius Commodus with Marcus. Labbé affirms that it was Lucius Verus; but it is more probable, that it was Commodus the Son of Antoninus, and that this Apology was presented after his being taken into the Government, about the Year 178.

(b) In Greek and Latin.] At Paris in Quarto, by Veke, An. Dom. 1541, and in Octavo, by Stephen with Nannius's Translation in 1557. Also by Plantin at Antwerp in 1560, 1583, and 1588. The Translation of Suffridus was printed at Colen, with Commentaries in 1567, and 1573. Nannius's Version of the Treatise concerning the Resurrection, was published at the end of the Works of Philo at Basil 1561, and in 1558 by Episcopius, as also at Colen in 1599. There is a Version of the Treatise of the Resurrection by Ficinus, and printed at Basil in 1516, and another of Valetus in Italian, printed at Venice in 1556. The Apology was printed in Latin at Paris in 1498, in Greek and Latin in 1577. In Latin at Basil 1565. translated by Gesner, and there again in 1558, in Octavo at Zurick in 1599. The Book concerning the Resurrection of the Dead, was printed in Latin at Paris in 1498, at Basil in 1561. In Greek and Latin at Venice in 1498, and 1550. At Basil in 1593, and 1653. At Paris in 1615, 1618, and 1636. The Translations which are at the end of St. Justin, are Nannius's of the Treatise of the Resurrection, and Gesner's of the Apology.

[Athenagoras has also been printed in Greek and Latin at Oxon. in Duodecimo 1682; and at Leipzick 1684, in Octavo cum Notis Var.]

THEOPHILUS Biſhop of ANTIOCH.

Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch.

THey that imagine (a), that this Theophilus whom we ſpeak of is the ſame with him, to whom St. Luke dedicates the Acts of the Apoſtles, are groſly miſtaken; for this Man was ſo far from being contemporary with St. Luke and the Apoſtles, that he was not ordained Biſhop of Antioch (b), until the year 170. after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt, and he governed this Church twelve or thirteen years, until the beginning of the reign of Commodus (c); that is to ſay, until the years of our Lord 181, or 182. This Biſhop was one of the moſt vigorous Oppoſers of the Hereticks of his time; he wrote a conſiderable Book againſt Marcion, and a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes (d), wherein he cited the Apocalypſe. He likewiſe compoſed other ſmall Tracts, for the Inſtruction and Edification of the faithful: All theſe Works are entirely loſt; but we have three Books ſtill written by him to Autolycus, a Learned Heathen of his Acquaintance, who had undertaken to vindicate his Religion againſt that of the Chriſtians.

In the firſt of theſe Books he anſwers the Requeſt, that had been made to him by that Heathen, to teach him how to know the true God, and after having declared that to attain to the knowledge of him, we muſt be purified in Mind and Heart, he proceeds to treat of the Nature of God, and of thoſe things which the Divines call his Attributes, as his Eternity, Immenſity, Power, Inviſibility; afterward he enlargeth on the Bleſſedneſs of the other Life, and on the Reſurrection of the Body; he obſerves by the way, that Princes ought to be honoured as having received their Authority from God, and derives the Etymology of the Word Chriſtian from Unction. This firſt Book is properly a Diſcourſe between him and Autolycus, in Anſwer to what this Heathen had ſaid againſt the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. The ſecond Book was written to convince him of the Falſhood of his own Religion, and of the truth of the Chriſtians. He begins with a Confutation of the Opinions that were maintained by the Pagans, concerning their Gods, and ſhews the Contradictions of the Philoſophers, and Poets on this Subject; he explains at large the Creation of the World, and that which happened in the ſucceeding Ages; he demonſtrates that the Hiſtory of Moſes is the oldeſt, and trueſt Hiſtory that ever was, and that the Poets have extracted many things from the Holy Scriptures, particularly their Relations concerning the Torments of the damned. In the third Book, after having proved that the Writings of the Heathens are full of an infinite number of Notions, contrary to right Reaſon and good Manners, he ſhews that the Doctrine and Lives of the Chriſtians, are very far from thoſe Crimes that are laid to their Charge. Laſtly, at the end of his Work he adds an Hiſtorical Chronology, from the Beginning of the World unto his Time, to prove that the Hiſtory of Moſes is the ancienteſt and the trueſt. It is apparent from this little Epitome, how well this Author was acquainted with prophane Hiſtory. Theſe three Books are filled with a great variety of curious Diſquiſitions concerning the Opinions of the Poets and Philoſophers: Tho' there are but few things that relate immediately to the Doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion; not that Theophilus was ignorant of them, for it appears from ſeveral paſſages, that he was very skilful in theſe Matters, but in regard that he compoſed this Book chiefly to convince a Pagan, he inſiſts rather in proving our Religion, by Arguments from without, than by expounding its Doctrines. He is the firſt Author that hath applied the Word Trinity (e), to the Three Perſons of the Godhead, but he calls the Third by the Name of Wiſdom: He aſſerts two things concerning the Word, which ſeem to favour of the Arian Hereſie; the firſt is, that the Word may be in a Place, and the Second, that he was begotten in Time; but theſe Expreſſions, which are common to him, and many of the ancient Fathers, had a different Signification (f) from that which was afterwards given them by the Arians.

Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch.

Moreover theſe Books are full of Moral and Allegorical Expreſſions, the Style is elegant, and the Turn of the Thoughts very agreeable, that whoever reads them, cannot doubt but that the Author was a very eloquent Man. They are entituled in the Greek Manuſcripts, The Books of Theophilus to Autolycus concerning the Faith of the Chriſtians againſt the malicious Detracters of their Religion. They have been publiſhed in Greek and Latin, as alſo in Latin by Conradus Geſner, and printed at Zurich in the year 1546; afterward they were inſerted in the Orthodoxographa, printed at Baſil in 1555. Fronto Ducæus annexed them to the firſt Volume of the Supplement of the Bibliotheca Patrum ſet forth in 1624; and they were afterwards printed at the end of the Works of St. Juſtin in the Edition of Morellus.

Beſides theſe three Books, we have another Book in Latin attributed to Theophilus, conſiſting of Allegorical Commentaries on the four Goſpels, which is in the Bibliotheca Patrum; There was a Commentary on the Goſpels under his Name in St. Jerom's time, divers paſſages whereof are produced by him in his Annotations on St. Matthew; there were alſo Commentaries on the Proverbs of Salomon; but this Father obſerves in his Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that they did not come up to the Elegancy or to the Style of the Writings of Theophilus.

(a) They that imagine, &c.] This was the Opinion of Gulielmus Tyrius, who in St. Bernard's time wrote the Hiſtory of the Cruſade, See lib. 4. c. 9. It is a groſs error, for according to this account Theophilus muſt have lived above 150 years.

(b) Ordained Biſhop of Antioch.] He was the ſixth; The firſt (according to the teſtimony of Euſebius) was Evodius, the ſecond St. Ignatius, the third Hero, the fourth Cornelius, the fifth Heros, and Theophilus the ſixth; St. Jerome indeed declares in one place that he was the ſeventh, but he is miſtaken; Euſebius in his Chronicle, and in his Hiſtory, refers his Ordination to the eighth year of the reign of the Emperor Marcus, that is, the 170 after Chriſt, according to the common computation.

(c) Until the beginning of the reign of Commodus.] Euſebius affirms that Maximinus was his Succeſſor in the ſeventeenth year of Marcus Antoninus, but in the Chronology of the Emperors compoſed by Theophilus at the end of his third Book to Autolycus he reckons nineteen years and ten days of the reign of Verus, that is to ſay, of the ſame Emperor Antoninus, and it cannot be affirmed that 16 years ought to be put inſtead of 19, as it is in the Tranſlation, for by computing the total Sum of the years of the Emperors which amount to 237 years and one day, it is apparent, that there muſt of neceſſity be 19. From whence it follows, that either he was miſtaken in reckoning up a greater number of years of the reign of this Emperor under whom he lived, than were really paſſed, which is not credible, or that he did not write theſe Books until after this time, under the beginning of the reign of Commodus; and then, he could not have had Maximinus for his Succeſſor until the year 182 of the vulgar account, unleſs he was taken in his Life-time to be his Coadjutor. There is more probability that Euſebius was deceived a year or two. Nicephorus in his Chronography of the Patriarchs of Antioch allows 13 years to Theophilus; which agrees with our Opinion.

(d) And a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Hermogenes.] Euſeb. lib. 4. cap. 24. Ἀπὸ τούτου ἂν ἀγνοῖτο διότι καὶ Μαρκίωνος πεποιημένον λόγος. St. Jerome, Sub Imperatore M. Antonino Vero librum contra Marcionem compoſuit, qui uſque hodie extat. And Euſebius, Καὶ ἄλλο περὶ τῆς αἱρέσεως Ἑρμογένους ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἔχομεν. St. Jerome, Et contra Hareſim Hermogenes liber unus, Καὶ ἕτερόν τινα κατ' αὐτοῦ σύγγραμμα. St. Jerome, Et alii breves, elegantesque tractatus ad ædificationem Eccleſiæ pertinentes.

(e) The word Trinity.] Lib. 2. p. 94. and 100.

(f) But theſe Expreſſions which are common to him with many of the ancient Fathers had a different Signification.] They meant nothing elſe by the firſt Expreſſion, as hath been already obſerved, but that God made himſelf manifeſt unto Men by the Word, therefore when Theophilus affirms that the Word is in a place, and that the Father cannot be there, he intended only to declare, that the Word appears unto Men in a place, as he heretofore appeared unto Adam in the Terreſtrial Paradiſe, and that the Father doth not appear in that manner: This is the Syſtem of the ancient Chriſtians: It would be more difficult to reſolve the ſecond Expreſſion, were it not that they themſelves have explained it, ſince they acknowledge that the Word is Eternal, and that he remained in God from all Eternity, as his Council, Wiſdom, and Word. But they ſay that the ſame Word who was in God, in ſome manner went out from him when he undertook to create the World, becauſe he began to make uſe of this Word in exterior Operations, and this is what they call the Proceſſion, Prolation, and Co-generation of the Word, which does not hinder but that the Word might be from all Eternity, and eternally begotten of the Father after the ſame manner as we apprehend it, but this is not that which they call Generation. Theſe Expreſſions are not only uſed by Theophilus, but likewiſe by Athenagoras, Tatian, Tertullian, the Author of the Book concerning the Trinity, amongſt the Works of this Father, Lactantius, the Compiler of the Homilies attributed to Zeno Veronenſis, and afterwards by Rupertus in his Commentaries on Geneſis.

APOLLI-

APOLLINARIUS, or, APOLLINARIS of HIERAPOLIS.

Apollinarius, &c.

Apollinarius, or, Apollinaris Bishop of Hierapolis, a City of Phrygia, wrote several Books under the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, the Titles whereof only remain at present; The first was an Oration dedicated to the Emperor in defence of the Christian Religion; The second a Treatise against the Gentiles divided into five Books; The third, two Books concerning Truth; The fourth, two Tracts against the Jews; The fifth was one or more Treatises against the Sect of the Montanists, which then began to appear. These are all the Works of this Author that are cited by Eusebius and St. Jerome (a), they were extant in Photius's time, who having read his Books against the Gentiles, as also those concerning Piety and Truth (b), declares, that he was much to be esteemed both for his Doctrine and his Style; wherefore I shall prefer the Judgment of this Learned Man before that of Trithemius, who without perusing the Works of Apollinarius, peremptorily asserts, that there seems to be more Zeal than Learning in what he has writ.

Apollinarius, &c.

We find in Eusebius, Book 5. Chap. 16. a large fragment of a certain Author, whom he doth not name, against the Heresie of the Montanists, from whence Ruffinus and Nicephorus have asserted, that this Fragment was taken from the Discourses of Apollinarius against them, but they must of necessity be deceived; for Apollinarius composed his Books to confute their Opinions, when they first began to be divulged, whereas the Anonymous Author of this Fragment, wrote after the death of Montanus, Maximilla, and Theodotus, who were the Ring-leaders of that Party; besides, he makes mention of this Heresie as maintained in a Country far distant from his, and established a great while ago, which plainly shews, that this Fragment belongs not to Apollinarius, and consequently, that there is not any part of his Works now extant.

(a) By Eusebius and St. Jerome.] Lib. 4. Cap. 27. St. Jerome in Catalogo omits the Books against the Jews, neither are they found in the Version of Ruffinus, nor even in some Greek Manuscripts of Eusebius.

(b) As also those concerning Piety and Truth.] Photius Cod. 14. It is probable that the Book of Piety is the first of those two that are cited by Eusebius, under the Title of Truth. Besides, he affirms, that there were other Works of this Author, which he had never seen.

DIONYSIUS of CORINTH.

Dionysius of Corinth.

Dionysius Bishop of Corinth lived under the Reign of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, and in the beginning of Commodus's. 'He not only took 'care of his own Flock, (says Eusebius, Book 4. Chap. 23.) but he also made the Christians of o-'ther Countrys partakers of his Divine Labours, causing 'them to fructifie every where by his Catholick Epistles, 'which he sent to many Churches. The first is written 'to the Lacedæmonians, containing an Instruction of the 'Catholick Faith, and an Exhortation to Peace and 'Unity. The second is directed to the Athenians, to 'excite their Faith, and to induce them to lead a Life 'conformable to the Rules of the Gospel: He likewise 'reproves their negligence, whereby they had almost a-'bandoned the Christian Religion ever since their Bishop 'Publius suffered Martyrdom in the Persecutions that 'were raised in his time: Moreover he mentions Qua-'dratus, who was elected Bishop of Athens after the Mar-'tyrdom of Publius, and testifies, that the Christians of 'this City owned the renovation of the ardour of their 'Faith to his Care. Besides this he informs us, that 'Dionysius the Areopagite being converted by St. Paul, '(as it is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles) was con-'stituted the first Bishop of Athens. There is also another 'Epistle written by him to the Nicomedians, wherein he 'confutes the Heresie of Marcion, and keeps close to the 'Rule of Faith. He likewise composed a Letter directed 'to the Church of Gortyna; as also to all those of Crete, 'in which he extreamly commends Philip their Bishop, 'to whom his whole Church had given authentick 'Testimonies of his singular Abilities and Generosity, and 'he admonisheth them to avoid Heresies. In his Epistle 'to the Amastrians, and to the other Churches of Pon-'tus, addressing his Discourse to their Bishop Palma, he 'explains divers passages of the Holy Scriptures; He 'therein lays down several Precepts concerning Marriage 'and Chastity, determining at the same time, that all Peni-'tents should be received that returned from any Crimes 'whatsoever, and even from Heresie. In the same 'Volume is contained another Epistle to the Gnossians, 'wherein he adviseth Pinytus their Bishop not to impose 'on the Christians the heavy burden of the Obligation to 'preserve their Virginity, but to have respect unto the 'weakness which is incident to most of them. Pinytus 'in replying to this Epistle, extols and admires Dionysius 'of Corinth, and exhorts him at last to afford them more 'solid nourishment, and to send frequent Letters to him 'which might fill and satiate the People that were com-'mitted to his charge, lest being always nourished only 'with Milk, they should grow old, and yet remain in a 'kind of Infancy. This answer represents as it were a 'lively Portraiture of the Faith of Pinytus, his diligence 'in watching over the Flock, with which he was en-'trusted by God, his profound knowledge in Divinity, 'and his extraordinary Eloquence. We have also in our 'hand another Letter of Dionysius written to the Romans, 'and particularly directed to Soter, who was then their 'Bishop; a passage whereof it will be expedient here to 'produce, in which he recommends to them the conti-'nuation of a certain Custom, that had been always ob-'served by them from their first plantation unto the per-'secution which happened in our time. This is (says he) a custom which hath been established among you, O ye Romans, ever since the beginning of your Church, to be charitable unto your Brethren, and to send to divers Churches throughout the World things necessary for their subsistence; you comfort the poor in their indigence, and relieve the urgent necessities of those that are condemned to the Mines; This custom you have received from your Ancestors, which the blessed Bishop Soter hath not only retained, but even augmented, by abundantly distributing the Donatives appointed for the relief of the Faithful, and cherishing as a Father would do his Children all the Brethren who came to Rome, 'He mentions St. Clement's Epistle to the Co-'rinthians, which had been for a long time constantly 'read in the Church of Corinth, as he testifies in these 'Words. We have even now passed the Lords Day, when we perused your Epistle, which we shall hereafter read continually, as we do that of St. Clement, that we may be replenished with Precepts and wholsome Instructions: 'Af-'terward he observes, that his Letters were corrupted by 'Falsifiers in these Words: I wrote several Epistles at the Entreaty of the Brethren, but the Ministers of the Devil have filled them with Tares, by retrenching and adding many things; they may well expect this terrible Sentence: Cursed be he that adds or diminisheth any thing from my Words. Wherefore it is not to be admir'd, that some have presumed even to corrupt the Sacred Writings, since they have done it in Books of much less Authority. 'Besides 'these Epistles, there is another Extant, written to Chry-'sophora his faithful Sister, to whom he gave Instructions 'suitable, carefully nourishing her with spiritual Food. These are the Contents of this passage of Eusebius, concerning the Epistles of St. Dionysius, which I have set down entire, because he hath made use of the same Method as we should have done, in case those Epistles had been still Extant.

Dionysius of Corinth.

Moreover Eusebius in his 2*d. Book*, Chap. 25. recites another Fragment of his Epistle to the Romans, wherein is mentioned the Death of St. Peter, in the City of Rome in these Words. 'Thus (says he) as I may so say, by 'your Exhortations you have mixed the Grain that 'sprung from the Seed of St. Peter and St. Paul, that 'is to say, the Romans and the Corinthians: for these 'two glorious Apostles entring into our City of Corinth, 'instructed us in dispersing the spiritual Seed of the Gospel, 'afterwards they passed together into Italy, and having 'given you also the like Instructions, they suffered Mar-'tyrdom with you at the same time. This is all that we certainly know concerning the Life and Writings of Dionyſius of Corinth.

Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth. In the Menologium of the Greeks, he is reckoned among the Martyrs (a), but ſince neither Euſebius, nor St. Jerome take any Notice of the matter, I am apt to believe that the Latin Church hath done more prudently in placing him in their Martyrology in the Rank of the Confeſſors.

Dionyſius of Corinth.

(a) HE is reckoned among the Martyrs.] On the 29th of November, τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ Διονύσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορίνθου ξίφει μαχαίρας τελειοῦται, on this day Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth died by the Sword. Glycas affirms that he ſuffered Martyrdom under the Reign of Antoninus Pius; and yet it is certain, that he lived under Marcus Aurelius.

Pinytus, Philippus, Modeſtus, Muſanus, and Bardeſanes.

Pinytus, &c.

AT the ſame time lived Pinytus Biſhop of Gnoſſus in the Iſland of Crete, who replyed (as we have even now obſerv'd) to St. Denys of Corinth, in an Eloquent and Learned Epiſtle, Philippus Biſhop of Gortyna, mentioned likewiſe by the later, wrote a Treatiſe againſt Marcion as well as Modeſtus (a), but leſs accurate.

Among theſe may be reckoned Muſanus, who wrote a Work againſt the Encratites, and Bardeſanes (b) the Syrian, who Compoſed two Tracts tranſlated into Greek by his Diſciples, the Firſt againſt Marcion, and other Hereticks, and the Second concerning Fate; this laſt was dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus (c). Beſides he wrote other Treatiſes upon the Perſecution, that was then raiſed againſt the Chriſtians of Syria: Euſebius obſerves, that this Author having been engaged in the Sect of the Valentinians, tho' he had acknowledged and retracted the moſt part of his Errors, yet he retained ſome of them; wherefore he is accuſed by St. Jerome, of being the Deviſer of a new Hereſie: Tho' he owns that Bardeſanes was endued with a very quick Apprehenſion, and was extremely vehement in his Diſputes. St. Epiphanius likewiſe makes him to be the Ring-leader of an Hereſie. 'Bardeſanes (ſays he in Hæreſ. 56.) is the Au-'thor of the Hereſie of the Bardaſianites, he was a Na-'tive of Meſopotamia, and an Inhabitant of the City of 'Edeſſa; moreover he was a very good Chriſtian (d), 'and wrote many uſeful Books, being well skill'd in 'the Greek and Syriack Tongues (e). He was inti-'mately acquainted with Agbarus Prince of Edeſſa, and 'aſſiſted him in his Studies; he lived until the time of 'Antoninus Verus, and Collected many things concern-'ing Fate againſt the Aſtronomer Abidas: There are alſo 'other Works written by him agreeable to the Faith: 'He Courageouſly withſtood Apollonius the Friend of An-'toninus (f), who adviſed him to deny that he was a 'Chriſtian, and undauntedly replyed, that he did not fear 'Death, which he could not avoid, tho' he ſhould do 'that which the Emperor required: But at laſt this Man 'adorned with ſo many Vertues fell into Hereſie, ſuf-'fering himſelf to be infected with the Errors of the 'Valentinians; inventing divers Æones, and denying the 'Reſurrection of the Dead. He acknowledged indeed 'the Law and the Prophets, together with the whole 'New Teſtament, but then he admitted ſeveral Apo-'cryphal Books along with them. Euſebius in Lib. 6. Præparat. Evangl. produceth an excellent Fragment of the Writings of this Author againſt Fate, whereby it is evident that it was written in the Form of a Dialogue. He proves in this Fragment, that Men are not Conducted by Nature and Neceſſity as brute Beaſts, but by Reaſon and with Liberty, becauſe, altho' the Nature of all Men be the ſame; yet there are infinite numbers of Manners, Cuſtoms, Laws and Religions among them, that are different even in the ſame Country, and under the very ſame Climate, which cannot proceed but from the different Choice that is made by them. Afterwards having alledged many Examples to evince this Truth, he adds: 'What ſhall we ſay, of the Society of Chriſtians, who 'are diſperſed throughout all the Cities of the World, 'and who cannot be induced by any Conſiderations, nor 'by any Arguments whatſoever, to follow the Manners 'and Cuſtoms of thoſe among whom they reſide; but 'on the contrary, whereſoever they are, they ſtill adhere 'to peculiar Laws, and have Manners different from 'thoſe of the People among whom they live, without 'being perſwaded by any means to commit thoſe things, 'which their Maſter hath declared to them to be Crimi-'nal, chuſing rather to ſuffer Poverty, Dangers, Igno-'miny, Torments, and even Death it ſelf? This paſſage ſet down by Euſebius, not only ſhews that Bardeſanes was a Perſon of a quick Apprehenſion, and of a vehement Temper, (as hath been obſerved by St. Jerome) but it likewiſe informs us, that he had acquired much Learning (g), and that his Style wanted neither Elegancy nor Ornament.

Pinytus, &c.

(a) AS well as Modeſtus.] St. Jerome affirms, that in his time there were other Tracts extant under the Name of Modeſtus; but that they were rejected by the learned as Suppoſititious.

(b) Bardeſanes.] Porphyrius, Lib. de Abſt. cites one Bardeſanes a Babylonian, who (he ſays) lived in the time of his Fore-fathers, and writ concerning the Brachman and Indian Philoſophers: But he muſt needs have been another Perſon.

(c) Was Dedicated to the Emperor Antoninus.] It is aſſerted by St. Jerome, that he preſented it to him; but it is more probable, that being Tranſlated, it was afterwards delivered by others; for ſince he wrote in Syriack, it is not credible, that he preſented, or even Dedicated his Book to the Emperor; on the contrary, he Compoſed it at the Entreaty of his Friends; and in the form of a Dialogue.

(d) A very good Chriſtian.] St. Epiphanius is deceived; for it is otherwiſe affirmed by Euſebius, that he was at firſt a Valentinian, and that his Errors were the remainders of this Hereſie.

(e) Being well skilled in the Greek and Syriack Tongues.] He did not underſtand Greek, ſince, as Euſebius aſſures us, his Diſciples Tranſlated his Works.

(f) The Friend of Antoninus.] Neither is there much certainty in this Relation.

(g) That he had acquired much Learning.] This Fragment contains an Enumeration of the Manners, Cuſtoms and different Laws of a very great number of People, which plainly ſhews his Learning, and it is written as agreeably as the Subject was capable of allowing it.

St. IRENÆUS.

St. Irenæus.

WE know nothing of the Country of St. Irenæus but only in general, that he was a Greek (a). It is probable, that he was at firſt Educated in the Chriſtian Religion (b), or at leaſt that he made profeſſion thereof even from his Youth, during which he was a Diſciple of St. Polycarp Biſhop of Smyrna in Aſia, who was then very Old. This induceth me to believe, that this Father could not be born till about the end of the Reign of the Emperor Adrian, or the beginning of that of Antoninus Pius, ſome time before

St. Irenæus.

(a) THat he was a Greek.] Galeſinius and ſome other Authors tell us, that he was of Smyrna, but this is barely a Conjecture: 'Tis certain, he was a Greek, and in all probability of Aſia.

(b) He was at firſt Educated in the Chriſtian Religion.] He always ſpeaks of the Chriſtian Religion, as if he had never been of any other, and he no where takes notice, that he had ever been a Heathen. Beſides it is certain, that he was a Chriſtian, and a Diſciple of St. Polycarp from his tender years, as he himſelf teſtifies in his Letter to Florinus, as it is cited by Euſebius, Lib. 5. c. 20. I have ſeen you, ſays he, when I was as yet but a Child in Aſia with St. Polycarp, I remember it very well, becauſe we beſt retain what we have ſeen in our Youth, ſo that I can tell, what kind of a place it was where St. Polycarp lived, what Diſcourſes he held, and after what manner he lived. And in the Third Book againſt Hereſies, Ch. 3. Polycarpus autem conſtitutus ab Apoſtolis Smyrnis in Aſiâ Epiſcopus, quem & noſtrâ primâ ætate vidimus, multum enim perſeveraverat, & valdè ſenex, Glorioſiſſimè, ac Nobiliſſimè Martyrium faciens exivit è vitâ. Which clearly Demonſtrates that St. Irenæus was very young, when he uſed to go to St. Polycarp, and that on the other hand, St. Polycarp, was extremely old.

St. Irenaus. the Year 140, after the Nativity of Jesus Christ (c). He was also a Disciple of Papias, if we may believe St. Jerome (d), and perhaps it is he whom he frequently cites in his Work against the Heresies, under the Name of an Elder, that had seen the Successors of the Apostles (e). After he had thus spent the time of his youth in the School of the most Learned of the Apostles, he went into France (f); where he was ordained Priest of the Church of Lyons by Pothinus (g), who was Bishop of that See. And when this Holy Prelate had suffered Martyrdom in the 90th Year of his Age, being the 17th of the Reign of Marcus Antoninus, and the 178th Year of Jesus Christ, Irenæus was Elected his Successor upon his return from a Voyage that he made to Rome (h); having carried several Letters thither written to Pope Eleutherus, by the Martyrs of Lyons, concerning the new Sect of the Montanists. At the end of this Epistle, these Holy Men recommended St. Irenæus in these words: We have desired our dear Brother and Collegue Irenæus, to carry this Letter unto you; we commit him unto your Care; and we entreat you to esteem him as a Person that hath very much Zeal for the Gospel of Jesus Christ; if we believed that his Dignity would add any thing to his worth, we would have recommended him to you in quality of a Priest; but he is much more recommendable for his Zeal and Piety. St. Irenæus

St. Irenæus being constituted Bishop, was not only employed in governing his particular Church with singular prudence, but he applyed himself also to the preserving of all the other Churches in the World from the infection of Heresies, which were then spread abroad in great numbers. And it was on this account (i) that he Composed in Greek (k) under the Pontificate of Eleu-

(c) The Year of our Lord, 140.] 'Tis commonly believed, that he was born towards the end of Trajan's Reign, or in the beginning of Adrian's. But this does not agree with what we have observed concerning him, by which it undeniably appears, that he only knew St. Polycarp in his old Age, when he himself was exceeding young: Besides, St. Irenæus lived till the Year 202, or 203, wherein he suffered Martyrdom, and that he had Strength and Vigor enough still left under the Pontificate of Eleutherus, towards the Year of our Lord 178. And this abundantly discovers the Error of those Persons, who have imagined, that Irenæus was the Angel of Thyatira, of whom mention is made in the Apocalypse. 'Tis certain, that a Book was writ before his Birth, for in his Fifth Book speaking of the Revelations; It is not very long, says he, since it has appeared in the World, almost in our own time, at the end of Domitian's Reign.

[Mr. Dodwel has fixed the time when St. Irenæus lived, in his Third Dissertation upon this Father, in this manner. Irenæus speaking of St. John's Revelation says (Lib. 5. cap. 30.) Neque enim ante multum temporis visum est, sed pene sub nostro Seculo, ad finem Domitiani imperii. So that the latter end of the Reign of the Emperor Domitian, was very near the time when St. Irenæus lived. Whence it must follow, that he was alive at least under the former part of Trajan's Government. But then the words, Sub nostro seculo, are not so easie; because Seculum at that time signified as often the time of the present Emperors Government as any thing else. Irenæus says also, that when he was ἐν πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ he heard St. Polycarp at Smyrna; when he was παντὶ γηραλέῳ. Now St. Polycarp was an old Man in the beginning of Hadrian's Reign, to which time Irenæus being his Disciple must be referred: For St. Irenæus in his Letter to Florinus, says, that he saw him when himself was very Young, making a very splendid Figure in the Emperor's Court. Now this can agree to none but Hadrian, who often went about his Empire, staying long in several places, where their Antiquities and Histories could afford him Entertainment. This of necessity must be about the Year CXXII, since no other time can be Assigned in Hadrian's Reign for such a Journey.

As for the time of his Death it must be carried as much higher as that of his Birth. The common Opinion is, that he suffered in the Persecution which Severus raised in Gaul, after he had Conquered Albinus. But that is inconsistent with it self; and it is no ways probable, that Severus should raise Persecution against those Men, for favouring Albinus, who as Tertullian assures us, made it a great part of their Justification, that in all these Civil Wars they had never declared themselves of any one Faction against the Emperor Severus; and this he appeals to as a thing notoriously known. Besides none of the Ancients within 300 Years of Irenæus ever mention his being a Martyr, a thing never omitted in those Primitive times, whenever they had just grounds to give a Title, which of all others they thought the most Honourable. It is plain by the Controversies concerning Easter, and his Letter to Florinus, that he lived to Commodus's time. And if he were 25 years old, when he saw Florinus at Smyrna about the Year CXXII, he must have been born near or in the Year XCVII. In the Year CLXXXII (the 3d. of Commodus) he wrote against Blastus and Florinus, when by this Account he himself was 85 years old. The last Controversies concerning the time of observing Easter were in the Year CLXXXIX, in the 10th year of Commodus, when we are sure that St. Irenæus was alive, because his Opinion was appealed to, and he gave it so solemnly as to put an end to their Differences. Then he was by the former Account, in the XCII Year of his Age: After that we have no Memorials, either how long he lived, or what he did.]

(e) Who had beheld the Successors of the Apostles.] Lib. 4. c. 45. Quemadmodum audivi à Presbytero, qui audierat ab his, qui Apostolos viderant, c. 47. valde insensatos ostendebat Presbyter eos. Item c. 49, 50, 52. and Lib. 5. c. 5. and cap. 17. he cites Papias by Name, Lib. 5. c. 33.

(f) He went into France.] Gregory of Tours writes, that he was sent thither by St. Polycarp. We don't certainly know what Year, though 'tis probable he did not stay long in Asia.

(g) By Pothinus.] Halloixius was of Opinion, that he was ordained Presbyter by St. Polycarp. But there is more Reason to induce us to believe, that he was ordained by Pothinus, and therefore St. Jerome calls him the Presbyter of Pothinus.

(h) At his return from a Voyage that he made to Rome.] 'Tis certain, that the Martyrs had resolved to send him to Rome to carry their Letter, but we can't certainly tell, whether he went thither or no. Valesius thinks, that though they intended to send him, yet Pothinus's Death preventing him, he was detained there to be his Successor, and so never went to Rome at all. Baronius and Petavius say, that he went to Rome, and that he was not ordained till after his Return. They have the Authority of St. Jerome to support them, who says the same thing in his Book of the Ecclesiastical Writers in the following words. Irenæus, Pothini Episcopi qui Lugdunensem in Galliâ regebat Ecclesiam Presbyter, à Martyribus ejusdem loci ob quasdam Ecclesiæ quæstiones rogatus Romam Atissus, honorificas super nomine suo ad Eleutherum perfert literas; postea tum Pothino prope Nonagenario Martyrio Coronato in locum ejus substituitur. Eusebius also seems to be of the same Opinion, since he mentions a Letter wherein it is said, that he was sent to Rome, without telling us, that his Journey was stopt by the Death of Pothinus. The Conjecture of Valesius is only founded upon the Improbability of the thing, that they would send St. Irenæus, who was the chief and the best known Member of the Church of Lyons, and who besides was to succeed Pothinus, at a time when that Church stood so much in need of his Assistance. But besides that in a Question of Fact, as this is, a Conjecture of this Nature is of little Consequence, so it may be replyed, that he was sent at the beginning of the Persecution, and that he returned before the Death of Pothinus. Feuardentius imagines, that St. Irenæus carried Letters also into Asia and Phrygia, which the same Martyrs wrote to their Brethren in those Churches about the same Subject, but this is very improbable, and there is nothing in Eusebius to induce us to believe it. All that we Read there, amounts only to this, that the Churches of Vienna and Lyons, after the Death of Pothinus, and the other Martyrs, wrote a long Letter (which in all probability was Composed by St. Irenæus) to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia, cited by Eusebius, towards the end of which, They passed their Censure upon the Montanists, with a great deal of Piety and Devotion, setting before them (ἐυθύμενοι) the Letters which their Martyrs had written, while they were as yet in Chains, as well to the Brethren of Asia and Phrygia, as to Eleutherus Bishop of Rome. But he does not say, that those first Letters to the Brethren of Asia and Phrygia, were carried by St. Irenæus, nor that they were sent at all, till the Letter concerning their Martyrdom was writ, and it seems to be very improbable that they would send them the second time, if they had been carried thither once before. As for what relates to the Ordination of St. Irenæus it is certain, that he was only a Presbyter, when he went to Rome, and this appears by the Letter of the Martyrs by Eusebius, and St. Jerome. It is more difficult to know, who ordained him afterwards. Father Quesnel in his Dissertations upon St. Leo, pretends that he was ordained by the Pope, and that he went purposely to Rome upon that Account, others believe that he came back before the Death of Pothinus, and was ordained by him. It is more natural and more agreeable to the Testimony of the Ancients to believe that he was not Elected, and ordained Bishop of Lyons, till after the Death of Pothinus; and whereas Father Quesnel pretends, that at that time there was only one Bishop of France, and therefore it was necessary for St. Irenæus after the Death of Pothinus to go and be ordained at Rome, all this is precarious, and the rather, because it appears that St. Irenæus was sent thither while Pothinus was living, and upon another occasion.

(i) 'Twas upon this Account.] He himself tells us in his Preface to the fifth Book, that he Composed these Books to convert the Hereticks, and to preserve the Novices in the Faith, lest they should be led aside by those, who would use their utmost Endeavours to pervert them, and seduce them from the Truth.

(k) In Greek.] Erasmus having found this ancient and barbarous Version, at first imagined, that these Books were Originally written in Latin, but afterwards he altered his Opinion, and no body doubts at present, but that they were written in Greek. For first St. Jerome places St. Irenæus amongst the Greek Authors. Secondly, Eusebius, St. Epiphanius, Theodoret, Photius and St. John Damascene, read and quoted him in therus (l) five Books againſt Hereſies, bearing this Title (m), The Confutation and Subverſion of that which is falſely called Knowledge. He wrote likewiſe at the ſame time two Epiſtles to two ſeveral Hereticks of Rome, one whereof was directed to Blaſtus, and the other to Florinus, whom he knew when he was the Diſciple of St. Polycarp. In the firſt of theſe Letters he treated of Schiſm, and in the ſecond concerning Monarchy. In the latter he proved, that there was but one God, and that he was not the Author of Evil; for this was at firſt the principal Error of Florinus, tho' he ſoon fell into thoſe of the Valentinians, which obliged St. Irenæus to dedicate another Work to him, Entituled, περὶ ὀγδοάδος, becauſe it was written againſt the Octonary of the Æons of the Valentinians.

Not long after, under the Pontificate of Victor the Succeſſor of Eleutherus, the Controverſie that aroſe between the Aſiatick Biſhops and this Pope, gave occaſion to St. Irenæus to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to re-eſtabliſh Peace. The ſubject of this diſpute was to know on what day Eaſter ought to be obſerved; The Biſhops of Aſia, according to their ancient cuſtom, always celebrated that Feſtival on the 14th of the Moon of March, on whatever day of the week it happened, whereas the Weſtern Churches waited for the Lords-Day before they celebrated it. This difference in point of practice, which ſeems to be but of little conſequence, produced ſome diſturbance among the Churches of the firſt Ages; and when St. Polycarp came to Rome in the time of Pope Anicetus, theſe two Biſhops earneſtly endeavoured to accommodate this matter; but not being able to perſuade one another to leave their former Cuſtom, (ſo jealous have Churches always been of their Ceremonies and Cuſtoms) they parted very good Friends, thinking that a difference of ſo little moment ought not to interrupt their mutual Agreement. But under the Pontificate of Victor, this Conteſt was revived with greater heat; and had well nigh cauſed a diviſion in the Catholick Church. For this Pope, incenſed becauſe the Biſhops of Aſia being very far from ſubmitting to the Threats and Penalties which he had denounced againſt them, in caſe they refuſed to aboliſh their own Cuſtom, and to Conform to that of the Weſtern Churches, had procured a large Epiſtle to be written to him by Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus in vindication thereof; took a reſolution to drive Polycrates and the Aſiatick Biſhops out of their Churches, and ſent every where Letters (ſays Euſebius) in which he declared them to be Excommunicated. Whereupon the other Biſhops, and even thoſe that celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter with thoſe of the Weſt, diſapproved the proceedings of Victor, and wrote Letters to exhort him to take other Meaſures more conformable to Peace and Charity. But there was none that performed this with greater Efficacy than St. Irenæus, who wrote an Epiſtle to him under the name of the Church of France, wherein he declares, that tho' he himſelf ſolemnized the Feaſt of Eaſter on the Lord's Day according to his manner, yet he could not approve of his undertaking to Excommunicate whole Churches for the obſervation of a Cuſtom which they had received from their Anceſtors. He adverti[illegible]th him, that different Cuſtoms have been uſed in Churches not only in the Celebration of the Feſtival of Eaſter, but alſo of Faſts, and in divers other matters of practice. Laſtly, he lays before him, that his Predeceſſors did not contend with the Aſiatick Biſhops in this matter; and that St. Polycarp being arrived at Rome, and having holden a Conference with Pope Anicetus touching this affair, they decreed, that mutual Communion and Peace ought not to be broken for a matter of ſo ſmall importance. It is probable that Victor was convinced by theſe Reaſons; for tho' the Aſiaticks did not lay aſide their Cuſtom, yet it doth not appear that the Union between them and the Biſhops of Rome was thereupon diſcontinued. This Epiſtle is produced by Euſebius, who affirms, that this Father wrote many others of the like nature to other Biſhops. St. Irenæus.

To return to the Works of St. Irenæus, beſides thoſe that we have already mentioned, he wrote a Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles very conciſe and extremely neceſſary, (ſays Euſebius) Entituled, Of Knowledge (n) περὶ ἐπιστήμης, as alſo another Tract which he wrote to Marcion, to ſhew what was the Doctrine that was Preached by the Apoſtles; and laſtly, a Book containing ſeveral Diſſertations, διαλέξεις on different Subjects, wherein (according to the Teſtimony of Euſebius) he quotes the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and the Book of the Wiſdom of Salomon. Theſe are all the Works of St. Irenæus that Euſebius and St. Jerome mention (o), but it is not known when theſe laſt were written.

The Death of St. Irenæus was no leſs glorious than his Life; for after having governed the Flock which Jeſus Chriſt had committed to his Charge for 24 years, he was not willing to abandon it in the time of the perſecution of the Emperor Severus, which was much more cruel in France than in any other part of the World. He ſuffered Martyrdom at Lyons with all the Chriſtians that were found in that City, and in ſo great numbers that their Blood ran down through all the Streets, according to the report of Gregory of Tours in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 27. We have not any particular account of his Martyrdom, which happened in the year, 202, or 203. after the Nativity of Jeſus Chriſt.

Of all the Works of this Father, there remains only in our poſſeſſion a very barbarous Verſion of thoſe againſt the Hereſies, and ſome few Greek Fragments of theſe Books given us by Euſebius, Theodoret, St. Epiphanius, and St. Joannes Damaſcenus, which are collected in the laſt Edition of Feuardentius, and in the Writings of Halloixius. There is alſo a Fragment of his Epiſtle to Florinus extant, and a conſiderable part of that to Victor, and an Advertiſement which he had inſerted at the end of his Book περὶ ὀγδοάδος, to oblige the Tranſcribers thereof, faithfully to reviſe and correct their Copy from his Manuſcript. The Verſion of the five Books concerning the Hereſies, tho' Barbarous (as I have hinted already) and full of Faults, yet is a very valuable Fragment; for the Variety which is in it is admirable.

In the Firſt Book, after having deſcribed at large the Errors of the Valentinians, in Chap. 1. He oppoſeth to them in the Second, the Faith of all the Churches in the World, which he comprehends in a kind of Creed; In the Third and fourth Chapters, he proceeds to ſhew that all the Churches and all Chriſtians agree in this Faith, and that the moſt Learned cannot add any thing to it, or make any Alterations from it, nor the moſt ſimple and ignorant, diminiſh any part of it. The following Chapters are ſpent in explaining the abſurd Notions of Valentinus and his Diſciples. In the 20th he returns to the Source and Original of the Hereticks, and beginning with Simon Magus, he gives an Account ſucceſſively of all the Hereſies that appeared ſince the time of the Sorcerer, even unto that wherein he wrote. This firſt Book Greek. Thirdly, This Author was leſs known to the Latins, than to the Greeks; and Laſtly, ſpeaking of the number of the Letters, and the Name of Anti-Chriſt, Lib. 5. he ſays ſeveral things that could not be ſaid but by an Author that wrote in Greek. We don't know who made this Verſion; ſome have attributed it to himſelf, but this is a fooliſh Chimera; it was certainly Compoſed by a Man that underſtood neither Language as he ought. It was not known in the time of Gregory the Great, who in his 50th Letter to Ætherius tells him, that he had ſearched a long time after the Writings of St. Irenæus, without being able to find them. Geſta vel ſcripta B. Irenæi jamdiu eſt quod ſollicitè quæſivimus, ſed hactenus ex eis invenire aliquid non valui. St. Auſtin cites a paſſage out of St. Irenæus, Lib. 1. contra Jul. cap. 3. which is of another Verſion.

(l) Eleutherus.] This appears, becauſe in his Catalogue of the Biſhops of Rome, from St. Peter down to his own time, he ends with Eleutherus, who, he ſays, was then living. Nunc duodecimo loco Epiſcopatum ab Apoſtolis ſortitur Eleutherus, Lib. 3. c. 3.

(m) Bearing this Title, &c.] Ἐλέγχου καὶ ἀνατροπῆς τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως βιβλία πέντε. Euſebius, Photius, and others. This agrees with the name which he has given his Books in his Prefaces to Lib. 2, 3, and 4. and in the laſt Chapter of the 4th as well as the firſt of the fifth. The Hereticks of thoſe times called their knowledge γνῶσις, and themſelves Gnoſticks, which was alſo the name of a particular Sect.

(n) Of Knowledge.] St. Jerome diſtinguiſheth this Treatiſe of Knowledge from that againſt the Gentiles, for want of having ſufficiently minded a paſſage in Euſebius, Lib. 5. c. 26.

(o) That Euſebius and St. Jerome mention.] St. Jerome ſpeaking of the Apocalypſe of St. John tells us, that St. Juſtin and St. Irenæus have interpreted it, from whence ſome conclude, that St. Irenæus compoſed a Commentary upon it. But St. Jerome's true meaning is, that theſe two Authors cited and explained ſome paſſages of it. Some Authors formerly attributed to him the Book De Univerſo, which was compoſed by Caius a Presbyter of Rome, mentioned by Photius, Cod. 48. The Author of the Queſtions attributed to St. Juſtin, cites a Book about Eaſter, Queſt. 115. and tells us, that there was an Account, that they did not pray kneeling on Sundays, and that there was mention made of the Pentecoſt, all which perhaps might be found in the intire Letter of St. Irenæus to Polycarp, of which Euſebius has only given us a fragment. Euſebius in his fourth Book, ch. 25. ſpeaking of the Book of Philip againſt Marcion, tells us, that St. Irenæus and Modeſtus had likewiſe wrote againſt the ſame Heretick. St. Irenæus himſelf, lib. 1. c. 29. promiſes to write particularly againſt that Heretick. We are not aſſured whether he ever did write againſt him or no, becauſe neither St. Jerome, nor Euſebius, who have given us a Catalogue of all the Books of St. Irenæus, mention it. 'Tis probable, that the Letter of the Churches of Vienna, and Lyons concerning their Martyrs was writ by St. Irenæus.

St. Irenæus.

indeed is extremely tedious, being fill'd with almoſt nothing elſe but the wild Conceits, and extravagant Imaginations of the primitive Hereticks: There is a notable paſſage in it concerning Pennance, upon the occaſion of certain Women, who being defiled by a famous Impoſtor named Mark, afterwards did Pennance, during the remainder of their Lives. In the Second Book, St. Irenæus begins to impugn the Errors which he had barely recited in the Firſt: He chiefly makes uſe of the Principles of the Hereticks in oppoſing them, and ſhews that they contradict themſelves, and that all their Whimſies are ridiculous and ill laid together. In the Third Book he confutes them by the Authority of Holy Scripture and Tradition: He proves that it is impoſſible, that all the Churches in the World ſhould agree together, to alter the Apoſtolical Doctrine; that the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles knew but one only God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, and one Jeſus Chriſt God and Man, who was born of a Virgin, who is not the Son of Joſeph, but was really Man, and that he actually ſuffered, and not in appearance only, as was pretended by the Hereticks. He occaſionally refutes the Error of Tatian, concerning the Damnation of Adam, and maintains as a certain truth, that he is ſaved. In the Fourth Book he continues to demonſtrate, that there is but one God; particularly, he ſhews againſt Marcion, that the ſame God is exhibited in the Old and New Teſtament; he Anſwers all the Objections of the Hereticks, and eſpecially thoſe which they took from Scripture; afterwards he alledgeth the Reaſons that induce a ſpiritual Man, that is to ſay, a Chriſtian, to condemn the Pagans, Jews, Hereticks, and Schiſmaticks. Laſtly, he rejects the Opinion of thoſe who affirmed, that Men were naturally good or evil, and proves the Liberty of Mankind. In the laſt Book, he Treats of the Redemption of Jeſus Chriſt, of the Fall of Man, of the Reſurrection of the laſt Judgment, of Anti-Chriſt, and of the State of Souls after Death. This is in General the Subject of every one of the Books of St. Irenæus: and they that peruſe them will find ſeveral other paſſages relating to ſome weighty Articles of our Religion.

There are for Example, many excellent Paragraphs concerning the Holy Scriptures, and among others, one in Book 2. Chap. 46, and 47. There are very conſiderable paſſages touching the Euchariſt in Book 3. Chap. 19. Book 4. Chap. 32, and 34. and in Book 5. Chap. 4. Where he proves the Reſurrection of the Body againſt the Valentinians, becauſe it is not credible, that being nouriſhed with the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, it ſhould remain in Corruption: He mentions the Three Perſons of the Trinity (p). In many places of his Works, and almoſt as often as he ſpeaks of the Word he eſtabliſheth his Divinity, Eternity (q) and Equality with the Father (r).

In the Second Book (ſ), he Treats at large concerning the Faculties of the Soul; he conceives that it is diſtinguiſhed from the Body, and that it is of a different Nature; he there refutes the Metempſychoſis, or Tranſmigration of Souls out of one Body into another, and proves that thoſe of the juſt ſhall ſubſiſt Eternally. But he ſeems to have believed, as well as St. Juſtin, that they are immortal only through Grace, and that thoſe of the wicked ſhall ceaſe to be, after they have been tormented for a long time. He maintains alſo another particular Opinion, that the Souls aſſume the Figure of their Bodies, but this word Figure may be underſtood of ſome peculiar Quality of the Soul.

St. Irenæus.

He Diſcourſeth in many places of the Fall of the firſt Man, and of the lamentable Conſequences of his Sin (t), he teacheth that to repair this Loſs, and for the Redemption of Mankind, the Word was made Man, and that it is through Grace, that he hath merited for us by his Paſſion, that all Men may be ſaved (u). As for the State of Souls ſeparated from their Bodies, he determined that they were conveyed into an inviſible place, where they expected the Reſurrection of the Body, and that the Juſt after having Reigned with Jeſus Chriſt on Earth, during the ſpace of a Thouſand years, and enjoyed temporal Pleaſures, ſhould enter into Heaven, to poſſeſs Eternal Happineſs (x). He imagined alſo, that our Saviour deſcended into Hell, to preach the Faith there unto the Patriarchs, and to the ancient juſt Men, as well Jews as Gentiles, and that they that believed at his Preaching ſhould be reckoned in the number of the Saints (y). Moreover he maintained ſome other particular Opinions; he believed for Example, that Jeſus Chriſt lived above Fifty years upon Earth (z), and that as Man. He was ignorant of the Day of Judgment &c. He approves the Judgment of St. Juſtin, that the Devil knew not his Condemnation before the coming of Jeſus Chriſt (aa). He aſſerts, that the Saints ſhall underſtand by little and little, thoſe things whereof they had no knowledge in their Entrance into Happineſs (bb). Laſtly, he imagines that God ſent Enoch to the Angels (cc), whom he conceives to be corporeal. The ancient Propagators of Chriſtianity ought to be excuſed for theſe ſorts of Opinions, there being ſcarcely one of them that had not admitted ſome Notions almoſt like theſe.

The Style of St. Irenæus (as far as we can judge by that part of his Works, which as yet remains) is ſuccinct, clear and ſtrong, but not very ſublime: He declares himſelf in his Preface to the Firſt Book; That the Elegancy of a polite Diſſertation ought not to be ſought for in his Works, becauſe reſiding among the Celtæ, it is impoſſible but that he ſhould utter many barbarous Words; that he did not affect Diſcourſe with Eloquence nor Ornament, and that he knew not how to perſuade by the force of his Expreſſions, but that he wrote with a vulgar Simplicity. He takes more pains to inſtruct his Reader, than to divert him, and he endeavours more to convince him by the Matters which he propounded, than by the manner of Expreſſing them. It cannot be doubted, but that he was a very profound Scholar in all ſorts of Knowledge, as well prophane as Sacred; he perfectly underſtood the Poets, and Philoſophers (dd); there was no Heretick of whoſe Doctrine and Arguments he was ignorant, he had an exquiſite knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; he retained an infinite number of things, which the Diſciples of the Apoſtles had taught by word of mouth: Laſtly, he was exceeding well verſed in Hiſtory and in the Diſcipline of the Church, ſo that nothing can be more literally true, than what is atteſted of him by Tertullian, Irenæus omnium Doctrinarum Curioſiſſimus explorator. Moreover, his Learning was accompanied with a great deal of Prudence, Humility, Efficacy and Charity, and it may be juſtly affirmed, that he wanted nothing that was neceſſary for the Qualification of a good Chriſtian, an Accompliſhed Biſhop, and an able Eccleſiaſtical Writer. However, the Learned Photius had reaſon to take notice of one defect, which is common to him, with many other ancient Authors; that is, That he weakens and obſcures (if we may ſo term it) the moſt certain Truths of Religion, by Arguments that are not very ſolid (ee). It were eaſie to (r) And his equality with the Father.] In the fourth Book, ch. 8. he ſays, that the Son is the meaſure of the Father, becauſe he comprehends him. He ſeems to have ſaid ſomething contrary to this, lib. 2. where he ſays, that the Father is greater than the Son, that he knew not of the day of Judgment; And in another place he ſays, that the Father is inviſible and the Son viſible. But as to the firſt paſſage, there is no more difficulty in it than in that of St. John, and he ſpeaks there of Jeſus Chriſt conſidered as a Man. And the ſecond ought to be underſtood after the ſame manner, as we have explained a like paſſage of St. Juſtin. It is yet more favourable to us, becauſe he ſays that the Son makes the Father viſible, Viſibile Patris Filius. Which ſhews, that the Father and the Son are of the ſame nature.

And as for the Pagan Philoſophers, he knew them ſo very thoroughly, that in the ſecond Book, ch. 11. he diſcovers all that the Valentinians had borrowed from each of them. We need only read over his firſt Book to be ſufficiently perſuaded, that he had very particularly applied himſelf to know all the Opinions of the Hereticks. One ſees by the Hiſtories which he cites as well in his Books, as in his Letter to Victor, how well he was verſt in Hiſtory, and in the Diſcipline of the Church.

produce ſome Inſtances of this defect, but it ſeems to me to be more expedient to leave them to the Judgment of the Readers of his Works.

Eraſmus firſt publiſhed the ancient Verſion of the Five Books of St. Irenæus, which was at firſt Printed at Baſil, in the Year 1526. A Second Edition was likewiſe ſet forth at the ſame place by Frobenius in 1528. afterwards in 1533, 1545, 1548, 1554, 1560, in Folio, and in 1571. At Paris in 1528, and 1563. in Octavo by Petit, in a very fair Character, and by the ſame Printer in 1567, again in Octavo. Theſe Editions were followed by thoſe of Gallaſius Miniſter of Geneva, in the Year 1570.

Laſtly, Feuardentius a Profeſſor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris, a Learned Man in his time undertook this Work, and Printed at Paris by Nivelle, in 1575 and 1576, the Five Books of St Irenæus, Reviſed and Corrected in many places, from an ancient Manuſcript, and Augmented with Five entire Chapters, which were found in his Manuſcript at the end of the Fifth Book. He has added at the end of every Chapter ſeveral Notes, which he judged to be neceſſary for the better underſtanding of this Author; they are for the moſt part uſeful and Learned, but there are ſome which exceed the due Limits, that a Commentator ſhould preſcribe to himſelf, whoſe Deſign ought not to be, to make Oſtentation of his Learning, or to Treat of matters of Controverſie, but barely to explain the Senſe of his Author. The Second Edition of Feuardentius, Printed at Colen in the Year 1596, and afterwards in 1630, and at Paris in 1639. is better than the former, becauſe it contains the Greek paſſages of St. Irenæus, which are extant in the Works of St. Epiphanius, and ſome other ancient Writers. To theſe may be added, thoſe that are Collected by Halloixius from the Writings of St. Joannes Damaſcenus, in a Manuſcript of the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld. I am of Opinion, that it would be uſeleſs to make a new Edition of the Works of St. Irenæus at leaſt until the Greek Text ſhall happen to be found; for to Compoſe one from the Verſion, that we now have in our Poſſeſſion (as Halloixius propoſes) would be a Buſineſs ſcarce of any manner of uſe.

St. Irenæus.

Victor, Polycrates, Theophilus of Ceſarea, and Bachillus of Corinth.

Victor, &c.

ST. Jerome places Victor amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, becauſe he wrote ſome little Pieces about the day of the Feſtival of Eaſter, which he believed ought not to be celebrated upon any other day but a Sunday. Euſebius mentions but one Roman Synod publiſhed in the Name of Victor.

Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus wrote a Letter againſt the Opinion of Victor, wherein he pretended that we ought to celebrate this Feſtival upon the 14th day after the appearance of the Moon in March, upon what day of the Week ſoever it fell. Euſebius cites part of this Letter written in the name of Polycrates, in the 24th Chapter of the 5th Book of his Hiſtory, wherein he aſſerts, that St. Polycarp, and ſeveral other Diſciples of the Apoſtles celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter on the ſame day, as was generally obſerved in Aſia, that is to ſay, the Fourteenth day after the appearance of the Moon in March, upon what day ſoever it happened. This difference, as we have already obſerved, raiſed ſome diviſions amongſt the Churches, and exerciſed the Pens of the moſt Learned Biſhops. The Biſhops of Paleſtine, Narciſſus of Jeruſalem, Theophilus of Ceſarea, Caſſus of Tyre, and Clarus of Ptolomais, wrote a Letter in the name of the Council, wherein, after they had proved that they derived this Cuſtom from the Apoſtles, they gave Orders to have their Letter ſolemnly publiſhed, and declared, that they celebrated Eaſter after the ſame manner as the Church of Alexandria did. Bachyllus Biſhop of Corinth wrote alſo a Letter in the name of the Biſhops of Achaia upon the ſame Subject, and in Euſebius's time the Letters of the Biſhops of Pontus of the Province of Oſroene were extant. But all theſe Books are loſt, and we have nothing that is ancient upon this Subject, except the Fragments of a Letter of St. Irenæus, and that of Polycrates cited by Euſebius, lib. 5. c. 4. All theſe Letters were writ towards the end of the reign of Commodus, or the beginning of that of Severus. There goes indeed under the name of Polycrates, a Book Entituled The Paſſion of bleſſed Timothy, mentioned by Sigebert, and publiſhed by Stapuleuſis, but it is a ſuppoſititious Work, and never mentioned by the Ancients.

THere lived at this time ſeveral Writers, whoſe Works were extant in Euſebius's time, who mentions theſe that follow, lib. 5. cap. 27. To theſe we muſt add a certain Perſon named Judas, who compoſed a Diſſertation upon the ſeventy Weeks of Daniel, wherein he has compoſed a Chronology that reaches down to the tenth year of the Emperor Severus, and would perſuade the World, that Anti-Chriſt was then at hand. So much had the Perſecution, raiſed againſt the Chriſtians at that time, troubled the Church.

SERAPION of ANTIOCH.

Serapion of Antioch.

SErapion the eighth Biſhop of Antioch was advanced to this Dignity in the tenth year of the Emperor Commodus, in the year of our Lord 191. He wrote a Letter to Caricus and Pontius againſt the Sect of the Montaniſts, a Fragment whereof Euſebius has cited, wherein he oppoſes the Authority of Apollinarius Biſhop of Hierapolis, and the Subſcriptions of two Biſhops of Thrace (a) to the Montaniſts. There was alſo in the time of Euſebius another Letter of his addreſſed to Domninus, who of a Chriſtian turned Jew, to reduce him from his

Serapion of Antioch.

(a) THE Subſcriptions of two Biſhops of Thrace.] Theſe Subſcriptions occaſioned Baronius to imagine, that a Council was held on this Subject; but they are only the Subſcriptions of the Letters of two Biſhops of Thrace, who wrote to the Aſiaticks concerning this new Sect, (as the Church of France had done) and therefore there is no neceſſity of ſaying that there was a Council aſſembled upon this occaſion.

Apoſtacy,

Serapion of Antioch.

Apostacy, and a Book concerning the Gospel falsly attributed to St. Peter. Eusebius cites a Fragment of this Book, by which it appears, that the Subject and Occasion which induced Serapion to write it, was a Contest that arose in the Church of Rhossus in Cilicia about the truth of that Gospel, that Serapion happening to be there, permitted them to read it, but that afterwards being convinced, that those Persons who defended it, were secret Hereticks, and that Marcion, who was the principal Asserter of it, received it from some Hereticks named the Docetæ, (who believed that Jesus Christ did not really suffer, but only in appearance) he wrote this Letter to them, till he could go to see them himself, to acquaint them with the falsity and errors of that Gospel.

Serapion of Antioch.

St. Jerome takes notice, that in his time there were some short Epistles of the same Author, that were conformable to his austere rigid way of living; but they are wholly lost. This Bishop governed the Church of Antioch till the first year of the Emperor Caracalla, and the year of our Lord 203. Antoninus succeeded him, and was the ninth Bishop of Antioch after the Apostles.

RHODON.

Rhodon.

Rhodon, tho' he was of Asia, studied at Rome, and had Tatian for his Master. He wrote many Books, and amongst the rest a Treatise against the Heresie of Marcion, dedicated to one Callistion. He likewise wrote a Piece upon the Hexameron. St. Jerome attributes to him a Book against the Montanists, a Fragment of which, as he supposes, Eusebius has cited. But since Eusebius says nothing of its being written by Rhodon, and since it is certainly of a later date, we may be sure that it cannot be his. So that we have nothing of Rhodon's left, save only a passage or two cited by Eusebius, taken out of his Book against the Heresie of Marcion, wherein he observes, that this Heresie in his time was divided into several Sects; that one Apelles acknowledged but one Principle, but that he rejected the Prophecies; that some others, as Potitus and Basilitus acknowledged two, and others introduced three Natures. He also tells us, that he had a Conference with Apelles, and that he himself being convinced of several Errors in their Conference, said, That we are not obliged to examine what we believe, and that all those who place their hope in Jesus Christ crucified, would be saved; that the question about the Nature of God was exceeding obscure; that he in truth believed there was but one Principle, but that he was not assured of it, and that the Prophecies were contrary one to another. Lastly, Eusebius adds, that Rhodon says in this Book, that he was Tatian's Disciple at Rome; that Tatian had written a Book concerning the most difficult Questions of Scripture, promising to explain them, but that having never done it, he himself endeavoured to perform it. And this is all we know of this Author; he flourished under the Emperors Commodus and Severus.

PANTÆNUS.

Pantænus.

Pantænus, a Stoick Philosopher, born in Sicily (a), about the beginning of the Reign of the Emperor Commodus, presided (b) over the celebrated School of Alexandria, where from the time of St. Mark the Founder of that Church, they had always a Divine that was eminent for his Learning and Piety, to explain the Holy Scriptures, and to instruct them in Human Learning.

He was obliged for a time to leave this Employment, to undertake another far more excellent. For the Indians having sent to the Bishop of Alexandria to furnish them with a Divine to instruct them in the Christian Religion, Demetrius sent Pantænus thither, who undertook this Mission with Joy, and behaved himself very worthily in it. 'Tis reported, that he found that the Indians had already some Tincture of the Christian Religion, which had been infused by St. Bartholomew the Apostle, and that he met with the Gospel of St. Matthew amongst them, written in Hebrew, which that Apostle had left there (c).

After Pantænus was returned to Alexandria, he re-assumed the Government of the School of that City, which in his absence he in all probability had committed to the care of his Disciple St. Clement a Presbyter of Alexandria. He continued to explain the Holy Scripture publickly under the Reign of Severus, and Antoninus Caracalla, and as St. Jerome tells us, was more serviceable to the Church by his Discourses, than by his Writings. Nevertheless he published some Commentaries upon the Bible, where he has discovered, as Eusebius says, the Treasures of the Scripture. We may judge after what manner he explained the Sacred Text, by the like performance of St. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and the rest that were brought up in that School. They abound in Allegories, they find Mysteries and Instructions in every thing, and scarce ever follow the literal Sense, and fill their Annotations generally with a great deal of Learning. A Man ought to have abundance of Wit and Eloquence to keep up this way of writing Commentaries, and to render it advantageous and entertaining to the People, otherwise it will degenerate and grow flat and tedious. The Commentaries of Pantænus are all lost. We only know, that he was The Author of that Rule, which has been ever since followed by all the Interpreters of Prophecies; that the Prophets often express themselves in indefinite terms, and that they may make use of the present time, instead of the past and future. Theodotus has related this Opinion of Pantænus, but he speaks of it, as if he had rather said it than writ it.

Pantænus.

(a) Born in Sicily.] Some have thought that he was an Hebrew, but they are mistaken, for St. Clement speaking of the Master he had in Ægypt, who was our Pantænus, lib. 1. Strom. calls him the Sicilian Muse, which shews that he was a Sicilian, for otherwise he would as soon have called him the Attick Muse. That Master of his, whom he calls an Hebrew, was another Person that instructed him in Palestine.

(b) Presided.] Eusebius, Lib. 5. c. 10. and St. Jerome in Catalogo.

(c) Which that Apostle had left there.] St. Jerome tells us, that Pantænus brought it with him, and that it was in his time preserved in the Library of Alexandria. I cannot easily prevail with my self to believe this Story, and indeed I should rather believe, that this was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which the Nazarenes owned, which might pass for that of St. Matthew; for why should St. Bartholomew leave an Hebrew Book with Indians.

St. CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

SAint Clement (a), a Presbyter of Alexandria, and Disciple of Pantænus (b), was after him, or rather at the same time with him, Master of the School at Alexandria, and Catechist of the Catechumens (c), belonging to the Church of that City. He flourished under the Emperors Severus, and Antoninus Caracalla, and it plainly appears, that he lived till the Reign of Heliogabalus, or Alexander Severus, that is, till about the year two hundred and twenty from the Birth of Christ (d). As he was endowed with extraordinary Learning, and a singular Talent in Writing, so he composed several considerable Works, which discover great Industry and Study. This is plain by the Catalogue which is left us of them, by Eusebius and St. Jerome. 'The Eight Books 'of Stromata; Entituled the Commentaries, or Stromata 'of Titus Flavius Clemens, concerning true knowledge; 'Eight Books of Hypotyposes, or Instructions, an Exhor'tation to the Gentiles, quoted in the Seventh Book of 'the Stromata; Three Books commonly called the Pe'dagogue; and a Book Entituled, What rich Man can be 'saved; a small Treatise concerning Easter; a Discourse 'of Fasting, another of Slander; an Exhortation to Pa'tience, written to the Catechumens; a Book Entituled, 'The Ecclesiastical Rule, against the Jews, dedicated to 'Alexander Bishop of Jerusalem. Besides these Books, St. Clement in his Second Book of the Pedagogue, Chap. 10. tells us, that he wrote a Book of Continence, and in his Third Book, Chap. 8. a Book concerning Marriage. Of these Works we have still Three remaining that are very considerable, The Exhortation to the Gentiles, the Pedagogue, the Eight Books of the Stromata, and the little Tract Entituled, What rich Man can be saved, which Joannes Matthæus Cariophylus, Arch-Bishop of Iconium, published from a Manuscript of the Vatican Library, whence Father Combefis made a new Version which he set forth, together with the Original Greek, in the last Volume of his Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum. [It was Printed also at Oxon. in Twelves 1683. Doctor Cave says, that it was published formerly under Origen's Name, being Printed by Michael Gheislerus, with Origen's Commentaries upon Jeremiah.]

The Exhortation to the Gentiles, is a Discourse written to convert the Pagans from their Religion, and to persuade them to embrace that of Jesus Christ. In the beginning of it, he shews what difference there is between the Design of Jesus Christ, and that of Orpheus, and those ancient Musicians, who were the first Authors of Idolatry, by telling us that these drew in Men by their Singing, and the Sweetness of their Musick, to render them miserable Slaves to Idols, and to make them like the very Beasts, and Stocks and Stones which they adored; whereas Jesus Christ, who from all Eternity was the WORD of God, always had a compassionate Tenderness for Men, and at last took their Nature upon Him, to free them from the Slavery of Daemons; to open the Eyes of those that were blind, and the Ears of those that were deaf; to guide their Paths in the way of Justice; to deliver them from Death and Hell; and to bestow on them everlasting Life; to put them in a Capacity of leading a Heavenly Life here upon Earth; and lastly, that God made himself Man, to teach Man to become like unto God. Having thus represented the Advantages of the Christian Religion, he exhorts them in a few Words, to embrace Vertue, Justice, Temperance, and to imitate the example of Jesus Christ, that so they may become worthy of eternal Salvation. He afterwards shews the Falshood of the Pagan Religion: First, by discovering the Infamy, and Vanity of their Mysteries, which he innumerates and describes exactly. Secondly, by shewing the Original of Idolatry, and after what manner Men first invented those false Deities. 'Some, says he, contemplating the Stars, 'and admiring their Courses, deifyed them, so the Indi'ans adored the Sun, the Phrygians the Moon, and o'thers gathering with pleasure the Fruits that grew out 'of the Earth, made a Deity of Corn, which they call 'Ceres, and another of the Vine, and that they call Bac'chus. Others dreading Punishments, Afflictions, Mise'ries and Calamities, invented particular Deities, who 'were either the Instruments of sending them upon Man'kind, or else of diverting them from Men: Some Phi'losophers following the Fancy of the Poets, made Dei'ties of the Passions, such as Love, Hope, and Joy; and 'others placed the Vertues in the Rank of Gods, repre'senting them by external shapes: Hesiod and Homer in 'their Accounts of the Generation of the Gods, and 'Descriptions of their Actions have given rise to a new 'sort of Theology. Lastly, the common People have 'made Gods of those, from whom they have received a'ny considerable Benefit. After having thus discovered the Original of Idolatry, he shews the Folly of it, by proving that the principal Gods, as Jupiter, Mars, Vulcan, Æsculapius, &c. were Men like others, and that we know their Country, their manner of Living and Employments, and that we may see their Sepulchres to this day: That the Poets have set down their Loves, their Wounds, and their Crimes: That the wisest of the Heathens have owned the Falshood of these Deities: That the several Religions of the Pagans destroy one another: That it is a strange kind of Blindness, to adore Statues as real Deities. Then he goes on to the principal Design of his Work, which is to exhort Men to adore the true God, and to embrace the Religion of Jesus Christ: he shews that the wisest of the Philosophers, as Plato, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, and Zenophon, have confest that there was but One true God; and that even the most ancient Poets, as Aratus, Hesiod, Euripides and Orpheus, have been obliged to acknowledge the same; and that the Sibyls, the Prophets, and the Books of Scriptures teach only the Worship of one God. Afterwards he is very earnest to persuade Men to embrace the Christian Religion, in Consideration of the great Advantages that it carries along with it, towards the Attainment of eternal Salvation, which they cannot otherwise hope for, and for preserving themselves from eternal Torments, which they cannot possibly avoid, but by believing in Jesus Christ, and by living conformably to his Laws. 'If you were permitted, says he, to purchase eternal Sal'vation, what would you not give for it? And now you 'may obtain it by Faith and Charity. There is nothing 'can hinder you from acquiring it, neither Poverty, nor 'Misery, nor Old Age, nor any other State of Life: Be'lieve therefore, in one God who is God and Man, and 'receive eternal Salvation for a recompence. Seek God, 'and you shall live for ever. Thus he concludes with a long Exhortation, wherein he most earnestly presses Men to quit their Idolatry and Vices, and to live and believe as the Christians do.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

The Second Book entituled the Pedagogue, is a Discourse entirely of Morality. It is divided into three Books. In the first he shews, what it is to be a Pedagogue, that is to say, a Conductor, Pastor, or Director of Men: He proves that this Quality chiefly and properly belongs only to the WORD incarnate. He says, that it is the Part of the Pedagogue to regulate the Manners, conduct the Actions, and cure the Passions. That he preserves Men

Chap. 2.

(a) ST. Clement.] He was called Titus Flavius Clemens: St. Epiphanius, in the Heresie of the Secundians, says, that he was called Athenienſis by some, and Alexandrinus by others, which has been the occasion that it was generally believed that he was of Athens, and that he was called Alexandrinus from the name of the Church whereof he was a Priest, but his Country is not certainly known. He was of the Sect of the Stoicks.

(b) Disciple of Pantænus.] St. Clement had several Masters, as he tells us himself, Lib. 1. Stromat. p. 274. He says that he had two in Greece, one of Cœlosyria, and the other of Egypt. And two others in the East, whereof one was an Assyrian, and the other of Palestine, and descended from the Hebrews: But that at last he found out one in Egypt, who was more excellent than all the rest. This last was Pantænus, whom he often mentions in his Book of Institutions. We do not know who were the other four. Baronius believes that the Assyrian was Bardesanes, and he of Palestine, Theophilus of Cesarea, but Bardesanes was not properly an Assyrian, and Theophilus of Cesarea was rather St. Clement's Companion than his Master. Valesius thinks with greater probability, that Tatian was the Assyrian, and Theodotus the Hebrew, under whose Name there is a Fragment of the Institutions at the end of the Works of St. Clement.

(c) Catechist of the Catechumens, &c.] Eusebius, Book 5. Chap. 10. and Book 6. Chap. 6. and St. Jerome in his Catalogue. We have already said, that Pantænus left the School of Alexandria to his Care when he went to preach to the Indians, and it is probable, that after his return they both taught in the same School.

(d) About the year two hundred and twenty from the Birth of Christ.] It is generally believed that he died about the year 200 from the Birth of Christ, but he must needs have lived longer; for Pantænus who was his Master lived to this time, and the Ancients assure us that he survived him. He wrote his Stromata in the time of the Emperor Severus.

from Sins, and heals them when they have been already guilty. That the WORD performs these Functions by forgiving our Sins, as he is God, and instructing Us as he is Man, with great Sweetness and Charity. That he equally informs Men and Women, the Learned and the Ignorant, because all Men stand in need of Instruction, being all Children in one Sense. Yet however, that we must not think that the Doctrine of the Christians is childish and contemptible: But that on the contrary, the Quality of Children, which they receive in Baptism, renders them perfect in the knowledge of Divine Things, by delivering them from Sins by Grace, and enlightning them by the Illumination of Faith: And that so we are at the same time both Children and perfect Men, and that the Milk wherewith we are nourished, being both the Word and the Will of God, is a very solid and substantial Nourishment. That the WORD guided the Jews in the Old Testament by Fear; but that after it was Incarnate, it has changed this Fear into Love. That Reproaches, Afflictions, and Punishments, which the WORD makes use of to chastise Men, are not Signs of his bearing any hatred towards them, but Effects of his Justice, and of the Care which he takes to correct them: That it is the same God, the Creator of the World, who is both good and just, that punishes and shews Mercy: That he is good upon his own Account, and just as to Men: That Reproofs and Chastisements are for their good; that there are two kinds of Fear, the Fear which Children have of their Father, or Subjects of their King, and the Fear which Slaves have of their Master. That both these Sorts of Fear are profitable to Men, but that the first is by much the most perfect. That the WORD inclines Men to good by its Exhortations, and prevents them from sinning, by its Threatnings: That he performed the Function of a Pedagogue by Moses and the Prophets, and that he is at last come himself to give Men suitable Remedies to their several Miseries, and to conduct them according to the Dictates of right Reason. That the whole Life of a Christian is a continued Series of Actions, conformable to Reason, and that Sin is produced by the going out of that Way.

In the 2d. and 3d. Books of the Pedagogue. St. Clement descends to the Recapitulation of human Actions, and gives Rules for Temperance and Christian Modesty. In the former of these he shews, that the End and Design of Eating, ought not to be Pleasure but Necessity, and that therefore we must avoid Excess both in the Quantity, and the Quality of our Meat. That Wine is not to be drunk but with great Moderation, and that young Persons particularly ought wholly to abstain from it. He finds great Fault with Luxury in Houshold-stuff and Moveables. He is of Opinion, that vocal and instrumental Musick, ought to be banished from the Christian Festivals, and that we should only celebrate therein the Praises of God. He is against immoderate Laughter, and uttering such Words as are unseemly. He requires that exact Modesty be observed in the Countenance, and in Discourse; he reprehends those who put Crowns and Garlands upon their Heads, and who perfumed themselves with Balm. He allows but little Sleep, and that in such Beds, that are neither too stately nor too delicate. That it is not lawful to marry but with a Design of begetting Children; That we should not make use of Cloaths, but for the sake of Decency. He declaims against Luxury of Apparel, against precious Stones, against fantastical Dresses in Men or Women, and against publick Baths. He describes and inveighs against all these things better than ever Juvenal, or any of the ancient Satyrists had done before him. He intermixes his Satyr with several curious Instructions, and descends to Particulars like a Casuist.

Book III. Chap. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

He passes in the next place to the Precepts of Vertue opposite to the Vices he has been reprehending: He shews, that there is none but the Christian, who is truly rich. That he ought to live in an entire Frugality. That he must not make use of any Exercises, and Pleasures, no farther than is absolutely necessary for his Health. He adds moreover divers Instructions, more particularly suited to the Women, to persuade them to carry themselves always civilly and modestly, and more especially in Churches. Lastly, he makes a Collection of several Places of Scripture, which relate to Morality, and the Conduct of our Life, and concludes by exhorting Men to hearken unto, and to obey the Precepts of Jesus Christ, their supreme and sovereign Pedagogue, to whom he addresses a Prayer, praising him with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, and returning him Thanks for making him a Member of his Church. These Books are very profitable for those that study Morality, and if the Casuists of our Times had perused and considered them well, they had not fallen into that damnable Remissness, wherein they have suffered themselves to be overtaken: They might also be very useful to all Christians, and I much wonder that no Person has undertaken to translate them in this Age, wherein several Pious and Learned Men, have employed their Time and Labour in rendring intelligible to all People the most excellent Writings of the Fathers, by translating them into our Language with a Clearness of Expression, and Exactness of Style not to be imitated. But if any would undertake the Translation of the Pedagogue, he must leave out several Passages, that are not fitting to be read by every Body, and accommodate some other Places to the Manners and Customs of our Times.

Last Chap.

The Books Entituled Stromata (e) are so called, because they contain several choice Thoughts (f) collected from divers Places, and joyned together, so as to make a Variety somewhat like that in Turky-work Carpets. Let us see how St. Clement speaks of his own Work in the Beginning of his Fourth Book. 'These Books, says he, 'are stored with Varieties, as their Name imports; 'we here pass on continually from one thing to another, 'and we often mention things that are foreign to our 'Subject. He afterwards compares this Work to a Meadow, a Tract of Land, or a Garden, wherein one may find all sorts of Herbs, Flowers and Fruits, of which we may gather what we please. 'But not (as he 'himself says in another place) to those beautiful Gardens, where the Trees and Plants are ranged only to 'please the Sight; but rather to a thick and shady Mountain, where the Cypresses, the Linden-trees, the Laurels, the Ivy, the Apple-trees, the Olives, the Fig-trees, 'and other kinds of Trees, both fruitful and barren are 'mixt together. He says, that he has observed this Method 'designedly, that so he might not clearly discover our Mysteries to those who were not yet Initiated, and yet so 'as others might comprehend them, and might thence 'make their advantage; as, says he, the Fruit-Trees of 'this Mountain, whereof we but just now spake, are 'concealed from those who would rifle them, whereas 'the Labourer who understands them, may pluck them 'up, and make a Garden, or a pleasant Forest. Do not 'therefore expect, says he, in these Books, either Order 'or Politeness; since our Design was to conceal, and, 'if I may so say, to embroyl things, that so, none but 'the Intelligent, and those who will take the Pains to 'inform themselves, may be able to comprehend them: So that as St. Clement has not observed any Method in these Books, but intermixed several Notions all along of Philosophy and Religion, it is a difficult matter to make such an Abridgment of them, as we have given of the Book of the Pedagogue. However, we shall endeavour to give an Account of the principal Matters, which he there Discourses of.

In the First Book, after having shewn how advantageous it is, for Persons of Ability to compose Books, he proposes the Subject of his, saying that they shall contain the principal Verities of Religion mixt, or rather conceal'd under the Maxims of Philosophy. Thence he takes occasion to refute those who find fault with Philosophy; to shew the Profit and Advantage of it; to discourse of the use that may be made of it: And he concludes by shewing that the Philosophy of the Hebrews is the most ancient of all, justifying this Truth by a most curious and exact Chronology.

In the Second Book he treats of Faith and its Effects, which are Repentance, Hope and Fear; he proves that Faith is necessary; that it is not in us by Nature, but by Will; that it is God's Gift, but so as to depend upon our own Free-will; that true Repentance consists in doing no more that which we are troubled for having done already; that there are two kinds of it, the First is that of those, who turned to the true Faith, to efface the Sins they committed, whilst they were Heathens; the Second is that of those, who have fallen after their Conversion, but yet have an Opportunity of obtaining Forgiveness, provided they are heartily sorry for their Sin; but that those who often fall into the same Sin, and by that means make a Circle of repenting and sinning, are like to those who have no Faith: And that it is only a seeming, and (e) The Books entituled Stromata.] This Book was called, as Eusebius tells us, The Stromatic Commentaries of Titus Flavius Clemens concerning the Gnosticks, according to the True Philosophy; This Title is at the end of the first Book, opposing the false Gnosticks to the True ones, which are the sober and discreet Christians.

(f) Choice Particulars.] The Word ῥαμματις properly signifies a Sheet of Linnen, or a Bag to enclose Pieces of Tapestry; it likewise signifies a certain Fish with Speckles on the Back. It is here taken for that neat mixture we see in Tapestry, and it imports as much as Miscellaneous Commentaries or Discourses. Russinus translates it, Opus varie contextum; Plutarch wrote a Book with this Title, and Origen wrote another after St. Clement.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

no true Repentance, in thoſe who ask Pardon for thoſe very Sins which they never intend to reform. Upon occaſion of Repentance he Diſcourſes of Sin. He ſays that Men commit it freely, and that they are purified from it by Faith and Charity. That the Fear of God is very profitable for us, that it inſtructs us, that it cauſes us to avoid Sin, and that it incites us to Love. He commends Charity, Temperance and Hoſpitality. He condemns thoſe that plunge themſelves in ſenſual Pleaſures: And propoſes to them the Example of the Martyrs who ſuffered Fire, Torments, and Death it ſelf for the defence of Juſtice and Truth. Afterwards he Diſcourſes of Marriage, and defines it to be a lawful Conjunction between a Man and a Woman, for the Propagation of Children. He approves of it, and ſhews its advantages, telling us that it is never lawful to leave the Woman, in order to Marry another, upon any Pretence whatever.

He continues in the Third Book, to ſpeak againſt the Incontinence of the Nicolaitans, Carpocratians, Valentinians, and ſeveral other Hereticks, and he defends Marriage againſt the Marcionites, againſt Tatian, and the other Hereticks that blamed it, tho' he prefers Virginity before it as a greater good; Provided, ſays he, that it be kept meerly for the Love of God, and for the obſerving his Commands. He maintains that Marriage is indiſſoluble, he does not entirely condemn Second Marriages, but blames them. He occaſionally tells a Story of Nicholas one of the Seven firſt Deacons, who is ſuppoſed to be the Author of the Nicolaitans, who having a handſome Wife, and being accuſed of Jealouſie, brought her, as they ſay, before the Apoſtles, and gave her leave to Marry whom ſhe pleaſed of them. But he excuſes Nicholas, and ſays, that thoſe who boaſt of being his Diſciples, have put a wrong Conſtruction upon this Action, as well as upon his Words: That he was informed, that he never had any Commerce with any other Woman, but his Wife: That his Daughters remained Virgins, and his Son was very Chaſt. He ſays that the Apoſtles St. Peter, and St. Philip were Married, and that they had Children: That even St. Philip married his Daughters, and he adds alſo, that St. Paul had a Wife, wherein he is miſtaken.

[Tho' it is uncertain whether St. Paul was ever Married, yet it is a raſh thing to ſay poſitively he was not. St. Clement alledges a Tradition in this Matter, which might eaſily be conveyed entire down to his time. It is plain, that the true Yoke-fellow, Philip. 4. 3. was a Woman; which others of the Ancients underſtood of his Wife, beſides St. Clement. His Expoſtulating with the Corinthians, and aſſerting that he had a Power to lead about a Siſter, or a Wife as well as St. Peter or any of the Apoſtles, may as well prove, that St. Paul juſtified his own Practice, as that he thought the thing ſimply lawful: eſpecially ſince he is there making a Defence for himſelf. The Queſtion however is very far from being certain in the Negative, and therefore at leaſt ought to be left undetermined.]

In the Fourth Book he treats of Martyrdom, and Chriſtian Perfection. He ſhews the Excellency of Martyrdom, and exhorts Chriſtians to undergo it, confuting the Hereticks, who held that Martyrdom was no Vertuous Action: He makes the perfection of Chriſtianity, to conſiſt in the Love of God and our Neighbour. He would have us love Sinners, and yet deteſt their Sin; that we ſhould do good out of a principle of Love and not for Fear. 'For that Man, ſays he, that abſtains 'from Evil only out of a ſlaviſh Fear, is not good vo'luntarily, but for Fear-ſake; and he who would not 'have abſtained but in Conſideration of the Recom'pence, cannot be ſaid to be juſt with a good Heart. 'For in the one 'tis Fear, and in the other the hope of 'a Reward, which renders them Juſt, or rather, which 'makes them appear ſo to the Eyes of the World. He ſays that God inflicts Puniſhments upon Men for Three Reaſons. Firſt, that the Man whom he Chaſtiſes may become better. Secondly, that thoſe who are to be ſaved, may take warning by theſe Examples. Thirdly, leſt he ſhould be deſpiſed by Men, if he did not avenge Affronts and Injuries done to himſelf.

In the Fifth Book, after having ſhewn that the way of inſtructing by Allegories and Symbols was very ancient, not only among the Jews, but alſo among the Philoſophers, he proves that the Greeks took the greateſt part of the Truths, which are in their Books, from the Barbarians, and principally from the Hebrews. This Book is full of Citations from the Poets, and the heathen Philoſophers.

In the Sixth Book, he ſpeaks again advantageouſly of Philoſophy. Afterwards he begins to draw a Character of the True Gnoſtick, that is to ſay, to give the Idea of a Chriſtian, that is perfectly Good and Wiſe. Theſe are the principal ſtrokes of his Picture. The True Gnoſtick has the Command over his Paſſions. He is exactly Temperate, and allows his Body no more than what is neceſſary. He loves God above all Things, and the Creatures for Gods-ſake, and the Relation they bear to him, and nothing is able to ſeparate him from this Love. He bears with Patience all unfortunate Accidents. He makes it his Buſineſs to know all things which relate to God, without neglecting human Learning. His Diſcourſes are regular and to the purpoſe, full of Sweetneſs and Charity. He is never overcome with Anger. He prays continually by Charity, that unites him to God; Firſt, begging of him the Remiſſion of his Sins; and then the Grace not to ſin any more, but to do Good. Afterwards St. Clement enlarges upon the Source or Spring, from whence this Gnoſtick derives this true Knowledge, and compleat Science. He ſays that it is the Holy Scripture, the Law and the Prophets, and in particular the Decalogue which he briefly explains, and Laſtly, the Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt foretold by the Prophets, preached throughout the World, and received notwithſtanding all the Contradiction of Kings, and the great Men of this World, who oppoſed it with all their Might.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

In the Seventh Book, he goes on to deſcribe the Vertues of his Gnoſtick; he ſays that he employs himſelf entirely in honouring God, in loving him, in underſtanding, hearing and imitating his WORD, which was made Man for our Salvation; that he does it not only upon certain days, but during the whole Courſe of his Life; that the Sacrifices by which he Honours him, are the Prayers and the Praiſes which he offers up at all times and in all Places; that he is Gentle, Courteous, Affable, Patient, Charitable, Sincere, Faithful and Temperate; that he deſpiſes the good things of this World, and that he is ready to ſuffer every thing for Jeſus Chriſt; that he does nothing either out of Oſtentation, or Fear, or the Deſire of being rewarded, but out of pure Love to the Goodneſs and Juſtice of God: Laſtly, that he is entirely Holy and Divine. Afterwards St. Clement Anſwers ſeveral Objections of the Greeks and Jews, who affirmed that the multiplicity of Hereſies ought to hinder Men from the embracing the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. To which he Anſwers, that this multitude of Sects is likewiſe to be found among the Heathens, and the Jews; that it was foretold by Jeſus Chriſt, that ſuch a thing ſhould happen among the Chriſtians. That it ought not to make us forſake the Truth, but rather on the contrary to ſeek after it, with the greater Care and Diligence. That there is an infallible Rule to diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood; that this Rule is the Holy Scripture, which being an inconteſtable Principle ſerves for a Proof of whatever we ſay. That it muſt be Confeſſed, that the Hereticks make uſe of it as well as the Catholicks. But then firſt they do not make uſe of all the Sacred Books. Secondly, thoſe which they do uſe are corrupted. Thirdly, they chiefly urge ambiguous Paſſages, which they explain according to their own Fancy, by departing from the true Senſe, and keeping only to Terms. Hence he takes occaſion to condemn in general all Hereticks, who rejecting the Tradition of Jeſus Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, and forſaking the Faith of the Church, have made themſelves the Authors of particular Sects, by inventing new Doctrines, and corrupting the Truth. He ſays, that there is but only One Catholick Church, which is more ancient than all the Aſſemblies of the Hereticks, that it was founded by Jeſus Chriſt, who dyed under Tiberius, and eſtabliſhed it in the World by the Apoſtles, before the end of Nero's Reign. Whereas there was hardly ſo much as one Hereſie older than Adrian's Time, and that they all bore the Name of their Author, or that of the Places and Countries where they firſt appeared, or from the Doctrine they taught, or the things which they honoured, which ſufficiently diſcovers their Falſhood and Novelty. He concludes by making the Deſcription of theſe Books of the Stromata, and by promiſing to begin another Subject in the following Book.

The laſt Book in our Editions, is a Collection of Logical Principles, which contains nothing that regards the Chriſtian Religion, or that is worth giving an Account of. Photius obſerves, that in his Time there were ſome Editions, where this laſt Book was Entituled; What rich Man can be ſaved: And that it began with theſe Words. Thoſe who make pieces of Oratory. But Euſebius diſtinguiſhes that Book from the Stromata.

St. Clement of Alexandria, does not ſtart at all from the Doctrine of the Church in thoſe Works of his, whereof we have already given the Abridgment. He does not only mention Three Divine Perſons, but he invokes them them as One only God (g). Besides he uses the Name of the most Holy Trinity. He says that the WORD, which was from the beginning in God, which is God, and equal to God, by which he created the World, and instructed all Men, did at last become Man to save us by his Doctrine, by his Example, and by his Death. It is true, in another Place he says, that the Nature of the Son is the most Perfect, the most Excellent, and that which approaches nearest to Almighty God, words which would seem to imply as if he believed, that the Nature of the WORD was different from that of the Father: But we know well enough, that the Ancients had not yet made so exact a Distinction between the Terms Nature, and Person, and that they often took one for the other. And indeed his way of Discourling of the Excellency of the WORD, in this and other Places, sufficiently declares that he did not believe, that he was of a different Nature, taking the word Nature in the same Sense as we at present do. For he says that the WORD is God, that it is without Beginning, that he is equal to the Father, that he is in the Father, that he created all Things, &c. Expressions which clearly discover what his Opinion was concerning the Divinity of the WORD.

Book IV. Pag. 537. and 565. He seems however to follow the way of speaking of some of the Ancients, in saying that the WORD is Visible, that he may be known, and that it is by him that we know the invisible Father, of whom he is the Image; but it is an easie matter to Accommodate these Expressions to the Doctrines of the Church, as we have shewn in our Critical Remarks upon several Authors already. He says, that the Blessed Mary remained a Virgin after she brought forth. He holds that the Dæmons sinned through Incontinency. He acknowledges Adam's Fall, and the Punishment of his Sin, which all Men have incurred. But he seems not well to have understood the Nature of Original Sin. 'Tis true, that in the passage commonly alledged from him against Original Sin, he contradicts the Opinion of these who affirmed, that the Generation was Corrupted. But he speaks after such a manner as would make us think, that he did not believe Original Sin, or at least, that he never considered it. Let them tell us, says he, how an Infant that is but just born has prevaricated, and how he who has already done nothing, could fall under Adam's Curse, &c. He often exhorts Men to do good by the hopes of Eternal Happiness, and dissuades them from Evil, by the Fear of Everlasting Punishments, without speaking at all of the Opinion of the Millenaries. He holds, that without Faith in Jesus Christ none can be saved: But he says, that Jesus Christ, and the Apostles preached the Gospel in the Limbi to just Persons, as well Gentiles as Jews, that they might obtain this Faith, wherein they were before deficient. He ascribes much to Free-Will, he believes that our Salvation, and Faith which is the beginning thereof depends upon our selves, though not without the Assistance of Divine Grace (h). He speaks nobly of the Necessity and Efficacy of Baptism. 'Baptism, says he, is called 'Grace, Illumination, Perfection, Washing, by which 'Name it is called, because it cleanses us from our Sins; 'it is called Grace because it remits the Punishment due 'for our Sins; Illumination because it enlightens us with 'the Illumination of Faith; Perfection because it makes 'us perfect. And Afterwards, pag. 95. These Bonds of 'Sin are immediately broken by the Faith of Man, and 'the Grace of God; Sins are remitted by this admirable 'Remedy of Baptism, and we immediately cease to be 'Sinners; from being Blind as we were before, we become clear-sighted, for what is taught to the Catechumens is purely Instruction to guide them to that Faith, 'which is thus internally conveyed by the Holy Spirit. We have given an account of the difference that he makes between the Remission of Sins committed after Baptism, and that which is obtained by Baptism. We have shewed that he allowed but one Repentance after Baptism, and that he rejects the Repentances of those Persons who often relapse into the very same Sins, as things of no value; that he approves of Marriage, and believes it indissoluble; that he blames Polygamy, and even second Marriages. He speaks but little of the Eucharist, and what he says of it is very obscure, because he endeavours to conceal this Mystery from those who were not Baptized. But he declares expressly in the Second Book of the Pedagogue, Chap. 2. that the Bread and Wine are the Matter of it, and condemns the Hereticks who used any thing else besides Bread, and Wine mingled with Water. He observes that in several Churches, after the Eucharist was distributed, it was left to the liberty of each of the Faithful, to take a part of it. He often cites Apocryphal Books, as the Gospel according to the Egyptians, the Book of Hermas; yet in the mean time he only allows the Four Gospels to be Canonical. He admits of the Authority of Tradition, and that of the Church. These are the Opinions of St. Clement upon the Principal Articles of our Faith, which are conformable to the Doctrine of the Church, in all the main Points, and different only in some Things of lesser Consequence.

But this cannot be said concerning his Work of Institutions, which according to the Testimony of Photius contained several Errors, even contrary to what he had taught in his other Works. Let us see what this Learned Critick says of the Matter. The Hypotiposes, says he, were written upon some Passages of the Old and New Testament, which he explains and interprets briefly; but though he has in several places very Orthodox and true Notions, yet in others he has some that are very Erroneous and Fabulous; For he says that Matter is Eternal, and he feigns Eternal Idea's produced by the Decrees of God; he places the Sun in the number of Created Beings; he holds the Metempsychosis; he pretends that there were several Worlds before Adam; he fancies Eve to be produced from Adam after an infamous manner, and different from that which is set down in the Scripture; he imagines, that the Angels having had to do with Women, begat Children of them; he thinks that the WORD was not really and truly Incarnate, but only in Appearance; he feigns two WORDS of GOD, the one Superior and the other Inferior, this last was that which appeared unto Men; he adds, that this WORD is not of the same nature with the WORD of GOD, that it was not the WORD of the Father that was incarnate, but a certain Vertue and Power of GOD proceeding from the WORD, which being a Spirit entred into the Souls of Men. He endeavours to prove these Opinions by Scripture. In a word, these Eight Books are full of such sort of Errors and Blasphemies; whether it be the Author of this Book that has written them, or whether it be any other who puts them out under his name. The intent and design of the whole Work appears to be an Explication of Genesis, Exodus, the Psalms, the Canonical Epistles, and Ecclesiasticus. The Author observes that he was the Disciple of Pantænus.

If this Work was so full of Errors, as there seems no reason at all to doubt after the Testimony of Photius who had seen it, it must needs have been composed by St. Clement, before he was throughly instructed in the Christian Religion, and had altogether quitted the Opinions of Plato; which seems very probable, for we cannot say that he was not the Author of these Books, which are attributed to him by all Antiquity, and there is no likelihood that they were falsified by the Hereticks in so many places. Besides that these are the Opinions of one who would accommodate the Platonick Philosophy to the Christian Religion, or rather of one who was half a Platonist and half a Christian. However among the Ancients these Books have been had in sufficient esteem and reputation. Eusebius cites several Passages out of them. In the First Book, Chap. 12. of his History he brings one out of the Fifth Book, where it is said that Cephas, Matthias, Barnabas, and Thaddæus, were of the number of the Seventy Disciples of Jesus Christ. The same Eusebius in the Second Book, Chap. 1. produces another passage taken out of the Sixth Book, where he says that Peter, James, and John, (though they were preferr'd by Jesus Christ to the other Apostles) did not dispute about Precedency, but chose with one consent St. James the

And again Book 5. pag. 544. The Father is not without the Son, neither the Son without the Father. And Pag. 598. after having quoted some Words of Plato, he understands them of the Trinity; For, says he, the Holy Ghost is the Third, and the Son, by whom all things were made, is the Second.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

Juſt to be Biſhop of Jeruſalem. And another out of the ſeventh Book, where he ſays, that theſe three Apoſtles had the Spirit of Knowledge, which they communicated to the ſeventy Diſciples. In the 9th Chapter there is another Paſſage taken from the ſeventh Book, where he ſays, that James the Brother of John by his Conſtancy converted his Accuſer, and that they were both beheaded for the Faith of Chriſt. In the 15th Chapter, he ſays, that St. Clement in his ſixth Book of Inſtitutions affirms, that St. Mark compoſed his Goſpel by the Direction of St. Peter, and that this Apoſtle approved of it when it was finiſh'd. Laſtly, Euſebius in the ſixth Book 14th Chapter tells us, that St. Clement in his Inſtitutions explains all the Books of the Old and New Teſtament, not omitting even thoſe of which many Perſons doubted, as the Epiſtles of St. Jude, St. Barnabas, and the Revelation of St. Peter: That he ſays that the Epiſtle to the Hebrews was written by St. Paul, and tranſlated by St. Luke: That St. Paul would not put his Name to it, becauſe he was hated by the Hebrews. He ſets down the Order of the Goſpels; he ſays that the Goſpels of St. Matthew and St. Luke were firſt written, that St. Mark compoſed his at Rome at the Inſtance of the faithful, and by St. Peter's Order, and that St. John writ his the laſt, at the Deſire of his Friends, to explain what was moſt ſpiritual in Jeſus Chriſt, the others having ſufficiently ſpoken of his Body.

The famous Valeſius has obſerved, that we have ſtill a very conſiderable Greek Fragment of this Work at the end of St. Clement, Entituled, An Extract of the Oriental Doctrine of Theodotus. For it contains thoſe very Errors, concerning Chriſt's Perſon, which Photius has obſerved in the Hypotipoſes; and the Author ſays towards the end, that Pantænus was his Maſter. It is alſo likely, that the other Fragment which follows, which is a Collection of Words and Expreſſions of Scripture, is likewiſe taken out of theſe Books, for beſides that it is found with the Works of St. Clement, it is written after that manner in which Euſebius and Photius acquaint us, that the Work of St. Clement was compoſed, and it appears that it is the very ſame Deſign.

There is alſo another conſiderable Fragment of St. Clement taken from his Book, What rich Man can be ſaved, in Euſebius, Book 3. Chap 23. where he tells us a famous Story of St. John. He ſays, that this Apoſtle coming to a City of Aſia, recommended to the Biſhop a young Man who ſeemed to have very good parts: That this Biſhop preſently took care of him, and having ſufficiently inſtructed him, he baptiz'd him; but afterwards neglecting to look after him as before, this young Man grew lewd, and became the Ring-leader of the Robbers; that St. John returning ſome years after, demanded of the Biſhop the Truſt which he had committed to his Charge, and let him know, that he required this young Man from him. The Biſhop telling him that he was utterly loſt, and that he was become the Head of the Thieves, this Holy Apoſtle being extremely concerned at this unfortunate Accident, immediately took horſe, cauſed himſelf to be taken by the Robbers, and to be brought before their Chief, who remembring him, immediately fled; but St. John running after him, made him acknowledge his fault, promiſed him to obtain for him Chriſt's Pardon, and brought him back along with him, and having put him into a Courſe of Repentance, he did not leave him till he was reconciled to the Church. We have this Book entire in the laſt Volume of the Supplement of the Bibliotheca Patrum, tranſlated by Giſlenius, and the Greek Text publiſhed by Cariophylus: 'Tis an excellent Diſcourſe, wherein St. Clement explains the Words of Jeſus Chriſt to the young rich Man recorded by St. Mark, Chap. 10. And it ſhews, that in order to Salvation, 'tis not neceſſary for any one abſolutely to quit his Poſſeſſions and Riches, provided he makes a good uſe of them. Upon occaſion of this Queſtion, he diſcourſes of Love towards God, and towards our Neighbour, and of Repentance. By the way he ſays ſomething of the Advantage there is in having a Director, to reprehend us ſeverely for our Faults, and to give us ſuitable Remedies for our Amendment. And it was to ſhew the Efficacy of Repentance, that he told this Story of St. John. We find under the name of St. Clement, in the Bibliotheca Patrum, ſome Explications upon ſeveral Paſſages of the Old Teſtament, and Commentaries upon the Canonical Epiſtles. If theſe Fragments are really his, they muſt be taken from his Books of Inſtitutions, which is not very improbable, becauſe they have a near Relation to what Photius ſays of the Inſtitutions, and beſides they have the Genius of St. Clement.

S. Clement of Alexandria.

There is no doubt but St. Clement was a Perſon of extraordinary Qualifications. St. Jerome makes no ſcruple of ſaying that no Man had ever more Knowledge than this Father; and it is certain, that of all the Ancients, there is none whoſe Books are ſo full of prophane Learning as his (i): He even ſhews too much of it for a Chriſtian Writer, and we may ſay that he was more a Philoſopher than a Divine, though he was by no means ignorant of our Religion, and perfectly underſtood the Holy Scriptures. But he is much more emphatical upon the Moral than upon the Doctrinal Part of Chriſtianity; and he explains almoſt all the Paſſages which he cites, after an Allegorical manner in Imitation of Philo Judæus. He writes always without Method and Coherence. His Style is careleſs; which may be particularly obſerved in his Stromata. For in his Exhortation to the Gentiles, and his Pedagogue, he writes more floridly, as Photius has obſerved, and he is all along buoyed up with a certain Mageſtick Gravity which is very delightful.

The Works of St. Clement have been printed in Greek at Florence in the year 1550 for Torrenſis, by the Care of Petrus Victorius. They were tranſlated by Gentianus Hervetus, which Tranſlation was printed at Florence by the ſame Perſon in the Year 1551; at Paris in 1566, 1572, 1590, 1592, and in 1612; at Baſil in 1556, and with St. Irenæus in 1560, and 1566; at Amſterdam in 1613. Silburgius afterwards took Pains upon this Author, and having collected the Obſervations and Corrections of ſeveral Learned Perſons, cauſed it to be printed in Greek by Commelinus in the year 1592, in Folio. Afterwards it was publiſhed in Greek and Latin by Heinſius, who reviſed the Tranſlation, and added ſome new Obſervations, and cauſed it to be printed in Greek by the ſame Commelinus in the year 1616. This Edition was followed by thoſe of Paris in the year 1629, and 1631, which is the beſt of all; That of 1641 is not ſo Fair and Correct.

(i) Whoſe Books are ſo full of prophane Learning as his.] I believe the Reader will not think it tedious to read the following Paſſage of Gentianus Hervetus concerning the Learning of St. Clement. Do you deſire, ſays this Author, to read Hiſtories that are very ancient and very curious? Read St. Clement who underſtood all ancient Hiſtory ſo perfectly well, that one would think him to have been ignorant of nothing that had paſs'd in the World. Have you an Eſteem and Veneration for the Verſes of the ancient Poets and the Anſwers of the Oracles? You cannot put too high a Value upon St. Clement, who quotes Paſſages from ſeveral ancient Poets, whoſe Works we have loſt. Would you be willing to know the Rites and Ceremonies which were obſerved in the Sacrifices of the Heathen Gods? Read St. Clement, who diſcovers the moſt hidden Myſteries of the Pagans. Beſides, is there any one among the Chriſtians who has any reſpect for the Superſtitions of the Heathens, who commends their Manners and Cuſtoms (and I wiſh to God there were no ſuch Perſons left, but if there be any) they may diſabuſe themſelves by reading St. Clement, who clearly makes out the Falſhood of the Pagan Religion, ſo that after having read it, they cannot but be aſhamed of their Folly. Have you a mind to underſtand the Opinions and Maxims of the ancient Philoſophers? Read St. Clement, who diſcourſes of the Original of Philoſophy, of all the Sects of Philoſophers, and of their Doctrine, yet ſo as he always prefers the Philoſophy of the Chriſtians before all others, and proves by invincible Arguments, that This is That which is only Divine, whereof God himſelf is the Author. Would you know the Tenets of the Hereticks who infeſted the Church in its Infancy? St. Clement explains them conciſely, and confutes them very ſolidly and ſubſtantially. Do you ſeek for Teſtimonies againſt the Hereticks of our Times? St. Clement will furniſh you with ſeveral. Have you a Deſign to correct that abominable Corruption of Manners in this preſent Age? There is no Author that reproves Vice more ſeverely, that exhorts more powerfully to the practice of Vertue, and that gives better Rules and Inſtructions for leading a Chriſtian Life. Laſtly, have you a mind to re-eſtabliſh the ancient Diſcipline of the Church? You cannot have too high an Eſteem for the Learning and Sanctity of St. Clement, who being a Prieſt carried himſelf, and lived after ſo holy a Manner, that it were very much to be wiſhed, that there were more Perſons in this Age like him.

Miltiades; The two Apollonii; And two Anonymous Authors, who wrote against the Heresies of Montanus and Artemo.

Miltiades, &c.

THIS not known neither what was the Country, nor the Profession of Miltiades; he wrote a Book against the Montanists, wherein he particularly maintains, that a Prophet ought not to speak in an Ecstasie or Fury (a). Eusebius affirms, that he has left evident Proofs of his Skill, and the Pains which he took in the Study of the Holy Scripture, in those Books which he wrote against the Gentiles and the Jews, each of which was divided into two Volumes. And that besides these Discourses, he wrote an Apology for the Christian Philosophy, Dedicated to the Governors of the Provinces (b). This Author lived under the Emperor Commodus.

There were at the same time two different Authors, both of which were called Apollonius. The first is a Greek Author, who wrote against the Sect of the Montanists, wherein he confutes their last Prophecies step by step, and censures the Practice and Manners of those Hereticks. Eusebius gives us a Fragment of it in Book 5. Chap. 18. where he describes the Exorbitances of Montanus and his Propheteſſes; he accuses them for taking Sums of Money and Presents. He particularly reprehends two Persons of this Sect, who boasted of their being Martyrs. Besides, Eusebius observes, that Apollonius says in this Book, that it was forty years since Montanus invented his Prophecies; that he makes mention of Thraseas, who was a Martyr in his time, and that he mentions a Tradition, that Jesus Christ had given Orders to his Apostles not to go out of Jerusalem for twelve years.

The second Apollonius was of Rome, a Senator of that City, if we may believe St. Jerome (c). He was accused in the time of the Emperor Commodus for being a Christian, and was brought into the Judgment-Hall before Perennis the Præfectus Prætorio. His Accuser was condemned (d) according to the Law of the Emperor, which punished the Accusers of the Christians with death, and Apollonius was sent back to justifie himself before the Senate; where he appeared, and made a very eloquent Oration in Defence of his Religion, tho' notwithstanding that he was condemned to Death, because there was an ancient Law which ordained, that those Christians, who were once judicially accused for their Religion, should not be acquitted if they did not forsake it. St. Jerome says, that he composed this Oration to present to the Senate. But Eusebius assures us on the contrary, that he spoke it before them. But whether he wrote it with a design to speak it, or that the Christians had taken care to preserve it, it was extant in Eusebius's time among the ancient Acts of the Sufferings of the Martyrs.

The same Eusebius gives us a Fragment of an Anonymous Author against the Heresie of Montanus. This by some is attributed to Apollinarius, and by St. Jerome, sometimes to Rhodon and sometimes to Apollonius. Tho', it was not written by either of these Authors, but by one more modern, who lived, as we have said, after the death of Montanus and his Propheteſſes. It was divided into five Books. Eusebius relates some Passages taken from the first, second, and third. In that which is taken from the first Book, the Author describes the furious Transports of Montanus and his Propheteſſes, and those who pretended to prophecy. In the Passages taken from the second Book, he says, that Montanus and Maximilla killed themselves; that Theodotus likewise threw himself down headlong; and that very holy Bishops, as Zoticus of Comana, and Julian of Apamia, being willing to convict the Prophecies of Maximilla of Imposture, were hindred by some who favoured that Sect. He adds, that Maximilla foretold, before she died, Wars and Persecutions, and yet that after her Death both Church and State enjoyed perfect Peace and Tranquility. In the Passage taken from the third Book, he says, That the Martyrs, of which they boast, cannot justifie themselves, since even the Marcionites likewise have made the same Pretences: But that the Martyrs of the Church do carefully avoid communicating with those of this Sect, as has been practised in the City of Apamia by the Martyrs named Alexander, and Caius, who were of Eumenia. Moreover in the following Chapter Eusebius relates a Passage taken from the same Book, where he says, that all the Prophets which have been since the time of the New Testament, such as Agabus, Judas, Silas, the Daughters of Philip, Quadratus, were not agitated by the same Spirit of Prophecy as Montanus and Maximilla, whose false and lying Prophecies were made in a sudden Heat, accompanied with Lewdness and Impudence, which took its Rise from Ignorance, and ended in involuntary Folly: But that in the ancient Prophecies, nothing like this was to be found. That since the time of Maximilla and Montanus, there has not been any Person of this Sect, who could boast of being a Prophet, whereas the true Gift of Prophecy ought to be always in the Church.

Miltiades, &c.

The other Author, whereof Eusebius gives us a Fragment without naming him, in the fifth Book of his History, Chap. 28. had written a Discourse against the Heresie of Artemo, who believed, that Jesus Christ was only a meer Man. It is related in this Fragment, that those of this Sect affirmed, that till Victor's Days the true Apostolical Doctrine was preserved, but that it was corrupted from the time of Zephirinus. 'Which possibly 'may be somewhat probable, (says this Author) if what 'they assert had not been first confuted by the Holy Scripture; and secondly, by the Writings of those Christians 'who were more ancient than Victor, such as Justin Martyr, Miltiades, Tatianus, Clemens, and several others 'that maintain in their Discourses the Divinity of Jesus 'Christ. For who can be ignorant of the Writings of 'Irenæus and Melito, who have taught, that Jesus Christ 'was God and Man at the same time. And even those 'Hymns and Psalms written by the Faithful since the 'beginning of Christianity, extol the Word of God, attributing Divinity thereto. So that since the Doctrine 'of the Church has been preached for so many years, 'how can they say, that till Victor's time the whole Church 'was of their Opinion? Are they not ashamed to invent 'this Calumny against Victor, who knew very well that 'Theodotus the Currier, who was the first Author of the 'Sect of those that deny the Divinity of Jesus Christ, was 'turned out of the Church by Victor himself? For if this 'Bishop had been of the same mind with Theodotus, how 'comes it to pass that he excommunicated him upon the 'account of his Doctrine? And what probability is there, 'that Zephirinus, who succeeded Victor, and continued 'in the See of Rome for ten years, should make an alte'ration in the Doctrine of the Church? And thus it is that this Author confutes the General Principle of all Hereticks that ever were, or ever shall be, giving us an infallible Rule to convince them, which has been, and shall always be, the Custom in the Church of God. For there was never any Age, wherein the Hereticks did not say, that the Church had changed its Doctrine, nor was there ever any time wherein they were not confuted first by Scripture, and secondly by Tradition, that is to say, by the Testimony of Authors, who lived before the Rise of those Heresies. Eusebius adds another Fragment from the same Author, where he speaks of the Penance of a Confessor called Natalis, who suffering himself to be abused by Asclepiodotus, and Theodotus the Goldsmith, the Disciple of Theodotus the Currier, was tormented for several Nights as a Punishment for his Fault, and afterwards did publick Penance for the same in the Pontificate of Zephirinus, and so was reconciled to the Church. To conclude, in this last Passage he describes the Character of

(a) IN an Ecstasie or Fury.] This is taken from the Author against the Heresies of the Montanists, in Eusebius, Book 5. Chap. 17. and the meaning of it is, that true Prophets ought never to deliver themselves in a Fury, nor to be out of their right Senses, as the Montanists were. This likewise is the Rule which St. Chrysostome gives for distinguishing the false Prophets from the true. Homil. 29. in Ep. 2. ad Corinth. And St. Jerome, in his Preface upon Nahum, Non enim loquimur in Extasi, ut Montanus, & Prisca, Maximillaque delirant, sed quod Prophetat liber est visionis intelligentis. St. Jerome here uses the Term Ecstasie in the same sense with the Anonymous Author.

(b) To the Governors of Provinces.] Πρὸς τὰς κοσμικὰς ἀρχοντας. Eusebius and St. Jerome understood these Words of Emperors; but since there was but one in this Author's time, it is more natural to explain this Expression by Governors of Provinces.

(c) If we believe St. Jerome.] Eusebius does not say, that Apollonius was a Senator, but St. Jerome affirms it in his Catalogue to Magnus. We cannot tell whether he knew it certainly, or whether it be only by Conjecture that he says so. But it is likely, that it was upon the account of his being a Senator, that the Præfectus Prætorio sent him back to the Senate to be tryed there.

(d) His Accuser was condemned.] It was his Slave, if we may believe St. Jerome, and 'tis very probable, for he was condemned to have his Bones broken, the ordinary Punishment of Slaves.

Miltiades, &c.

theſe Hereticks, and he ſays, that they have corrupted the Scriptures, and overthrown the Rule of Faith; that when we object to them any Paſſages of Scripture, they try whether they can make thereof any Compound or Disjunctive Syllogiſms; that they ſtudy Geometry and Logick, and that they pervert the ſimplicity of the Faith taught in the Holy Scriptures, by their falſe Subtilities, which is the Common Character of all Hereticks. We do not know who this Author is, nor what was the Title of his Book (e): But this Fragment ſet down by Euſebius plainly diſcovers, that he was a Learned Man, and well skilled in the Controverſie, and underſtood how to Reaſon cloſely againſt the Hereticks, and to give admirable Rules for their Conviction.

Miltiades, &c.

(e) We do not know who this Author is, nor what was the Title of his Book.] Nicephorus calls it the Labyrinth, and Theodoret, Lib. 2. Haret. Fabul. confirms this Title. Photius, Cod. 48. attributes the Book of the Labyrinth to Caius, and others aſcribed it to Origen.

TERTULLIAN.

Tertullian.

TErtullian (a) was a Native of Africa, of the City of Carthage (b). His Father was a Centurion in the Troops which ſerved under the Proconſul of Africa (c). And there is no doubt to be made, but that he was at firſt a Heathen (d), but it is not known when, nor upon what occaſion he was entred into the Church (e). He flouriſhed chiefly under the Reigns of the Emperors Severus, and Antoninus Caracalla (f), from about the year of our Lord 194, till towards the year 216. And it is very probable, that he lived ſeveral years after, ſince St. Jerome relates, that it was reported in his time, that he lived to an extream old Age (g). But we do not exactly know the time of his Death.

The Books that he wrote to his wife ſufficiently ſhew, that he was a Married Man, but we cannot gather from thence when he was Married. The Learned are divided as to this matter, ſome pretending that he married his Wife before he was a Chriſtian, and that he left her after he embraced Chriſtianity; others believing, that he was not Married till after he was Baptized. Which has been the occaſion that ſome have found a difficulty in clearing this Point, which at firſt ſight ſeems to be of no great moment, whether, as it is commonly believed, that Tertullian was ordained a Prieſt within a little time after his Converſion; if he married his Wife after he was Baptized, and afterwards remained with her, it would ſeem that it might be concluded from thence, that in his time it was lawful for Prieſts to Marry. And this is that which has made Pamelius ſay, that Tertullian, before he was ordained Prieſt, made a Vow of Continence to his Wife. But becauſe it appears in the Books which he directed to her, that he ſtill lived with her when he wrote them, the Author of the Life of Tertullian and Origen has been obliged to ſay, that he might maintain Pamelius's Opinion, that theſe Books were written by Tertullian immediately after his Converſion: Though it is more probable, that Tertullian was not Married till after he was Baptized (h), and that he did not write theſe Books to his Wife till he was old (i), a little before he fell into the Errors of the Montaniſts.

Tertullian.

There is no Paſſage in his Writings from whence it can be concluded, that he was a Prieſt of the Catholick Church (k); but St. Jerome affirms it ſo poſitively (l), that there is no reaſon to queſtion it. It is commonly believed, that he was a Prieſt of the Church of Rome (m): But being of Carthage, and having almoſt always remained there, he ought rather to be called a Prieſt of the Church of Carthage, than of Rome. He was not ſo happy

(a) TErtullian.] He was called Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus, which diſtinguiſhes him from the Conſul Tertullus and Tertullian the Martyr.

(b) And of the City of Carthage.] He teſtifies as much himſelf in his Book De Pallio, c. 2. and in his Apology, c. 9. Witneſs, ſays he, the Troops of our Country, ſpeaking of the Troops under the Proconſul of Carthage. St. Jerome confirms the ſame in his Chronicon, and in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

(c) And ſays, that his Father was a Centurion of theſe Troops, which was no very conſiderable Employment.] Euſebius ſeems to ſay, that Tertullian was a Roman, and a Perſon of Quality. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 2. Ταῦτα Τερτυλλιανὸς τὰς Ρωμαίων νόμως ἐκπεπαιδευμένος ἀνὴρ τὰ ἄλλα ἐπιδοξότατος ἐν τοῖς μάλιστα ἐπὶ Ρώμης λαμπρῶν. What he ſays of Tertullian's being well skilled in the Roman Laws, has made ſome believe, that he was a Lawyer, and indeed there is a Lawyer of the ſame Name: But it is certain, that he is a different Perſon from our Tertullian, and Euſebius does not ſay, that he was a Lawyer, but that he was well verſed in the Roman Laws. What Euſebius adds of his Country and his Extraction, is by no means to be maintained, if we do not underſtand it of the Roman Writers; and that the Senſe muſt be, that Tertullian was one of the moſt Excellent of all the Latin Authors. Ruffinus has given this Senſe to this Paſſage of Euſebius by tranſlating it, Inter noſtros Scriptores admodum clarus. Pamelius ſays, that Tertullian was a Lawyer, but he brings no good Argument for it, relying only upon the Authority of Trithemius, who is a modern Author.

(d) But that he was at firſt a Heathen.] He himſelf ſays, ſpeaking to the Heathens in his Apology, We have been likewiſe of your Party; Men are not born Chriſtians, but they become ſo. And in his Book De Spectaculis, and in that concerning the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, chap. 19. and 59. he ſays, That he had aſſiſted at thoſe Sights and Spectacles, and that he had ſpent part of his Life in Lewdneſs.

(e) But it is not known when, nor upon what occaſion he was converted to the Church.] Pamelius ſays, that he was converted by the Anſwer of an Oracle, and Father George of Amiens affirms, that it was by a Viſion, but neither of theſe are to be credited.

(f) And Antoninus Caracalla.] St. Jerome affirms, that he flouriſhed under theſe Emperors, and this appears by his Writings; ſome have ſaid, that he flouriſhed about the year 160, but they are miſtaken.

(g) To an extream old Age.] St. Jerome, in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, ſays, Uſque ad Decrepitam ætatem vixiſſe fertur.

(h) That he was not Married till after he was Baptized.] His Wife was a Chriſtian; and he does not ſay in any place of his Works, that ſhe was converted with him, or that ſhe had converted him; it is therefore more probable, that he Married her after he was a Chriſtian. For there is no likelihood, that while he was a Heathen, he ſhould Marry a Chriſtian Woman; and if ſhe had been converted with him, or that ſhe had converted him, he would without doubt have taken ſome notice of it in the Books which he wrote to her.

[His urging St. Paul's Authority and Command in his ſecond Book to his Wife, when he adviſes her to marry a Chriſtian if ever ſhe married again, is a ſtrong preſumption, that if he married after his Converſion, his Wife was a Chriſtian at that time.]

(i) Till he was pretty well advanced in Years.] Theſe Books are compoſed in the form of a Laſt Will or Teſtament; In the firſt, he exhorts his Wife to preſerve her Continency after his Death; a ſign that ſhe had but little regard of it in his Life time. In the ſecond, he tells her plainly, that it is a Duty to endeavour to maintain that Continency in their Widowhood, which they could not preſerve in their Married Eſtate: Which ſhews, that Pamelius's Opinion is nothing but a groundleſs Suppoſition. Theſe Books were written by Tertullian towards the end of his Life, as may be proved. Firſt, by the manner of the Compoſition, which is in form of a Laſt Will or Teſtament. Secondly, becauſe a Man ſeldom troubles himſelf to write to his Wife, what he would have her do after his Death, but till he is in years. Thirdly, becauſe though Tertullian was not a thorough-paced Montaniſt when he wrote thoſe two Books, yet he ſeems to be leaning very much that way.

[That is not a neceſſary Conſequence.]

(k) There is no Paſſage in his Writings from whence it can be concluded, that he was a Prieſt of the Catholick Church.] There is a Place in his Book De Animâ, c. 9. whence is may be concluded, that he preached in the Church of the Montaniſts, and that they related to him ſtrange Viſions. But as all the Montaniſts talked after this rate in their Aſſemblies, it cannot certainly be concluded from hence, that he was a Prieſt; and we have only the Authority of St. Jerome for it.

(l) But St. Jerome affirms it ſo poſitively.] In his Treatiſe of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, Cum uſque ad mediam ætatem Presbyter Eccleſiæ permanſiſſet, ad Montani Dogma delapſus eſt.

(m) It is commonly believed, that he was a Prieſt of the Church of Rome.] That which makes it believed that he was a Roman Prieſt, is what St. Jerome ſays of his falling into the Error of the Montaniſts, becauſe he was provoked by Envy, and the Injuries which he received from the Clergy of that Church. But there is no neceſſity for all this that he ſhould be at Rome, ſince there was a ſufficient Intimacy and Correſpondence between theſe two Churches, ſo that it might be eaſily known at Rome, what was ſaid and done at Carthage, and though he had been then at Rome, yet it would not have followed, that he was Prieſt of that Church: None of the Ancients affirm it, but on the contrary, Optatus calls him a Carthaginian, as he calls Zephirinus Urbicus, that is, the Biſhop of Rome: And alſo Victorinus Patavionenſis. The Prædeſtinatus of Sirmondus calls him plainly, a Presbyter of Carthage.

Tertullian. as to preserve this Dignity to the end of his days, for after having continued in the Church for about 40 or 45 years, he separated from it in the beginning of the Third Century (n), to follow the Sect of Montanus and his Disciples.

As to the Reasons of his Separation, some have said, that it was Jealousie that carried him to this Excess, because Victor was Preferred before him to the See of Rome; Others say, that he was angry because he could not get the Bishoprick of Carthage, which he put in for, and that this made him take up such a Resolution; And lastly, others have assigned different Reasons (o), which are yet less probable; But this is rather to divine, than to give the Reasons of Tertullian's Change: Which are no where grounded upon the Testimony of any ancient Writer. That which has the most likelihood, is what is related by St. Jerome, that the Envy which the Roman Clergy bore him, and the Outragious manner wherewith they treated him, exasperated him against the Church, and induced him to separate from it. And besides, the extraordinary Austerity which appeared in the Sect of the Montanists, suited very well with his violent and severe Temper, which caused him to carry every thing to Extremities. And it was for this reason that he was so enraged against the Catholicks, and that he treated the Church with such Fury, after his Separation from it. It does not appear by his Books, that he ever afterwards returned from his Error, and none of the Ancients have affirmed it; but on the contrary, they have all spoken of him, as of a dead Man out of the Communion of the Church. It would therefore be a thing altogether against common Sense to imagine, as some have done, that he at last returned into the Bosom of the Church.

And this is an exact Abridgment of Tertullian's Life; let us now proceed to his Writings, and begin by examining the Order, according to which they were Composed, that so we may afterwards make a more exact Judgment of them. And by considering them in this manner with relation to the order of Time, they may be divided into two Classes: The first, comprising those which he composed whilst he was still a Catholick; And the second, those which he wrote after he was a Montanist. They are easily distinguished, because he never fails in his later Books, of speaking of the Holy-Ghost of Montanus, of the Prophecies of the Montanists, and of their Extraordinary Fasts, of declaiming against Second Marriages, and against the Absolution which is granted by the Catholicks to those who fall into Sin after Baptism; or lastly, of Railing against the Catholicks whom he calls Psychici, that is to say, Carnal and Sensual. But we must consider them more particularly, and examine in what Years the several Books were written. Tertullian.

It is evident, that Tertullian wrote his Book Of Penance, whilst he was yet a Catholick; for therein he expressly confutes one of the Principal Errors of the Montanists, by proving, that those who have committed Sins after their Baptism, may obtain Absolution from the Church, provided they do Penance. Erasmus questions, whether this Book be Tertullian's or no, because it is written more politely than his other Books; and the Authority of Erasmus has made Rhenanus reject this Discourse; though since 'tis quoted under Tertullian's Name by St. Pacianus an Author of the Fourth Century, there seems no reason to question its being Tertullian's: Besides, the difference of the Style is not very considerable, and it is no wonder that Tertullian, when he was a young Man, and newly Converted, should write a Book, upon which he bestowed so great pains, more politely than usual.

His Book of Baptism was written about the same time: For it is not only free from all the Errors of the Montanists, but even what he says, That Baptism is reserved to the Bishops, and that it is never permitted to Women to Teach or to Baptize, is expressly contrary to their Discipline.

Besides, we have no reason to doubt, but that he composed the Discourse of Prayer whilst he was yet a Catholick: For speaking therein concerning Fasts, he says, That there is no Solemn Fast among the Christians, but that which is before Easter; which is contrary to the Discipline of the Montanists, who observe several Lents. Besides, he cites in this Treatise the Book of the Pastor, which he rejected after he was a Montanist. We cannot exactly tell in what Year these Books were written, nor which of the three were Composed first.

His Apology for the Christian Religion was wrote about the year 200 (p), in the beginning of the Persecution under the Emperor Severus. It is commonly believed, that he wrote it at Rome, and Address'd it to the Senate: But it is more probable, that it was composed in Africa (q), and indeed he does not address himself to the Senate, but to the Proconsul of Africa, and the Governors of the Provinces.

The Books concerning Patience, and the Exhortation to the Martyrs, may have been written about the same time: But that to Scapula was not composed till some years after, as well as the Two Books to the Nations.

Afterwards, as he began to incline towards the Montanists, he wrote about the year 202, or 203, the Discourses concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, and of Idolatry (r). This is the last of the two, the other being (n) In the beginning of the Third Century.] The Epocha of his Change is certain, for we may easily fix it, because he says in his Book against Praxeas, that this Heretick being come to Rome, hindred the Bishop of that Church from acknowledging the Prophecies of Montanus, that he wrote against him at that time, and had obliged him to revoke his Opinion, that afterwards he acknowledged the Paraclet, or Comforter. Now it is very likely, that Victor was this Bishop that rejected the Prophecies of Montanus; For Tertullian says, that Praxeas hindred him from consenting to these new Prophecies, by urging the Authority of his Predecessors, who could be no other than the Popes Anicetus and Eleutherus, in whose time these new Prophecies of Montanus first began to appear: So that Tertullian could not be turned till after the Pontificate of Victor, who was Pope from the Year 193, to the Year 201. He was a Montanist when he composed the Books against Marcion, which were written in the Year 207. So that Pamelius, who fixes his Change in the Year 210, is mistaken.

(o) Have assigned different Reasons.] Baronius is the Author of the first Opinion, ad An. 201, n. 9. Pamelius, in his Life of Tertullian, of the second. And there are others besides, who have assigned other Causes for his Change, which are all groundless.

(p) His Book of the Apology for the Christian Religion was written about the Year 200, from the Birth of Christ.] It is very likely that it was Composed about this time. M. Allix pretends, that it was not written till the Year 211, but his Reasons are but weak. He says, that he alludes in the 47th Chapter to the Book of Præscriptions; but though he here makes use of the term Præscribe, it does not thence follow, that this Book was Composed after that of the Præscriptions. The second Reason is taken from an Eclipse seen at Utica, in the Year 210, to which, says he, Tertullian alludes in the 20th Chapter; but he does not speak at all in this place of any particular Eclipse. The last and principal Reason of M. Allix is, that in the 4th Chapter of the Apology, he speaks of Severus as if he were dead. Severus, says he, A Prince of great Constancy, has he not lately abolish'd by his Authority the Papian Law, which ordains, that one should have Children before the Age in which the Julian Law gives permission to Marry. But this might be said of Severus whilst he was yet living, and it is likely that he abolished this Law (if yet he did abolish it at all, for it was rather Constantine that did it) in the beginning of his Reign. But what we read in the 5th Chapter, Who are those that have made Laws against the Christians, 'tis neither Adrian, nor Vespasian, nor Antoninus, nor Severus, might prove that he wrote after the Death of Severus; but we must read Verus, as it is in the later Editions, and not Severus.

(q) It is more probable that it was composed in Africa.] Pamelius and several Authors are of Opinion, that he wrote his Apology at Rome, and that he addressed it to the Senate. But there is not one Passage in this Book, that gives any ground for this Conjecture. On the contrary, this Book is Addressed to the Chief Governors of the Cities. Tertullian speaks of Rome and the Romans, as not being in their City, nor with them. In Chap. 21, 24, 35, and 45. he speaks of the Proconsul, and there was not any at Rome. As to what we say, that it was not Addressed to the Senate, but to the Governors of the Provinces, the beginning of the Apology does evidently shew: Which is this. Si non licet vobis Romani Imperii Antistites, in aperto & in ipso vertice civitatis Præsidentibus ad judicandum palàm dispicere, & coram Examinare quid sit liquidum causa Christianorum, si ad hanc solam speciem Auctoritas vestra de Justitia Diligentiâ in publico aut timet, aut erubescit inquirere. Si denique domesticis indiciis nimis onerata secta hujus infestatio obruit viam defensioni, &c. Those which he calls Imperii Antistites are the Governors and Proconsuls, and that which follows plainly shews it, for he says, that they preside in vertice civitatis, which does not signifie the City of Rome which is always called Urbs, and what he adds, that it belongs to them to examine the Cause of the Christians, to try them, and to receive Informations against them, does evidently prove, that he speaks of the Governors of Places. Secondly, he does not mention so much as one word of the Senate in the whole Book. Thirdly, he speaks of the Proconsul, as of the Supream Magistrate, Chap. 45. Lastly, he always calls those to whom he Addresses this Work Præsides, a Title which properly agrees to the Governors of the Provinces.

(r) The Discourses concerning publick Sights and Spectacles, and of Idolatry.] In the 5th Chapter of the Book concerning Idolatry, he alludes to the Joy at the Birth of Geta; He speaks in his Book concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, Chap. 7. of the City of Rome, like a Person who was not there, so that this Book could not be made at Rome, as has been believed.

Tertullian. quoted Chap. 13. He was not yet a thorough-paced Montaniſt, but he began to embrace their Opinions, though he had not yet openly left the Church. He ſtill kept the ſame Opinions when he compoſed his Books Of the Ornament, and Dreſſes of Women (ſ): And two Books Dedicated to his Wife. His Book of The Teſtimony of the Soul has no certain Epocha (t); but as we do not find therein any Foot-ſteps of the Errors of the Montaniſts, we may believe that it was written by Tertullian before he ſeparated from the Church.

And theſe are all the Works that can be attributed to Tertullian whilſt he remained Orthodox, all the others being certainly written after his returning Montaniſt. His Books againſt Marcion are the firſt of theſe laſt kind of Books (u); The Epocha of them is certain, for in the firſt Book, chap. 15, he ſays, That he writ it in the 15th year of the Emperor Severus, that was the 207th after Chriſt. In the firſt of theſe Books he promiſes his Book of Præſcriptions (x): So that although this be a very excellent Diſcourſe, and that it contains nothing but what is Catholick, yet it muſt be confeſſed that he compoſed it when he was a Montaniſt, unleſs we ſhould ſay, that he kept it by him for ſome time unpubliſhed: However it be, it was compoſed when he wrote his Book concerning the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, wherein he refers to the Book of Præſcriptions in the ſecond Chapter.

The Book concerning the Soul was written after the Books againſt Marcion, which are cited in the ſecond Chapter, but before the Book concerning the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, where he quotes his Book concerning the Soul, and alſo that concerning the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt. So that this is the Order of the Books compoſed by Tertullian after thoſe againſt Marcion. The Book of Præſcriptions, of the Soul, of the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, of the Reſurrection of the Fleſh; theſe were all compoſed from the year 207, to the year 210.

His Scorpiacus (y), his Book De Coronâ (z), and that De Pallio (aa), were written about the ſame time, but we do not know the year. In his Book De Coronâ, he ſays, That he had compoſed a Treatiſe concerning the Confeſſions, and Sufferings of the Martyrs. Baronius believes, that it is the Scorpiacus which he means: But I believe, it is rather that Book concerning Flight in time of Perſecution. For his Scorpiacus was written againſt Hereticks, whereas that which he intended, when he wrote the Book De Coronâ, ought to have been againſt the Paſtors, who withdrew themſelves in time of Perſecution.

The Book againſt the Jews was written towards the end of the Reign of Severus, in the year 209, as appears by what he ſays of the State of the Roman Empire in the ſeventh Chapter (bb). We do not certainly know the time when thoſe Books were written againſt Praxeas, againſt Hermogenes, and againſt the Valentinians, but only that they were written by Tertullian when he was a Montaniſt (cc). Neither can we give any account of the time of his writing the following Treatiſes in Defence of the Montaniſts againſt the Church; His Diſcourſe of Chaſtity, of Faſts, of Monogamy, his Exhortation to Chaſtity, of Flight in time of Perſecution, and that wherein he proves, That Virgins ought to be veil'd. St. Jerome adds to theſe, Six Books of Extaſie, and a Treatiſe againſt Apollonius, which are loſt. Tertullian.

I have now nothing to conſider, but the ſmall Treatiſe addreſſed to Scapula, which we certainly know when it was written, for it was after the Death of Severus under Antoninus Caracalla, about the year 213 (dd). And the two Books to the Gentiles were compoſed about the ſame time (ee). And this is the Chronology of all the Works of Tertullian.

There are ſome others which are falſly attributed to him: And amongſt theſe we are to reckon the ſmall Catalogue of Hereſies, which is at the end of the Book of Præſcriptions. For firſt of all, it is of a different Style. Secondly, it was not to be found in the old Manuſcript of Agobardus, which is the moſt ancient Manuſcript of Tertullian's Works, nor in another old Manuſcript, which Rhenanus made uſe of for the firſt Edition of Tertullian. Thirdly, in thoſe Manuſcripts where it is to be found, it is ſeparated from the Præſcriptions, and ſometimes inſtead of being at the end, it is placed in the bebinning, and ſo Trithemius both ſaw, and quoted it. Fourthly, the Præſcriptions have a Concluſion before this Catalogue, wherein Tertullian does not promiſe to make ſuch an Abridgment of the Hereſies, but to write againſt them all ſeparately. Fifthly, 'tis the Work of ſome Author that lived after St. Epiphanius, from whom he borrows the Hiſtory of Marcion, and perhaps he may have taken from St. Jerome what he ſays concerning the Jews.

There goes likewiſe under Tertullian's name a Letter concerning Jewiſh Meats, but it is of a quite different Style, and the places of Scripture are there quoted after another manner than they are in Tertullian's Works, which plainly ſhews, that it is none of his: 'Tis a Letter of a Paſtor to his Church, written in the time of Perſecution. St. Jerome attributes to Novatian a Letter concerning Jewiſh Meats, which in all probability is this very Treatiſe that bears the ſame Title.

(ſ) His Books of the Ornament and Dreſſes of Women.] The Latin Titles are, De cultu Muliebri, & de habitu Muliebri.

(t) His Book of the Teſtimony of the Soul has no certain Epocha.] It was written after his Apology, as may be concluded from the 5th Chapter.

(u) His Books againſt Marcion are the firſt of this laſt ſort.] It is evident that he was a Montaniſt, when he Compoſed the Books againſt Marcion; this appears by the 28th Chapter of his Firſt Book, by the 24th of the Third Book, by the 22d of the Fourth Book, and by the 15th of the Fifth Book. In the Fourth Book, Ch. 22. he calls the Catholicks Pſychici.

(x) He promiſes his Book of Præſcriptions.] Lib. 1. cap. 1. Alius libellus hunc gradum ſuſtinebit adverſus Hæreticos, etiam ſine tractatu Doctrinarum revincendos, quod hoc ſit de Præſcriptione novitatis; We may affirm, that it was written before, and that he only publiſh'd it then, that he might confirm ſome Arguments in his Books againſt Marcion. Which has given occaſion to ſome, to think that this Book was written by Tertullian, whilſt he was yet Orthodox, becauſe he ſpeaks ſo advantageouſly for the Church againſt Novelties. But he makes uſe of the very ſame Principles, in his Book againſt Marcion, and againſt Praxeas. The Catalogue of the Heretics, where he puts the Montaniſts in the Number of Hereticks, is not Tertullian's; ſo that Reaſon, which might contribute to make it believed, that he wrote his Præſcriptions whilſt he was a Catholick, is of no conſequence.

(y) The Book entituled Scorpiacus.] This Book of Scorpiacus was written after the Books againſt Marcion, as may be ſeen by the 5th Chapter.

(z) The Book De Coronâ.] It was written upon occaſion of a Donative granted by the Emperors Antoninus Caracalla, and Severus, to the Soldiers, about the Year 209.

(aa) The Book De Pallio.] Scaliger pretends that this was his firſt Work; and Salmaſius on the contrary ſays, that it was written when he was made Prieſt. The firſt believes, that the Cloak was a Habit for all Chriſtians. And the ſecond maintains, that it was only a Habit for the Prieſts; but both of them are miſtaken, for the Chriſtians and Prieſts wore both long and ſhort Garments indifferently, according to the Cuſtoms of the Places where they were. The Cloak was a Habit for Philoſophers, and ſuch as made Profeſſion of a more auſtere Life than ordinary. What is ſaid in the ſecond Chapter of his Book De Pallio, that the triple Virtue of the Emperor had entirely routed the Barbarians, and procured Peace and Tranquility to the People, can no otherwiſe be underſtood, but of the latter end of the Reign of Severus, who enjoyed a moſt profound Peace after he had defeated all his Enemies, and taken in as Partners in the Governments, his two Sons Caracalla and Geta, and this is what Tertullian calls Triplex Imperii Virtus, as when he ſays, Barbari excluſi, he alludes to the Wall which Severus cauſed to be built in Britain, to put a ſtop to the Incurſions of the Barbarians.

(bb) What is ſaid concerning the State of the Roman Empire, in the Seventh Chapter.] He aſcribes in this place the flouriſhing Condition of the Empire, the Germans beaten back, the Britains hemmed in and ſecured, the Moors beſieged by the Roman Legions, &c. Which agrees to the time of the Emperor Severus, though this cannot be underſtood, but of the latter end of his Reign, when after he had Conquered all the Barbarians, he cauſed that Wall to be built, which we juſt now mentioned, and diſperſed the Roman Legions about the Frontiers of the Empire, as Dion. Caſſius obſerves.

(cc) We do not certainly know the time when theſe Books were written againſt Praxeas, &c.] It is evident, that the Book againſt Praxeas was Compoſed after he was a Montaniſt, ſupra. In his Book againſt Hermogenes, he accuſes this Heretick of pretending to be Married, &c. which is a Reproach exactly agreeable to the temper of the Montaniſts; And in the Book againſt the Valentinians, he commends Proclus or Proculus a famous Montaniſt. This Book was written after his Book againſt Hermogenes, for he obſerves there, that he had already written againſtthis Heretick.

(dd) About the Year 213.] Severus, ſays he, the Father of Antoninus, had ſome regard for the Chriſtians.

(ee) The two Books to the Nations compoſed about the ſame time.] In the firſt Book, Chap. 17. he alludes to the Titles of Antoninus Caracalla, who cauſed himſelf to be called Parthicus, and Germanicus; and in the ſame place, Chap. 9. he ſays, That there was not yet elapſed 300 Years from the Death of Jeſus Chriſt to his own time, which ſhews, that the Third Age was then already advanced. Beſides, that theſe Books were written ſince his Apology, which is the Subject of this, and which he here enlarges, and poliſhes, and puts into order in theſe two Books, wherein we may find ſeveral Phraſes and Expreſſions taken from the Books which he wrote after he was a Montaniſt.

There

Tertullian.

There is likewise attributed to Tertullian, a Book concerning the Trinity, which is none of his: For besides the difference of the Style, that Author mentions the Heresie of Sabellius, which was after Tertullians time. St. Jerome observes, that Novatian writ a Book of the Trinity, wherein he had made an Abridgment of Tertullian's Book; and he adds, that several Persons attributed Novatian's Book to St. Cyprian. The Book of the Trinity, whereof we speak, might possibly be this Abridgment of Novatian, especially since Ruffinus observes, that Novatian's Book was corrupted by the Macedonians, which agrees with this Treatise whereof we speak, in which there are Errors concerning the Divinity of the Holy-Ghost.

There pass also under Tertullian's Name several Poems, which are no more his, than they are Virgil's or Homer's. The Poem called Genesis, seems to be that which Gennadius attributes to Salvian Bishop of Marseilles (ff), that concerning the Judgment of God was, perhaps, composed by Verecundus (gg) an African Bishop, mentioned by Isidorus Hispalensis, in the seventh Chapter of his first Book of Illustrious Men. In the Poem against Marcion (hh), there are some Opinions different from those of Tertullian. There is likewise a Poem to a Senator in Pamelius's Edition, one of Sodom, and one of Jonas and Ninive in the Bibliotheca Patrum, of which we do not know the Authors; the first is Ancient, and the other two seem to be written by the same Author. Besides, St. Jerome affirms, that Tertullian writ several other Treatises, which were lost in his time, and amongst others, a Book Of the Habits of Aaron, whereof this Father speaks in his Letter to Fabiola. He quotes likewise a Book Of the Circumcision, another Of those Creatures that are Clean, and of such as are Unclean, a Book concerning Extasie, and another against Apollonius; Tertullian himself cites several other Treatises of his own composing, as in his Book Of the Soul, a Discourse concerning Paradise, and in his Book Of the Testimony of the Soul, chap. 2. a Discourse Of Destiny; and in another place, a Book concerning The Hope of the Faithful, and another against Apelles. He had also composed a former Work against Marcion, which being lost in his own time, he was obliged to write a new one. Lastly, he wrote the Discourses Of Baptism, Of Publick Sights and Spectacles, and that wherein he proves, That Virgins ought to be veil'd, in Greek.

But we have said enough of Tertullian's Works as to what relates to Criticism and Chronology, we will now look upon them with relation to what they contain. And considering them thus, we may distinguish them into three Classes: The first, comprizing those which were written against the Gentiles. The second, those which were made against Hereticks. And the third, those which relate to Discipline and Manners. The first Book of this first Classis is his Apology against the Gentiles, wherein he shews the Injustice of those Persecutions and Sufferings which they inflicted on the Christians, and the Falshood of those Accusations which were laid to their Charge; and at the same time proves the Excellency of their Religion, and the Folly of that of the Heathens. He begins, by shewing that there is nothing more unjust or opposite to the very Intent and Design of Laws, than to condemn without understanding, and to punish without considering whether there be any just ground for such a Condemnation. And yet that this is put in practice every day against the Christians, that they are hated, condemned, and punished, merely upon the account of their being Christians, without ever considering, or giving themselves the trouble to be informed what it is to be a Christian. That there are indeed some Laws made by the Emperors, which forbid Men to be Christians, but that these Laws are unjust, subject to Alteration, made by evil Emperors, and contrary to the Opinions of the justest and wisest amongst them. He afterwards confutes the Calumnies which were spread abroad against the Christians, as that they used in their Night-meetings to cut a Child's Throat, and to devour it, and that after they had put out the Candles, they had filthy and abominable Conversations amongst themselves. He shews, that there is not only so much as the least Proof of these Crimes alledged against them, but that their Life, their Manners, and the Principles of their Religion, were directly opposite to these Abominations. Tertullian.

'We are, says he, beset daily, we are continually betrayed, we are very often surprized and oppressed, even in the very time of our Meetings; but did they ever find this Child dead, or a dying? Was there ever any one that could be a Witness of these Crimes? Has ever any one of those who have betrayed us discovered these things? Besides, he presses the Heathens further, by shewing, that these Crimes were frequently committed amongst themselves, that they have slain Children in Africa in honour of Saturn, and that they have sacrificed Men in other places, that their Gods have been guilty of a thousand shameful and abominable Practices; whereas the Christians are so far from killing a Child, and drinking its Blood, that they do not so much as eat the Flesh of those Beasts that have been strangled, and that they are such inveterate Enemies to all kinds of Incest, that there are several amongst them who preserve their Virginity all their Lives. After having thus confuted those Calumnies which were set on foot, on purpose to render the Christians odious; he gives an Answer to that Objection which was made to them, That they did not own the Pagan Deities, and that they did not offer up Sacrifices to them for the Prosperity of their Emperors; from whence they concluded, that they were guilty of Sacrilege and Treason. He answers in a word, that the Christians did not pay any Honour to the Gods of the Heathens, because they were not true Gods, and he appeals, for a Testimony of this, to the Consciences of the wisest of the Heathens themselves. He evidently demonstrates, that their pretended Gods were Men, and for the most part Criminals, that were dead, and that their Images cannot be adored without the greatest Folly and Madness in the World, that even the wisest of the Heathens despised them. He occasionally confutes what has been objected by some to the Christians, that they worshipped an Asses Head, and adored Crosses. And from thence he takes occasion to explain the Doctrine of the Christians. 'We adore (says he) One only God, the Creator 'of the World, who is Invisible and Incomprehensible, 'who will recompence Good Men with Everlasting Life, 'and punish wicked Men with Eternal Torments, after 'he has raised them from the Dead. He proves this Truth by the whole Creation, which so evidently demonstrates that there is a God: 'That it is (says he) the greatest 'Wickedness that can possibly be conceived, not to acknowledge him, of whom 'tis impossible that we can 'be ignorant, even by the very Dictates which Nature 'inspires into all Men, which oftentimes cause them to 'invoke the True God, as when we say, If God thinks 'good, if God pleases, God sees us, and the like. And this 'he calls, The Testimony of a Soul that is naturally 'Christian: Testimonium animæ naturaliter Christianæ. Lastly, by the Antiquity of the Books of Moses which are more ancient than all the Writings of the Greeks, and by the Authority of the Prophets, who foretold those things that were to come to pass. Then after having proved the Unity of God, which the Jews acknowledge as well as the Christians, he goes on to that Faith of Jesus Christ, which is peculiar to the Christians: He says, that the Christians do not look upon him as a mere Man, but as God, who is the WORD of God, begotten of the same Substance, that he is thus God and the Son of God, and that his Father and He are One; that the WORD coming down into the Womb of a Virgin, (as was formerly foretold) took Flesh upon him, and was born God-Man: He only desires them to consider it as a Fable like theirs till he has proved it by invincible Arguments: Which he presently does by the Authority of the Prophets, who have plainly foretold Jesus Christ by the Miracles which he wrought, by that extraordinary Eclipse which happened at his Death, that is taken notice of in the very Records of the Heathens; and lastly, by his miraculous Resurrection. 'And all these Things (says he) are authorized by 'the Testimony of Pilate, who being already a Christian 'in his Heart, wrote them to Tiberius Cæsar, and the 'Cæsars had then been Christians, if it had been possible 'either that the World could subsist without Emperors,

Tertullian.

‘ or that the Emperors could be Chriſtians. He adds to theſe Proofs, that of the Eſtabliſhment of the Church notwithſtanding Perſecutions; and that which may be drawn from the Confeſſion of the Heathen Gods, that is to ſay, the Dæmons who ſubmitted themſelves to Jeſus Chriſt, and were againſt their Wills driven out of the Bodies of thoſe that were poſſeſſed only by the Name of Jeſus Chriſt. And here he makes a Digreſſion, to prove, that the Romans owed not their Greatneſs and Proſperity to their Gods; from whence he concludes, that the Chriſtians are not guilty of Treaſon, ſince the Gods, whom they will not own, have not any Power to ſuccour and preſerve the Emperors. ‘ But, (ſays he) we Invoke for their Proſ‘ perity the Eternal, the True, and the Living God, who ‘ gave them their Life and their Empire, who alone has ‘ Power over them, and who alone is above them; and ‘ after whom they are the Chiefeſt. They are Great, on‘ ly becauſe they acknowledge themſelves Inferior to him, ‘ Ideo magnus eſt, quia Cœlo minor eſt. ’Tis this God to ‘ whom the Chriſtians pray with their whole Hearts, for ‘ all the Emperors, that he would grant them a long Life,
‘ a peaceable Reign, a faithful Council, valiant Soldiers,
‘ an obedient People, and in a word, all that a Man and
‘ an Emperor can poſſibly deſire. He adds, that the Chriſtians have greater Obligations upon them for the Performance of this, than other Men. Firſt, becauſe the Holy Scripture enjoyns them to it; and Secondly becauſe being perſuaded that the World ſhould end together with the Roman Empire, they deſired to retard thoſe Calamities which were to happen at the end of all Things, by praying for the Preſervation of the Empire. That it is true, that the Chriſtians do not ſwear by the Genii of the Cæſars, nor by their Health, which is more precious than thoſe Genii who are only Dæmons, and that they do not ſolemnize the Feſtivals of the Emperors, but that this is only for fear of falling into Idolatry. That in other things they are more obedient, and better Subjects than other Men, though they have the Power in their hands, if they had a mind to defend themſelves. ‘ We have been (ſays
‘ he) but a little time in the World, yet we are to be met
‘ with in all places; you may find us in the Cities, in the ‘ Villages, in the Armies, in the Courts of Juſtice, in ‘ the Senate, and in the Markets. We have left you your ‘ Temples alone to your ſelves. What Wars might not
‘ we be capable of undertaking? And with what Reſo‘ lution might not we carry them on, though we had not ‘ near ſo many Troops as you; we, who die daily with ‘ ſo much Joy, were it not a Law amongſt us to ſuffer
‘ our ſelves rather to be killed, than to kill others. Si
‘ non apud iſtam Diſciplinam magis liceret occidi quam oc-
‘ cidere. But how could the Heathens object, That the Difference of Religion could cauſe any diſturbance in the Commonwealth, or make Parties and Factions? He ſays, that the Chriſtians have no Ambition, nor Pretentions in this World, as they are Chriſtians, are ſo far from forming any Parties againſt the Government, that they think upon nothing leſs than State-Affairs. And that he might perſuade the whole World of this Truth, ſee the Deſcription which he makes of the Chriſtians of his time, and of their Aſſemblies. ‘ We make up (ſays he) a Bo‘ dy that is united by the Bond of the ſame Religion, the ‘ ſame Diſcipline, and the ſame Hope. We aſſemble our ‘ ſelves, and compoſe, if I may ſo ſay, a Body of an Ar-
‘ my, to force Heaven by our Prayers, and this Violence
‘ is very acceptable to God. We pray not only for our ‘ ſelves, but alſo for the Emperors; for their Miniſters,
‘ for the Magiſtrates, for the good of the State; for the ‘ Peace and Quietneſs of the Empire; and laſtly, for the ‘ retarding the end of the World. Beſides, we aſſemble
‘ our ſelves to read the Holy Scriptures according to our ‘ different Wants and Neceſſities, for our Inſtruction, and ‘ Information in our Duty. Theſe Sacred Oracles are ‘ of ſignal Uſe for the preſerving our Faith, the confirm‘ ing our Hope, and the regulating our Manners, by the ‘ Meditation upon its Precepts. And ’tis in theſe Aſſem-‘ blies that the neceſſary Exhortations and Reproofs are ‘ to be expected. The Judgments which are there deli‘ vered, are given with all the Equity and Circumſpecti-
‘ on imaginable; becauſe thoſe who paſs Judgment are ‘ verily perſuaded, that Almighty God takes notice of ‘ them. Their Cenſures are all Divine, and ’tis a great ‘ Preſumption of God’s future Judgment againſt any One,
‘ when he has committed any Sin, for which he deſerves
‘ to be ſeparated from the Communion of Bread, and
‘ from Prayer, and the Aſſembly of the Faithful; and ‘ in a Word, to be deprived of all manner of Commu‘ nion of holy Things. Thoſe who preſide amongſt us,
‘ are the moſt Ancient, and ſuch whoſe Probity is very ‘ well known; and this Honour is not to be purchaſed
‘ for Money, but it is beſtowed upon pure Virtue, for ‘ all thoſe Concerns which relate to God, are not to be ‘ valued at a Price. If we have any kind of Treaſure,
‘ it is not to be look’d upon as a Bleſſing that is any ways
‘ diſhonourable to our Religion, as if it was to be pur-
‘ chaſed upon any Account. Every one contributes ac‘ cording to his Ability what Alms he pleaſes, and when ‘ he pleaſes, which yet is commonly done Monthly.
‘ None are compelled; every one gives freely what he ‘ will. Theſe Contributions are the Contributions of Piety,
‘ for we do not employ them in making merry Meetings,
‘ or in other unneceſſary Expences: But to maintain and ‘ bury Orphans, and poor People, to relieve old Men
‘ and infirm Perſons, to aſſiſt the faithful who are exiled
‘ into the Iſlands, or condemned to work in the Mines,
‘ or confined in Priſon, for having embraced the Faith
‘ of Jeſus Chriſt. We all call our ſelves Brethren, not ‘ only becauſe we are all Brethren by the Right of Na‘ ture, but becauſe we all acknowledge One and the ‘ ſame God for our Father, becauſe we have all one and ‘ the ſame Spirit which ſanctifies us: And laſtly, becauſe
‘ all things are common amongſt us, but our Women.
‘ Our Feaſts are called Agapæ, that is to ſay, Entertain‘ ments of Love and Charity. They were not inſtituted
‘ for debauched Paraſites, but for the Entertainment of ‘ the Poor, being aſſured that God has a more eſpecial
‘ Regard for them. And if the Reaſon of the Inſtitution
‘ of theſe Feaſts is wholly Sacred, the Conſequences of ‘ them are equally ſo. There is nothing here to be ſeen,
‘ that is any ways contrary to Civility and Modeſty.
‘ They do not ſit down at Table, ’till they have refreſh-
‘ ed and nouriſhed the Soul by Prayer, they eat no more ‘ than what is neceſſary to ſuffice Nature, and they drink
‘ no more than what is fitting and convenient for chaſte
‘ and regular Perſons; they take care not to glut them-
‘ ſelves, ſo as to hinder their riſing in the Night to wor-
‘ ſhip God. They diſcourſe of ſuch things as are profi‘ table, becauſe they look upon themſelves, as in the Pre-‘ ſence of God, who is a Witneſs of every thing that we ‘ ſay. The Supper is concluded with Prayer, and they ‘ do not break up in a Tumult or Diſorder; but they ‘ retire regularly and with great Modeſty, as it is not hard
‘ for ſuch Perſons to do, who take greater care to nour‘ iſh their Souls, with that holy Diſcipline, in which they ‘ are inſtructed, than their Bodies with the Victuals which ‘ they eat. After having thus deſcribed the Aſſemblies of the Chriſtians, he ſhews, that thoſe Calamities and Miſfortunes which happen in the World, are unjuſtly attributed to them, as if they were the Cauſe of them. He maintains, that ’tis theſe are the Men who divert and prevent them, and that they are very far from being any ways the Occaſion of attracting them. He concludes, by proving that we admire thoſe Virtues in the Philoſophers, which are diſcernable in a much more excellent and higher Degree in the Chriſtians.

Tertullian.

The Two Books to the Nations are almoſt of the very ſame Subject with the Apology. And Tertullian repeats therein the greateſt part of the things which he had ſaid before in his Apology, but he puts them in another Order, explaining and enlarging upon them: So that the Difference between theſe two Books is this, that the firſt is written with Heat, and without much Study; and the ſecond is a methodical Treatiſe, and compoſed with great Conſideration. The Second Book to the Nations was written againſt the falſe Gods of the Heathens, wherein he gave an exact Account of the Deities of the ſeveral prophane Religions, and ſhewed how exceedingly fooliſh a thing it is to own them; but this Book is ſo imperfect, and there is ſo little Coherence in all that we have extant of it, that it cannot be of any great advantage to us.

In the Book of The Teſtimony of the Soul, he enlarges upon one Proof for Religion, which he had advanced before in his Apology, that the Soul does naturally, and even againſt its Will, acknowledge, that there is but one God, and that there is another Life after this. He proves it by thoſe Notions which Nature hath inſpired into us, and which are ſo deeply engraven in our Minds, that nothing is able to efface them: So that they often come from a Man, when he thinks of them the leaſt. As when one ſays without any Reflection, God grant it, what pleaſes God, God help me, good God, &c. Expreſſions that manifeſtly ſuppoſe, that the Soul is penetrated with the knowledge of a God, as the Fear which we naturally have of Death, the Deſire of leaving behind us a Name to Poſterity, and that Compaſſion which we have for the Dead do evidently ſuppoſe, that there is another Life after this. Now theſe Notions being natural to the Soul, and to be found in every Body, it muſt neceſſarily follow, that they come from God. And this is the Subject which Tertullian enlarges upon very ingeniouſly in this little Treatiſe.

The Book to Scapula, was compoſed to diſſuade the Governor of Africa from the Perſecution which he had raiſed againſt the Chriſtians. He begins, by repreſenting to him, that the Chriſtians rather wiſhed for Martyrdom, than than feared it; and that therefore it was not out of any Apprehenſion he had of them, that induced him to direct this Diſcourſe to him, but the earneſt Deſire which he had for the Salvation of the Heathens, becauſe the Religion of the Chriſtians obliges them to love their Enemies, and to endeavour to convert them from the Error wherein they are at preſent. He afterwards tells him, that the Chriſtians adore that God whom Mankind knows by Nature; he repreſents to him, that it ought to be left to the free Direction of Men to embrace that Religion, which ſeems to them to be moſt agreeable to Truth: That another Man's Religion does neither hurt nor good to any body: That it is not an Act of Religion to conſtrain Men to embrace a Religion, which they ought to chuſe voluntarily. Non eſt Religionis cogere Religionem, quæſponte ſuſcipi debet, non vi. He adds, that the Life of Chriſtians is unblameable; that they pay an entire Obedience to the Emperors; that they were never found engaged in a Party with the Rebels. 'They are (ſays he) Enemies to no 'Man, and leaſt of all to the Emperor, very well know-'ing, that it is their God who has eſtabliſhed him, they 'love, honour, and reſpect him, moſt heartily wiſhing 'his Preſervation, and that of the Empire, as long as the 'World ſhall continue; We therefore honour the Empe-'ror after that manner, which is lawful for us, and which 'only can be of advantage to him; that is to ſay, as a 'Man who is next under God, and who has received 'from God every thing that he has. We likewiſe offer 'Sacrifices for his Safety, but they are the Sacrifices of 'Prayer: For God does not ſtand in need of Incenſe, nor 'of the blood of Victims. After having thus vindicated the Chriſtians from the Crime of High-Treaſon, he diſſuades Scapula from the Perſecution againſt Chriſtians, by the Examples of thoſe who have been puniſhed for perſecuting of them, and likewiſe by the Examples of thoſe who have had ſo much moderation, as to permit them to enjoy their Liberty and Tranquility. And theſe are the Books written by Tertullian, in defence of the Chriſtian Religion againſt the Gentiles.

Tertullian.

This muſt be owned to have been a great piece of Ingenuity in a Doctor of the Sorbon when the Perſecution of the Hugonots was at the height in France.

There is but one Book of his againſt the Jews, wherein, firſt, he proves, that the Law of Moſes, and its Ceremonies, were eſtabliſhed but for a time, and that they were to ceaſe at the coming of Jeſus Chriſt. And ſecondly, that the Meſſiah expected by the Jews, and foretold by the Prophets is already come, and that this is Jeſus Chriſt. Which he evidently makes out from the Prophets, who foretold the Time of his Coming, and the Circumſtances of his Life and Death. He obſerves, that the Original of the Jews miſtake aroſe from their confounding his laſt Coming, wherein he will appear in great Power and Glory, with his firſt Coming, wherein he was ſeen in great Humility, and took upon him the mean Condition of other Men.

Although the Book of Præſcriptions againſt the Hereticks is not, in the Order of Time, the firſt that Tertullian has written againſt them, yet it is ſo, as to the Order of the Matters which it contains; becauſe it is deſigned againſt all Hereſies in general, whereas the others are only againſt ſome particular Hereſie. This Book is entituled, Of Præſcriptions, or rather, Of Præſcription againſt the Hereticks; becauſe herein he ſhews, that their Doctrine is not to be admitted by reaſon of its Novelty. Before he enters upon the Matter, he endeavours to obviate the Scandal of thoſe, who admire, how there could be any Hereſies in the World, how they could have been ſo great and ſo powerful, and how it comes to paſs, that ſo many conſiderable Perſons in the Church, have been ſeduced to embrace them, by ſhewing that Hereſies have been foretold, that they are neceſſary Evils for the Tryal of our Faith, and that we muſt not judge of Faith by Perſons, but of Perſons by their Faith; Ex perſonis probamus fidem, an ex fide perſonas? After having given this neceſſary Caution, he lays down the firſt Principle of Preſcription. 'We are not allowed, ſays he, to introduce any thing that is new in Religion, nor to chuſe 'by our ſelves, what another has invented. We have 'the Apoſtles of our Lord for Founders, who were not 'themſelves the Inventors, and Authors of what they 'have left us; but they have faithfully taught the World 'the Doctrine which they received from Jeſus Chriſt. 'Hereſies have riſen from Philoſophy and human Wiſdom, which is quite different from the Spirit of Chriſtianity. We are not allowed to entertain our Curioſity, 'nor to enquire after any thing that is beyond what we 'have been taught by Jeſus Chriſt and his Goſpel, Nobis curioſitate opus non eſt poſt Chriſtum Jeſum, nec inquiſitione poſt Evangelium. And when we have once believed, 'we are to give Credit to nothing any farther than as 'we have already believed. And here it is, that he anſwers the Objection of the Hereticks, who urged this Paſſage of Scripture, Seek, and you ſhall find: by telling us, that it is not permitted to ſeek when we have once found, that it would be a Labour to no purpoſe, to ſeek for Truth amongſt all the Hereſies; and laſtly, that if it be permitted to ſeek, it is after having admitted the Rule, that is to ſay, the principal Articles of Faith, which are contained in the Creed. But as the Hereticks did often alledge the Holy Scripture, in Defence of themſelves; he proves that the Church was not obliged to enter into a Diſcuſſion of thoſe Paſſages which they quoted; that this way of confuting them is very tedious, and difficult, becauſe they do not acknowledge all the Books of the Scriptures, or elſe they corrupt them, or put a falſe Interpretation upon them; which renders the Victory that is to be obtained over them uncertain and difficult. He ſays then, that it is to better purpoſe to underſtand perfectly, who it is, that is in Poſſeſſion of the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt; who thoſe Perſons are, to whom the Scriptures were committed in Truſt; and who are the firſt Authors who have given an Account of our Religion. He goes back even to Jeſus Chriſt, who is the Source and Original of this Religion, and to the Apoſtles who received it from him. He ſhews that it is impoſſible, that the Apoſtles ſhould preach any other Doctrine, than that of Jeſus Chriſt, and that all the Apoſtolical Churches ſhould embrace any other Faith, than that which the Apoſtles had delivered to them; from whence he concludes, that it muſt of Neceſſity follow, that that Doctrine, which is conformable to that, which is found to be the Faith of all the Churches, muſt be That which was taught by Jeſus Chriſt: and that on the contrary, That which is oppoſite thereto, muſt be a novel Doctrine. He farther confounds the Hereticks by the Novelty of their Opinions. It is evident (ſays he) that the moſt ancient Doctrine is that of Jeſus Chriſt, and by conſequence that alone is true, and that That on the contrary, which had not any Date 'till after his Aſcenſion, muſt be falſe and ſuppoſititious. Having laid down this infallible Rule, he proves the Doctrine of the Hereticks to be of a later Date than that of the Church, becauſe the Authors of the Hereſies were after the Eſtabliſhment of the Church, from which they have ſeparated themſelves. That the ſeveral Sects of the Hereticks cannot reckon their Original from the Time of the Apoſtles, nor ſhew a Succeſſion of Biſhops, from their Times, as the Apoſtolical Churches can, with whom they do not communicate. That though they could pretend to ſuch a Succeſſion, yet the Novelty of their Doctrine condemned by the Apoſtles, and the Apoſtolical Churches would convince them of being Cheats and Impoſtors, and that what they have added, taken away, or changed in the Books of the Holy Scripture, does farther diſcover, that they invented their Doctrine, after theſe Books were compoſed. That laſtly, their Diſcipline and Conduct, which is abſolutely human, and earthly, without Order, and without Rule, renders them every way contemptible. I have exactly ſet down the Reaſonings of Tertullian in this Work; becauſe, as he himſelf obſerves, they are not only proper to confute the Hereſies that were in his Time, but alſo to diſprove all thoſe that ſprang up afterwards, or that ſhould ariſe hereafter, even to the end of the Church.

Tertullian.

I ſhall not enlarge ſo much upon the Works which were written againſt thoſe Hereſies which are now extinct. The moſt conſiderable, is, that which he compoſed againſt Marcion, which is divided into Five Books. This Heretick maintained that there were two Principles, or two Gods; the one Good, and the other Evil; The one Perfect, and the other Imperfect; that this laſt is the God whom the Jews worſhip, who created the World, and delivered the Law to Moſes; whereas the firſt is the Father of Jeſus Chriſt, whom he ſent to deſtroy the Works of the Evil one; that is to ſay, the Law and the Prophets, which Marcion rejected. He affirmed likewiſe, that Jeſus Chriſt was not cloathed with true Fleſh. And by conſequence, that he did not ſuffer really, but only in appearance. Theſe are the Errors which Tertullian confutes in this Work. In the firſt Book, he ſhews that the unknown God of Marcion, is only a Fantaſtical and Imaginary Being. In the ſecond he proves that That God the Creator of the World, whom the Jews worſhipped, is the only true God, and the Author of all Good. After having demonſtrated this Truth by invincible Arguments, he reſolves thoſe Difficulties which are raiſed by the Marcionites againſt God's Conduct in the Old Teſtament. He explains for Example, Why he has permitted Sin? Why he ſuffers Sinners? Why he puniſhes Men ſo ſeverely? Why he ſeems ſometimes to alter his Conduct and Deſign, &c. In the third Book he ſhews, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, who is the Creator of the World, and the Author of the Law, that he has been foretold by the Prophets, and that he took upon him true Fleſh, by taking upon him our Nature. In the fourth Book he ſhews, Tertullian. that it is the ſame God, both in the Old and in the New Teſtament. He reconciles the pretended Contradictions alledged by Marcion, and ſhews that the whole Life of Jeſus Chriſt was foretold, and figured in the Old Teſtament. That Jeſus Chriſt has explained and confirmed the Prophets, and perfected the Precepts of the Law. In a word, he proves at the end of this Book, that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of God, the Creator of the World, by the Doctrine of the Prophets, by his own Doctrine, by his Inclinations, by his Virtues, by his Opinions; and laſtly, by his Reſurrection. In the laſt Book, he ſhews from the Epiſtles of St. Paul, that it is the ſame God, that is preached both in the Old, and in the New Teſtament, and that Jeſus Chriſt is the Son of the Creator of the World. There are in this Book two difficult Paſſages concerning the Euchariſt, which have given Subject to very great Diſputes; of which I ſhall not ſpeak in this Place, contenting my ſelf to refer the Reader to thoſe, who have diſcourſed of them at large, that ſo I may paſs on to the other Works of Tertullian.

After having maintained the Unity of God againſt Marcion, he defends the Trinity of Perſons againſt Praxeas. This Heretick came from Aſia, to diffuſe the Poiſon of his Error in Rome; he was naturally of a very unquiet and uneaſie Temper, and beſides was vainly puft up with the falſe Opinion of being a Martyr, which Quality he took upon him, becauſe he was for a ſhort time impriſoned for the Faith. Being come to Rome, under the Pontificate of Victor, he prevented this Pope from acknowledging the New Prophecies of Montanus, beſides he made him, if we believe Tertullian, revoke the Communicatory Letters which he had granted to the Montaniſts. He begun to divulge his Hereſie in the City of Rome, and afterwards went into Africa, where he made ſome Proſelytes; but he was convinced by a Catholick (which without doubt muſt be Tertullian) and obliged to put down in Writing a Recantation of his Error. So after he had concealed his Doctrine for ſome time, he publiſhed it anew, and Tertullian, who had confuted him before, whilſt he was yet a Catholick, wrote againſt him, after he fell into the Error of the Montaniſts. He eſtabliſhes in this Book, the Diſtinction of the WORD, and the Trinity of Perſons againſt the Hereſie of Praxeas, who acknowledged but one Perſon in God, making no Diſtinction between the Father and the Son, and by conſequence maintained, that the Father made himſelf Man, and ſuffered for Us. Tertullian oppoſes to him the Rule of Faith, which obliges us to acknowledge only one God in three Perſons, which are all three of the ſame Subſtance, and have all one and the ſame Power, and that it was the Perſon of the Son who was incarnate, and died for Us. He ſhews that this Trinity of Perſons, does no ways prejudice the Unity of the Godhead, as the Unity of the Godhead does no ways hinder the Trinity of Perſons. That the Son is of the Subſtance of the Father, and that the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from the Father by the Son. That the WORD which was from all Eternity in God, and who did, as it were, come out of him to create and govern the World, as a Perſon ſubſiſting, who nevertheleſs has not a different Subſtance from that of the Father, ſo that it does not follow from hence, that we believe two Gods, and two Lords; that is the Son, and not the Father, who made himſelf Man, without ceaſing to be God, and that the Properties of human Nature, are only to be found in Jeſus Chriſt. In a Word, he explains very handſomly in this Treatiſe, the Faith of the Church, concerning the Myſteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation. It muſt be owned, that in ſome Places he expreſſes himſelf after a manner, not very agreeable to that which has been uſed in the following Ages (ii). But we muſt pardon theſe kind of Expreſſions in the Ancients, who wrote before thoſe Terms, which they made uſe of, were fixt and limited to a certain Senſe.

But it is a difficult Matter to excuſe him, where he Tertullian. ſeems to aſſert, as well in this Book, as in other Places of his Works, that God had a Body, or rather that he was Corporeal. Yet there are ſome Authors that vindicate him from this Error, and this has occaſioned a Queſtion, which is ſo common, and if I may ſay it, ſo trivial, that I do not think it neceſſary to ſay any thing of it in this Place.

Hermogenes was another African Heretick, who maintained that matter was Eternal, And that God did not create it when he made the World, but that he only made uſe thereof, to form things as we ſee. He ſuckt this Error from the Philoſophy of the Stoicks, and defended it by Syllogiſms, connected according to their Methods of Reaſoning, which made Tertullian ſay in the Treatiſe which he compoſed againſt him, that the Philoſophers were the Patriarchs of the Hereticks. He there diſcovers the Fallacies of the Sophiſms of this Heretick, and ſhews that our Religion teaches us, that God created even that Matter, whereof he made the World.

The Book againſt the Valentinians, is rather a Satyr and Raillery, than a ſerious Confutation of the Extravagant Sentiments of theſe Hereticks. Valentinus, the firſt Author of this Sect, ſeparated from the Church out of ſpight, becauſe hoping to be Elected a Biſhop, by reaſon of his Wit and Eloquence, he was put by to prefer another Perſon, who had ſuffered for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt in times of Perſecution. After he had ſeparated from the Church, he invented, or rather revived an old Opinion, according to the Principles of which, he feigned a Succeſſion, and imaginary Generation of a kind of Deities. His Diſciples refined upon this Notion, and formed quite different Syſtems. But all theſe Fancies were impertinent and ridiculous, ſo they took great care to conceal them, leſt if they ſhould diſcover them, all the World ſhould be preſently ſenſible of their Extravagancy: 'Tis this which Tertullian upbraids them with. 'If you 'teach the Truth, ſays he to them, why don't you diſco-'ver it? It perſuades by teaching, and it teaches by per-'ſuading; it is not aſhamed of ſhewing it ſelf; on the 'contrary, 'tis aſhamed of nothing, but of being conceal-'ed. You reproach us for our Simplicity; it is true, we 'love it, becauſe it is by this means, that we know, and 'make known the will of God. But 'tis no wonder that the Hereticks ſhould blame this Simplicity, and ſhould ſo carefully conceal their Principles; for they were ſo extravagant, that the bare Diſcovering of them would be ſufficient to render them ridiculous: 'Tis this which Tertullian does in this Work. 'I undertake, ſays he in this 'Book to diſcover to the Eyes of all Men, the hidden 'Myſtery; but though I profeſs to relate the Opinions of 'theſe Hereticks, without making a particular Confuta-'tion, yet I hope I ſhall be pardoned, if I cannot for-'bear cenſuring them in ſome Places. What I do is 'nothing but a Sport before a real Combat, I ſhall ra-'ther ſhew them where I could ſtrike them, than lay 'them on. But if there be found ſome Paſſages that may 'excite Laughter, 'tis becauſe the very Subject cauſes 'it. There are many things which deſerve to be jeered 'and ridiculed at this rate, leſt if we ſhould confute 'them ſeriouſly, we ſhould ſeem to lay too great Streſs 'upon them. Nothing is more due to Vanity than 'Laughter, and to Laugh, does properly belong to the 'Truth, becauſe it is pleaſant, and to ſport with its Ene-'mies, becauſe it is certain of the Victory.

And theſe are all the Books which are particularly againſt the Hereticks; there are others, in which Tertullian likewiſe confutes ſome Errors, and defends ſome Catholick Truths, though they were not written againſt any Hereticks in Particular. Such are the following Books.

The Book of the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, wherein he proves againſt the Hereticks Marcion, Apelles, and Valen- tinus,

(ii) He expreſſes himſelf after ſuch a manner as is not very agreeable to that which has been made uſe of in the following Ages.] He ſays firſt, that the WORD was begotten of the Father, when God created the World; but he acknowledges at the ſame time, that he was in God, and a Perſon diſtinct from the Father from all Eternity. And ſo the whole Ambiguity lies in the Term of Generation, which he does not underſtand of the Eternal Proceſſion of the Son, but of a certain Prolation or Emiſſion without, which he ſuppoſes was done at the Inſtant of the Creation of the World, becauſe it is by the WORD that God Created it, and doth ſtill govern it. And this appears evidently in Tertullian's Book, and we ought not to wonder, if in his Book againſt Hermogenes, he ſays, that there was a certain time, when the Father was not the Father, and when he began to be the Son, becauſe he believed that he had not the Quality and Name of Son, 'till this World was Created, though he was in God before, and diſtinguiſhed from the Father from all Eternity. Secondly, he ſays, that the Father is inviſible, and the Son viſible; but in that ſenſe which we have explained, that is to ſay, that the Son who has always render'd himſelf viſible to Men by taking ſeveral Forms, under which he has appeared to them; and laſtly by making himſelf Man. Thirdly, He ſeems in ſome Places to inſinuate, that even the WORD, as it is the WORD, is inferior to the Father; but this muſt be underſtood of an Inferiority, which the Divines call of Original, that is to ſay, (as he explains it himſelf) becauſe he has received all from the Father, for he ſays expreſly in ſeveral Places, that the Father and the Son are of one, and the ſame Subſtance. Fourthly, He ſometimes makes uſe of the Word Subſtance, to ſignifie the Perſon Subſiſting, which is an uſual thing amongſt the Ancients before the Council of Nice, and even amongſt ſome of them after it.

tinus, That Jesus Christ took upon him true Flesh, like to ours, in the Womb of the Virgin. Tertullian.

The Title alone of the Book of the Resurrection of the Flesh, is enough to discover, that it was written against the Sadducees, and against the Hereticks who denied the Resurrection.

The Scorpiacus, so called, because it is a Remedy against the Poison of Hereticks, like Scorpions, defends the Necessity and Excellency of Martyrdom against the Gnosticks.

The Book of the Soul, written against the Opinions of the Philosophers, and the Hereticks, treats at large of the Nature of the Soul, and its Qualities. But it is full of false Principles and Errors. He pretends that the Soul is Corporeal, and that it takes a certain Form of a Body, though it be invisible; he confutes the Opinion of Plato, concerning Reminiscency, or the Faculty of Remembring, and Pythagoras's Transmigration; he affirms, that the Soul does not come from Heaven, but that it is formed with the Body, and that as the Body of the Parents produces a Body, so their Soul produces a Soul. That all Souls, and even those of the Martyrs, which some have excepted, are disposed of after Death, in a certain Subterraneous Place, where they receive Refreshment, and Torment, according to the Good or Evil which they have done: And that they expect the Resurrection, and the Day of Judgment, which will render them entirely happy, or entirely Miserable to all Eternity. There are likewise in this Treatise, some other particular Opinions; as for Instance, that the Soul and Breath are the same thing; that that which is unreasonable in the Soul, comes from the Devil; that every Soul has its Dæmon; that all Dreams are not vain.

The Book of Baptism is divided into two Parts; the First relating to Doctrine, and the Second to Discipline. In the First he defends the Necessity and Efficacy of the Sacrament of Baptism against the Hereticks called Caiannites; he proves that the Waters of Baptism do procure to us Forgiveness of our Sins, and of the Punishment which they deserve. 'What can there be, says he, more miracu-
'lous, than to see that by washing the Body by an ex'ternal Baptism, we efface at the same time, the Mortal
'Stain of the Soul, and when that Stain is once taken 'away, the Punishment is likewise remitted to us? He afterwards discourses of the Imposition of Hands, and of the Unction which followed after Baptism, to make the Holy Ghost descend upon the Faithful, and to draw down upon them the Blessings of Heaven. 'We do not 'receive, says he, the Fulness of the Holy Ghost by Wa'ter; but it prepares us for receiving it by washing us
'from our Sins. And as St. John prepared the Way of 'the Lord, so the Angel which is present in Baptism,
'prepares the Way for the Holy Ghost, by the Absolu-
'tion of our Sins, which we obtain by Faith, which is 'confirmed and sealed by the Invocation of the Father,
'Son, and Holy Ghost. When we come out of the 'Font we are anointed; and this Unction, which is per'formed on our flesh, is profitable to our Soul, as ex'ternal Baptism has a spiritual Effect, which is to deli'ver us from our Sins. Afterwards, there is the Laying 'on of Hands, to draw upon us the Holy Ghost, and
'this most Holy Spirit descends voluntarily from Hea-
'ven, into purified and blessed Bodies. In the Second Part, he discourses of several Questions concerning Baptism, which relate to Discipline. The first is concerning the Baptism of St. John, whether it were from Heaven, or from Earth? He says, that it was from Heaven, because it was ordained by Heaven: However, that it did not bestow any thing that was Heavenly, but that it made way for Heavenly things, by bringing us to Repentance; and that it neither conferred the Holy Ghost, nor Remission of Sins. The second, is concerning the Necessity of Baptism, upon which he starts a considerable Objection, taken from what there might seem that the Apostles, of whose Salvation no doubt can be made, were never baptized. To this he answers, that possibly they might have been baptized, though we find no mention of it; and in the second place, that that Familiarity which they had with Jesus Christ, the Greatness of their Faith, and the Ardency of their Charity, might supply in them the Defect of Baptism, since Jesus Christ has promised the Remission of Sins, and Salvation to those Persons who had Faith, though they were not baptized. That nevertheless, there is no doubt to be made, but that at present, Baptism is necessary to Salvation, and that tho' formerly a Man might be saved only by Faith in one God, yet that now we must believe in Jesus Christ, and that it was necessary, that this Faith should be sealed by Baptism, that Jesus Christ had made a Law for it, and prescribed the Manner, saying, Go and teach all Nations, Baptizing them in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. And that this Sentence of the Gospel: If a Man be not born again of Water, and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, does invincibly establish the Necessity of Baptism. Tertullian.

The third Question is, Whether one may baptize more than once? He says expressly, that there is but one Baptism, that it never ought to be reiterated. He excepts however the Baptism of Hereticks; Who, says he, are not able to give it, because they have it not. And therefore it is, that we have a Rule among us to Re-baptize them. He adds, that Martyrdom is a kind of second Baptism, which is instead of the Baptism of Water, when any Person has not received it, and which repairs it, when that Grace is lost, which it conferred.

The fourth Question, is concerning the Minister of Baptism: He says, the Bishop has Power of Administring it, and after him the Priests and Deacons; nevertheless, with his Permission, to set a higher Value on the Priesthood. That in Case of Necessity, any Man may administer it, and that we should be Guilty of the Loss of a Soul, if we did not afford it that Grace, whereby it may be saved; there are none but Women, to whom he seems absolutely to prohibit the Administring of Baptism, in any Circumstance whatsoever.

This is also ingenuously taken notice of, because the Church of Rome allows Women to Baptize in case of Necessity.

The fifth Reflection, is concerning the Condition of those who are to receive Baptism. He says, that it is not to be Administred rashly, and that it is good sometimes to put some Stop to it, that those who receive it may be the better disposed. He would chiefly have this Discipline observed in respect to Infants, and though he supposes that they are capable of receiving Baptism, yet he will not allow them to be baptized without Necessity. 'What Necessity is there (says he) to expose God-fa'thers to the Hazard of answering for those whom they 'hold at the Fonts; since they may be prevented by 'Death, from being able to perform those Promises which 'they have made for the Children, or else may be disap'pointed by their evil Inclinations. Jesus Christ says,
'indeed, Hinder not little Children from coming to me;
'but that they should come to him as soon as they
'are advanced in Years, as soon as they have learnt their 'Religion, when they may be taught whither they are go'ing, when they are become Christians, when they be'gin to be able to know Jesus Christ. What is there
'that should compel this innocent Age to receive Bap'tism? And since they are not yet allowed the Disposal 'of Temporal Goods, is it reasonable that they should 'be entrusted with the Concerns of Heaven? For the same 'Reason (he farther says) it is proper to make those who 'are not married wait for some time, by reason of the 'Temptations which they have to undergo till they are 'married, or have attained to the Gift of Continency.
'Lastly, (he says) Those who shall duly consider the great 'Weight and Moment of this divine Sacrament, will
'rather be afraid of making too much haste to receive it,
'than to defer it for some time, that so they may be the
'better capable of receiving it more worthily.

The sixth, is concerning the proper time for Administring of Baptism. He says, that it may be done at any time; but that the solemn Days for performing it, are the Times of Easter and Pentecost.

Lastly, he says, That those who are desirous to dip themselves Holily in this Water, must prepare themselves for it by Fastings, by Watchings, by Prayers, and by sincere Repentance.

And this is what the second Part contains, wherein there are but two Errors, the first whereof concerning the Baptism of Hereticks, is common to him, with several others; and the second, which relates to the Baptism of Infants, is particular to him alone, and we shall not find any of the Ancients speaking after the same manner.

The Book of Penance is the First of those which relate meerly to the Discipline of the Church; therein he distinguishes two sorts of Penance; the first is that which is performed before Baptism; and the second is that of those, who being so unhappy, as to fall into Enormous Sins after Baptism, do recover themselves by a laborious Penance. In the First Part, he shews the Necessity there is of proving and preparing Ones self, for a long time, for the Reception of this Grace of Baptism, by a true Repentance. He fears not to say, that Baptism is to no purpose, if we have not repented of our Sins, and amended them, and that it is great Presumption to imagine, that having led a disorderly Course of Life till the very Day of Baptism, we should be made Holy all of a sudden, and that we should cease from Sinning immediately after we have received this Sacrament. 'Can it 'be believed, says he, that the Reformation is made just
'at the time when we are absolved? No certainly, it is Tertullian.

'made at the time when the Pardon is yet in ſuſpence, 'and that we are afraid ſtill of the Puniſhment, though 'we had not as yet deſerved to be delivered from our 'Sins, that we might be in a Capacity of deſerving it. 'When God ſtill threatens us, and not when he has par-'doned us.-----I confeſs that God grants Remiſſion of 'Sins, to thoſe who receive Baptiſm, but they muſt take 'Pains to be made worthy of it; for who would be ſo 'bold, as to confer this Sacrament on a Perſon, of 'whoſe Repentance he has any reaſon to make a Doubt. 'You may impoſe upon the Miniſter, and ſo procure 'Baptiſm, by falſe Pretences; but God, who knows the 'Hearts, keeps his own Treaſures himſelf, and does not 'grant his Grace, but only to thoſe that are worthy of 'it; ſo that none can imagine that he may ſin more free-'ly, becauſe being yet but a Catechumen, he ſhall receive 'the Remiſſion of his Sins in Baptiſm; for this Sacra-'ment is the Seal of Faith, and Repentance is the Be-'ginning and Stamp of Faith. Laſtly, We are not waſht 'from our Pollutions by Baptiſm, only that we might 'ſin no more, but becauſe we have our Heart already 'purified: Quia jam corde loti ſumus. The Second Part of this Treatiſe, is of Penance after Baptiſm, called Exomologeſis. He declares at firſt, that he finds it difficult to diſcourſe of this Second Repentance, which is the laſt Hope that remains to thoſe who have committed any Crimes, that is to ſay, Enormous Sins after Baptiſm: 'Leſt, ſays he, by treating of this new Means of reco-'vering our ſelves from Sin, which God offers to us; 'it might ſeem as if we would open a Way for Sinning 'afreſh. However, he ſays, that God foreſeeing Man's 'Infirmities, and the Devil's Temptations, was willing, 'that though the Gate of Remiſſion was ſhut, and the 'Grace of Baptiſm refuſed for ever to thoſe who had 'forfeited their Baptiſmal Innocence; they ſhould yet 'have one Remedy left, which is a Second Repentance, 'but that it is granted to them but once. He afterwards deſcribes the laborious Exerciſes of this publick Penance, called Exomologeſis. 'Tis, ſays he, an Exerciſe 'inſtituted to humble and abaſe the Sinner. It makes 'him lead a Life that is proper to prevail with God for 'Mercy; it makes him lie in Sack-cloth, and upon 'Aſhes, entirely to neglect his own Body; it overwhelms 'his Mind with Grief and Sorrow; it reduces him 'to drink nothing but Water, and to eat nothing but 'Bread, and to take no more than what is neceſſary for 'his Suſtenance; it obliges him to prolong his Prayers, 'and to feed them, if I may ſo ſay, by Faſtings: It cauſes 'him to break out into Sighs, Groans and Tears, to cry 'Day and Night to the Lord, to caſt himſelf at the 'Prieſt's Feet, and to proſtrate himſelf before God's Fa-'vourites. Laſtly, To conjure all his Brethren to pray to God for him, and to appeaſe his Wrath by their Prayers. After having thus deſcribed the Fatigues of this Exomologeſis, he ſhews the Neceſſity of it, and reproves thoſe who were aſhamed to embrace it, when they had committed Sins after Baptiſm.

His Book of Prayer, is a Diſcourſe partly Moral, partly Eccleſiaſtical; for in the Firſt Part, he explains the Lord's Prayer; and in the Second, he diſcourſes of ſome particular Ceremonies, uſed in the Prayers of the Chriſtians. Firſt, he adviſes the Chriſtians to be reconciled to their Brethren, to free their Minds from all ſort of Trouble and Paſſion, to purifie their Hearts from all Sin, before they betake themſelves to Prayer; Secondly, He ſays that the Chriſtians do not uſe to waſh their Hands before Prayer, but that in Praying, they commonly lift them up towards Heaven. Thirdly, That it is not neceſſary to take off our Cloaks when we Pray, nor to ſit always after Prayer. Fourthly, That we ought to pray with a modeſt Countenance, lifting our Hands towards Heaven. Fifthly, That our Voices muſt be low, that we muſt not ſpeak louder than is neceſſary, to be heard. For, ſays he, it is not the Sound of our Words that God gives ear unto; but he regards the Intention of our Heart. Sixthly, That when we faſt in private, and for the ſake of Devotion, we muſt not abſtain from the Kiſs of Peace, as when it is a ſolemn Faſt againſt the time of Eaſter. Seventhly, That the Stationary Days, that is to ſay, thoſe Days when ſeveral of the Faithful continued in Prayer and Faſting till Three a Clock in the Afternoon; we muſt not abſtain from aſſiſting at the ordinary Prayers, as if it was neceſſary to break our Faſt, as ſoon as we have received the Body of Jeſus Chriſt. 'Your Station, ſays 'he, will be more ſolemn. Receive the Lord's Body, and 'keep it, and ſo you ſhall be Partakers of the Sacrifice, 'and you will perform your Devotion the better.

In his Book concerning Idolatry, he ſhews, that the Crime of Idolatry is not only committed by Sacrificing to Idols, but alſo ſeveral other ways, of which he gives us a very pretty Account. He pretends, that all thoſe Workmen who make Pictures, repreſenting the Falſe Gods; that the Aſtrologers, who have given to the Planets the Names of the Heathen Gods, and who attribute to them any Power and Efficacy; Profeſſors of Rhetorick, who commend the Gods of the Heathens; the Merchants, that furniſh Commodities for the Adorning the Temples, and offering Sacrifices to the Gods, are all guilty of Idolatry. He maintains, that it is not lawful for the Chriſtians to Feaſt on thoſe Days which the Pagans Solemnize in Honour of their Gods, nor to adorn their Houſes with Torches and Laurels, in Honour of their Princes and Magiſtrates; that they may be allowed to go to the Weddings of their Kinſfolks, though Sacrifices be offered there; but that this is only to ſatisfie that Duty to which we were obliged, upon the Account of our Relation. That it is likewiſe lawful for Servants to follow their Maſters to the Sacrifices, and for Chriſtians to render to Heathen Emperors that which is their Due. But that they ought not to accept of Offices, nor bear Arms, at leaſt, that they cannot do it without countenancing ot Idolatry. Laſtly, He does not acquit thoſe of Idolatry, who attribute the Name of God to the pretended Deities of the Heathens, or who ſwear by their Name, whether it be through Cuſtom or otherwiſe. And all this is grounded upon this moſt certain Principle, That all thoſe who any ways favour the Wicked in their Vice, or contribute to Wickedneſs in any manner whatſoever, are themſelves guilty; but Tertullian ſeems to ſtretch it a little too far in ſome Particulars, and to lay too great a Streſs upon the Rigour of Things which might be excuſed: As for Example, To bear Arms for the Defence of the Empire, to Adorn their Houſes with Torches and Laurels, in Honour of their Princes, and to make uſe of ſome ways of Speaking that are Cuſtomary, though they may have ſome Affinity to Idolatry.

Tertullian.

And to the ſame purpoſe, defending in his Book De Coronâ Militis, the Action of a Soldier, who had refuſed to put a Crown upon his Head; he maintains that it is abſolutely prohibited to the Chriſtians to Crown themſelves, and even to bear Arms. He ſpeaks in this Diſcourſe very advantageouſly of Cuſtom and Tradition, and relates ſeveral remarkable Examples of Ceremonies, which he pretends to be derived from Tradition. 'To 'begin, ſays he, with Baptiſm, when we are ready to 'enter into the Water, and even before we make our 'Proteſtations before the Biſhop, and in the Church, 'That we renounce the Devil, all his Pomps and Mi-'niſters; afterwards we are plunged in the Water three 'times, and they make us anſwer to ſome Things which 'are not preciſely ſet down in the Goſpel; after that they 'make us taſte Milk and Honey, and we bath our ſelves 'every day, during that whole Week. We receive the 'Sacrament of the Euchariſt, inſtituted by Jeſus Chriſt, 'when we Eat, and in the Morning-Aſſemblies, and we 'do not Receive it, but from the Hands of thoſe that 'preſide there. We offer Yearly Oblations for the Dead, 'in Honour of the Martyrs. We believe, that it is not 'lawful to Faſt on a Sunday, and to pray to God 'kneeling. From Eaſter to Whitſontide we enioy the 'ſame Priviledge. We take great Care not to ſuffer any 'Part of the Wine and Conſecrated Bread to fall to the 'Ground. We often Sign our ſelves with the Sign of 'the Croſs; if you demand a Law for theſe Practiſes, 'taken from the Scripture, we cannot find one there; 'but we muſt anſwer, That 'tis Tradition that has eſta-'bliſhed them, Cuſtom that has authorized them, and 'Faith that has made them to be obſerved.

The Book concerning Flight in time of Perſecution, is a further Mark of the Extream Rigour of Tertullian, for there he maintains, That it is abſolutely Prohibited to Fly in time of Perſecution, or to give Money not to be Perſecuted.

The Book De Pallio, is a ſmall Treatiſe, wherein he endeavours to prove, that he had reaſon to quit the Toga, or the long Roman Gown, and to wear a Cloak; he ſhews therein a great deal of Wit and Learning, and it ſeems as if he Compoſed it, rather to ſhew what he was capable of ſaying upon ſo trivial a Subject as this is, than ſeriouſly to defend the Action.

In his Book concerning Publick Sights and Spectacles, he diſſuades the Chriſtians from thoſe Sights and Spectacles, ſhewing how theſe Pleaſures are both ſhameful and dangerous to thoſe who have Renounced the Pomps and Pleaſures of the World, and Idolatry.

There is no need of giving the Reaſons why he wrote thoſe Books concerning the Ornaments and Dreſſes of Women, ſince the Titles themſelves do ſufficiently ſhew againſt what Abuſe they were written: So likewiſe the Title of the Book, that Virgins ought to be Veiled, does diſcover the Subject; but we are not to underſtand it only of Virgins Conſecrated to God; for Tertullian's

Deſign

Tertullian. Design is to prove, that young Women ſhould be Veiled, that is to ſay, that they ſhould have their Face covered in the Church: Which he undertakes to prove, contrary to the Cuſtom of his Country, where only married Women were veiled. And upon this Account he ſpeaks againſt this Cuſtom, and maintains, that it cannot preſcribe againſt Truth; which is true, when it relates to Doctrine, but not when it concerns only a Matter of Diſcipline, which is but of little Conſequence.

In the Firſt Book written to his Wife, he Exhorts her not to Marry again; and in the Second, he Adviſes her, that in caſe ſhe will Marry again, to take a Chriſtian for her Husband.

The Treatiſe of Patience is an excellent Exhortation to the Practice of this Virtue: In which Diſcourſe, Tertullian ſets forth with a great deal of Eloquence, all the Motives and Arguments, which might induce Chriſtians to Patience, and diſſuade them from Impatience.

The Diſcourſe directed to the Confeſſors, whom he calls Martyrs, according to the ancient way of ſpeaking, is likewiſe a very powerful Exhortation to thoſe who were in Priſon upon the Account of the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, to encourage them to bear with Patience their Chains and Torments, and to perſevere with Conſtancy to the End; nothing can be more Pathetical and Moving than this little Diſcourſe.

I have now nothing more to do, but to ſpeak of thoſe Books which Tertullian Compoſed againſt the Church, in Defence of the Montaniſts, and they are Four: His Book of Modeſty, of Monogamy, an Exhortation to Chaſtity, and a Treatiſe of Faſts. In his Book of Modeſty, he endeavours to prove againſt the Church, that it has no Power to Remit the Sins of Fornicators and Adulterers, and that when Men are once fallen into theſe Crimes after Baptiſm, they cannot be any more admitted into the Communion of the Church, how Penitent ſoever they may be. In his Book of Monogamy, and the Exhortation to Chaſtity, he abſolutely condemns ſecond Marriages, as being Adultery. Laſtly, In his Diſcourſe of Faſts, he commends the Exceſſive Faſts of the Montaniſts, who made ſeveral Lents, obſerving the Stationary Faſts, as if they had been expreſly enjoyned, making them to continue till Night, and not eating upon thoſe Days any thing but Bread and Fruits, nor drinking any thing but Water. In all theſe Books, excepting his Book of Exhortation to Chaſtity, he formally attacks the Church, and the Catholicks, whom he calls Pſychici, and ſpeaks every where very advantageouſly of Montanus and his Propheteſſes, believing that the Holy Ghoſt had inſpired them to ſet up and eſtabliſh a more perfect Diſcipline. For as to what relates to the Rule of Faith, that is to ſay, to the principal Doctrines of Religion, Tertullian and the firſt Montaniſts were of the ſame Opinion with the Church: And therefore it is, that in this Book againſt Praxeas, he ſays, that he always believed in One only God, in three Perſons, and that he ſtill believes it more firmly, ſince he has been inſtructed by the Paraclete or Comforter: And in his Book which he wrote, to prove that Virgins ought to be Veil'd, he ſays, that excepting the Rule of Faith, which is immoveable, and can no ways be changed, Manners and Cuſtoms that relate to Matter of Diſcipline may be reformed and altered. That it is this which the Paraclete has done by the Miniſtry of Montanus, who has inſtructed Men in a much more perfect Diſcipline than that which the Apoſtles had taught them, that Juſtice was with him in the Cradle while he was an Infant: That the Law and the Prophets were as it were the Infancy, that the Goſpel was as it were the Youth, but that there was no compleat Perfection to be found, but in the Inſtructions of the Holy Ghoſt, who ſpake by Montanus; for Tertullian and the firſt Montaniſts do not believe that Montanus was the Holy Ghoſt, but only that the Holy Ghoſt had inſpired him, and ſent him to Reform and Perfect the Diſcipline of the Church; and they did not attribute this Priviledge only to Montanus, but alſo to ſeveral of his Diſciples, and principally to Women; and they would have it believed, that there were among them ſeveral Perſons who had Revelations, and propheſied Things to come. Theſe Perſons were ſometimes ſtrangely agitated, ſometimes they fell into an Extaſie. This Sect gave a reſpectful Attention to all that they ſaid, either while they were thus agitated, or after they came to themſelves, as it was believed that theſe were ſo many Revelations, of which it was not lawful to make any doubt; they allowed them to ſpeak in their Aſſemblies when they would, and they believed that they had more Power and Authority than Prieſts and Biſhops. And this was the Reaſon that there was but very little Order and Rule obſerved in their Aſſemblies. But as to other things, they practiſed a very ſevere and auſtere Diſcipline; they for ever condemned not only thoſe, who after their Baptiſm had committed Murder or Idolatry, but alſo thoſe who had fallen into Fornication and Adultery, to lye under a perpetual Excommunication; They impoſed new Faſts, and obſerved them very ſtrictly, eating nothing but Bread and Fruits. They Condemned ſecond Marriages; and they believed that it was not lawful to flee in Times of Perſecution. As ſoon as ever this Sect appeared in the World, it deluded a great many Chriſtians by that outward Shew of Perfection and Sanctity which it carried along with it. For on the one hand, the Auſterity of their Lives added Weight and Credit to their Revelations; and on the other hand, their Revelations cauſed their Diſcipline to be embraced. Several good Men were immediately brought into the Snare, and in a ſhort time we find the Churches of Phrygia, and afterwards other Churches divided upon the Account of theſe new Prophecies. Even the Biſhop of Rome himſelf was impoſed upon by them, and granted them Communicatory Letters, which he preſently Revoked, being ſenſible of his Error. The Chriſtians of the Church of France were more circumſpect as to this Matter, and wrote to Pope Victor and the Churches of Aſia concerning theſe new Prophecies, giving ſuch a Judgment of them as was very diſcreet and agreeable to the Faith; as Euſebius tells us: But we do not certainly know what it was that they wrote, though it is very likely that they diſapproved of theſe new Revelations, wiſhing nevertheleſs, that they would treat with Gentleneſs and Moderation, thoſe who had ſuffered themſelves to be ſurprized by Error, that ſo they might be induced to return into the Boſom of the Church. At length the Biſhops of Aſia having met together ſeveral times, to examine theſe new Prophecies, conſidering of what Conſequence it was to put a Stop to their farther Progreſs, Condemned them, and Excommunicated as well thoſe who were the Authors of them, as thoſe that followed them. And this is all that I thought neceſſary to ſay concerning the Sect of the Montaniſts, and the Condition in which it was in Tertullian's time. We will now return to our Author, and ſpeak of his Genius, his Style, and the Judgment that ought to be paſſed upon his Writings. Tertullian.

He was of a very quick, ſprightly, and ſharp Temper, but he had not all that Exactneſs and Clearneſs that might have been wiſhed. There is very often more Glittering than Solidity in his Reaſonings: He rather ſtrikes and dazles by his bold Expreſſions, than convinces by the Force of his Arguments. His Thoughts are far fetch'd, and ſometimes lofty enough; the Turn which he gives them is high, but not very natural. He oftentimes ſtretches things too far. He is warm, and tranſported almoſt upon every thing. He is full of Figures and Hyperboles. He was very well furniſhed with Knowledge and Learning, which he ſufficiently knew how to make uſe of to good purpoſe. His Excellency conſiſted in Satyr, his Jeſts are very ingenious and biting. He attack'd his Adverſaries very cunningly, and overthrew them by a multitude of Reaſons; which are interwoven, and, as it were, linked one within another. Laſtly, If he does not perſuade by his Reaſonings, he at leaſt forces Conſent by that pompous way of Expreſſion whereby he ſets them out. His Style is Conciſe, his Expreſſions Emphatical, and there are in his Writings almoſt as many Sentences as Words. Yet Lactantius had reaſon to take notice of three conſiderable Defects in him. 'Tertullian, 'ſays he, was very well vers'd in the fine Learning, but 'his Style is neither fluent, nor polite, but very obſcure. In loquendo parum facilis, parum comtus, & multum obſcurus. Theſe three Faults in Stile are common to him, with the greateſt part of the African Writers (kk), but we may ſay, that they are in a very high Degree in Tertullian, and that there is not any Writer, whoſe Style is more harſh, leſs polite, and more obſcure than his. All his Works are ſubject to theſe Defects, ſome more, and ſome leſs. He is more clear and conciſe in his Polemical Diſcourſes, more obſcure and harder in his common Places; as in the Book De Pallio, which is one of the obſcureſt Pieces of Antiquity. His Book of Penance is the moſt Polite of all. The moſt excellent, and the uſefulleſt of his Works, are his Apology, the Præſcriptions, his Books of Penance, of Baptiſm, of Prayer, and his Exhortation to Patience, and to Martyrdom.

After what we have ſaid already, it is an eaſie matter to judge the true Character of Tertullian; But it is not ſo eaſie to determine, whether he be more to be commended, or Blamed: For firſt of all, if we were to make a Judgment, in relation to the Service which he did the Church, it would be difficult to ſay, whether he has done

(kk) Theſe three Faults in Style are indeed to be found in the greateſt part of the African Writers.] We muſt except Minutius, St. Cyprian and Lactantius, they had quite worn off that way of Writing, though St. Cyprian ſtill retains ſome reliſh of it.

Tertullian.

more Hurt or Good. For on the one hand, he vigorouſly defended its Doctrine againſt ſeveral Hereticks, he maintained in ſome of his Works very conſiderable Points relating to Diſcipline; and laſtly, he all along Eſtabliſhed an excellent Morality: But on the other hand, beſides that he always had ſeveral Errors, he formally oppoſed the Diſcipline of the Church after he ſeparated from it. And if we judge in the ſecond Place by the Temper of the Man, there is ſo much of Good and Ill in it, that we cannot tell which of the two ought to carry it. Laſtly, If we make a Judgment of him by his Style, we cannot tell whether he is to be Commended for what he has that is Great and Surprizing, or to be Blamed, becauſe of its other Defects and Imperfections. And thus Learned Men have always been, and are ſtill extreamly divided (ll) in the Judgments which they have given, and which they ſtill give of this Author; which makes me believe, that it is better to commend the Good, and to blame what is amiſs, than to pretend to make an abſolute Judgment, which would be always ſubject to a thouſand Diſputes.

In the laſt place, to ſpeak briefly of the Editions of Tertullian, there has hardly been any Author, oftner Printed, and upon whom more Perſons have beſtowed their Pains. For which, two Reaſons may be given, the Corruption of the Manuſcripts, and his Obſcurity, and theſe two Reaſons are likewiſe the cauſe one of the other; for his Obſcurity induced the Tranſcribers, who did not underſtand him, to alter ſome Words, that they might make ſuch a Senſe as they themſelves underſtood: And the Corruptions of theſe Tranſcribers have been ſo far from clearing his Meaning, that they have rendered it ſtill more Obſcure; Which has been the occaſion that this Author has given ſo much Trouble to all thoſe that have hitherto ſet out any Editions of any part of his Works.

Rhenanus was the firſt who publiſhed Tertullian's Works, which were firſt Printed at Baſil in the year 1521. from two Manuſcripts which he had got out of two Abbeys in Germany; and the ſecond time in the year 1528. I have a great Eſteem for the Arguments and Notes, which this excellent Perſon, who was very well vers'd in all Parts of Learning, and in Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity, has put at the beginning of the greateſt part of Tertullian's Works: And I think that no Man has laboured more ſucceſsfully than he in the Explication of this Author; and that Rigaltius has very well obſerved, that Rhenanus wanted nothing to have made his Work compleat, but more Manuſcripts. Yet his Notes have been Cenſured by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and they have been put at Rome in the Index Expurgatorius, becauſe of ſome Remarks which were a little too free upon the Abuſes that were common in his time: But this ought not to diminiſh the Eſteem we ought to have for him. We likewiſe find Editions of Tertullian, printed at Baſil in the years 1525, 1536, 1539. But they are plainly Copies of the firſt Edition, wherein nothing is altered but the year. The third Edition of Rhenanus is the beſt, it was Printed at Baſil in Folio in the year 1550. In this Edition, there are ſome Books corrected by Gelenius out of a Manuſcript from England. The fourth was likewiſe Printed at Baſil in 1562. The fifth is of Paris, Printed by Guillard in 1545. The ſixth was Printed upon a very curious Letter in the year 1566, at Paris in two Volumes in Octavo, for Volchelus, and Audoenus Parvus. Laurentius de la Barre ſet forth a new Edition of Tertullian, Printed at Paris in 1580. Then Pamelius Publiſhed Tertullian with new Commentaries: His firſt Edition was in the year 1579, Printed at Antwerp. It was followed afterwards by that of 1583, Printed at Paris for Sonnius; and it was afterwards Printed at Antwerp by Plantin

Tertullian.

(ll) And thus Learned Men have always been, and are ſtill extreamly divided.] We ſhall here ſet down ſome Judgments made by the Ancients and Moderns concerning Tertullian: St. Cyprian, by the Relation of St. Jerome, who was told it by a Prieſt that had heard it from a Secretary of St. Cyprian's, uſed every day to read ſomething of his Works; and when he called for his Book, he ſaid, Give me my Maſter. And in truth St. Cyprian has imitated him, and has borrowed a great many things from him. He has likewiſe compoſed the greateſt part of his Works with the ſame deſign as Tertullian; as his Book of Idolatry, in imitation of Tertullian's Apology. His Books De Diſciplina & habitu mulièbri, de zelo & livore, de Oratione Dominica, de opere & eleemoſynis, were written in imitation of thoſe of Tertullian upon the ſame Subject. Euſebius ſays of Tertullian, that he was one of the ableſt of the Latin Writers, and that he has obtained a great Reputation in all the Churches.

Lactantius paſſes the Judgment which we have already related, which is not very advantageous to him. St. Hilary ſays in his Commentary upon St. Matthew, that the Error into which he fell, has taken away the Authority of his Books, which deſerved Approbation. Conſequens error hominis detraxit ſcriptis probabilibus Authoritatem.

St. Jerome ſpeaks ſometimes very advantageouſly of him, as in his Catalogue, where he calls him a Man of a quick and ſharp Wit; and in his Epiſtle to Magnus, he ſays that there was not any Author, who had more Learning and Subtilty; but in other places he reprehends his Errors and Defects. In his Apology againſt Ruffinus, he ſays, I commend his Wit, but condemn his Hereſies: and in his Book againſt Helvidius, who oppoſed to him Tertullian's Authority, he makes this Anſwer, What I have to ſay to you concerning Tertullian, is, that he is not of the Church. Eccleſia hominem non eſſe.

St. Auſtin commends Tertullian's Style, and always condemns his Error; in his Book De Geneſi ad Literam, he ſays, that Tertullian having an excellent Apprehenſion, did ſometimes diſcover the Truth, and that he could not forbear ſometimes to eſtabliſh it even againſt his own Opinions.

Vincentius Lirinenſis gives a Character of Tertullian in theſe Words; Tertullian, ſays he, was among the Latins what Origen was among the Greeks, that is to ſay, the firſt and the moſt conſiderable Man they had. In a word, Is there any Author more knowing and better verſed, both in Eccleſiaſtical and Prophane Learning? Has he not comprized in his vaſt and prodigious Memory, all the Philoſophy of the Sages, the Maxims of the diffèrent Sects, with their Hiſtories, and what elſe appertained to them? Did he ever undertake to attack any thing, which he has not almoſt always, either pierced by the Vivacity of his Wit, or overthrown by the Force and Weight of his Reaſonings? and who can ſufficiently extol the Beauties of his Diſcourſe, which is ſo well guarded, and linked together by a continual Chain of Arguments, that he even forces the Conſent of thoſe whom he cannot perſuade; His Words are as ſo many Sentences. His Anſwers are almoſt ſo many Victories, as has been ſufficiently experienced by the Marcions, the Apelles's, the Praxeas's, the Hermogenes's, the Jews, the Gentiles, the Gnoſticks, and a great many others, whoſe Blaſphemies he has ſilenced by great numbers of Books that have been as ſo many Thunderbolts which have reduced them to Aſhes. And yet though he has had all theſe Advantages, he did not continue in the Ancient and Univerſal Faith of the Church, and he has proved himſelf leſs faithful than Eloquent. At laſt he altered his Judgment, and his Error, as has been obſerved by that bleſſed Confeſſor St. Hilary, has taken away that Authority from his Writings, which otherwiſe they would have deſerved.

I ſhall take no notice of the Judgment of Trithemius, Rhenanus, Politian, Pamelius, Rigaltius, and ſome other Moderns, which every body may conſult upon occaſion, and I ſhall conclude with the Judgments given by two of our French Authors, who have both given us Characters of Tertullian, but in a different way.

The firſt is the famous M. Balſac, in a Letter written to Rigaltius, which is the Second of the Fifth Book. 'I expect '(ſays he) the Tertullian which you are publiſhing, that he 'may learn me that Patience, for which he gives ſuch admi'rable Inſtructions; He is an Author to whom your Preface 'would have reconciled me, if I had had an Averſion for 'him, and if the Harſhneſs of his Expreſſions, and the Vices 'of his Age had diſſuaded me from reading him; but I have 'had an Eſteem for him for a long time, and as hard and 'crabbed as he is, yet he is not at all unpleaſant to me. I 'have found in his Writings, that Black Light which is men'tioned in one of the ancient Poets, and I look upon his 'Obſcurity with the ſame Pleaſure, as that of Ebony which 'is very bright, and neatly wrought. This has always been 'my Opinion; for as the Beauties of Africa are not leſs 'amiable, though they are not like ours, and as Sophoniſba 'has eclipſed ſeveral Italian Ladies, ſo the Wits of that Coun'try are not leſs pleaſing with this foreign ſort of Eloquence, 'and I ſhall prefer him before a great many affected Imita'tors of Cicero; And though we ſhould grant to the niceſt 'Criticks, that his Style is of Iron, yet they muſt likewiſe 'own to us, that out of this Iron he has forged moſt excel'lent Weapons; and that he has defended the Honour and 'Innocence of Chriſtianity; that he has quite routed the Va'lentinians, and ſtruck Marcion to the very Heart.

The ſecond Character of Tertullian, is that which Father Mallebranche gives us in his Recherche de Search after Truth, in his Second Book, Chap. 3. la Verité. 'Tertullian (ſays he) was without doubt a Man 'of Extraordinary Learning, but he had more Memory than 'Judgment. He excelled more in his Fancy and Imaginati'on, than in Judgment and true extent of Thought. There 'is no doubt to be made, but that at laſt he was an Enthu'ſiaſt, in that ſenſe which I have explained it, and that he 'had almoſt all the Qualities which I have attributed to theſe 'Fanaticks. That Reſpect which he had for the Viſions 'of Montanus, and for his Propheteſſes, is an unqueſtionable 'Proof of the Weakneſs of his Judgment. That Fire, thoſe 'Heats, thoſe Enthuſiaſms upon little Subjects, do evidently 'diſcover the Extravagancy of his Fancy: How many Irre'gular Tranſports are there in his Hyperboles and Figures? 'How many Pompous and Magnificent Reaſons, which prove 'only by their glittering, and which perſuade only by 'ſtunning and dazling of the Underſtanding! He after'wards endeavours to ſhew that this is a true Picture, by making ſome Excerptions out of his Book De Pallio, which he thinks to be the moſt proper Book to juſtifie what he affirms.

Tertullian. in 1584; at Heydelberg for Commelin in 1596, and 1599; at Cologne 1617; at Geneva in 1597, 1601, 1607; at Zurich by Belley in 1657; at Paris in 1608, in 1616, in 1634, in 1658, in 1664; and at Roan in 1662. The Commentaries of this Author are both Learned and Useful, but he digresses too much from his Subject, and he often brings in things, which are of no use for the understanding of his Author. Tertullian's Works have been likewise Printed according to Pamelius's Edition with Junius's Notes, at Franeker in 1597. In the year 1627, Rigaltius Printed nine Treatises of Tertullian at Paris in Octavo, more Correct, from a Manuscript presented by Agobardus, who lived in the Ninth Century, to the Church of Lions, whereof he was Bishop, and he collated it with the various Readings of a Manuscript of Monsieur Montchal. In 1584, Latinus Latinius published his Conjectures to restore some Places of Tertullian, which he pretended were corrupted. Pancirollus also had taken pains upon Tertullian, but he published nothing. Fulvius Ursinus, Collected several various Readings from Manuscripts, and put them in the Margin of one of Pamelius's Editions of Tertullian which Rigaltius used. Johannes Woërus has likewise made some Notes upon Tertullian, as well as Albaspinæus, who wrote several upon some Passages relating to Discipline and Penance. Pithœus, Mercerus, Junius, Salmasius, Richerius, Theodorus Marsilius, and some others, have made Remarks upon his Book De Pallio, Printed separately at Paris in 1576, and 1594, with Junius's Notes; In 1600, with those of Salmasius; In 1625, Jocobus Gothofredus published from the Manuscript of Agobardus the two Books to the Nations, which were never Printed before. They were Printed at Geneva for Chouet, together with the Commentaries of that Learned Lawyer.

La Cerda the Jesuit undertook to make a Continued Commentary upon Tertullian's Works, more ample than those which had been hitherto made: He began this Work, and caused two Volumes of it to be Printed at Paris in 1624, in 1630, and 1641; but he never finished it, and his Commentaries are only upon part of Tertullian's Books; and besides they are long and tedious, because he explains several things which need no Explication, and he very often leaves his Subject.

After all these, the Learned Rigaltius having Revised Tertullian's Works from the Manuscript of Agobardus, and making use of the various Readings Collected by Ursinus, Pithœus, and Junius, published the Text of Tertullian more Correct in very many places, and added some short Notes, to examine which of the two Readings is the truest, to reject or confirm some Conjectures, and to explain the most Difficult and Uncommon Words; And he has annexed at the end longer Observations, to explain the difficult Passages, or to clear some ancient Practises; or lastly, to discover some Point of Learning which was more difficult to be cleared. 'Where, if, 'says he, you find any Opinions that are a little too free, 'as about the Confession of Secret Sins, about the Face 'of Jesus, (which he believes was not at all Comely, 'grounding it upon the Testimony of Tertullian, and 'some others of the Ancients) and upon the Wax-Tapers 'which are lighted up in the Churches in the Day-time, 'you must not think that I have taken notice of them 'any otherwise, than as they were necessary to explain 'Tertullian's Notions, and not any ways to reprehend 'the Doctrine of the Catholick Church, or to disapprove 'of the opinions of those Fathers, who lived after his 'time. Words by which Rigaltius endeavours to excuse Tertullian. those Opinions, which were too freely inserted sometimes by him in his Notes, as well upon St. Cyprian as Tertullian; But I do not know whether this Excuse will satisfie every Body, for it must be confessed, that there are some places, wherein he sufficiently shews, that he speaks according to his own Opinion, rather than according to that of his Author, and in which he even digresses from his Subject, to make Observations which are sometimes not very agreeable to the present Practice of the Church: But though we might have some reason to tax some of his Notes as to what relates to Divinity; yet we must confess on the other side, that the Notes and Remarks which he has made relating to Criticism, Grammar, and the Explication of some difficult Passages of Tertullian, are very excellent. However he is generally blamed for being too bold in his Conjectures, and that he has not been exact enough in Revising his Author from ancient Manuscripts; And lastly, that he has inserted his Conjectures, and other Mens into the Text, without the Authority of any Manuscripts.

The Bookseller, who Printed the Tertullian of Rigaltius in 1634, being willing to make the Work as Compleat as he could, Printed in 1635, in a Volume by it self, the Notes and Commentaries of those who had taken Pains upon Tertullian before him, that so we might have all that had been done upon this Author, excepting the Commentaries of La Cerda. This Volume joyned to the Edition of Rigaltius's Tertullian of 1634, which was afterwards Reprinted in 1641, is the perfectest Edition of this Author.

It has been since Printed in 1664, which is not so large, but more Commodious, wherein they have put in the Margin the entire Notes and Observations of Rigaltius, together with others selected from those of Rhenanus, Pamelius, Albaspinæus, La Cerda, and Salmasius, &c. together with the Corrections of Mercerus. Priorius, who had the Care of this Edition, has put at the beginning a Preface, which he calls, A Discourse concerning the Life and Errors of Tertullian, that is not exactly done, any more than this Authors Notes; which have not found a General Esteem among the Learned.

I do not speak of the Edition of Tertullian published by Father George, which he caused to be Printed at Paris in 1648, and 1650, in three great Volumes, which he has Entituled Tertullianus Redivivus, because there is nothing in this Edition worth taking notice of; and those long and tedious Commentaries which this Capuchin has made, can be of no advantage to the Ignorant, nor of any use to the Learned.

It would be a desirable thing to have a new Edition of Tertullian Printed, the Text whereof should be exactly agreeable to the best Manuscripts, without inserting the Conjectures of particular Persons. And they ought likewise to add a Choice Collection of those Notes which are the most useful, taken from all the Commentators; And lastly, they should not range the Books according to the Order of Time, but according to the Order of the Matters, as we have done in giving an Abridgment of the Books, and to prefix at the beginning, The Life of Tertullian, and a Criticism upon his Writings; like that which we have done here in French, but larger, and more exact.

CAIUS.

Caius. CAIUS a Priest of the Church of Rome (a), lived in the time of the Popes Zephirin and Victor, that is to say under the Emperors Severus and Antoninus. He wrote a Treatise by way of Dialogue (b) against a famous Montanist called Proclus or Proculus (c), wherein he reprehended, and accused this Heretick for giving credit too rashly to those new Prophecies, and at the same time confuted his Reasons. Eusebius speaks of this Treatise in three Places: The first is in Chap. 25. of the Second Book of his History, where he quotes a Fragment of it relating to the Sepulchers of St. Peter and St. Paul, which were to be seen at Rome in this Authors time. The second is in Chap. 28. of the third Book, where he speaks of the Heretick Cerinthus in these Terms. 'Cerinthus tells us in 'some Revelations which he had written (as if he had 'been a great Apostle) prodigious Things, which, as he 'said, he had learn'd from the Angels, assuring us, That 'after the Resurrection, Christ should have an Earthly 'Kingdom, and that Men should live in Jerusalem, 'where they should enjoy Carnal and Sensual Pleasures, 'and spend a Thousand years in continual Marriages and 'Jollity. The third place wherein Eusebius speaks of Caius is in his Sixth Book, Chap. 20. where he says, that Caius. his Third Book, relates the Words of Proclus taken from this Dialogue.

(a) A Priest of the Church of Rome.] Eusebius and St. Jerome tell us plainly, that he was a Priest, and that he lived in Zephirin's time; but they do not say that he was a Roman. His Treatise was Composed in Greek; Photius is the First, who affirms expressly, that he was a Priest of the Church of Rome; and he adds, that he was ordained Bishop of the Gentiles.

(b) By way of Dialogue.] Eusebius calls it, Διάλογον κατὰ Ἑλλήνων, that is to say, a Book of Dialogues; and Caius and Proclus, seem to have been the Persons who speak therein, for Eusebius in

(c) Proclus or Proculus.] The Sect of the Montanists was divided into two Parties, the one were καθ' ἑαυτὸν, and the others κατ' Ἀσκηνὸν, as it is observed in that small Abridgment of Heresies, at the end of Tertullian's Præscriptions. It is thought that this Proclus was the same with Proculus the African, who was likewise a Montanist, and of whom Tertullian speaks; but this is not likely; for he, against whom Caius writes was a Greek, and was called Proclus, and not Proculus.

Caius. Caius, condemning the Boldneſs by which the Enemies of the Church do counterfeit ſome Books of Scripture, reckons but 13 Epiſtles of St. Paul, not counting that which was written to the Hebrews among the number of this Apoſtle's Writings. Laſtly the ſame Euſebius in his Third Book, Chap. 21. recites ſome Words relating to the Daughters of Philip the Deacon, taken from this Author's Dialogue.

Euſebius and St. Jerome make no mention of the other Works of Caius, but the Learned Photius tells us, That he had likewiſe compoſed a Treatiſe againſt the Hereſie of Artemon, who believed that Jeſus Chriſt was only a meer Man, and that he was the Author of a Book Entituled, The little Labyrinth (d), from whence Euſebius has taken the Paſſage concerning the Penance of Natalis. Photius likewiſe attributes to him a Treatiſe Of the Univerſe, or Of the Nature of the Univerſe, or of the Cauſes thereof, which went in his time under the Name of Joſephus; Let us ſee what he ſays of it. 'This Work con'tains two little Books, wherein he ſhews that Plato
'contradicts himſelf; he convinces the Philoſopher Al-
'cinous (e) of ſeveral Falſities and Abſurdities concern'ing Matter and the Reſurrection; he oppoſes his own
'Opinions to thoſe of this Philoſopher, and ſhews that
'the Jews are a much more ancient People than the 'Greeks; he believes that Man was compounded of Fire,
'Earth, and Water, and of a Spirit which is called the 'Soul, of which he ſpeaks in theſe Terms: God has
'form'd this Spirit together with the Body, and taking
'the principal part from thence, he has cauſed it to pene-
'trate and fill up all its Members; ſo that extending it-
'ſelf throughout the whole Body, he has taken the form
'from thence; but it is of a colder Nature than Matter,
'of which the Body is compounded. This Opinion
'which ſuppoſes that the Soul is Corporeal, (if neverthe-
'leſs he acknowledges no other Soul in a Man than this 'Spirit) this Opinion, I ſay, is quite different from the 'Doctrine of the Hebrews, and does not agree with the 'greatneſs of his other Notions. To conclude, as the 'ſame Photius adds, (from whom we have only tranſ-
'lated his words) he ſpeaks of Jeſus after a very Ortho'dox Manner. For he calls him Chriſt, and ſpeaks of his ineffable Generation from the Father, after ſuch a manner as is no ways to be reprehended; which gives us occaſion to doubt whether this be the Work of Joſe- phus or not; though the Style very much reſembles that of this Hiſtorian. He adds alſo afterwards, that he has found and obſerved that this Book was written by Caius Author of the Labyrinth; but that not bearing the Name of its Author, ſome have attributed it to Juſtin Martyr, others to Irenæus; though in reality it was compoſed by Caius. The proof which he brings for it, is, That the Author of the Labyrinth, whom he believes to be Caius, ſays, towards the end, that he was the Author of the Book concerning the Nature of the Univerſe; but this Argument is not abſolutely convincing. For it is not certain, that Caius was the Author of the Book of the Labyrinth, which ſome have attributed to Origen, and 'tis likely enough that there might be two ſeveral Books of Different Authors, which might have very near the ſame Title.

(d) The little Labyrinth.] We have obſerved, that Euſebius does not Name the Author of this Fragment, but that Theodoret aſcribes it to the Author of the Labyrinth, and on the other hand, Photius informs us, that Caius was the Author of that Book, and proves it, becauſe the Author of the Labyrinth ſays, That he wrote a Treatiſe concerning the Univerſe, whence it would follow, that it was Caius who was the Author of this Fragment; but I ſhould rather believe it to be taken out of the Book, which he Compoſed againſt Artemon. Euſebius ſays, that the Book from whence he produces this Fragment, was written againſt his Hereſie, and the Paſſages which he brings from thence do clearly ſhew it.

(e) The Philoſopher Alcinous.] He wrote a Treatiſe, wherein he makes a Compariſon between Ariſtotle and Plato.

HIPPOLITUS.

Hippolitus. HIPPOLITUS, who was according to the Relation of ſome, Biſhop of Oſtia in Italy (a), and according to others Metropolitan of Arabia, ſuffer'd Martyrdom (b), under the Reign of the Emperor Alexander. He made himſelf conſiderable by the Commentaries which he compoſed upon the Holy Scripture (c). Euſebius and St. Jerome aſſure us, that he had written upon the Six Days Work, upon Geneſis, Exodus, the Canticles, the Pſalms, the Prophet Zachary, the Prophet Iſaiah, upon ſome places of Ezechiel, upon Daniel, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſticus, and the Apocalypſe; and that he compoſed Two Treatiſes, the One concerning Saul, and the other concerning the Witch of Endor. Beſides theſe Works upon the Scripture, he likewiſe wrote a Treatiſe concerning Anti-Chriſt, a Diſcourſe concerning the Reſurrection, a Work againſt all the Hereſies, and one in particular againſt that of Marcion; a Diſcourſe concerning Eaſter, wherein he has given a kind of Chronicle, to the firſt Year of the Emperor Alexander; and a Paſchal Cycle for Sixteen years. He likewiſe made one or more Homilies in the Praiſe of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which he recited in the Preſence of Origen, who followed and imitated him in the Works, which he compoſed upon the Holy Scripture. There is a Catalogue of his Works upon the ſide of a Statue found near Rome, where his Paſchal Cycle was affixt; ſeveral Books are here omitted, mentioned by Euſebius and St. Jerome; but there are others (d), of which they have not ſpoken: The Catalogue is this. The Works of Hippolitus, upon the Penitential Pſalms, concerning the Witch of Endor, upon the Goſpel of St. John, and the Apocalypſe, concerning the Gifts of God. Apoſtolical Tradition, a Chronicle, a Book written to the Greeks, another upon Plato, or concerning the World, an Exhortation to Severina, a Demonſtration of the Time of Eaſter in a Table, Odes upon the whole Scripture, a Diſcourſe of God, of the Reſurrection of the Fleſh, of Good, and from whence Evil Proceeds. This Catalogue does not appear to me, to be ſo faithful and exact, as that of Euſebius and St. Jerome, who own beſides, as well as Honorius Auguſtodunenſis after them, that Hippolitus writ ſeveral other Treatiſes, whereof they had not any Knowledge. And we have now almoſt entirely loſt, even thoſe of which Euſebius and St. Jerome have given the Catalogue. Hippolitus.

There goes indeed under his Name, a ſmall Diſcourſe, Printed at Paris in Greek, with the Verſion of Picus Mirandula, in the Year 1557, and afterwards in 1660, and inſerted into the Bibliotheca Patrum, with this Title; Of the end of the World, Anti-Chriſt, and the Second Coming of Jeſus Chriſt. But it is very uncertain, whether this be the Treatiſe of Anti-Chriſt (e) attributed to Hippolitus, and mentioned by Euſebius. The Title being (a) Biſhop of Oſtia in Italy.] St. Jerome, in his Catalogue, ſays, that he does not know of what City he was Biſhop. Gelaſius, in his Book De duabus Naturis, citing Hippolitus, ſays, that he was Metropolitan of Arabia. Nicephorus makes him Biſhop of Pontus: It is more likely that he was a Biſhop of Arabia, than of Italy: For it is certain that he was of the Eaſt, and St. Jerome obſerves in one of his Homilies, that Origen was his Scholar; ſome have ſaid that he was the Diſciple of St. Clemens, and this is very probable.

[Monſieur le Moyne's Conjecture, that Hippolitus was Biſhop of Portus Romanus, now called Aden in Arabia is moſt probable; for it was an eaſy miſtake for thoſe who knew nothing of this Arabian Portus, to imagine, that he was called Portuenſis from the Portus Romanus, by Oſtia in Italy, eſpecially ſince there has been ſo current a Tradition of his ſuffering Martyrdom in Italy.

(b) Suffered Martyrdom.] St. Jerome, in the Preface to his Commentaries upon St. Matthew, calls him a Martyr, and in the Martyrologies, he is rankt in the Number of Martyrs. It is certain, that he ſuffered Martyrdom in Italy, and perhaps at Oſtia: His Acts are forged and counterfeit. It is affirmed herein, that he ſuffered Martyrdom under Claudius, it ſhould have been under Alexander; and Ulpianus, who is mentioned in theſe Acts, perhaps may be Ulpius, who was Governor of Rome in the time of this laſt Emperor.

(c) Which he compoſed upon the Holy Scripture.] St. Jerome ſays, that Origen being cited by his Friend Ambroſius, undertook to write Commentaries upon the Sacred Scripture, in imitation of Hippolitus.

(d) But there are others.] 'Tis very like that it is a Collection of Homilies, which was extant in Theodoret's time, who cites ſeveral of them, which perhaps might make a part of his Commentaries upon the Scripture.

(e) It is very uncertain whether this be the Treatiſe of Anti-Chriſt.] The Books of Hippolitus were Entituled Of the Reſurrection, and of Anti-Chriſt, according to the relation of Euſebius, and St. Jerome: This is Entituled, Of the End of the World, &c. This Stile is mean and Childiſh, whereas that of Hippolitus was grave and lofty. This Treatiſe begins with ἀπαρ γαρ. There are a great many trifling Conjectures concerning the Birth, and the Life of Anti-Chriſt; he believes that he is to be a Devil; he ſays that St. John is not Dead, which is contrary to ancient Tradition: He cites the Apocalypſe inſtead of Daniel; he holds that the Souls of Men have been from all Eternity, which agrees with Origen's Opinion: in a word, this Treatiſe is worth very little.

different

Hippolitus.

different from that related by Eusebius; the Style mean and Childish: And lastly, The Fables and Falshoods which it contains, give us sufficient Ground to doubt it. There is another Treatise of Christ and Anti-Christ, which bears the Name of Hippolitus, published in Greek by Gudius, which Father Combefis has caused to be Printed in Greek and Latin, in the last Volume of the Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum. Though this Treatise be more ancient than that which was published before under Hippolitus's Name, yet does it not appear to me worthy of this Author. Those that read the Commentary upon the History of Susanna, and the Greek Fragment upon Daniel, which are Printed in the same Place, will pass the same Judgment upon them.

The Demonstration against the Jews, Published in Latin by Turrianus, and inserted by Possevinus into his Apparatus, is a fragment of some Homily, or of some other Book of that Nature. It is not certain, whether it be written by Hippolitus. There was found at Basil, a Treatise upon the Apocalypse, attributed to Hippolitus; but it is doubted whether it be his, because of the meanness of the Style, and the little Learning there is in it, as Sixtus Senensis has observed. The Collections, or rather the Extracts taken by Anastasius the Library-Keeper, out of the Sermons of Hippolitus, upon some points of Divinity, and upon the Incarnation, against Bero and Helix, Hereticks of the Sect of the Valentinians, published by Turrianus and Canisius, and related in Greek by Anastasius, in his Collections set forth by Sirmondus, seem to be very ancient; but it is not certain whether they belong to Hippolitus. We must make the same Judgment of the Homily, Entituled, Of One Onely God in Three Persons, and of the Incarnation against the Heresie of Noetus, which is published by Vossius, with the Works of Gregorius Thaumaturgus; but though it was not really written by Hippolitus, yet it contains the Principles of the Ancients concerning the Trinity (f).

That little Work, Of the Lives of the Twelve Apostles, which Father Combefis caused to be Printed from a Manuscript in the King's Library, in his Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum, is not Hippolitus's, and contains several Fictions of the modern Greeks (g), relating to the Deaths of the Apostles. We must say the same of a Book written much upon the like Subject, concerning the Seventy two Disciples (h) of Jesus Christ, which was in the Library of Cardinal Sirletus, which Baronius mentions in his Notes upon the Martyrology upon the Ninth Day of April.

Photius had read Hippolitus's Book against the Hereticks, and gives us this account of it. 'I have read the little 'Book of Hippolitus, who was Disciple of St. Irenæus, 'against Two and thirty Heresies: He begins with the 'Dositheans, and he goes on as far as Noetus and the Noe'tians. He says that all these Heresies have been confu'ted by St. Irenæus, and that he has collected in this lit'tle Book, the Reasonings and Arguments of this Father. 'His Discourse is clear and serious, and he says nothing 'but what is to the Purpose, though he has not all the 'Beauties of the Attick Style. He affirms some things 'which are not true, and amongst others, that the Epistle 'to the Hebrews was not written by St. Paul. It is said, 'that he made several Homilies to the People, as well as 'Origen, who was his Friend, and that he wrote several 'other Books. The same Author, in another place, mentions the Commentary of Hippolitus, upon Daniel. 'He 'says that though he does not literally explain this Pro'phet, yet he does not let slip any part of his Sense, that 'is considerable, that he interprets things according to 'the manner of the Ancients, and not with that Exact'ness which has been since observed; but that he is not 'to be censured for that, because it is not reasonable to 'expect from those that lay the Foundation of any Sci'ence, That they should omit nothing that might be said 'upon it; but on the contrary, we ought to commend 'them, because they were the first Discoverers, for those 'Things which they first found out: That for the rest, 'Hippolitus was mistaken, in pretending to fix the Time 'of the end of the World, and of the coming of Anti'Christ, which Christ would not discover to his Disci'ples, even when they desired it of him very earnestly. 'He pretended, says he, to fix it five hundred years after 'the Death of Christ, as if the World was to last but 'Six thousand years; which is too nice a Subtilty. His 'way of Writing is clear and plain, and very proper for a 'Commentary, though he departs from the Rules, and 'the Purity of the Attick Dialect. We have likewise a 'Homily which he made concerning Jesus Christ and 'Anti-Christ, wherein, though he follows the same way 'of Writing, yet he is more Plain, and favours more 'of Antiquity. And these Passages of Photius, do not only discover the Subject of those Works of Hippolitus which he had read, but also the style and Character of this Author.

Hippolitus.

The Paschal Cycle for Sixteen years, composed by Hippolitus, whereof Anatolius, Eusebius, St. Jerome, and Victorius have made mention, was found round about a Marble Statue, that was dug out of the ground in the Year 1551, near Rome (i), and carried into the Vatican Library; and afterwards it was published by Gruter, by Scaliger, and by Bucherius; who caused it to be Printed, together with the Cycle of Victorius of Aquitain, in the Year 1633. Mabillon observes in his Voyage Into Italy, that he saw at Rome in Cardinal Chigy's Library, an Ancient Greek Manuscript containing the four great Prophets, wherein there is a Commentary of Hippolitus upon the Dream of Nabuchadonosor. Iter Italicum.

Lastly, Theodoret quotes and produces some considerable Fragments of Hippolitus (k), concerning the Incarnation of Jesus Christ, taken from several of his Homilies, and from his other Treatises upon the Holy Scriptures.

(f) The Principles of the Ancients concerning the Trinity.] These Principles are, that the WORD was from all Eternity in the Father, as being his Wisdom, his Power, and his Counsel; that when he designed to create the World, he did, if I may so say, put him without him; and this is that which they call Generation: That it is by him that he created the World; and that he governs it; that it is he who made himself visible to Men; who spake to the Patriarchs and the Prophets; who gave the Law, and who at last became Incarnate; that conformable to this Oeconomy, we acknowledge Three Persons in God, which nevertheless make but one only God; that the WORD before he took Flesh, had not perfectly the Quality of the WORD, and that we may say, that he was begotten of the Father; That we ought to believe that the WORD descending from Heaven into the Womb of the Virgin Mary, took therein a reasonable Soul, and every thing that belongs to human Nature, Sin only excepted, and all this in order to save Man, who fell by the Sin of Adam, and to render him Immortal, &c.

(g) Several Fictions of the Modern Greeks.] Such as these following, That St. Andrew was Crucified upon an Olive Tree: That the Relicks of St. John were not found in his Sepulchre, that St. Bartholomew was Crucified with his Head downward; that St. Thomas Preached among the Magi; that he was run thorough, in four Places with a Lance made of Deal in the City of Salamis; that Thaddeus preached the Gospel in Mesopotamia; Things which are taken from the Fictions of the Modern Greeks, as from Sophronius and others.

(h) Concerning the Seventy two Disciples.] This is manifestly the same with the false Dorotheus.

(i) Near Rome.] Near the Church of St. Laurence, in a Place where there was in all probability a Chappel to Hippolitus. The Statue is of Marble, representing Hippolitus sitting in a Chair, on the sides of which, there are two Cycles, for Eight Years each; on the Right side is that of the 14 Days of the Moons, and on the Left, that for the Sundays. On the side of this Cycle, there is a Catalogue of Hippolitus's Works, which we have already set down. This Cannon is the most ancient Paschal Cycle that we have.

(k) Lastly Theodoret relates some considerable Fragments of Hippolitus.] He cites some from an Oration upon these words of Isaiah, Dominus pascit me, &c. from his Sermon upon Hannah and Elkanah, from an Homily upon the beginning of Isaiah, from a Book concerning the Destribution of Talents; and Lastly, from a Letter to a Queen (which some believe to be Mammea, the Mother of Alexander, others, one called Severa) whose Name is mentioned in the Catalogue of this Authors Works which was on the side of his Statue; from an Oration upon Canticles, from an Interpretation of the Second Psalm, and from the three and twentieth Oration upon the two Thieves. See the Tradition related by Theodoret at the end of his Three Dialogues.

Hippolitus. [The Catalogue of Hippolitus's Works, taken from the Roman Marble, is ſo very uncorrect in Monſieur Du Pin, that I ſhall tranſlate it anew from the Greek Copy, with ſome few Notes upon it to explain it. Hippolitus.

COmmentaries upon the Pſalms.

Of Spiritual Gifts.
Apoſtolical Tradition.

Againſt the Greeks, and againſt Plato, or concerning the Univerſe.
An Exhortation to Severina. (b)
A Demonſtration of the Time of Eaſter, as it is in the Table.
Odes upon all the Scriptures. (c)
Of God and the Reſurrection of the Fleſh.
Of Good, and whence cometh Evil.

(a) Accounts of Time.] This Dr. Cave joyns with the next Line, and ſo makes but one Title thus, Chronicles to the Greeks: But as the Marble lies in Gruter, (from whom Dr. Cave tranſcribed it) Χρονικῶν makes one Line, and πρὸς Ἕλληνας another; now for the moſt part one Line makes a whole Title, were the Conjunction ὡς does not connect more together, eſpecially where a compleat Senſe can be made by ſuch a Diviſion: But here the ὡς πρὸς Πλάτωνα muſt be joyned with πρὸς Ἕλληνας, and a Diſcourſe upon a Philoſophical Subject, concerning the Univerſe againſt Plato, and other Greek Philoſophers, has no great Coherence with a Chronology.

(b) Severina.] This according to Monſieur le Moyne is faulty, and ſhould be read πρὸς Σεβῆρον Αὐ, to Severa Auguſta; and his Reaſon is, becauſe Theodoret ſpeaks of a Letter written by this Hippolitus to a certain Queen Πρὸς βασίλισσάν τινα. This reaſon is not ſufficient to me, for Inſcriptions upon Marbles, when drawn by skilful Men, are Copyed by the the Graver with more Care than ordinary books by Tranſcribers: and becauſe we cannot tell who this Severina was, therefore it does not follow either, that Hippolitus did not write ſuch a Letter to her, or that he might not write another to an Empreſs, which Theodoret might have ſeen and quoted.

(c) All the Scriptures.] This Du Pin has rightly tranſlated; Le Moyne tells us, that it ſhould be πάσας τὰς αἱρέσεις, upon all Hereſies. Hereſies ſeem to be as improper things to write Hymns upon, as one would wiſh. But the Hiſtorical Parts of Scripture will afford Matter enough for the loftieſt Genius to work upon. Dr. Cave does deſervedly throw aſide Le Moyne's Conjecture, though it ſeems ſtrange that he ſhould not diſcern that the received Reading was true.

Scaliger's Conjectures of the two firſt Lines, which are almoſt all eaten away, is too raſh; he takes the Letters ως and νας to be parts of the Words ὑμνους μετάτους, from whence he concludes, that Hippolitus wrote Commentaries upon the Seven Penitential Pſalms; but (as Dr. Cave obſerves) that Word applyed to thoſe Pſalms was unknown in that Age, and what to put in the room of it, is hard to aſſign, and ſo I left it out.

GEMINIANUS or GEMINUS.

Geminianus or Geminus. WE joyn Geminianus, or Geminus (a), a Prieſt of Antioch to Hippolitus the Martyr, becauſe they both flouriſhed under the Reign of Alexander, and becauſe he is ſpoken of in Euſebius's Chronicon in the ſame place, where Hippolitus is mentioned. We know nothing of the Works of this Author. Only St. Jerome aſſures us, that he left behind him ſome Pieces which were Monuments of his Parts. Geminianus or Geminus.

(a) Geminianus or Geminus.] He is called by Euſebius in his Chronicon, Geminianus; and by St. Jerome, in his Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, Geminus.

ALEXANDER.

Alexander. Alexander, a Biſhop in Cappadocia, being come to Jeruſalem, to viſit the Holy Places that are there, when Narciſſus, who governed that Church, was not capable himſelf alone, by reaſon of his great Age, to diſcharge all the Duties of the Epiſcopal Office, the Chriſtians of that City retained Alexander, and made him his Co-adjutor, by the Conſent of the Biſhops of the neighbouring Churches. It is ſaid that they had a Revelation, and heard a Voice, adviſing them to chuſe him Biſhop; and indeed there needed nothing leſs than a Miracle, to authorize an Election ſo extraordinary as this (a), and for which there had yet been no Preſident. He governed this Church joyntly with Narciſſus, as his Colleague. See what he ſays of it at the Concluſion of a Letter written to the Antinoites. ‘ Narciſſus, who held before me the Epiſcopal See, and ‘ who is now united (b) with me in Prayers, being an ‘ hundred and ſixteen years old, ſends you Greeting, and ‘ exhorts you to be all of one and the ſame Mind.

Alexander being in Priſon in the time of the Perſecution under Severus, wrote likewiſe a Letter to thoſe of Antioch, wherein he congratulates them upon the Ordination of Aſclepiades, who ſucceeded Serapion in that See: He ſent this Letter by Clemens, as it is believed of Alexandria (c). Beſides, he wrote a Letter to Origen, of which Euſebius recites a Fragment in the 14th Chapter of the 6th Book of his Hiſtory, where he ſays, that he was a Friend of Pantænus, and of Clement of Alexandria, and that theſe Men made him acquainted with Origen. And laſt of all, he ſent a Letter to Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, which he wrote along with Theoctiſtus, Biſhop of Cæſarea, in favour of Origen, wherein he proves by ſeveral Examples, that Biſhops may invite thoſe that are proper for inſtructing the People, to preach in their Preſence: he wrote beſides ſeveral other Letters, of which we have nothing remaining. He ſuffered Martyrdom at Cæſarea in the time of the Perſecution, under the Emperor Decius. Alexander.

(a) An Election ſo extraordinary as this.] There were two things in this Ordination which were New, and contrary to the Laws of the Church. The firſt was the Tranſlation of a Biſhop to another See: The ſecond, the making a Coadjutor to a Biſhop whilſt living.

(b) Who is now united.] It appears by this, that Alexander was not only Coadjutor, but that he alone had the Care of the Church, that Narciſſus did not concern himſelf with any thing, and that he had no more than barely the Honour.

(c) As it is believed of Alexandria.] St. Jerome believes that it was St. Clement of Alexandria, and this may very well be, For he lived till this time, and he was intimately acquainted with Alexander, to whom he dedicated a Book concerning the Eccleſiaſtical Rule. Euſebius, Lib. 6. Cap. 13.

JULIUS AFRICANUS.

Julius Africanus. Julius Africanus, who was of Paleſtine (a), though older than Origen (b), is believed to have been the Diſciple of Heraclas, becauſe being drawn by his Reputation, he came to Alexandria to confer with him (c). He was deputed by the Emperor Alexander (d), to cauſe the City of Emmaus to be repaired, which was afterwards called Nicopolis. He particularly applied himſelf to Chronology and Hiſtory, and compoſed an exact Julius Africanus.

(a) Who was of Paleſtine.] Some have confounded him with Sextus Africanus of Lybia; but this is an Error: For our Author was of Paleſtine, and lived there, whereas the other was only of Lybia.

(b) Older than Origen.] In the Letter which he wrote to Origen, he calls him his Son, and he continues his Chronicle no farther than to the time of Heliogabalus, which ſhews that he was older than Origen.

(c) To conſer with him.] Heraclas was undoubtedly Biſhop of Alexandria, when he came into this City. He ſays as much himſelf in his Chronicle, according to the Relation of Euſebius, lib. 6. cap. 3. and of Bede de Sex. æt. page 86. of Ado, and others.

(d) By the Emperor Alexander.] This Embaſſy was under Alexander the Son of Mammea, and not under Heliogabalus. That which made Euſebius miſtake, is becauſe Africanus's Chronicle went no farther than the time of Heliogabalus.

Chroni-

Julius Africanus.

Chronicle (e), divided into five Books, from the Beginning of the World, to the third year of the Reign of Heliogabalus (f), wherein he gave a brief Account of the most remarkable Accidents from the Beginning of the World, to the time of Jesus Christ, and related in few Words all that had happened since Christ's time, to that wherein he wrote. We have not this famous Work at present under Africanus's Name. But Eusebius has inserted it almost entire in his Chronicon, altering and adding some few things, and correcting some of his Mistakes. We have still some of his Fragments in two Works, published by Scaliger, of which one is Latin, and is called Chronological Extracts, taken out of Eusebius and Africanus; and the other is Greek, and Entituled, A Collection of Histories.

Besides this Chronicle, he wrote two Letters upon two important Questions relating to the Scripture: The first directed to Aristides, was written to reconcile that seeming Contradiction, which is found in the Account given of the Genealogy of Jesus Christ by St. Luke and St. Matthew. Eusebius gives us a considerable part of this Letter, in the fifth Chapter of the seventh Book of his History. And in order to reconcile this Difference, he has recourse to that Law of Adoption, that took place among the Jews, and which obliged the Brothers to marry their Brothers Wives who died without Children. He says then, that Matthan, who descended from David by Salomon, married a Wife named Estha, by whom he had Jacob: But that after the Death of Matthan, this same Woman married Melchi (he should have said Matthat) who descended from David by Nathan, of whom she had a Son named Heli, and that so Heli and Jacob were Brothers by the Mothers-side; and that Heli dying without Children, Jacob was obliged to marry his Widow, of whom he had Joseph the Husband of Mary, who was by Consequence natural Son to Jacob, and the Son of Heli according to the Law; and descended from Salomon by Jacob, and from Nathan by Heli. This way of reconciling the Evangelist, as to the Genealogy of Jesus Christ, is very easie, and has hardly any Difficulty in it; but that every Body may readily comprehend it, we shall represent it in the following Table.

Julius Africanus.

DAVID.

SALOMON, And his Descendants related by St. Matthew.		NATHAN, And his Descendants related by St. Luke.
MATTHAN, The first Husband.	ESTHA, The Wife of both.	MELCHI, Or rather MATTHAT, The second Husband.
JACOB, The Son of Matthan the first Husband.	THEIR COMMON WIFE. Whose Name we do not know, First married to Heli, of whom she had no Children, and afterwards to Jacob, his Brother.	HELY.
The Natural Son of Jacob.	JOSEPH.	The Son of Heli according to the Law.

The Second Letter of Africanus, relating to the History of Susanna, was written to Origen, who had in a Conference cited the Prophet Daniel, to vindicate the Innocence of Susanna. Africanus writes to him, that he admires that he does not look upon this Part of Daniel as fictitious, and that this whole History is no more than a Fable. The Reasons which he brings for this Opinion, are very learned and ingenious, and there was a Necessity for so great a Man as Origen to answer him; and yet it seems as if Africanus wrote to him, rather to be instructed in the Truth, than with any Design of Disputing against him.

There is likewise attributed to this Author, a Work Entituled, The Cesti, which is cited under his Name, not only by Suidas and Sincellus; but likewise by Photius, and even by Eusebius, in the Sixth Book, Chapter 31, of his History: If that Passage, which is not to be found in Ruffinus's Version, nor in St. Jerome, be not foisted in. But it is more likely, that this is the Work of another Africanus (g). We do not know whether he, of whom we speak, wrote any thing else, nor when he died.

(e) And composed an exact Chronicle.] Eusebius gives it the Name of a Chronography, and St. Jerome stiles it a History of the Times: Photius and Bede call it a Chronicle. It contained the Origine and Succession of all the Monarchies and Commonwealths, and he annext to the end thereof, a kind of Table, called a Canon, wherein he disposed under every Year, what he had before observed successively. St. Basil cites a Passage from thence, relating to the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, in the 29th Chapter of his Book, de Spiritu Sancto.

(f) The Reign of Heliogabalus.] Photius, who had seen it, says, that his Chronicle went no farther than the Reign of Macrinus. But the Computation of years, and a Fragment related by Scaliger, clearly shew, that he continued it to the time of Heliogabalus.

(g) Is the Work of another Africanus.] These Books, Entituled Cesti, were Discourses containing nothing but prophane Learning, they were so called à Cesto Veneris: They treated of Herbs, and particularly of those that had any Faculty in procuring Love. The Author of this Book was of Lybia; he called himself Sextus Africanus, or rather Africanus Cestus. He was probably a Heathen, as the Title, and the Subject of his Work sufficiently shew. There is a Book attributed to one Africanus, cited by Politian, under the Name of Cestus, being a Manuscript in the King's Library, but not the same which Photius speaks of: It was lately published.

MINUTIUS FELIX.

Minutius Felix.

Minutius Felix, a famous Lawyer at Rome (a), who lived in the Beginning of the Third Century (b), wrote an excellent Dialogue, Entituled Octavius, in Defence of the Christian Religion. 'Tis a Conference between a Christian whom he calls Octavius (c), and a Heathen named Cecilius, where Minutius sits as Judge. Cecilius speaks first against the Christian Religion, and begins by laying down this

Minutius Felix.

(a) A Lawyer at Rome.] Not only Lactantius and St. Hierom assure us that he was of this Profession; but this likewise appears by the beginning of his Dialogue, where he says, that it being Vacation time, he had no Business at the Hall.

(b) In the Beginning of the Third Century.] The Ancients do not fix precisely the time wherein he lived. St. Hierom, in his Catalogue, wherein he keeps the Order of Time, places him between Tertullian and St. Cyprian. It is evident that Minutius has taken several Thoughts from Tertullian, and that St. Cyprian, in his Book Of the Vanity of Idols, has transcribed in several Places the Words of Minutius. This makes it probable that he was an African, and his Style favours a little of Africa.

(c) Octavius.] He is also called Januarius, and Cecilius is named Natalis; and Minutius Felix, Marcus. It would be Minutius Felix.

Maxim, that every thing is uncertain and doubtful, and that therefore it is a great piece of Raſhneſs, eſpecially in the Chriſtians, who are an ignorant and ſtupid ſort of People, to pretend to eſtabliſh their Opinions as certain and infallible Truths: That there being no Providence that governs the World, and all things being dubious, it is the beſt way to ſtick to the Religion of our Anceſtors. That the Roman Empire was firſt eſtabliſhed, and afterwards arrived to its preſent Height by the Religion of the Gods; that they never contemned the Omens and Preſages of the Sooth-ſayers, without repenting of it; and that their Oracles certainly foretold things that were really to come to paſs. Afterwards he attacks the Religion of the Chriſtians in particular, he accuſes them of worſhipping an Aſs's Head, adoring Croſſes, and other things which were yet more diſhonourable. He upbraids them for thoſe Crimes of which the Heathens themſelves were juſtly accuſed; to wit, the Murthering of Children, the Committing of Inceſts. He reprehends in them as a Crime, that exceſſive Love which they had one for another. He finds fault with them, becauſe they had no Temples, Altars, nor Statues. He tells them, that they can neither ſee themſelves, nor ſhew to others that God whom they adore; that they feign that he ſees all things, but that it is impoſſible that he ſhould be able to take care of every particular thing, if he has the Charge of the whole Univerſe lying upon him. He pretends that it was to no purpoſe that the Jews adored and honoured this God. He ſcoffs at the Hopes of the Chriſtians. He looks upon the Reſurrection, Hell, and Heaven to be Fables, like thoſe of the Poets. He ſays, that Men being neceſſarily good or evil, 'tis ridiculous to believe that God will puniſh or reward them for their Actions. He examines the Condition of the Chriſtians in this Life, which is to be poor, Ignorant, ſubject to Diſeaſes, perſecuted, expoſed continually to Racks and Tortures: 'Which ſhews (ſays he) that their 'God either cannot, or will not relieve them, and by con-'ſequence that he is impotent or malicious. That on the contrary, the Romans, who do not adore the God of the Chriſtians, are not only powerful, and Lords of the whole World; but they likewiſe enjoy all thoſe Pleaſures, from which the Chriſtians are forced to abſtain. He concludes by adviſing the Chriſtians not to ſeek any more after Heavenly Things, and not to flatter themſelves vainly with the Knowledge of them: maintaining that all things being uncertain and doubtful, it is better to ſuſpend our Judgments, than to judge raſhly, for fear of falling into Superſtition, or utterly deſtroying all Religion. After ſome Reflections of Minutius Felix, Octavius anſwering Cecilius's Diſcourſe, obſerves how he has argued after a very inconſtant Manner, ſometimes admitting a Deity, and ſometimes ſeeming to doubt thereof. 'Which he has not done (ſays he) out of any Craft 'or Cunning, this ſort of Artifice ſuiting not with his 'candid and frank Temper; but that has happened to 'him, which uſually happens to a Man, who is ignorant 'of the Way, when he ſees ſeveral Paths, he ſtands in 'ſuſpence, not daring to chuſe any, and not being able 'to follow them all. In like manner, as he adds, he 'who has no certain Knowledge of the Truth, is always 'in doubt, and ſuffers himſelf to be led by the firſt Suſ-'picion, without being able to ſtop himſelf. He afterwards reprehends all the Reaſonings of Cecilius, and he anſwers every one in particular. After having ſhewn that Poverty and Ignorance, which was upbraided to the Chriſtians, could be no ways prejudicial to the Truth; he proves the Divine Providence, by the Order and Beauty which is ſeen in the Univerſe, and by the admirable Perfections of all the Creatures. And he ſhews, that it could be no other than God, who has created all Things, governing them by his WORD, ruling them by his Wiſdom, and bringing them to Perfection by his Power: That he is not to be ſeen, becauſe he is more ſubtile than the Sight: That he is not to be comprehended, becauſe he is greater than all the Senſes: That he is infinite and immenſe: That the Bounds of our Underſtanding are by much too ſhallow to have a perfect Knowledge of him: That it is only he who comprehends himſelf; that it is impoſſible to give him a Name ſuitable to his Perfections: And yet that all Men do naturally know him: That the People ſtretching out their Hands to Heaven, invoke only this God, and that the Prophets and Philoſophers have acknowledged him. He afterwards ſhews, that the Antiquity of their Fables ought not to give them any Authority: That they have not only ſo much as the leaſt Appearance of Truth, but that they are impertinent and ridiculous, and that he muſt be void of common Senſe, who gives any Credit to them: That we are not to attribute the Eſtabliſhment, nor Increaſe of the Empire, to the Religion of the Romans, ſince it was founded at firſt by Parricide, and by the Rapes of ſtrange Women, and that it afterwards grew to its Greatneſs by Uncleanneſs, by Sacriledge, and by unjuſt Wars: That very often their Commanders contemned the Auguries; and that nevertheleſs they were ſucceſsful in what they undertook: That the Anſwers of their Oracles were very often falſe and ambiguous, and that we are not to wonder, if by a great chance they ſometimes hit: That the Demons, who are impure Spirits, made uſe of theſe Superſtitions to deſtroy Mankind; and to ſet them at a greater Diſtance from God, after they were already loſt by their Vices and Diſorderly Deſires: That 'tis theſe Spirits who anſwer in their Statues, who poſſeſs Men, and agitate them ſo furiouſly; but being conjured by the Name of the only true God, they are obliged to go out of the Bodies of thoſe whom they have tormented. He afterwards confutes the Calumnies wherewith they aſperſed the Chriſtians: He ſays, That if it were true, they ought not to be compelled to deny their Religion, but rather to own thoſe Inceſts, Impieties and Murders wherewith they were accuſed: That the Chriſtians are too well inſtructed, to adore an Aſs's Head, and too chaſt, to commit Uncleanneſs in the Celebration of their Myſteries: But that there is a Religion among the Heathens, in which they worſhipped Beaſts, and committed execrable Villainies without Puniſhment; that they are not the Chriſtians, but the Heathens, who place their Hopes in mortal Men, and in inanimate Statues, and who were frequently guilty of Murders and Inceſts: That the Chriſtians do neither adore nor deſire Croſſes, and that they are ſo far from ſhedding Man's Blood, that they dare not ſo much as to eat that of Beaſts: That they are modeſt and reſerved, not only in Body, but in Mind: That they commonly marry but once, that they have no other Deſign in their Marriage, but the having of Children: That their Repaſts are not only very chaſt, but alſo very ſober: That there are ſeveral Chriſtians who preſerve a perpetual Continency, and yet without any Vanity upon that Account: That though they refuſe to bear any Offices, yet they are not for all that of the Scum of the People: That their Number encreaſes continually, which is a certain Sign of their Virtue: That they do not diſtinguiſh themſelves from others by any outward Mark, but by their Innocence and Modeſty: That they love one another, and call one another Brethren, becauſe they have all one and the ſame God for their Father: That they have neither Statues, nor Altars, nor Temples, becauſe the Majeſty of God cannot be repreſented by Images, nor encloſed in Houſes built by the Hands of Men, and that it is better to conſecrate our Mind, and our Heart as his Temple. Nonne melius in noſtra dedicandus eſt Mente? in noſtro Conſecrandus Corpore? That the Sacrifices and Victims which he requires, and which we ought to offer up unto him, are Juſtice, Purity and Innocence; That tho' God be inviſible, yet he is diſcovered by his Omnipotence: That he knows all things, and nothing can be concealed from him: That he protected the Jews ſo long as they honoured him; and 'twas only for their Sins that they have drawn upon themſelves his Anger and Vengeance. After having thus diſcourſed of the Object of the Chriſtian Worſhip, he goes on to the Proof of the other Points of their Doctrine. He ſhews, that the Learned do agree, That the World ſhall have an End: That Pythagoras and Plato believed one part of the Reſurrection when they taught the Immortality of the Soul, and the Metempſychoſis: That it is not more difficult for God to raiſe up Men after their Death, than it was for him to produce them out of Nothing: That all the Revolutions of Nature are as ſo many Images of the Reſurrection: That ſeveral had rather be annihilated for ever, than to riſe again to endure Eternal Torments; and that they were confirmed in their Opinion by the Impunity which they enjoyed in this Life: But that the Judgment of God will be by ſo much the more rigorous, as it is ſlower in puniſhing: That theſe Torments ſhall be exceſſive, and ſhall have neither End nor Bounds: That the Fire which ſhall burn the Body without conſuming it, ſhall nouriſh it (if I may ſo ſay) and make it to ſubſiſt to all Eternity: That it is ſufficient not to know God to be condemned to ſuffer theſe Pains, becauſe it is not a leſs Sin to be ignorant of him, than to offend him: But that the Heathens ſhall not be puniſhed only for this Ignorance of God, they being guilty of ſeveral Crimes; that they cannot excuſe themſelves by alledging Deſtiny, ſince Man is a free Agent, and that Deſtiny is nothing elſe but the Execution of God's Decrees, which are regulated according rather to divine, than to believe, that theſe were the Januarius and Natalis, Biſhops of Africa, who lived in St. Cyprian's time: It would have been more likely that Octavius and Cecilius were imaginary Names in the Dialogue, if we had not been told that they are their proper Names.

cording to Men's Actions: That that Poverty which is so frequent amongst the Christians, makes for their Glory; that the Evils and Persecutions which they suffered, are no Proof that God has forsaken them, but that he tryes and purifies them: That it is a Spectacle well becoming God, to behold a Christian stoutly contending with Pain, standing firm and stedfast in the midst of Torments, insulting over his Executioners and Judges, freely resisting even Princes and Emperors, and yielding only to God. 'You exalt (says he) to the Skies, a Scevola, 'who after having missed of his Aim in killing a King, 'voluntarily lost his Hand, and saved his Life by this 'couragious Action. But how many Persons are there 'among us, who have suffered without complaining, 'not only their Hand, but their whole Body to be burnt, 'though they could have delivered themselves from these 'Torments, had they pleased? What do I say? Even 'our Sons and our Daughters laugh at your Gibbets, at 'your wild Beasts, and at all your Punishments. And 'ought not this to convince you, that it is impossible 'that they would have endured these Pains to no purpose; or that they could be able to suffer them without God's Assistance? And do not think that those Persons are happy, who being utterly ignorant of God, 'are loaded with Honours and Riches. These are unfortunate Men, who are raised up, that their Downfal might be the greater, these are Victims which are 'fattened for the Sacrifice. For what solid Good can 'be had without God, since Death shews that all the 'rest is no more than a Dream? This being so, a Christian may indeed seem to be miserable, but can never 'be really so: Christianus videri potest miser, non potest esse. He adds, that they abstain from Pleasures, from publick Sights, and from the Pomps of the World, because all these things are contrary to good Manners, and that their Life is more unblameable than that of the Philosophers, who seem to be wise by their Discourses, and by their outward Appearance, but were by no means sound at the Bottom.

After Octavius had thus answered all the Objections of Cecilius, the last acknowledges himself convinced by his Arguments: I do not expect (says he) the Determination of our Arbitrator; we are equally victorious, Octavius triumphs over me, and I triumph over Error: I submit my self therefore to God, I acknowledge his Providence, and I do publickly declare, that the Religion of the Christians, among the Number of whom I place my self from this present, is the only way that discovers the Truth.

This Dialogue is elegant, the Expressions are select, the Words proper, the Turn agreeable, the Reasons are set forth to advantage, and beautified with a great deal of Learning. In a word, this small Treatise shews, as Lactantius has observed, that Minutius had been a very excellent Defender of Religion, and of the Truth, had he entirely applied himself to this Study. But this is rather the Production of one who would divert himself from Business, than a Book written with great Assiduity and Diligence. He flourishes upon his Subject without treating of it thoroughly. He takes more Pains in shewing how ridiculous the Opinions of the Heathens are, and in confuting them by their own Authors, than in explaining and proving the Doctrine of the Christians. Besides, he does not appear to be very well skilled in the Mysteries of Religion, and he seems to have believed, that the Soul should die with the Body (d).

Minutius Felix.

This Discourse passed a long time for the Eighth Book of Arnobius; for it being found together with the seven Books of Arnobius in an ancient Manuscript of the Vatican Library, it was printed four times (e) under his Name, before any Body knew its true Author. The Learned Lawyer Balduinus was the first that found out this vulgar Error, and caused this little Treatise to be printed by it self in the Year 1560, at Heidelberg, with a Learned Preface, wherein he restores it to its true Author. But tho' we owe to this famous Lawyer the Honour of having first made this Discovery; yet 23 Years after, Ursinus causing Arnobius's Works to be printed at Rome, whether he had not seen Balduinus's Edition, or whether he had a mind to attribute all the Honour of this Observation to himself, separated this Book of Minutius from those of Arnobius, without taking any Notice that it had been done before, ascribing to himself by this means the whole Credit of the Discovery. Some time after, in the year 1603, Woverius caused it to be printed at Basil by Frobenius, with very useful Notes, for the understanding of this Author. In 1610, it was printed at Franckfort in Octavo, according to Balduinus's Edition. Afterwards Elmenhorstius caused it to be printed at Hambourg with some new Observations, in the year 1612, adjoyning thereunto the Preface of Balduinus. The Year following, Heraldus the Lawyer published at Paris an Edition of Minutius in Quarto, which was more correct than the others. Lastly, Rigaltius revising it very diligently from a Manuscript in the King's Library, being the same which was in the Vatican, put it forth in the year 1643, with very learned and curious Notes; and it was re-printed at Amsterdam in 1645, together with Julius Firmicus. This Edition of Rigaltius was followed in the Edition of St. Cyprian of 1666, to whose Notes they have added part of those of Woverius, Elmenhorstius, Oizelius, and those lately made by Priorius. Lastly, All these Notes were printed together with the Text, after the manner which they call Variorum, in the Year 1672.

St. Hierom says, That in his Time there was a Book concerning Destiny attributed to Minutius Felix: but tho' this might be the Work of an eloquent Author, yet it was not written in the same Style with this Dialogue. It is true, that Cecilius promises in this Dialogue, to treat more largely of Destiny upon another Occasion: but to tell whether he did it or no, or whether this Treatise that was extant in St. Hierom's Time, was the same which he promised, or rather, whether this Promise gave occasion to some other Author to forge a Discourse thereof under Minutius's Name, are things which we cannot positively determine.

(d) That the Soul should die with the Body.] He says, That there is nothing after Death, as there was nothing before the Production; and that being made of nothing, it shall likewise be renewed of nothing.

AMMONIUS.

Ammonius.

AMmonius, a Christian Philosopher, the Master of Plotinus and Origen (a), flourished in Alexandria (b), where he publickly taught Philosophy in Alexander Severus's Reign. Porphyry falsly accuses him for having quitted the Christian Religion, in which he had been educated: For it is certain, as Eusebius and St. Hierom observe, That he always continued stedfast in the Doctrine and Precepts of Christianity. 'Witness (says Eusebius) those excellent Works that he 'has left behind him, which are so many authentick Monuments of his Faith and his Ability; as the Book entituled, The Agreement between Moses and Jesus Christ, 'and all the other Pieces which may be found in the 'Hands of studious Persons. In the Number of these Works we may reckon a Gospel composed out of all the Four: which was a kind of Harmony and Concord which he had drawn up with a great deal of Pains and Study, as is testified by Eusebius in his Epistle to Carpianus, placed at the Beginning of his Canons upon the Evangelists. Which has given occasion to St. Hierom to affirm, that Ammonius writ Canons like those of Eusebius. But they were not, properly speaking, Canons which Ammonius composed; for the Canons were no more than Indices of the Places of the Gospels, which are contained in one, two, three or four of the Evangelists; whereas Ammonius's Harmony or Concord contained the entire Text of the Four Evangelists, which Eusebius made use of in making his Canons, which referred to this Concord, and were a Table to it. Trithemius likewise attributes Canons to Ammonius, but they and it seems undeniable, and we must needs confess, that there were two Origens, who were Disciples to Ammonius.

Ammonius.

(a) Master of Plotinus and Origen.] Porphyry says, in Plotinus's Life, That this Philosopher, when he was twenty years old, came to hear Ammonius; that he was his Disciple for eleven years; and that he had another Disciple named Origen. But, as we shall observe elsewhere, this is a different Person from the famous Origen. Nevertheless, Eusebius assures us, That our Origen was likewise his Scholar,

(b) Flourished in Alexandria.) There was another Ammonius, a Philosopher likewise, who lived after the Council of Chalcedon. He was somewhat older than Origen, and a Platonist.

Ammonius. are thoſe of Euſebius. We have at preſent in the Bibliotheca Patrum an Harmony of the Four Evangeliſts, falſly attributed to Tatianus by Victor of Capua; which Cardinal Baronius, Father Labbé, and ſeveral other Learned Men, do aſcribe to Ammonius. It is certain, that this was not written by Tatianus, who retrenched the Genealogies of Jeſus Chriſt, which are to be found in this Concord. It bears the Name of An Harmony, and it is aſcribed in the Title to an Alexandrian, which made Baronius conjecture that it was written by this Ammonius, who was of Alexandria, and whoſe Works bore the Title of An Harmony. Zacharias, Biſhop of Chryſopolis, who lived in the Twelfth Century, and made Commentaries upon Ammonius's Harmony, has followed this word for word, which confirms Baronius's Conjecture. Ammonius.

ORIGEN.

Origen. ORigen (a) was born in the City of Alexandria, about the year 185, from the Birth of Chriſt (b). Beſides the Name of Origen, he had moreover that of Adamantius (c). His Father, who was called Leonidas, educated him in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and did not only cauſe him in his Youth to learn the poliier Learning, with all the prophane Sciences, but he particularly ordered him to apply himſelf to the underſtanding of the Holy Scripture, before any other kind of Learning, giving him every day ſome Portions thereof to learn and repeat. And it happened very luckily, that the Son's Inclination, exactly anſwered the Father's Deſign; for he purſued his Study with a moſt extraordinary Zeal and Fervency, and as he was endowed with a quick Apprehenſion, and very great Sagacity, he did not content himſelf with that Senſe which at firſt view preſented it ſelf, but he afterwards endeavoured to dive into the Myſterious and Allegorical Explication of the Sacred Books, and ſometimes would even puzzle his Father by asking him the Meaning of ſome Paſſages of Scripture, which obliged this good Man ſeemingly to reprehend him, and to adviſe him not to ſoar above the reach of his Underſtanding, and to content himſelf with the moſt clear and natural Senſe of the Scripture; though inwardly he was extremely joyful, and returned Thanks unto God with all his Heart, for his great Mercy, in beſtowing on him ſuch a Son. But that theſe Opinions may not be attributed either to the blind Love of a Father for his Child, or to that Affection which Euſebius, who relates theſe things, had for Origen, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, That St. Hierom, even then when he wrote againſt Origen, with the greateſt Earneſtneſs, was obliged to acknowledge, that he had been an extraordinary Perſon from his very Infancy, Magnus Vir ab Infantiâ. Ep. 65. ad Pammachium de erroribus Origenis. When he was a little more advanced in Years, he had for his Maſter in Philoſophy, the famous Ammonius (d), the Chriſtian Philoſopher; and in Divinity, the Learned St. Clemens of Alexandria. He was not above ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age, when the Perſecution began at Alexandria, in the 10th Year of the Reign of Severus, and the 202d from the Birth of Chriſt. His Father being ſeized and impriſoned upon the account of the Chriſtian Faith, he would alſo have offered himſelf to the Perſecutors, out of the great Zeal he had to ſuffer Martyrdom; but his Mother oppoſed it very ſtiffly, and was even forced to hide his Cloaths, to prevent him from going abroad to put his Deſign in Execution: And being thus detained againſt his Will, he wrote a Letter to his Father to exhort him to Martyrdom, wherein he expreſſes himſelf thus: Stand ſtedfaſt, my Father, and take care not to alter your Opinion upon our Account. Leonidas being animated by his Son's Exhortation, couragiouſly ſuffered Martyrdom, and was beheaded within a little while after. His Goods having been confiſcated, Origen remaining with his Mother and Brethren, was reduced to extream Poverty; but a certain Lady of Alexandria, who was very rich, whether out of Compaſſion to his Miſery, or out of the Reſpect ſhe had for him, afforded him all kind of Aſſiſtance, and even took him into her Houſe. There lived with her at the ſame time a famous Heretick of Antioch, whom ſhe had adopted for her Son, who held Conferences in her Houſe, where a great Number, not only of Hereticks, but alſo of Catholicks were preſent. But though Origen was obliged of neceſſity to converſe with this Man, yet he would never hold Communion with him in Prayer, keeping exactly to the Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, and teſtifying the Abhorrence that he had for the Doctrine of the Hereticks. However, in a little time he put himſelf into ſuch a Condition, as not to ſtand any longer in need of his Ladies Aſſiſtance; for applying himſelf entirely, after his Father's Death, to the Study of Human Learning, he taught Grammar, and by his Employment he got a ſufficient Competency to maintain himſelf. Origen.

Whilſt he followed this Profeſſion, the Chair of the School at Alexandria becoming vacant by the Retreat of St. Clement, and by the Flight of all thoſe who were diſperſed by the Perſecution, ſome of the Heathens, who were willing to be converted, made their Application to him, though he was not then above eighteen years old. The two firſt of his Diſciples were Plutarch, and Heraclas his Brother, who ſucceeded Demetrius in the See of Alexandria. At length, the Reputation and Number of thoſe that were converted by him increaſing every day more and more, Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, confirmed him in the Employment of Catechiſt or Profeſſor of Sacred Learning in the Church of Alexandria. When he ſaw himſelf ſettled in this Charge, he left off teaching Grammar, not being willing to depend upon any other Profeſſion for his Subſiſtence: He ſold all his Books that treated of human Learning, contenting himſelf with four Oboli a day, which were allowed him by the Perſon who purchaſed them.

And then it was that he began to lead a very ſtrict and ſevere Life, which contributed no leſs than his Learning to attract to him a great number of Diſciples, notwithſtanding the Fury of the Perſecution, which being then begun at Alexandria, under the Government of Laetus, continued ſtill with greater Violence under Aquila his Succeſſor. He had ſeveral of his Diſciples there, who ſuffered Martyrdom in the ſame Place; among others, Plutarch, Serenus, Heraclides, Hero, &c. And he was himſelf very often expoſed to the Rage of the Heathens, when he went to the Aſſiſtance and Encouragement of the Martyrs. He then carried his Auſterities ſo far, as to commit an Act of that Exceſs, as to be blamed even by thoſe who have been his greateſt Defenders, and which he himſelf afterwards condemned, though he might do it upon a good Motive (e), and out of an exceſſive Zeal for Charity. For as his Employment obliges him to be

(a) Origen.] There is not any Eccleſiaſtical Author, whoſe Life we have more exactly. Euſebius, who was his great Admirer, has deſcribed it very particularly. 'Tis from him that we have taken, without citing him, almoſt all that we have related concerning him. We muſt add thereunto St. Hierom in his Catalogue, and in ſeveral other Places. Ruffinus againſt St. Hierom; St. Epiphanius in the 64th Hereſie; Photius in the 118th Volume, where he has given an Abridgment of the Apology of Pamphilus, and what Origen ſays of himſelf, Tom. 6. in Matth. & alibi. We have alſo made uſe of the Aſſiſtance of the Moderns, and particularly of that famous Work of Huetius, intituled Origeniana; of the Life of Tertullian and Origen, written in French by a worthy Man; which we ſay as much to do them Juſtice, as to take off from our ſelves the Imputation of being a Plagiary. [Our Author means Dr. Allix, Treaſurer of the Church of Sarum, who had a great Eſteem paid to him in his own Country for his extraordinary Learning, till the late Perſecution forced him hither for Relief.]

(b) Was born in the City of Alexandria, about the year 185 from the Birth of Chriſt.] St. Epiphanius ſays, That he was an Alexandrian. Euſebius ſays, That he was ſeventeen years old at the time of the Perſecution of Severus, which was in the year 202 from the Birth of Chriſt, and by conſequence he was born in 185.

(c) He had moreover that of Adamantius.] Photius believes that he had this Name by reaſon of the ſtrength of his Reaſonings. St. Hierom ſays, That he had it becauſe he reſiſted Errors like a Diamond. But this is only gueſſing: we may ſay the ſame of thoſe who ſeek for the Etymology of the Name of Origen, out of a needleſs Curioſity.

(d) He had for his Maſter in Philoſophy, the famous Ammonius.] There were two Origens Diſciples to Ammonius: The firſt of whom, Porphyry ſpeaks of in the Life of Plotinus, and Longinus, who wrote nothing but a ſmall Treatiſe of Demons, and lived but to the Reign of Gallianus, and who was Porphyry's Diſciple and Friend, which does not agree with our Origen, as has been obſerved by Valeſius and Huetius.

(e) And which he himſelf afterwards condemned, though he might do it upon a good Motive.] Euſebius, his great Advocate, ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner as ſhews he was aſhamed of it. The Paſſages where Origen himſelf has condemned it, are in the 15th Sermon upon St. Matthew, Chap. 19. Ver. 12. and againſt Celſus, Book 7. We do not know whether he made uſe of Iron, or of ſome particular Simple; nor is it any great matter if we did know it.

often

often with Women, whom he instructed as well as Men, that he might take away from the Heathens all pretence of Suspicion of any ill Conduct by reason of his Youth, he resolved with himself to execute to the Letter that Perfection which he was persuaded was proposed by Jesus Christ in these Words of the Gospel; That there are some who make themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven. He was willing to keep this Action private, and did all he could to conceal it from his Friends: but it was presently discovered; and being come to the Knowledge of Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, he commended his Zeal, and the Fervency of his Faith, and bad him not be discouraged upon that Account, but to continue more earnestly in the Instruction of the Catechumens.

In the mean time, Origen's Reputation increased daily more and more, and procured him so great a Number of Disciples, that he himself alone was not able to manage it: and therefore he committed to his Friend Heraclas the Care of those who were to be instructed in the first Principles of Religion, reserving to himself such as were advanced to a higher Degree of Knowledge. It was about this time, in the beginning of the Reign of Antoninus, that he went to Rome (f), under the Pontificate of Zephirinus; and much about the same time, he likewise composed that great and famous Work, called the Tetrapla; which was a Bible, wherein by the side of the Hebrew Text, he had transcribed in different Columns, the Translation of the Septuagint; that of Aquila, that of Symmachus, and that of Theodosian, distinguished by Verses; and he added thereunto afterwards two other Versions without any Authors Name, and a Seventh only upon the Psalms, which he found at Jerico in a Barrel: and these Versions, with the Hebrew, written both in Hebrew and Greek Characters, make up that Book which is called the Hexapla (g). These Works mightily increased his Reputation, and drew from all Parts into Alexandria a great Number of learned Persons to converse with Origen, and to be instructed by him. Ambrose was one of this Number: He anathematized the Heresie of Valentinus, in which he had been engaged, to embrace the Orthodox Faith. Origen was afterwards obliged several times to leave Alexandria: For first he was sent for by an Arabian Prince, who wrote to Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, and to the Governor thereof, to send him to him to be instructed by him; and a little while after, this City being cruelly harrass'd by the War which the Emperor Antoninus Caracalla made against its Inhabitants for having affronted him by their Jears and Scoffs, Origen retired into Palestine; and being come to settle in the City of Cæsarea, the Bishops of that Province desired him to expound publickly the Scripture in that Church, and to instruct the People in their Presence, though he was not yet a Priest; to which Request of theirs he complied. Now whether Demetrius envied him this Honour, or whether he was persuaded that they had violated the Rules of the Church, he wrote to these Prelates, telling them, That it was a thing unheard of, and that it had been never practised till then, that Lay-men should Preach in the Presence of Bishops. But Alexander of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus of Cæsarea, writing back to him, proved by several Instances, That this had been often put in Practice. In the mean time, Demetrius had written to Origen to come home; and having also sent some Deacons to press his Return, he was obliged to betake himself again to his first Employment. Some time after, he was again diverted from it by Order of the Princess Mammæa, who caused him to come to Antioch, that she might see, and discourse with him: but staying with her but a little while, he returned to Alexandria, and fell again to work upon the Holy Scripture, with the Assistance of his Friend Ambrose, who furnished him with Copyers. He continued there till the Year 228, when he departed from thence with Letters of Recommendation from his Bishop, to go into Achaia about some Ecclesiastical Affairs (h). It was in this Voyage, as he passed through Palestine, that he was ordained Priest by the Bishops of this Province, being 42 years old. This Ordination of Origen by Foreign Bishops extreamly incensed his Diocesan Demetrius against him, it having been done without his Permission. He wrote every where Letters against him, upbraiding him for the Action which he had committed in his Youth. However, Origen returned to Alexandria, where he continued to write his Commentaries upon the Sacred Scripture. It was then that he published his five Books of Commentaries upon the Gospel of St. John, eight Books upon Genesis, Commentaries upon the first Five and twenty Psalms, and upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah; his Books de Principiis, and his Stromata.

Origen.

All this while the Bishop of Alexandria was not at all appeased, but continued to persecute him: And in a Council which he assembled in the Year 231, it was ordained, That Origen should go out of Alexandria; that he should not be permitted to teach there any longer, nor so much as to live there; but that nevertheless he should not be deprived of his Dignity of Priesthood. Origen being banished from Alexandria, retired to Cæsarea, his ordinary Place of Refuge, where he was very well received by Theoctistus, Bishop of that City, and by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, who undertook to defend him, and commissioned him to expound publickly the Scripture, hearing him as if he had been their Master. But Demetrius not being satisfied with the first Judgment given against Origen, accused him in a Council of the Bishops of Egypt (i), and having caused him to be Deposed, and even to be Excommunicated, according to St. Hierom, wrote at the same time to all Parts against him, to procure his being thrust out of the Communion of the Catholick Church. For when once a Priest was excommunicated, and deposed by his Bishop by the Consent of the Bishops of the Province, he could not be any longer received in any Church. There was no need of examining whether it was justly or unjustly that he had been condemned in his Province. So that it is no wonder if all the Bishops of the World, excepting those of Palestine, Arabia, Phœnicia and Achaia, who were particularly acquainted with Origen, and with whom he had a most familiar Intimacy, should consent to his Condemnation; and if Rome its self, having assembled its Senate against him, says St. Hierom, that is to say, its Clergy, did condemn him after the Example of his own Bishop. We believe, says St. Augustin, upon a Subject almost like this, whatsoever we are informed of by Letters from a Council, and we must not do otherwise. For those who had not any particular Knowledge of Origen, ought to believe him guilty; and those who knew him, that they might not violate that Order of Discipline, ought to consent to his Excommunication, after it was once signified to them by his own Bishop. And so it was that Marcion being excommunicated by his Father, and his Bishop, and being come to Rome, desiring to be received there into Communion, received this Answer from the Clergy of that Church: We cannot receive you, without the Consent of your Father; for as there is in the Church but one and the same Faith, so there ought to be therein but one and the same Spirit, and one and the same Discipline. Therefore, by a great Number of Canons and Ecclesiastical Constitutions, it was absolutely prohibited to any Bishop whatever, and even to the Bishop of Rome himself, to receive into Communion those Priests who had been excommunicated by their Bishops upon any Pretence whatever. Nevertheless Origen found, as we have said, some Protectors, especially in Palestine, where he continued to explain the Scripture at Cæsarea with great Reputation, both in the Life-time, and after the Death of Demetrius, who lived not long after he had condemned Origen. All sorts of Persons, not only from that Province, but even from remote Countries, came to be his Disciples. The most famous were, Gregory, Sirnamed afterwards Thaumaturgus, who was Bishop of Neocæsarea, and his Brother Athenodorus. But though after Demetrius's Death, the Persecution which he had raised against Origen abated a little, yet he was always looked upon as a Person excommunicated by all the Egyptians, and the Sentence which was

(f) In the beginning of the Reign of Antoninus, that he went to Rome.] Baronius places this Voyage under Heliogabalus, and says that Origen was sent for to Rome by Mammæa; but he is mistaken, for Mammæa caused him to come to Antioch, and not to Rome.

(g) That Work which is called the Hexapla.] See Valesius upon Eusebius, where he proves that the Hexapla do comprehend six entire Versions, and that the seventh was only upon the Psalms. Eusebius writes, that they were composed at this time. St. Epiphanius believes that they were made at Tyre. As they are great Works, and tedious to compose, 'tis likely that he began them then, and finished them afterwards.

(h) About some Ecclesiastical Affairs.] This Business was without doubt to confute Heresies which were at that time very numerous in Achaia, as St. Hierom and Ruffinus relate. 'Tis probable it was in this Voyage that he wrote, whilst he was at Nicomedia, (as he himself observes) his Letter to Africanus concerning the History of Susanna. It was likewise at this time that he convinced two Hereticks of falsifying the Conferences which he had with them, and of making him say what he never said. Ruffinus relates this in the Book de Adul. lib. Orig.

(i) Accused him in a Council of the Bishops of Egypt.] Photius, Cod. 118. makes mention of these two Councils, and St. Hierom. lib. 2. in Ruff. c. 5.

Origen.

given againſt him by Demetrius continued under his Succeſſors (l), Heraclas and Dionyſius, though the firſt had been Origen's Diſciple, and the ſecond had a great Eſteem for him. In this time he went on with his Commentaries upon St. John, and he began to compoſe ſome upon Ezekiel and Iſaiah.

After the Death of Alexander, under whoſe Reign all this happened, his Succeſſor Maximinus ſtirred up a Perſecution againſt the Church in the Year 235. Ambroſe, Origen's Friend, and Theoctiſtus, Prieſts of Cæſarea, having been taken and brought before this Emperor, upon the account of the Chriſtian Religion, Origen ſent them an Exhortation to Martyrdom. Nevertheleſs, he concealed himſelf during this Perſecution, and retired for ſome time to the City of Athens, where he finiſhed his Commentaries upon Ezekiel and went on with the Commentaries upon the Song of Salomon, which he finiſhed when he returned to Cæſarea in Paleſtine, from whence he went afterwards to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, where he remained ſome time with Firmilian, who invited him thither.

Under the Reign of Gordianus, which began in the Year 238, Beryllus, Biſhop of Boſtra, in Arabia, fell into a very groſs Error, affirming, That our Lord, before his Incarnation, was not a Perſon ſubſiſting. Some Biſhops being aſſembled to convince him of this Error, they cauſed Origen to come thither alſo. After that ſeveral Biſhops had had Conferences and Diſputes with this Biſhop, Origen being deſired to enter the Liſts with him, diſcourſed him at firſt familiarly, being willing to be throughly informed of his Opinion; and after having perfectly underſtood his Error, and the Grounds upon which he pretended to maintain it, he convinced him by ſeveral Reaſons, and ſet him again in the right Way, forcing him to acknowledge his Error. The Records of all that paſſed in this Affair were preſerved for a long time after, wherein was to be ſeen the Sentiments of Beryllus, the Opinions of the Biſhops who met there, the Queſtions propoſed to him by Origen, and the whole Conference which they had together in his Church. St. Hierom takes notice, That in his Time, Origen's Dialogue with Beryllus was extant. This Biſhop having acknowledged his Error, preſerved the Purity of his Faith even to his Death, and had an extraordinary Kindneſs for Origen, to whom he wrote ſeveral Letters. St. Hierom places him among the Number of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers.

Afterwards Origen was called, under the Reign of Philip, to another Aſſembly of Biſhops, which was held againſt ſome Arabians, who maintained, That the Souls of Men died, and were raiſed again with their Bodies. After having ſpoke in the Preſence of them all, upon the Queſtion which was in agitation, he defended the Truth, and attacked this Error with that Force of Argument, that he cauſed all thoſe to change their Opinion, who had fallen into the Miſtake.

He was then Threeſcore years old, or thereabouts, and yet this did not hinder him from carrying on his Works with the ſame, or rather with greater Diligence; for he did not only compoſe ſeveral Books in his Study, but he made almoſt every day Diſcourſes to the People, and for the moſt part without any time allowed to prepare them, which were nevertheleſs ſo well eſteemed, that the Tranſcribers took them after him as he delivered them, and publiſhed them afterwards. This Employment did not take him off from compoſing ſeveral conſiderable Books; as his Eight Books againſt Celſus, Twenty five Volumes upon St. Matthew, Twenty five Volumes of Commentaries upon the Minor Prophets, a Letter to the Emperor Philip, and one to Severa his Wife (m). St. Hierom ſays, That he wrote alſo a Letter to Pope Fabianus, wherein he ſets forth his Recanting of the Errors which he had written, and laid the Blame of them upon Ambroſe. If this be ſo, he did it to make this Pope favourable to him, that he might get again into the Communion of the Roman Church. He wrote alſo at this time againſt the Hereticks called Helceſaitæ.

Origen.

Afterwards, in the Perſecution of Decius, which was about the ſame time, Origen ſuffered with great Conſtancy for the Faith. He was ſeized, put into Priſon, loaded with Irons; he had for ſeveral Days his Feet in the Stocks, where they were cruelly extended, even to the greateſt Extremity: They threatned him to burn him alive, and they rack'd him with ſeveral ſorts of Tortures, to try his Patience to the utmoſt; but he endured all with an undaunted Reſolution (n). Being come out of Priſon, he held ſeveral Conferences, and wrote Letters worthy of a Holy Confeſſor of Jeſus Chriſt. Laſtly, After having laboured ſo much, and ſuffered with ſuch great Credit and Glory, he died in the beginning of the Reign of Gallus, in the Year Two hundred fifty two, from the Birth of Chriſt, and in the Sixty ſixth Year of his Age (o p).

Though what we have remaining at preſent of the Works of Origen, makes up ſeveral conſiderable Volumes, yet they are nothing in compariſon to what he has wrote (q). Euſebius had made an exact Catalogue of his Works, in the Apology which he made for him, under the Name of the Martyr Pamphilus; and St. Hierom did the ſame in one of his Letters. But both of theſe Catalogues being loſt, we have no knowledge of any, but thoſe that have been cited by the Ancients; which ſtill are much more in number than thoſe which we have now remaining.

We may diſtinguiſh two kinds of Works written by Origen. The One are upon the Sacred Scriptures, and the Others are ſeparate Treatiſes upon different Subjects. He had compoſed three ſorts of Books upon the Scripture, not to mention his Hexapla and Tetrapla, which were rather a Collection than a Work; to wit, Commentaries, Scholia, and Homilies. In his Commentaries, he wholly gave up himſelf to that Heat and Fire which was natural to him, to penetrate the height and depth of the Scripture, and the moſt myſterious Interpretation thereof, the better. His Scholia were, on the contrary, only ſhort Notes to explain the difficult Places. Theſe two kinds of Works were more for the Learned, than for the uſe of the People; whereas the Homilies, which the Latins call Treatiſes, and which we call Sermons, were Moral Inſtructions upon the Holy Scripture. We have none of the Scholia remaining, nor have we hardly any of the Homilies in Greek; and thoſe which we have in Latin, are tranſlated by Ruffinus and others with ſo much (l) The Sentence which was given againſt him by Demetrius continued under his Succeſſors.] Gennadius ſays, That Theophilus reports that Heraclas drove Origen out of the Church; and the Author of the Life of St. Pachomius, ſays the ſame thing, as well as Peter of Alexandria, cited by Juſtinian in his Letter againſt Origen. It is moſt certain that the Sentence given againſt him was not revoked, and that not one of the Egyptians would have any thing to do with him.

(m) A Letter to the Emperor Philip, and one to Severa his Wife.] Some have believed that this Emperor was a Chriſtian, and ſay that Babylas deprived him from the Communion of the Church till he had repented for the Murthers which he had committed; but this Story is very uncertain.

(n) But he endured all with an undaunted Reſolution.] St. Epiphanius accuſes him for approaching to the Heathen Altars, and for making as if he would offer Incenſe to the Gods: But this Story, and almoſt every thing that Epiphanius ſays concerning Origen, is fabulous, and invented by ſome Enemy to Origen, who deceived St. Epiphanius, a Man eaſily impoſed upon. To ſhew that this Story is falſe, 'tis ſufficient to obſerve, that even Origen's greateſt Enemies, as Theophilus, St. Hierom, Juſtinian, &c. who have omitted nothing to cry him down, have taken no notice at all of it; and that his Defenders, Euſebius and Pamphilius, are ſo far from excuſing him from this Crime, that they have on the contrary commended his Conſtancy and Reſolution. 'Tis true, St. Epiphanius does not ſay that this happened in the Perſecution of Decius, as Nicephorus does; but in what time ſoever they fix this Accident, it is equally overthrown by the Obſervation we juſt now made. It is alſo leſs probable, when it is referred to the time of Maximinus's Perſecution; for what likelihood is there that Origen, after having committed ſo groſs a Fault, ſhould be honoured, as he was, by the Biſhops of Paleſtine?

(o p) He died in the Year 252 from the Birth of Chriſt, and in the 66*th Year of his Age.*] According to Euſebius, Lib. 7. cap. 11. he died in the firſt Year of the Reign of Gallus; and St. Hierom, in his 65th Epiſtle, written 400 years after Chriſt, ſays, That it was 150 years after Origen's Death. It is certain, according to Euſebius, that in the Year 202 Origen was ſeventeen years old, and that in the third year of the Emperor Philip he was above ſixty years old: So that if we ſuppoſe him to have lived but ſixty ſix years, as St. Hierom aſſures us in his Book of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, he muſt have died in the beginning of the Reign of Gallus, in the Year 242; but if he lived ſixty nine years, as Euſebius writes, he muſt have lived to the end of the Reign of Gallus; that is to ſay, till the year 254 or 255.

(q) Yet they are nothing in compariſon to what he has written.] It is certain that he compoſed a very great Number of Books; and he made them with that eaſe, that he could hardly find Scribes enough, as both his Friends and Enemies agree. St. Hierom in his 65th Letter to Pammachius, ſpeaking of Origen, ſays, Who is there of you that can read as many Books as he has compoſed? And in another Place, he ſays, That he compiled an innumerable company of Books. Theophilus ſays the ſame thing. Euſtathius ſays, That he filled the World with his Works. Vincentius Lirinenſis affirms, That none has written more than him; and it is upon this Account that he had the Name given him of Chalcenterus, and Syntacticus. St. Epiphanius and Ruffinus ſay, That he writ 6000 Volumes. St. Hierom ſeems to diſpute it, telling us, That there is not the third part of them in Euſebius's Catalogue. By the Word Volumes, we muſt not underſtand ſuch Tomes as are now adays, but only ſmall Works; ſo every Homily, every part of a Book, is in this ſenſe a Volume: ſo that we need not admire, though he had written 6000 Volumes.

Origen. much Liberty (r), that it is a difficult matter to discern what is Origen's own, from what has been foisted in by the Interpreter. A great part likewise of his Commentaries are entirely lost. The following Table will present you in one View those Works which we know to have been composed by Origen upon the Scripture, what we have left of them in Greek, and what we have only remaining of them in Latin. Origen.

(r) Are translated by Ruffinus and others with so much Liberty.] Ruffinus says it himself in the Conclusion to his Version of the Commentaries upon the Romans; and St. Hierom also somewhere upbraids him with it. And besides, this appears by the Translation it self, which is full of Figures and Allusions to Latin Words, of Terms taken in another sense than what they were in Origen's Time, where the Trinity and other Mysteries are expressed in such Terms as were not used till after the Council of Nice, and where there are Points of Discipline more modern than Origen's Age; which has given occasion to those who have not considered the Liberty that Ruffinus took of adding or leaving out what he pleased, to doubt whether the greatest part of these Works were Origen's or no. The Liberty which Ruffinus has given himself is still more evident, by what he has written in the Prologue to his Version of the Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans, which he says he has Abridged by above the half. St. Hierom's Versions are not more exact; and the most faulty of all is that of an ancient Translator, who has interpreted the Commentaries upon St. Matthew.

The Books of Origen, of which we have any knowledge, and by whom they are cited.	The Books or Fragments of Origen, which we have in Greek, and whence they are taken.	The Latin Books of Origen, and their Translators.	Proofs and Notes upon the Table.

St. Epiphanius, and after him Cedrenus and Suidas, say, That Origen writ upon all the Books of the Holy Scripture. We shall here give the several Books in order, of which there remains now any knowledge.

Thirteen Tomes of Commentaries, and two Books of Mystical Homilies upon Genesis. St. Hierom apud Ruffinum invect. 2. & Ep. ad Damasum. Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 24. But these thirteen Tomes went no farther than Ver. 15. of the 4th Chap. where it is written, Omnis qui occiderit Cain, &c. St. Hierom ibidem ad Damasum, q. 1.

Two Books of Mystical Homilies upon Genesis. Idem Ibid.

Pamphilus in his Apology produces a small Fragment of his Preface upon Genesis.

Commentaries upon Exodus in the Philocalia, chap. 26.

Item, Some Scholia.

And twelve Homilies.

Scholias upon Leviticus, and sixteen Homilies. Ruffin. invect. 2. & in Prologo Homil. in Num.

Commentaries upon Deuteronomy, which he cites himself, Tom. 32. in Joan. and in the 8th Homily upon St. Luke Cassiodorus had seen eight Books of them, de Inst. Divin. c. 7.

Sixe Homilies. Ruffin. Prolog. ad Ursat.

Six and twenty Homilies upon Joshuah.

Nine Homilies upon the Books of Judges.

Two Homilies upon the Kings: One upon the first Chapter of the first Book;

And the other Intituled, De Engastrimytho.

Cassiodorus had seen another upon the first Book of Kings, one upon the Second, and a very long one upon the second Book of Chronicles. Lib. De rerum. Div. cap. 2.

He composed several Homilies upon Job; witness Eustathius in Diagnostico de Engastrimytho; and St. Hierom Ep. 75. The first of whom tells us, That he had said some things very childish concerning the Names of Job's Daughters: and the second, that he had said some things concerning the Stars, and against the Devil,

Three Fragments of Tomes, some Commentaries upon Genesis, related by Eusebius in his Books de Praparatione.

The first upon Ver. 12. of the first Chapter of Genesis, taken from the 7th Book.

The second taken out of the third Tome, upon Ver. 14. taken from the 6th Book, and in the 22d Chapter of the Philocalia.

The third, which is in the Philocalia, chap. 14. is extracted out of the same Tome upon the 16th Verse.

Some Fragments taken from the Philocalia, cap. 16, & 17.

Some Commentaries upon Exodus, and upon Leviticus [2].

A Fragment of the 20th Homily upon Joshuah, in his Philocalia, cap. 12.

The Homily de Engastrimytho was taken from a Manuscript of the Vatican Library, and published by Leo Allatius in 1629. with Eustathius in Hexameron, who wrote against this Homily of Origen's. The Subject of this Discourse is, to enquire whether the Witch of Endor did really raise the Soul of Samuel, or whether the Devil only appeared in his shape. Origen maintains the first Opinion, and Eustathius the second, Authors are divided hereupon.

A Fragment upon the first Psalm, taken from St. Epiphanius, Haref. 64. Three others taken from the Philocalia, cap. 2, & 3.

Seventeen Latin Homilies upon Genesis, translated by Ruffinus [1]. It is doubted whether they be not extracted from the two Books of Mystical Homilies, because they seem to be of the number of those which were made ex tempore, and transcribed by the Writers. The last Homily is imperfect.

Twelve Homilies upon Exodus, translated by Ruffinus.

Sixteen upon Leviticus, attributed falsly to St. Cyril, translated also by Ruffinus.

Eight and twenty Homilies upon Numbers, which are doubtful, because they were translated by Ruffinus with great liberty [3].

Six and twenty Homilies upon Joshuah; to which there is a Preface attributed to St. Hierom; but 'tis more likely to be by Ruffinus, as well as the Translation of this Work, both because of the conformity of Style in the Prologue and in the Version, as because he owns them in the conclusion of the Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans.

NineHomilies upon Judges, all translated by Ruffinus for the same Reasons.

The first Homily upon the Kings, which is in all probability done by the same Interpreter.

Nine Homilies upon the Psalms, translated by Ruffinus.

[1] In the Prologue to Ursatius, which is written by Ruffinus, he says, That he has collected and translated into Latin, the Homilies of Origen upon the whole Pentateuch; so that though this Version in Merlin's Edition bears St. Hierom's Name, yet it was made by Ruffinus, as Erasmus and Genebrard acknowledge. The Author of the Conclusion to the Version of the Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans, which is also Ruffinus, says positively, That he had translated Origen's Homilies upon Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus: They are those that follow.

[2] There is in the Philocalia, cap. 1. a passage taken from the second Homily upon Leviticus, which is not to be found in those Latin Homilies which we have. He must therefore necessarily have written more than sixteen. Besides, in those which we have, Hom. 4, & 6. he cites more of them.

[3] The Style is Ruffinus's, who has made a Preface thereto; in which he affirms, and also in his Prologue to Ursatius, That he has collected in this Work, and dispos'd in order, all that he could find of Origen's upon Numbers, whether they were written in Homilies or Scholia; so that this Work is more Ruffinus's than Origen's; and we must not wonder, if we therein find some Explications which appear to be of a Latin Author, and later than Origen.

Devil, which the Church does not receive.

He was the firſt that made Commentaries upon all the Pſalms, as St. Hierom tells us, Ep. 89. St. Hilary has copied and imitated them in ſeveral places. Trithemius ſays that he had ſeen them.

He alſo wrote Homilies and Scholia upon the Pſalms, as the Author of the Commentaries upon the Pſalms, attributed to St. Hierom, aſſures us.

A Commentary upon the Proverbs, cited by Pamphilus.

Two Commentaries upon the Song of Songs: One was made when he was young;

The other, which he compoſed when he was older, divided into Ten Tomes, in which he has out-done himſelf; upon which account, St. Gregory Nyſſen ſays, That he has taken extraordinary pains upon this Book of Scripture, In Proœmio lib. Canticorum.

Thirty Books of Commentaries upon Iſaiah.

Five and twenty Homilies.

And ſome Scholia. Hier. lib. 1. Apol. adverſus Ruffin. cap. 3. & in Proœmio Comment. MSS. Euſebius Book 6. chap. 32. ſays, That the thirty Tomes went as far as the Viſion of the four-footed Beaſts.

Several Homilies upon Jeremy: Caſſiodorus and Rabanus Maurus tell us, That there were 45 of them.

Five Tomes of Commentaries upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah; Euſebius.

Five and twenty Books of Commentaries, and ſome Homilies upon Ezekiel; Euſebius Book 6. chap. 32.

Some Commentaries upon Daniel; Orig. Tract. 24. in Matth.

Five and twenty Volumes of Commentaries upon the leſſer Prophets. St. Hieron. de Scriptorib. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 6. cap. 36. The Commentaries upon Hoſea and Zachary are a part of them. St. Hierom makes mention of two little Books of Origen upon Hoſea, in the Preface to his Commentary upon the Prophets: but he did not explain it entirely, as it appears by St. Hierom, and by the Philocalid.

Another Fragment containing the Catalogue of the Sacred Books, taken from Euſebius's Hiſtory, lib. 6. cap. 25.

Another from St. Epiphanius, Ibid.

Item, One upon the 4th Pſalm, taken from the Philocalia, cap. 25.

One upon the 40th Pſalm, Ibid.

And laſtly, One upon the 82d Pſalm, taken from a Homily; Euſebius Hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 38.

A Fragment taken from his firſt Commentary upon the Canticles, in the Philocalia, chap. 27. And one taken from his ſecond, chap. 26.

Nineteen Homilies upon Jeremiah, falſly attributed to St. Cyril, and publiſh'd by Corderius, twelve whereof are tranſlated by St. Hierom.

A Fragment of the 39th taken from the Philocalia, chap. 1.

A Fragment extracted from the 20th Tome, taken from the Philocalia, chap. 11.

A Fragment of the Commentary upon Hoſea, in the Philocalia, chap. 8.

Two paſſages taken from the Commentary upon the Canticles, in the Apology of Pamphilus, tranſlated by Ruffinus, in St. Hierom Tom. 4.

Huetius believes, that the Latin Book upon the Canticles ought not to be divided into Homilies, ſince it is a continued Commentary, and that it is the very Commentary of Origen tranſlated by Ruffinus.

Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral others, think that it is by a Latin Author. See the Remarks here at the ſide [4].

Two Homilies tranſlated by St. Hierom word for word.

Two paſſages taken from his Commentary upon Iſaiah. One upon the 1 chap. and the other upon the 28th chap. in the Apology attributed to Pamphilus in the 4th Tome of St. Hierom.

Nine Homilies tranſlated by St. Hierom (as the ſame St. Hierom in his Catalogue, and the conformity of the Style, makes it appear.) The 9th is imperfect, to which there is added the end of the 9th Homily upon Jeremiah.

Fourteen Homilies upon Jeremiah, tranſlated by St. Hierom, twelve whereof are alſo in Greek; but the Tranſlation differs very much from the Greek, and the Homilies are diſpoſed without any order.

Fourteen Homilies upon Ezekiel, tranſlated by St. Jerome, [illegible] Prologue, Style, St. Jerome's own Teſtimony in Catalogo aſſure us, and Ruffinus Invect. 2.

St. Jerome inſerted into his Commentaries upon Daniel, Origen's Scholia, taken out of his 10th Book of Stromata.

[4] Not only the Proteſtant Criticks, as Perkins, Coke, Rivet, and others, do reject this Work after Eraſmus and Amerbachius, but likewiſe Sixtus Senenſis, and ſeveral Papiſts. In ſome Editions it is attributed to St. Ambroſe, in others to Peter Lombard, others, as Merlin, Genebrard, and Huetius, believe it to be that of Origen; and even Blondel in his Apology is of this opinion, as well as Aubertin. The Reaſons againſt it are, That it appears to be by a Latin Author, 1. Becauſe in his Prologue he cites the Greeks, as ſtrangers to him. 'Tis anſwered, That he oppoſes the Greeks not to the Latins, but to the Chriſtians. 2. 'Tis ſaid, That the Author ſpeaks as if he had written in Latin; for he explains the three Greek Names of the three parts of Philoſophy; Generales Diſciplinæ, ſays he, quibus ad ſcientiam pervenitur, tres ſunt, quas Græci Ethicam, Phyſicam, & Theoriam appellaverunt, (nos has dicere poſſumus Moralem, Naturalem, & Inſpectivam) nonnulli ſane etiam Logicam, quam nos rationalem poſſumus dicere. And in another place he ſays, That the Greek word ἀγαπᾶν ought to be tranſlated by diligere, and ἀγάπη by dilectio. 'Tis anſwer'd, That theſe Explications are by the Interpreter. A third Reaſon, which is more conſiderable, is, That St. Hierom in his Prologue upon Origen's two Homilies upon the Canticles, which he tranſlated, ſaith, That Origen in the ten Tomes explain'd the Tranſlations of the Septuagint, of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and the fifth Verſion; which is not to be found in this Work: But this perhaps was left out by Ruffinus; beſides, it may be ſaid that this Commentary here may be accommodated to all theſe Verſions: ſo the Reaſons which are for the Negative are but weak, whereas thoſe which are for the Affirmative are very ſtrong. Firſt, It is certain that Origen did write upon the Canticles. Secondly, This Commentary has the Character and Style of Origen, which gives an allegorical and figurative ſenſe to every thing. Thirdly, There are ſome Sentences and Thoughts exactly like thoſe which are in the Homilies tranſlated by St. Hierom. Fourthly, It explains the Hebrew words, and draws from thence a myſtical ſenſe, after Origen's way. Fifthly, He here cites his other Works. Sixthly, He has peculiar Notions concerning the Soul and the Angels. And laſtly, That which is a convincing Proof, is, That the Greek Fragment of Origen upon the Canticles, cited in the Philocalia, is found here, though interpreted with a great deal of liberty. That it is a continued Commentary, and not Homilies, is proved by the Style, becauſe there is a Preface written by the Author; and beſides, all Origen's Homilies have a like form of Concluſion, whereas this Commentary is continued without this Concluſion. Ruffinus is the Author of this Tranſlation; and it is certain that it was not St. Hierom, who ſays in the Prologue of the two Homilies, That this Tranſlation would require too much leiſure, pains, and expence, and that he durſt not undertake it. Gennadius ſays, That all Origen's Works which were not tranſlated by St. Hierom, were done by Ruffinus; and indeed the Style of it is very like Ruffinus's.

	[5] Five and twenty Tomes of Commentaries upon St. Matthew, with Homilies and Scholia. Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 36. and St. Hierom in Proæmio Comment. in Matth.	A Fragment of the first Tome upon St. Matthew, in Eusebius lib. 6. Hist. cap. 25. Another taken from the first Tome in the Philocalia, chap. 6. The Commentaries from the 13th Chap. Ver. 36. to the 22d Chap. Ver. 33. are published by Huetius, who has copied it from a Manuscript in the Queen of Sweden's Library; and from another in the King's Library, from the 11th to the 16th Tome, and comprising the 17th.	A Fragment of the first Tome upon St. Matthew, in the Apology of Pamphilus. Another of the 7th Tome, ibid. Bullinger cites some passages thereof, in Disput. contra Casaubonum, p. 2. De-amb. 3. p. 19. taken out of the Commentary upon the 6th Chap. and the 23d. The Translation of the Commentaries upon St. Matthew, from the 13th Chap. Ver. 16. to the 27th, Ver. 66. is improperly divided into 36. Homilies, made by Erasmus, from the 13th Chap. Ver. 36. to the 16th Chap. Ver. 20. The remainder is an ancient Version, of which we do not know the Author [6].	[5] In the Preface attributed to St. Hierom upon the Homilies on St. Luke, there are 36. Ruffinus in his second Invective reckons 26 of them, we had better keep to the Account of Eusebius, and St. Hierom. [6] Some have attributed it to St. Hierom; but he himself says in his Prologue upon St. Luke, that he would not undertake it. In his *65*th Epistle, he says, that no Person dar'd till his time to interpret the Books de Principiis, and the Tomes of Origen, therefore it is not ancienter than St. Hierom. Neither was it done by Ruffinus, who in his Version of the Apology of Pamphilus translates some passages of this Commentary, and relates them after a different manner than what is to be found in this Version, which differs very much from the Text; and it is quite another Style from that of St. Hierom, and of Ruffinus. 'Tis probably later than Gennadius, who says that all that we have of Origen in his time was translated by St. Hierom or Ruffinus. Aquinas relates some passages of them word for word, in his Catena aurea: so that this Author is between Gennadius and Aquinas, and nearer the first than the last, because he cites a passage of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, Tract. 8. which was not quoted by Origen; which shews its Antiquity, besides the Style and the Terms are old. Huetius, from whose Observations we have taken all this, believes that it was made in Cassiodorus's time, and that it might be ascrib'd to Epiphanius Scholasticus, the Author of the Tripartite History, were not the Style quite different: Therefore he attributes it to one Bellator, a Friend of Cassiodorus, who had translated several Greek Books, and particularly some of Origen's Homilies, at the desire of Cassiodorus.
	Commentaries upon St. Luke. 5. Tomes. St. Hierom. Pro. Hom. in Lucam. Origen T. 13 in Mat. Nine and Thirty Homilies upon St. Luke. Id. Ibid. & in Catalogo. Two and thirty Tomes of Commentaries upon St. John. Ruffin. Invect. 2. Some homilies upon the Acts.	There are but 9 Tomes upon St. John extant, 1. 2. 6. 10. 13. 19. 20. 28. 32. Ferrarius published a Version divided into 32 Tomes, taken from a Venetian MS. Huetius published the Greek from a MS. in the King's Library. A Fragment of the 4th Tome. Philocal. c. 4. Another of the 5th Tome. Ibid. c. 4. A Fragment of the Comments upon the Acts. ib. c. 7.	Nine and thirty Homilies upon St. Luke, translated by St. Hierom [7].	[7] He mentions it in the Catalogue of his Works, and in his Prologue to Paula, & Eustochium; and it is quoted by Ruffinus in his Invective. Ruffinus upbraids him for having omitted and alter'd, in translating Origen's Homilies upon St. Luke, those passages which were against the Divinity of the Son; and that when he quoted this passage, Ecce enim ut facta est vox, &c. he observes that he added, Principium substantiæ ejus; which is to be found in the 4th of those Homilies that we have still extant. Lastly, according to the report of Ruffinus, St. Hierom translated seventy of Origen's Homilies. Now he had Translated 14 upon Jeremiah, 14 upon Ezekiel, and 9 upon Isaiah, as appears by his Prologue upon Ezekiel; and there remains to make up the 70, these 39 upon St. Luke; besides that those which we have under his Name, are written according to the Style and manner of Origen. It is objected in the first place, That there are therein several Greek words turn'd into Latin: for example, it is observed, That κεχαριτωμένη, that is to say, gratiâ plena; That ἀλόγως, that is, sine ratione; That cadaver comes á casu; That in the Greek there is an article. Homily 22, and Homily 25. Answ. These Explications are put in by the Interpreter. There are the like in those Books which we have at present in Greek and which are undoubtedly his, and in the ancient translators, as in him that interpreted St. Irenæus, &c. Secondly, It is objected That the Holy Ghost is there called the Third Person. Ans. Origen often said, That the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost were Three Hypostases, and the Latins have translated the Word Hypostasis by that of Person: For example, Ferrarius translated that passage of the second Tome in Joan. after the same manner. Third Objection: He makes a Dialogue between the Devil and Jesus Christ, and makes them hold long Discourses together. Ans. This is exactly Origen's way. Fourth Objection: He makes use of the Authority of Isaiah and the Psalms against the Sadducees, in the 39th Homily; whereas Origen said that the Sadducees admitted only the Law, and by consequence he would not have made use of any other Books against them. Answ. Origen never said that the Sadducees did not admit the Prophets, but only that they did not make use of them to prove the Doctrines of Faith.
	Commentaries upon the Epistles to the Romans, which were to the number of 15 Tomes, according to Ruffinus in the Preface to his Version; or twenty, according to Cassiodorus. Some Commentaries upon the first Epistle to the Corinthians; Hom. 17. in Luc. & Hier. Ep. 52. Some Commentaries, Homilies and Scholia upon the Epistle to the Galatians. St. Hierom in Proæmio Commentar. Ep. ad Galat. & p. 89. ad August. Three Tomes upon the Epistle to the Ephesians. Lib. 1. Apol. ad Ruff. 4, 5. A Commentary upon the Epistle to the Colossians. Apolog. de Pamphilo. One upon the Epistle to the Thessalonians. Hier. Ep. 52.	A Fragment of the first Tome of the Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans, chap. 24. of the Philocalia. Another taken from the 9th Tome, in the 9th chap. of the Philocalia.	Ruffinus translated 15 or 20 Tomes of Origen's Commentaries upon the Epistle to the Romans [8]. Fragments of Commentaries upon the Epistles to the Colossians and to Titus, in the Apology of Pamphilus. St. Hierom, in the Epistle to Minervius and Alexander, re-	[8] Ruffinus abridged them into half the compass, as he acknowledges in his Preface. Some attribute this Version to St. Hierom; but unjustly: for in the conclusion he strikes at St. Hierom in these Words: Some perhaps may ask me why I put my Name, and may enquire why I have not set down, for example, the Commentaries of Hierom, upon the Epistle to the Romans. And he adds, that he translated the Books of St. Clement; and that we should not think that it was done by Hierom, he puts the Name of Clement in the Title, which shews that this Translation was done by Ruffinus. We have also two Latin Passages taken from the Apology of Pamphilus.

Some Commentaries and Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

He promiſed a Commentary upon the Apocalypſe, Tom. 3. in Matth.

Euſebius lib. 6. cap. 25. relates a Fragment upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

All theſe Greek Fragments are exactly collected by Huetius in the two Volumes which he has publiſhed, containing all that remains in Greek of Origen's Works upon the Scripture; and 'tis to him that we are indebted for almoſt all the Remarks that are here. He has not inſerted the Fragments which are in the Catena, becauſe he believes they are not of any great Authority.

lates a Fragment of the Commentaries of Origen upon the Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians.

Laſtly, There are ſome Fragments of a Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, in the Apology of Pamphilus.

The other Treatiſes of Origen are not near ſo many in Number as his Works upon the Holy Scripture: and yet they were very conſiderable: for not to mention his Commentaries upon the Philoſophers, which Euſebius ſpeaks of in the 6th Book, Chap. 18. of his Hiſtory, he wrote (s) 2 Books of the Reſurrection; the Treatiſe de Principiis, divided into 4 Books; 10 Books of Stromata, (t) witneſs the ſame Euſebius, Chap. 24. The Book of Martyrdom, Mentioned in the 28 Chapter, the 8 Books againſt Celſus in the 36 Chapter, the Letter to Africanus, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna; to which we may add, the Diſpute which he had with Beryllus, which was extant in Euſebius's Time, (u) and ſome Diſcourſes and Letters which Euſebius collected, and divided into three Books, as he declares in the ſame 5th Book, Chap. 36. St. Hierom mentions almoſt all his Works; and beſides theſe, two other Dialogues of the Reſurrection, and a Treatiſe explaining the Hebrew Names of the new Teſtament, which he added to that of Philo, concerning the Explanation of thoſe of the Old (x). And alſo in the Apology of Pamphilus, there is mention made of a Treatiſe concerning Prayer, compoſed by Origen. Theodoret often cites our Author againſt divers Hereticks (y): but we muſt not therefore think that he compoſed ſo many expreſs Treatiſes againſt theſe Hereticks; they are only ſome Paſſages of his Works, where he confutes ſeveral Errors, whilſt he is Writing upon other Subjects.

The Chief of all theſe Books is the Diſcourſe againſt Celſus, divided into eight Books, which were publiſhed in Greek long ſince, with the Tranſlation of Gelenius, and the Notes of Hæſchelius, and of one Chriſtoph. Perſona printed at Rome in the Year 1471, and afterwards very correctly in England in 1658. The Exhortation to Martyrdom has been lately publiſhed by Weſtſtenius, the Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, together with the Letter to Africanus, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna, which was formerly ſet forth in part by Hæſchelius, in the Year 1602. We have likewiſe the Verſion of the four Books de Principiis, compoſed by Ruffinus. But he has taken ſo much liberty (aa), That we cannot diſcern what is Origen's own. There are ſome Latin Fragments of the Books of the Reſurrection, cited in the Apology of Pamphilus, which we have only in Latin. The Letter to St. Gregory Thaumaturgus is intire in Greek in the Philocalia. Ruffinus relates a Fragment of a Letter to thoſe of Alexandria, where he complains that they had corrupted his Books. St. Hierom accuſes him for having omitted, that in this ſame Letter Origen railed at Demetrius, Biſhop of Alexandria, and at thoſe others who had condemned him. Euſebius alſo produces, as we have already ſaid, ſome Fragments of two Letters. The Book of Prayer, which Huetius had promiſed, has been lately Publiſhed in Greek and Latin in England. This Work was addreſſed to Ambroſe and Tatianus, and it may be divided into three Parts. In the firſt, he treats of the Neceſſity, the Advantage, and the good Effects of Prayer. In the Second, he diſcourſes of the different kinds of Prayer, and particularly explains the Lord's Prayer. In the laſt, he ſpeaks of the Circumſtances and Conditions which ought to precede, accompany and follow our Prayers. Laſtly, We may joyn to Origen's Works the Philocalia, which is a Collection of ſeveral Paſſages of Origen, relating to the Holy Scripture, made by St. Baſil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, and publiſhed by Tarinus in the Year 1618, and the Book of the Apology of Pamphilus, of which we have the Tranſlation done by Ruffinus, which is amongſt St. Hierom's Works in the Fourth Tome.

We ought alſo to have reckoned here the Dialogue againſt Marcion, which bears his Name, if it was not more probable that it was compoſed by another Author (bb), who has introduced Origen in this Dialogue defending the Church's Cauſe and therefore has given it Origen's Name, as Cicero gave that of Lælius and Cato to his Books of Friendſhip and Old Age.

(s) He wrote two Books of the Reſurrection.] St. Hierom in Ruffin. lib. 2. Inveſt. ſays, That Origen compoſed two Books, and two Dialogues of the Reſurrection. The ſame in his 6th Epiſtle cites the 4th Book of the Reſurrection. Methodius wrote againſt this Work.

(t) The Treatiſe de Principiis, divided into four Books, and ten Books of Stromata.] This laſt Book was compoſed in imitation of that of St. Clement of Alexandria; witneſs St. Hierom, Ep. 84. who ſays, That Origen compared therein the Opinions of the Philoſophers and Chriſtians, and proved our Doctrines from Plato, Ariſtotle, Numenius and Cornutus. In the tenth Book he explained the Epiſtle to the Galatians, and ſome Paſſages of Daniel.

(u) And ſome Diſcourſes, and Letters which Euſebius had collected.] Euſebius has related a Fragment of that which he wrote to his Father, being then very young, lib. 6. cap. 2. Item, of another againſt thoſe who accuſed him of applying himſelf too much to the Study of Human Learning, Chap. 19. He makes mention in the 28 Chapter of the Letters which he wrote in the Time of the ſixth Perſecution; afterwards in the 36 Chapter, of a Letter to the Emperor Philip, and of one to Severa his Wife; and laſtly, of one to Fabianus, and of ſeveral others, cited at large in the 39th Chapter. St. Hierom in his Catalogue, cites the three laſt, together with a Letter to Beryllus. Ruffinus cites a Letter to his Friends, Lib. de Adult. lib. Origenis; where he complains that ſome had falſified his Writings. In the 13th Chapter of Philocalia, there is part of one ſet down to Gregory Thaumaturgus; Cedrenus and Suidas have preſerved a fragment of another Letter.

(x) Concerning the Explanation of thoſe of the Old.] St. Hierom in Præfat. ad lib. Hebr. Nom. The Author of the Orthodox Queſtions, attributed to St. Juſtin, Queſt. 82, and 86.

(y) Theodoret often cites our Author againſt divers Hereticks.] Lib. 1. Cap. 2. He ſays that he wrote againſt Menander. In the 4th Chapter againſt Baſilides and Iſidorus; in the 7th, againſt the Heleeſaites; Euſebius ſays, concerning theſe laſt, That it was in his Homilies. In the 19th Chapter, againſt Appelles; in the 3d Book, Chap. 2. againſt the Nazareans. He attributes to him in the 5th Chapter, the little Labyrinth againſt Theodotus, which is by another Author.

(aa) But he has taken therein ſo much Liberty.] He declares it himſelf in his Preface, where he ſays, that he has retrenched and added ſeveral things concerning the Trinity. The Paſſages out of theſe Books, related in the Apology, are quite different from this Verſion, as well as thoſe which are in the Philocalia.

(bb) If it was not more Probable that it was compoſed by another Author.] This Dialogue is a Diſpute againſt the Marcionites, and the Valentinians, wherein he introduces Origen, defending the Doctrines of the Church; Megethius, and Marcus taking the part of the Marcionites; Droſerius, Valens, and Maximus, that of the Valentinians, and Eutropius as a Judge between them. We have three different Verſions of it, that of Perionius, and that of Picus, printed in 1655, and that of Humfredus in 1557, which is much the exacteſt. But it has been lately publiſhed in Greek by a Learned Engliſh-man, who pretends that it is Origen's. Huetius after Halloixius and Rivet believes that it is not Origen's, and this Opinion ſeems the moſt probable. 'Tis indeed cited in the Philocalia, as a Work [Whom our Author means by this Engliſh-Man I know not. Weſtſtenius, the Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, was the firſt that publiſhed it at Baſil, Gr. Lat. in 1674. 4*to*.]

But

Origen.

But we muſt reckon amongſt the Suppoſititious Books two different Commentaries upon Job, Printed in Latin under Origen's Name; the firſt divided into three Books, which concludes about the middle of the third Chapter of Job. We do not certainly know whether it was compoſed in Latin, or whether it was tranſlated from the Greek (cc): however, 'tis certain that it was not written by Origen (dd), but by ſome other Author, who lived ſince the Time of Arius (ee), and one that was an Arian himſelf.

The other Commentary upon the Book of Job, tranſlated by Perionius from a Manuſcript of the King's Library, is alſo by an Arian (ff), but different from the firſt, though he commends the Martyr Lucian as well as Origen, and ſpeaks of the Manichees. The four Homilies upon Job, which were publiſhed under Origen's Name in the firſt Edition by Genebrard, were left out in the ſecond, becauſe they are not Origen's, no more than St. Chryſoſtom's to whom they are ſtill attributed. It is obſerved in a Letter prefixed to Eraſmus's Edition, that there were ſtill remaining under Origen's Name ſome Little Notes upon Job, which they would not Inſert in his Works, becauſe they appeared to be of a quite different Style and Genius.

Origen.

There is in the King's Library, a Commentary upon St. Mark, aſcribed likewiſe to Origen, which is certainly none of his (gg).

The ten Homilies upon ſeveral Paſſages of the Goſpel, collected by Merlinus, are all written by others (hh), being written after a quite different Manner, and almoſt all of them compoſed by a Latin. The Book concerning Sighs, or Penance, attributed to Origen, and placed by Gelaſius among the Number of the Apocryphal Pieces is without doubt counterfeit, as well as his Preface. Morellus cauſed to be Printed under Origen's Name, in the Year 1601, ſome Scholia upon the Lord's Prayer, and upon of Origen's: But it is poſſible that St. Gregory and St. Baſil might have been deceived, becauſe it bears his Name; or that believing that this Book containing nothing but Origen's Opinions, and going under his Name, they might quote it in a Work wherein they made a Collection of his Opinions. Beſides, it appears by the Title, that they had taken this Paſſage from Euſebius, who relates it word for word as it is in the Philocalia, in his 7th Book de Præparatione Evangelicâ, as taken from the Treatiſe of one Maximus περὶ ὕλης that is to ſay, concerning Matter; and at the end they add the following remark; This is extracted from Euſebius's Book, De Præparatione Evangelicâ; the Author thereof is Maximus, a famous Writer among the Chriſtians, as Euſebius obſerves; but it is likewiſe found almoſt in the ſame Terms in Origen's Dialogue againſt the Marcionites and other Hereticks, in which Megethius is the Diſputant, and Eutropius the Judge. This Obſervation makes it appear, that the Authors of the Philocalia believed that this paſſage did really belong to Maximus, relying upon Euſebius's Authority; but having alſo found it in a Dialogue which bears Origen's Name, they believed that they might cite it as his, without examining whether he was the Author of it; for 'tis a thing very unlikely to affirm, that Origen had taken this Paſſage from Maximus, to inſert it into his Dialogue, ſince it is already in Euſebius in form of a Dialogue, though the Names be ſuppreſſed. So it ſeems, that we may ſay that Maximus was the Author of this Dialogue, wherein he introduces Origen, diſputing againſt the Hereticks, and Eutropius as a Judge. But there are conſiderable Difficulties raiſed againſt this Hypotheſis. The firſt, That Maximus was more ancient than Origen, as appears by Euſebius, who in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 27. places him amongſt the Authors who flouriſhed under the Emperors Commodus and Severus. The Second is, That it is not likely the Treatiſe of Maximus ſhould be this Dialogue, becauſe it was Entituled concerning Matter, and he only proved therein, that Matter was a created Subſtance, whereas this Dialogue contains ſeveral other Points of Religion. We may anſwer to the firſt Reaſon, That Euſebius was not exact in ſetting down the Times of Authors, and eſpecially of thoſe about whoſe Lives he was not particular. The ſecond Objection is more difficult; though we may ſay, that Euſebius having extracted out of this Book of Maximus, only what relates to the Original of evil, and the Creation of Matter, he gave it the Title of περὶ ὕλης, & unde ſit malum, though it treated of other Subjects; beſides that, this Dialogue was chiefly deſigned to confute the Error of the Marcionites, who admitted of ſeveral Principles for the explaining the cauſe of Evil, and that of the Valentinians, who made Matter Eternal. Which agrees with what Euſebius ſays in his Hiſtory, that Maximus compoſed ſeveral Volumes concerning that famous Queſtion among the Hereticks; From whence comes Evil? and to prove that Matter is created Subſtance, for though there are other things diſcourſed of in this Dialogue, yet theſe are the two Principal Heads. Nevertheleſs, as the Paſſage which is related by Euſebius, and in the Philocalia, does not agree exactly with what is in this Dialogue, and that the Names of Origen, and the other Diſputants are not there to be found, 'tis likely they were added after the Death of Maximus and Origen. There are likewiſe in this Dialogue ſome Things which might give occaſion to conjecture, that is is more Modern than any of theſe Authors. For it having been objected in the Firſt Part, that the God of the Creation, who has the Hearts of Kings in his Power, muſt of neceſſity be a wicked God, ſince he ſuffered the Chriſtians to be perſecuted: He anſwers, Theſe piriful Shifts which you make, might have had ſome probability in former times, and there might have been ſome neceſſity then of returning an Anſwer to them, which might have been done very eaſily: But now we have a Religious Prince, what have you to ſay? Will you ſay that it is another God who rules his Heart, ſince this Godly Prince governs us much better than the others, and yet after a quite contrary manner; for he eſtabliſhes what the others would have deſtroyed, he overthrows the Images and Temples which the others honoured. Which ſhews that this Dialogue was compoſed in Conſtantine's time; for to ſay that this is to be underſtood of Philip, is to affirm a thing of which there is no likelihood; becauſe ſuppoſe that he was a Chriſtian, of which we are not aſſured, it was moſt certain that he did not make Profeſſion thereof, and we cannot ſay of any Emperor before Conſtantine, that he overthrew Idolatry, and deſtroyed Temples and Idols. So the moſt probable Opinion is, That this Dialogue was compoſed in the Beginning of the fourth Age by one of Origen's Diſciples, who has inſerted Maximus's Dialogue unto his diſcourſe. Beſides there is another Reaſon not to attribute it to Origen, which is taken notice of by Huetius; which is that we find ſome Notions that are very Orthodox, and quite different from Origen's Errors concerning the State of Innocence, Man's Body, the Soul and the Reſurrection.

(cc) Whether it was compoſed in Latin, or whether it was tranſlated from the Greek.] Eraſmus, Aubertin, and Coke are of Opinion that it was Latin, becauſe the Phraſe, and manner of Expreſſion is Latin; but this might proceed from the Interpreter. That which makes it believed that the Author was rather a Greek, is the Prologue which is in the Interpreters Name; which Eraſmus rejects as Suppoſititious.

(dd) 'Tis certain that it was not written by Origen.] He ſays ſome things contrary to what Origen affirms. For Example, in the Second Book, he ſays that Jeſus Chriſt preached three years and a half; and Origen, in his Book De Principiis, Cap. 2. and Hom. 32. in Lucam, ſays that he preached but a Year and odd Months.

(ee) But by ſome other Author, who lived ſince the Time of Arius.] He calls the Church that believes the Trinity, a Sect and a Hereſie. He rejects the Word Trinity and ὁμοούσιος; He commends the Martyr Lucian, who died a long time after Origen, and whom the Arians extolled as their Patron: Upon which Arius calls Euſebius of Nicomedia, Colluſianita; And this ſufficiently ſhews how groſly they are miſtaken, who have attributed theſe Commentaries to St. Hilary.

(ff) The other Commentary upon the whole Book of Job, is alſo by an Arian.] He condemns the Term ὁμοούσιος; and calls the Catholicks Homouſiaſts; He commends Lucian the Martyr; and it is different from the Firſt, becauſe he makes Moſes to be the Author of the Book of Job, and the Firſt only makes him to be the Interpreter. Whereas Origen, in his Sixth Book againſt Celſus, ſays, that Moſes wrote nothing but the Pentateuch. It is of a different Style from the Treatiſes of Origen, and he confutes thoſe who believe the Stars to be animated, which is Origen's Opinion.

(gg) A Commentary upon St. Mark, aſcribed likewiſe to Origen, which is none of his.] It is of quite a different Style. He ſays he will collect the Opinions of the Ancients. In ſome Manuſcripts it is attributed to St. Cyril; in others to Victor of Antioch: It has been Tranſlated, and Publiſhed under this Name by Peltanus. He cites Origen, Euſebius, St. Chryſoſtom, Apollinarius, and Theodoret; and he mentions the Novatians.

(hh) The Ten Homilies are all of other Authors than Origen.] they have been collected in ſeveral Places, and put into order by Merlinus. They are all written in a different Style from Origen's; and compoſed by a Latin Author: they have all deſigns that are quite differing from thoſe of Origen's Homilies; they are full of Quibbles upon Words, and of affected Rhetorical Figures, which is not to be found in Origen's Works. In the firſt, he ſays, that Jeſus Chriſt was born of the Virgin, without opening of her Womb; The contrary to which is taught by Origen, in the 14th Homily upon St. Luke. The ſecond diſcourſes of the Arians and the Manichees; and therein the Term ὁμοούσιος is defended; therein likewiſe are cited the Books attributed to St. Dionyſius. The 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 10th Books are all filled with vain Repetitions, Antitheſes, Quibbles upon Words, Synonima's and Alluſions, which prove that it is a Latin Author, they are of the ſame Style of the firſt. The 9th is compoſed of three Parts (as Huetius has obſerved.) The Firſt is part of Origen's 34th Diſcourſe upon St. Matthew. The Second is taken from St. Hierom's 8th Book upon Iſaiah; and the Laſt from the 17th Chapter of St. Gregory's Ninth Book of Morals.

Origen. the Hymn of the bleſſed Virgin, and of Zachary; but the Bibliotheca Patrum, &c. (ii) informs us, that they were written by Petrus Laodicenſis Beſides there were found in the Vatican Library, ſome Homilies upon Jeremiah, ſome whereof were Printed by Chiſletius in the Year 1623, which alſo are none of his. The Book concerning Cœlibacy of the Clergy, which is amongſt St. Cyprian's Works, bears the Name of Origen in a Manuſcript of the King's Library (kk), but 'tis the Work of a Latin Author. It is ſaid alſo, that there are in Libraries ſome Treatiſes under this Author's Name (ll), which are very dubious, they not being cited by the Ancients, and being for the moſt part upon ſuch Subjects, upon which it is not likely that Origen ſhould have written.

I ſhall not ſtand to ſet down in particular the ſeveral Editions of Origen's Works as well in Greek as in Latin, having already taken notice of the greateſt part of them: It ſhall ſuffice me to ſay, That all Origen's Works that are in Latin, have been collected by Merlinus, and afterwards by Eraſmus, and Printed in two Volumes at Paris in the Year 1512, and at Baſil, in the Years 1526, 1545, and 1571. That Genebrard has ſince made a larger Collection, Printed at Paris in 1574, 1604, and 1619; and at Baſil in 1620. That all the Greek Fragments of Origen's Books upon the Scripture, are publiſhed with a tranſlation by the Learned Huetius, and Printed in France in two Volumes, in the Year 1667, but that he has not yet ſet forth the other Works of Origen, as he promiſed. That his Books, againſt Celſus, and the Philocalia were Printed in England in 1658. That Wetſtenius, Greek Profeſſor at Baſil, cauſed to be Printed there, in 1674, the Dialogue againſt Marcion. The Exhortation to Martyrdom, and the Letters of Africanus and Origen, concerning the Hiſtory of Suſanna; and laſtly, That the Book concerning Prayer has been lately Printed in England. So that to have all Origen's Works, as well thoſe which we have only in Latin, as thoſe in Greek, we muſt have Genebrard's Edition, Huetius's two Volumes, the Books againſt Celſus, with the Philocalia, Printed in England in Quarto; the Quarto Volume ſet forth by Wetſtenius, and the little Treatiſe concerning Prayer, lately Printed in England.

It would be very tedious, and to little purpoſe, to give here an Abridgment of all Origen's works, and Particularly of his Homilies, and his Commentaries upon the Scripture, which are almoſt all full of Allegories and Morality; beſides, having only the Verſion of the greateſt part of the Homilies, we cannot be certain whether that which relates to Doctrine and Diſcipline, be Origen's own, or Ruffinus's: I ſhall therefore content my ſelf to give a Summary of his Doctrine upon the principal Points of our Religion, examining at the ſame time whether he be guilty of thoſe errors of which he is accuſed.

If we had had his Books of Principles in Greek, we might eaſily have been inform'd of all his Opinions; for theſe Books contained the Abridgment of his Doctrine: But ſince we have only Ruffinus's Tranſlation, in which he himſelf confeſſes that he altered and omitted ſeveral Paſſages, wherein Origen diſcourſes concerning the Myſtery of the Trinity, which he believes were corrupted by the Hereticks, we cannot be aſſured of Origen's Doctrine from this Verſion, except it be in thoſe things for which he is condemned: ſo that we muſt have recourſe to thoſe Works of Origen which we have in Greek.

Origen's Notions concerning the Nature and the Attributes of God are very Orthodox; he believes that he is a Spiritual, Inviſible, Simple, and Eternal Eſſence. He is wrongfully accuſed for believing that God had a Body, ſince he ſays directly contrary in ſeveral places, and proves it by many convincing Arguments. He diſcourſes admirably concerning the Knowledge and the Providence of God. Some have accuſed him of having ſet Bounds to his Power, becauſe he ſays, That he is called Omnipotent only becauſe he governs all things, and not becauſe he can create any thing anew. Juſtinian cites in his Letter to Mennas, a Paſſage taken from the ſecond Book of Origen's Principles, where he ſays that the Power of God is finite, and that he made all the Creatures that he can govern. Ruffinus alſo taxes him of this Error. He ſeems indeed to have believed that God created that Matter from all Eternity, whereof he has made the World, and of which he will make ſucceſſively ſeveral other Worlds. Origen.

The Ancients are extreamly divided as to the Judgment that is to be given of Origen's Doctrine concerning the Trinity.

St. Hierom, John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, St. Epiphanius, St. Auſtin, and after them Theophilus, Juſtinian, and the fifth Council have accuſed him of ſeveral Errors about this Myſtery: on the contrary Didymus, St. Athanaſius, St. Baſil, St. Gregory Nazianzen, an anonymous Author, of whom Photius ſpeaks in the 117th Volume, St. Chryſoſtom and Ruffinus have either cited him againſt the Arians, as an Author who had Orthodox Notions concerning the Trinity, or defend him againſt the Accuſations of his Enemies; the one by giving a favourable Senſe to his Words, and the Others by maintaining that thoſe Paſſages which were found not to be agreeable to the Faith of the Church were added; and that there were other contrary Expreſſions which were entirely conformable to the Doctrine of the Church. It is certain that in Ruffinus's Latin Verſions which we have of the Book de Principiis, and the Apology of Pamphilus, and of his other Works, the Doctrine of the Trinity is explained after a very Orthodox manner. But we muſt confeſs, that we cannot rely upon Ruffinus's Credit, who acknowledges that he added and altered ſeveral Paſſages relating to the Trinity. It is true, he ſays he has taken what he has added from other Places of Origen; but St. Hierom denies it, and we are not obliged to believe Ruffinus upon his own Word. So likewiſe we ought not to give Credit entirely to what St. Hierom ſays againſt Origen, ſince he was as violent againſt him, as Ruffinus was paſſionate for him. Therefore neither believing his Enemies, nor his zealous Defenders, let us conſult thoſe Pieces of his Works which we have in Greek. And here ſtill we are in a Labyrinth, from which it will be difficult to extricate our ſelves. Herein we find ſome things which appear no leſs contrary, than the Opinions themſelves of the Authors who have written for and againſt him. He often ſpeaks very excellently of the WORD, which gives us reaſon to believe that he was perſuaded of his Godhead: He ſays, That he was from the beginning in the Father; That he is the Image of the Father; That he was begotten of the Father from all Eternity; That he is a Subſiſtence, and a Perſon diſtinguiſhed from the Father; That he is the Wiſdom of God, and that he is God himſelf; That he never leaves his Father; That thoſe are in an Error, who deny that the Godhead of the Father and the Son is the ſame, though their Subſtance be different; That he is God, ὁυσία, though he be not the Source and Original of the Godhead, as the Father is, whom upon that account he calls Αυτόθεον; That he is above all Creatures; That we may addreſs our Vows and our Prayers to Him, as to God the Father; That he is only known by the Father; and that he ought to be honoured as the Father, and that he has the ſame Power. Laſtly, St. Athanaſius cites two formal paſſages for the Eternity of the WORD, and for his Equality with the Father; St. Baſil alſo cites one which is very clear for the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt.

But, on the other ſide, in his Books we meet with many expreſſions which are very harſh, little conformable to the Orthodox Doctrine, and which ſeem to favour the Arians. He ſays that the Word is an Hypoſtaſis different from the Father; and he takes the Word Hypoſtaſis to ſignifie Nature and Subſtance.

'Tis probable he did not think them worth publiſhing.

Origen.

He says likewise, that the Father and the Son are One in Concord and in will; and that the last is not properly God, ἰδίως, but only called God, because he is the Image and resemblance of the Divinity; That the WORD and the Holy Ghost were made by the Father; That we must not compare the Father with the Son; and that the Father is greater than the Son, who is inferior to him, though he be superior to all Creatures, as the Sunbeam is inferior to the Sun; and lastly, that the WORD is the Minister of the Father. These Expressions, and some others like them are hard indeed; But when there are Contradictions in Authors, we ought always, in my Opinion, to take the most favourable Side. Besides that, it is more easie to put a good Construction on these last Expressions, which were very common before the Council of Nice, than to put a bad one upon the first: For without making use of Ruffinus's way of defending him, who says that these Places are either added or corrupted; and without alledging in his Excuse, that being to dispute against the Sabellians, he was obliged to make use of some Terms which might seem to favour the opposite Error: without making use, I say, of these general Defences, I believe we may explain in a very Catholick Sense, those Expressions which I have just now related. When he says, that the Father and the Son were Two Hypostases; he understands by the Word Hypostasis, all that is opposed to nothing; and he had no other Design than to maintain against the Sabellians, That the WORD was not a Vertue or a Quality from the Father, but a Person subsisting. It is certain, That in Origen's Time the Words Hypostasis and Substance were synonymous Terms; but so too by the Word Substance, was often understood a Person subsisting; and some Catholick Authors, not only before the Council of Nice, but even afterwards have affirmed that the Father was a Substance, the Son a second Substance; understanding, as St. Hilary observes, by Substance, the Persons subsisting. In the second place, Origen does not say that the Son is a Creature: He does not deny but that he is God, but he only denies that he is God of himself, as the Father is, Αυτόθεος; and this is what he would explain by the Comparison of the Sun and the Sun-beam, which the Fathers who lived after the Council of Nice, Thought to be very proper for the explaining the Mystery of the Trinity. And thus it is, that going upon the principle, he says the Son is inferior to the Father, and that the Father was greater than the Son; not that he believed them to be of a different Nature, since he owned that they are One and the same Divinity, and One and the same Substance; That the Son was equal to the Father, and that he was in him from all Eternity; but because the Son derives his Divinity from the Father, who is the Source of the Godhead. As to what he says, That the Son is the Minister of the Father; That the Father made use of him in making the World; and that the Son was created. These are expressions that are too common amongst the Ancients, to be particularly Objected to Origen as a Crime.

Epist. ad. Avitum.

Tom. 2. in Joan. p. 56. Tom. 6. p. 130. Lib. 5. contra Celsum. Tom. 15. in Matt.

St. Hierom accuses Origen for saying, That the Son in comparison of the Father was not Goodness it self, but only the Image and Representation of Goodness; and Huetius confirms this to have been Origen's Opinion by some of his Greek Passages. The same St. Hierom upbraids him also for affirming that the Son in comparison of the Father, was a lesser Light; That he was not the Truth, but the Image of the Truth; That he was Visible, and the Father Invisible; but we may easily discern that these expressions, as harsh as they may seem, being considered separately, were meant by Origen in a good sense, he having no other Design than to prove that the Father was the Source and Original of Goodness and Truth; and that the Son received it from him and that in this Sense he was the Image of the Father's Goodness, the Brightness of his Godhead: Expressions which in this sense are very Orthodox. As to what he says that the Father is Invisible, and the Son Visible, we have shewn in other places what the Ancients meant by this way of speaking.

Lastly, It is easie to answer what St. Epiphanius and several others object to Origen, That he denyed that the Father was Visible to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; for he affirms so expresly in so many Places, That the Father is perfectly known of the Son, and even of the Holy Ghost, that he must of necessity have had some other meaning, when he seems to assert the contrary. Ruffinus answers this Objection, That he denied that the Father was Visible to the Son, as Bodies are Visible to Bodies, that he might confute the Error of the Valentinians, who believed that God was Corporeal; and he cites a Passage of Origen, where he distinguishes betwixt Seeing and Knowing, and Affirms, that we may say that the Son knows the Father, but that we cannot say that he sees him, because Seeing is the Property of a Body. I shall not make any Answer to other more trivial Objections, because it is easie to satisfie them, as well by what we have just now said as by what we have observed upon the other Fathers. (a) There are no very considerable Objections made against Origen's Doctrine concerning the Incarnation; for though he be accused of several Errors, he affirms so positively in all his Works, that the WORD had taken a Body and a Soul like ours, in the Womb of a Virgin, by the Operation of the Holy Ghost; That Jesus Christ had true Flesh; That he really suffered; That he is altogether God and Man, in that the Human Nature was united with the Divine Nature in one and the same Person: That it is impossible to accuse him of any Error concerning the Mystery of the Incarnation. Perhaps as he was of opinion, That the Souls were in Heaven before they came down into their Bodies, he might think the same thing of the Soul of Jesus Christ, but this was only a particular Error, for which he was not very earnest.

Tom. 20. in Joh. p. 292.

Origen.

He is accused of believing that the Death of Christ was of Advantage to all reasonable Creatures, as Angels, Devils, and even insensible things; and 'tis certain that he does assert this wild Notion in several places of his Works; He has feigned a spiritual Death of Jesus Christ in the other World, which has given occasion to tax him for holding that Jesus Christ died several times, He believed that Christ did not come out of the Virgin's Womb by Penetration; and he accuses the Virgin Mary of Distrust. But these are but slight Errors, and common among the Ancients.

As he believed that the only Point of Faith relating to the Angels, was, That there were such Beings, and that neither Scripture nor Tradition had determined any thing as to their Nature and their Number; so he has taken the Liberty to deliver his own Thoughts hereupon: He imagines that they are corporeal, though invisible, having nevertheless a spiritual Soul. He says, That the good Angels have a finer, and the evil ones a grosser Body. The Principle from whence he has drawn this Conclusion, is, That all intelligent and spiritual Creatures, having been created in Heaven with a perfect Freedom of Will, they have been afterwards, for a Punishment of their Faults, confined to Bodies more or less gross, according to the Quality of their Crimes, and ranked in such and such Orders or Degrees of Creatures inferior one to another: Yet so, nevertheless, as that after having suffered this Exile, if I may so say, for some Ages, they may by living virtuously, return to the Place from whence they were banished. (b) And going upon this Principle, he affirms, That Men may become Angels and Angels Men; That the Angels being free, do often commit Faults; That the Devils shall one day be delivered; That the Angels are guilty of several Offences in their Administration of things here below, for which they are immediately rebuked, and for which they shall be judged in the Day of Judgment. All these Fancies, and several others, are the Consequences of Plato's Doctrine, to which Origen was wonderfully addicted. We must nevertheless acknowledge, that he does not propose these things as Doctrines of our Religion, but only as his Opinions and Conjectures.

ſon; and in others, That they take care of inanimate things. Though he denies that we ought to addreſs to the Angels the ſame Prayers, and the ſame Adorations as to God, yet he allows that they may be prayed unto, and honoured as they deſerve.

Concerning the Soul, he ſays in the Preface to his Books of Principles, that it is not determined by the Tradition of the Church, whether it be produced by another Soul, or whether it comes from elſe-where; whether it be Eternal, or created at a certain time; whether it animates the Body, or whether it be only confined there. This is what he ſays in the Language of an Eccleſiaſtical Author: But following the Principles of Plato's Philoſophy, he holds, That Souls are intelligent Creatures, which have been from Eternity, which are ſent into Bodies as into a Priſon, for a Puniſhment of their Sins; That they paſs from Body to Body; That they become Angels; and laſtly, That they are in a continual Motion. He aſſerts all theſe things in his ſecond Book of Principles, Chap. 6, and 7. and in ſeveral other places of his Works. (d) He ſays in ſome places, That the Soul is corporeal; but in others, he aſſures us that it is ſpiritual and incorporeal.

(e) He holds it as an Article of Faith, That there is a Free Will in all reaſonable Creatures; from whence it follows, That though a Man may be excited to Good by ſome Celeſtial Power, and ſpurr'd on to Evil by the Devil, yet he is never conſtrained to do Good or Evil. This is what he ſays agreeably to the Doctrine of the Church; but he extends this Liberty, by following Plato's Principles, to all ſorts of Conditions; and he pretends, That an intelligent Creature is, and will always be free to do Good and Evil, in whatſoever State and Condition he is; for in this he makes Free Will to conſiſt. (f) He does not ſeem to have made any Diſtinction between Adam's State, and that of Mankind after the Fall.

He attributes very much to Free Will, and Nature, and he ſpeaks but very little of Grace, which he believes was infuſed into Souls according to the Merits which they have, before they are confined in Bodies; and afterwards it is augmented according to the Good and Evil which they do in making uſe of their Natural Liberty. He aſcribes in ſeveral places the Converſion of a Man, and all the Good which he acts, to Free Will; and allows hardly any thing to Grace, ſo that it was not without Reaſon that St. Hierom accuſes him for having furniſhed the Pelagians with Principles; though yet in ſome places he ſpeaks very advantagiouſly of Grace, and of the Aſſiſtance of God. He is taxed for holding, that Men may arrive to ſuch a Degree of Perfection, that they ſhall be no more ſubject to Temptation, nor commit any more Sins: And indeed there are ſome Relicks of this Error in his Books. He has alſo affirmed, that thoſe who have ſinned, after having received the Holy Ghoſt, could obtain no more Pardon for their Sin. (g) And upon this account he maintains, that St. Peter had not as yet received the Holy Ghoſt, when he denied Chriſt, and that being forſaken by God, it was impoſſible for him not to ſin. (h) When he explains that Paſſage of the fifth Chapter of the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans, he diſcourſes of Original Sin after a very obſcure manner; as if he doubted of it: And we muſt not wonder after this, that he did not admit of any other Predeſtination, than that which has reſpect to Merits.

He believed that the Stars were animated with reaſonable Souls confined to theſe Bodies. (i) He owns the Reſurrection of the Body, but by Philoſophizing too nicely upon this Matter, he has, if I may ſo ſay, ſpiritualized it.

He admits of two Reſurrections; That of the Righteous, and that of the Wicked. He acknowledges the laſt Judgment, wherein Men and Angels ſhall be judged; but he ſeems to make a doubt in what Place it ſhould be, if all Men were there to be judged. (k) He ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt ſhall appear there, but that we neither know the Place where he will appear, nor the Manner how. He rejects the Opinion of the Millenaries. He confeſſes that good Men ſhall again be recompenced with Eternal Bleſſedneſs, and the Wicked puniſhed with Eternal Fire; but he deſtroys the Simplicity of this Faith by reaſoning too much on this Subject. He believes that all Men, even the moſt Holy, ſhall paſs through the Fire: That after Men have paſſed through the Fire, the Wicked ſhall be caſt into Hell, that is to ſay, into the loweſt Place, and they ſhall be there tormented with Eternal Fire. This Fire (as (l) he explains it in other places) is Remorſe of Conſcience, and Vexation of Spirit. (m) He makes Bleſſedneſs to conſiſt in an Union with God. He ſays that Souls come to it by degrees; that after they are ſeparated from their Bodies, they are for ſome time upon Earth, in order to be purified, that afterwards they are taken up into the Air, and inſtructed by Angels, that they paſs through ſeveral places, where they remain for ſome time, and that at laſt they come to the higheſt Heaven, in compariſon whereof the Firmament is but a Hell; that the more they retain of Earth in them, the longer they are upon this Journey: That the Souls which are arrived at this Sovereign Degree of Bliſs, may fall from it, and that they are ſent back again into Celeſtial Bodies, or others, and that they afterwards return from whence they were driven: that ſo Bleſſedneſs may have an end, and that Torments ſhall have a Concluſion likewiſe. (n) He ſays in his Preface to the Book De Principiis, that God created the World, that it had a Beginning, and that it muſt have an End; but that it is not determined by Tradition, what it was before, and what it will be after. He imagines that it was made, if I may ſo expreſs it, to be a Place of Baniſhment for all Intelligent Creatures. He makes no Difficulty of aſſerting, that there were more Worlds before this, and that there ſhall be more after it. He ſays, that God always had the Matter upon which he wrought, which ſuppoſes that it is eternal, ſince God created it from all Eternity.

(o) He ſays, That the earthly Paradiſe was in Heaven, and he has explained of the Souls which were there, that which is ſaid in Geneſis concerning Adam and Eve. It may be concluded from all, that we have already ſaid concerning Origen's Doctrine upon the Tenets of our Religion, that although he profeſſed to believe the Doctrine of the Church, (p) yet he ſets up ſome Philoſophical Principles, the Conſequences of which were found contrary to what was taught by the Chriſtian Religion; which obliged him, in order to accommodate theſe things which were ſo directly oppoſite one to the other, to invent ſeveral Opinions that were very far from the Simplicity of the Faith. So that we muſt diſtinguiſh in Origen what he ſays according to the way of ſpeaking uſed by the Church in his Time, and what he ſays according to the Principles of Plato's Philoſophy, and then we need not wonder, if after having acknowledged the Truths of Chriſtianity, he ſhould loſe himſelf by advancing ſuch Platonick Notions as are deſtructive to them. And this, in my Opinion, is the reaſon of his principal Errors, which which are all of them founded upon three Principles taken from the Platonick Philosophy; which are: First, That intelligent Creatures have always been, and shall eternally exist. Secondly, That they have always been free to do Good and Evil. And Lastly, That they have been precipitated into the lower places, and confined to Bodies for a punishment of their Sins. Let any one throughly examine all Origen's Errors, of which we have just now spoken, and he will easily perceive that they all proceed from this, that he was willing to accommodate the Truths of the Christian Religion to these Platonick Principles.

There are besides some other slighter Errors in Origen, into the greatest part of which he fell by confining himself too much to the Allegorical Sense of the Scripture; for Example, (q) Explaining Christ's words concerning the power of Binding and Loosing, which he granted to St. Peter, he seems to reserve this power to those Bishops and Priests who imitate the Virtues of this Apostle, and in the same Sense he says, that all spiritual Men are this Rock, upon which Jesus Christ has built his Church. So likewise (r) explaining that passage of Scripture, where it is said: Not that which goeth into the Mouth defileth a Man, he speaks of the Eucharist after so obscure and Allegorical a manner, that it is very difficult to comprehend his Meaning. (s) He likewise explains Allegorically what is said of the Eucharist in other places of the Word of God. It is easie however to defend him against the Protestants upon the Subject of the real Presence, since he acknowledges in the eighth Book, that the Loaves which are offered in the Church are made a Holy Body by Prayer, διὰ τῆς ἐπικλήσεως ἁγιάζεται. We might easily bring other Examples of the Oversights that he has committed, endeavouring too much to spiritualize the Words of the Scripture, but I shall pass them over in Silence.

(s) Hom. 16. in Num. & Tract. 35. in Matt. Hom. 7. in Levit. & Tom. 32. in Joan.

He speaks of the Sacred Scripture after a very excellent manner, as of a Book written by persons who were inspired by God. His passages upon this Subject have been collected by St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, in a Book which they have Entituled Philocalia. (t) He distinguishes the three Senses of Scripture, but he applies himself particularly to the Allegorical Interpretation, and he affirms that there are some places which have no literal Meaning. He proves that every Body ought to read the Scripture.

Now for some points of Discipline which may be observed in his Works. The Christians assembled together in his Time in the Churches, not only on Sundays, and Festivals, but also on other Days. (u) He often speaks against those who neglected to do it, and who did not hear the Word of God with due Respect. There were Priests and Bishops in his Time, who were chosen by the People. And their Duty was to teach the People, they instructed the Catechumens, and prepared them for Baptism for a considerable time. They baptized the Children; and Baptism was never reiterated; they anointed those who were baptized with Oyl. They observed Lent; and also fasted Wednesdays and Frydays. They expelled out of the Church, such as committed publick Crimes after Baptism: And (x) he observes in his Book against Celsus, that there were some Persons set apart on purpose to take care of the Manners of the Faithful. They allowed of Penance but once, and that rarely too. Excommunication was the greatest Ecclesiastical Penalty. Nevertheless, it was not doubted but that those who were unjustly Excommunicated, might be saved. Simony also was prohibited.

In his time Sins were confess'd to Priests, and they examined those who were to teach in publick. They believed that one ought to live a very holy Life, to approach the Blessed Sacrament, and that as it was very advantageous to those who received it worthily, so it was Damnation to those who received it unworthily. They did not admit Persons that were twice married to holy Orders. They concealed the Mysteries, and principally the Eucharist, from the Infidels and the Catechumens. They prayed to God on their Knees, and turning towards the East. They celebrated Good-Friday, Easter, Whitsuntide, and Sundays, with very great Solemnity.

Origen.

And these were the principal Points of Discipline, that can be observed in the Books of Origen: It would be too tedious to take notice of Points of Morality that he discourses of in his Homilies, which are all filled with them. We shall here present you only with some of them.

He says, that we ought not to make use of Marriage, but only for the sake of having Children: that he who does Good out of servile Fear, shall be less rewarded than him who does it out of Love. (y) There are in his Homilies upon Exodus, a great many curious Allegories upon the Necessity of renouncing the World, and leading a Christian Life. He says, That Pharaoh represents the World, who slew the Male Children, that is, the righteous, and preserved the Females, that is to say, vicious and effeminate Persons; and he makes a pretty Moral upon this Allegory. He says, that Ægypt is the Type of the World, from whence we must depart, not only in Body, but in Mind, by renouncing it entirely. There are a great many other Allegories and moral Thoughts of the same Nature. He distinguishes two sorts of Sins; great Sins, and lesser Sins. He ranks among the number of lesser Sins, such as may prove mortal; and by great Sins, he understands such, for which we can do Penance but once. He gives seven remedies for Sins; Baptism, Martyrdom, Alms-deeds, forgiving of our Enemies, the Conversion of our Brethren, Charity, and laborious Penance, and lastly, that Repentance and Unction of which St. James speaks. (z) He says, that we must not presently reprehend publickly the Sin of our Brother, but that we ought first to rebuke him in private, afterwards before one or two Witnesses; and lastly, if he did not reform, then we are to tell it to the Church. (aa) He shews that true Fasting is an Abstinence from Sin, and that we ought to Fast in order to feed the Poor. His Homilies upon Numbers, Joshuah, and the Judges are more filled with Allegories than Morality. Those which he composed upon the Psalms have more Morality in them: He there discourses of Humility, of Prayer, of Patience, of Meekness, of the Prosperity of the Wicked, of Repentance, of that Holiness which is required to communicate worthily, of the Choice of a Guide. His other Homilies are mixed with Morality and Allegories: His large Commentaries have more Learning in them. He therein handles several Questions very learnedly, and makes very judicious Remarks upon them. He gives some Explications upon the Holy Scripture, that are very curious and ingenious: But he goes too far from the Letter, to find out Allegorical Senses; and he amuses himself in explaining too scrupulously all the Words of the Scripture, that he might the better give them a mystical Sense. He is a great Enemy to Hereticks, he attacks them as often as he discourses of any Subject that has any relation to their Errors. He does not let any of them escape; sometimes he writes against Simon, Basilides, Carpocrates, Valentinus, Marcion, and Montanus: At other times he attacks the Ebionites, the Helcesaites, the Encratites, the Ophites, and the Sabellians. (bb) He acknowledged for Canonical Books of the Old Testament, only those which were in the Canon of the Hebrews to the number of two and twenty: (cc) He ranks the Book of Esther in this number, and joyns the Book of Ruth with the Book of Judges, and Baruch with that of Jeremiah. As for the Books of Maccabees, Judith, Tobit, Ecclesiasticus, and Wisdom, he commends them as Good Books, profitable for Catechumens, but such as are out of the Canon of the Books of the sacred Scripture. He calls them nevertheless in some places Divine Books. He cites the Book of Wisdom under the Name of the Scripture. He cites likewise the Maccabees, and the Book of Ecclesiasticus, which he affirms to be among the Books of Salomon. We have already taken notice of his Opinion concerning the History of Susanna. He receives as Canonical Books of the New Testament, the Four Gospels, pels, the Fourteen Epiſtles of St. Paul: (dd) He ſays however, concerning that to the Hebrews, that the Thoughts of this Epiſtle are St. Paul's; but that it was compoſed by ſome other Perſon, and that there is none but God who knows the Author of it, tho' ſome attribute it to S. Clement, others to St. Luke. He ſays that there is but one Epiſtle of St. Peter, which was received by all the Churches, but that we may grant the ſecond likewiſe to have been his. He ſays the ſame thing of the two laſt Epiſtles of St. John. He cites the Epiſtles of St. Jude, and St. James in his Commentary upon the Epiſtle to the Romans. He likewiſe quotes the Revelations, and attributes them to St. John. Beſides theſe Books, he often cites Apocryphal Writings, as the Goſpels according to the Ægyptians, and according to the Hebrews; The Book of Hermas, the Epiſtle of St. Barnabas, the Book of Enoch, and even ſome Heretical Books, as the Apocalypſe of St. Paul, a Book concerning the Twelve Apoſtles, the Doctrine of St. Peter, the Acts of St. Paul, the Hiſtory of Iſaiah, and ſome others.

Origen had very quick Parts, a very ſtrong and extenſive Fancy: but he relied too much on the Vivacity of his Genius; and often loſt himſelf out of too great Earneſtneſs to fathom, and ſubtilize every thing. He had a very happy Invention, and a much more happy Delivery of what he had invented: But he had not that Exactneſs in his Inventions, nor all that Gracefulneſs in the Delivery as might be wiſh'd. He carried on his Work with ſo great Eaſe, that he is ſaid to have Dictated to ſeven or eight Perſons at a time, and he was ſo ready in expreſſing himſelf, that he made the greateſt Part of his Homilies Extempore. Upon which account his Style was not very correct, nor coherent; He had a vaſt Memory, but he often truſted too much to it. He was a Perſon of moſt profound Learning; and he particularly ſtudied Plato's Philoſophy, which he underſtood to Perfection, and indeed he was too much addicted to it for a Chriſtian. He underſtood likewiſe the Maxims of the other Philoſophers. He had applied himſelf mightily to the Study of human Learning: He was neither ignorant of Hiſtory, nor Mythology, and he had as great Knowledge in all the prophane Sciences, as thoſe who had ſtudied nothing elſe all their whole Lives. But he particularly excelled in the Knowledge of the Holy Scripture, to the Study of which he entirely addicted himſelf. He had learned it all by heart, and that he might not neglect any thing which might be of uſe for the underſtanding the Letter thereof, he carefully examined all the Verſions of the Bible, which were in his time, and compared them all together with the Hebrew Text, adding thereto a literal Commentary upon the moſt difficult places. He was not very well skilled in the Hebrew; yet he knew enough of it to underſtand it, and to obſerve the Differences of the Text, and the Tranſlations; but he did not keep to the literal Explication of the Bible. He thought it neceſſary for the ſetting off of the Holy Scripture to the beſt advantage, which appeared but plain and ſimple to the Heathens, and for the rendring it of greater uſe to all the World, to give myſtical or allegorical Interpretations of every thing in it: And herein imitated the way of Philo and Ariſtobulus, and followed the Genius and Manner of the Platoniſts. We have already taken notice, that Hippolitus explained the Scripture allegorically, and that it was in imitation of him that Origen undertook this way of Writing. St. Clement of Alexandria his Maſter, is alſo full of Allegories, and 'tis not to be denied but that the Helleniſtical Jews, and the Primitive Chriſtians made very frequent uſe of them: But Origen has carried on an Allegory as far as it can poſſibly go, and he has furniſhed Matter to all the Greek and Latin Fathers who have imitated him, and have hardly done any thing elſe than copy him. This way of explaining the Holy Scripture by continual Allegories, ſeems to me to be very defective. For though it may be good ſometimes to awaken, if I may ſo ſay, the Auditor, and to direct him by ſuch kind of Allegories, yet they become uſeleſs and tedious, when they are perpetual; and the Mind, which requires great Application for the comprehending of them, is tired, and ſoon looſes the Conſequence both of Reaſoning and Thought: Beſides, that by minding only the Allegorical Senſe, we neglect the Literal, which is oftentimes more excellent, and of greater Advantage than all the Allegories in the World, that divert the Mind without inſtructing it, and ſtrike the Imagination without affecting the Heart. Laſtly, if in explaining the Holy Scripture, we ſhould only ſtick to the Allegory, as Origen has done, it might give occaſion to believe, that the Scripture taken barely in the Literal Senſe would be but of very little Advantage, which is a very great Error. 'Tis therefore a very ill way of defending Origen in this Point, to ſay with a modern Author, that he ſeems to have been excuſable in this, becauſe he had learned by Experience, that the Letter of the Scripture was but of little uſe for Inſtruction. For this is to make him aſſert a thing which is very falſe, the Letter of the Scripture being of exceeding uſe for Inſtruction, and even more profitable than any Allegory, which is not to be us'd, but only now and then to awaken the Auditors.

Origen's Books againſt Celſus are an excellent Work, and ſtored with extraordinary Learning. He anſwers the Objections of Celſus, who of all the Heathens that have written againſt the Chriſtian Religion, has made the moſt cunning ones, and propoſed them the moſt maliciouſly, very ſolidly. He eſtabliſhes by convincing Proofs, the Hiſtory of Jeſus Chriſt, his Miracles, his Divinity and Reſurrection. He confutes the Calumnies and Impoſtures of Celſus, and of the other Heathens againſt the Chriſtians; and Laſtly, he proves the Truth and Excellency of the Doctrine and Religion of Jeſus Chriſt. This Book is written very Politely, and with great Care and Exactneſs. 'Tis not only the beſt of Origen's Works, but alſo the moſt accompliſh'd and beſt Compoſed Apology for the Chriſtians which we have of all the Ancients. The Books of Principles were likewiſe written with great Care, and they had been of very great uſe, if he had contented himſelf to explain the Principles of Religion according to Scripture and Tradition, without mixing therewith his own Philoſophical Notions. His Commentaries upon the Scripture are more Polite than his Homilies, they are full of Learning, but they are not very Exact, and we may obſerve therein a great many Fancies which are uſeleſs, obſcure, and perplexed. Often after having begun one Explication, he paſſes to another, without finiſhing the firſt. His Homilies are plainer and intelligible, but their ſtyle is leſs Elegant.

The Treatiſe concerning Prayer is an Excellent Piece of Devotion. It contains a great many Excellent Principles of Morality, and is full of very profitable Inſtructions. We may alſo find there ſeveral Curious Remarks relating to the Diſcipline of that Time. But it is not abſolutely free from the Errors and Defects which we have obſerved in the other Works of Origen. As this Diſcourſe is very Inſtructive and not very much known, I have thought it convenient to give a Summary of it.

Origen begins it by a Common Place, to wit, that there are an Infinite Number of Things which we cannot know without being enlightned from Heaven. He applies this Reflection to his Preſent Subject, ſaying, that it would be impoſſible for him, without the Aſſiſtance of Heaven, to explain how we ought to Pray, what we ought to ſay when we Pray, and what are the moſt Proper Times for Prayer. That he who treats of this Matter, muſt be enlightned by the Heavenly Father, inſtructed by the Son, and inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt: That in order to Pray as we ought, 'tis not ſufficient to repeat ſome certain Prayers, but we muſt have good Diſpoſitions; and that our Prayer may be acceptable to God, it muſt be accompanied with a Conſcience, Pure, and without Blemiſh. Afterwards entring upon his Subject he obſerves that the Greek Word Ευχη, which ſignifies Prayer, is mentioned in Scripture the firſt time, in that Place where it is ſaid that Jacob coming from Meſopotamia, made a Vow to offer unto God the Tenth of all that he ſhould bring from that Country. He adds that the Word is often taken in this Senſe, to ſignifie a Promiſe or Vow of Performing a Thing, if God grants us what we ask of him in our Prayers. But he obſerves at the ſame time that there are other Places where it is taken for Prayer it ſelf; and he ſets down ſome Examples wherein it is taken in both Senſes.

After having ſpoken of the word Prayer, he treats of the neceſſity of the thing it ſelf: He confutes the Arguments of thoſe who pretended to maintain that it was to no purpoſe to pray; he obſerves, that this Error could not be maintained by any but notoriouſly-wicked Perſons, and by Atheiſts, who deny God's Providence: but that the Devil endeavouring by all means to ſpread deteſtable Doctrines among thoſe that bear the Name of Chriſt, had put it into the hearts of ſome perſons to reject every thing that is ſenſible in Religion, to deſpiſe the Holy Euchariſt and Baptiſm, and to neglect Prayer as a uſeleſs thing. Now theſe are the Reaſons which theſe Perſons bring for their Opinion: Firſt, God knows every thing, ſay they, therefore what need is there of Praying; Secondly, He does not only know what muſt happen, but he ordains it; therefore what neceſſity is there of asking that Origen. that of him, which shall infallibly come to pass? Thirdly, If we are Predestinated before our Birth, it is to no purpose to pray since we shall be necessarily Sav'd or Damn'd. Fourthly, God being immutable, we do but deceive our selves in believing that we are able by our Prayers to make him alter his Decrees. Origen, in answer to these difficulties distinguishes Three sorts of Things which are in motion. The first are those that are moved by a Foreign Power, such as, Inanimate Beings. The second are those that are moved by their own Nature, but without Knowledge, as Animals and Plants. The Third are those that move themselves, and determine themselves, as Intelligent Creatures. He proves, That these are free, and that Prescience and Predestination does not at all destroy this Liberty, because God ordains nothing relating to free Actions, but what he has foreseen that intelligent Creatures would do freely: And that so Prescience is not the cause of Things, nor of Actions which are done freely; but it only supposes that these things will be, or will not be; and that the knowledge which God has of them, is followed by the Decree, whereby he is resolved to grant or not to grant his Grace, to hear or not to hear; That he foresees the Good and Evil which Men shall commit; That he knows whether they will repent or no; and that, in consequence of this knowledge, he Predestinates or Reprobates them. He adds, That God has appointed Angels over Men to preserve them, as long as they deserve it. One might here take notice of his particular Opinion concerning the Sun, the Moon, and Stars, which he says are intelligent and free Agents.

After having confuted the Reasons of those who reject Prayer, he shews the advantage of it. He says in the first place, That he who prays, puts himself in a condition of presenting himself before God, and of conversing with him; That in order to this, he ought to drive away all evil Thoughts, to banish all earthly Affections, to raise up his mind towards Heaven, to forget Injuries, to pardon his Enemies, and by no means to repine against God. From hence he concludes, That Prayer cannot be of any advantage, if it be not preceded with great preparation. Secondly, He assures us, That Christ Jesus, the High-Priest of our Offerings, prays with us; That the Angels pray with him, and that the Saints which are departed pray with us, (and this here is one of the most ancient and excellent Monuments to prove the Intercession of Saints.) His words are these: The Souls of the Saints which sleep among the number of the Just, pray with us, as it is said in the Book of Maccabees. —— And since the imperfect Knowledge which we have in this World is made perfect in the other Life, 'tis a very great Absurdity not to believe the same thing of the other Virtues, and principally Charity towards our Neighbour, which we ought to believe to be much stronger in the Saints than in mortal Men, who are subject to Weaknesses and Imperfections. He adds, That every faithful Person has his Angel that hears him, and preserves him whilst he prays. Lastly, He proves the necessity of continual Prayer, by the Example of Jesus Christ, by that of Just Persons, and by the reckoning up of those Benefits and Graces which have been bestowed upon Men from their Prayers: He exhorts the Faithful to pray for spiritual and heavenly Things, rather than for earthly and sensual Goods, such as Beauty, Nobility, Riches: He shews the meanness and the vanity of these things.

He distinguishes four kinds of Prayers, after the Apostle St. Paul in his first Epistle to Timothy. The δεησις, that is to say, Supplication, which is to ask any Good of which we stand in need. The second called προσευχὴ, is, according to Origen, a request that is made in any danger, with assurance of obtaining what we desire: He observes, that this kind of Prayer is commonly joined with Doxology, that is to say, with Praising of God's Holy Name; The third ἔντευξις, is a Prayer made by a Person who has great confidence that he shall obtain what he asks, he being much in God's Favour. The last is, Giving of Thanks for the Benefits which we have received. He gives Examples taken from the Holy Scripture, of each of these kinds of Prayer.

This first Part of his Treatise concerning Prayer, is followed with an Explication of the Lord's Prayer.

He makes two Observations upon these first words, Our Father, The first is, That it is only in the New Testament, where there is given to God with assurance the Title of Our Father. The second, That if we would say these words as we ought, we must be of the number of the true Children of God, that is to say, Free from Sin, and in a State of Grace.

He says upon these words, Which art in Heaven, That we must not understand them in a gross sense, as if God was in Heaven after a corporeal manner.

Upon these words, Hallowed be thy Name, That it is not as if God were not Holy in himself, but only that we desire that men should acknowledge this Holiness in his Conduct. He observes, That this and the following Forms are in the Imperative, but that it is taken for the Optative Mood. And from hence he takes occasion to confute Tatian, who affirmed that these Words of God in Genesis, Let there be light, was not an express Command, but only a simple Wish. By these other Words, Thy kingdom come, the faithful Person prays the Lord, That the Kingdom of Jesus Christ, which is in him, may be perfected and compleated by the expectation of the Day of Judgment. By these, Thy will be done, we desire of God, That men may fulfil God's Will upon Earth, as it is accomplished in Heaven; or else, That the Wicked, being represented by the Earth, should perform God's Will, as it is already done by Just Persons. Origen would not have us understand these following words, Give us this day our daily Bread, of bodily Bread; but he understands them of the Doctrine of Jesus Christ, who is our Bread and our Nourishment. He observes, that the word ἐπιούσιος, Supersubstantialis, which we render by DAILY, is not to be met with in any Author; and that it is peculiar to the Evangelists. In order to explain it, he tells us, That as bodily Bread is changed into our Substance, so this Bread of the Word of God communicates its Nature and Efficacy to our Souls. By Daily Bread, he means Eternity. Upon these Words, And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us, he explains the several Duties of Men. He says, That they owe to themselves the good of their Souls, that they owe very much to their Guardian Angels, but that they are above all things indebted to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Ghost; that every Condition and every Estate has its peculiar Duties. There is one Duty, says he, of a Wife, another Duty of a Widow, another of a Deacon, another of a Priest, another of a Bishop, whose Charge is much the greater, and he shall render an exact Account to God, who will punish him very severely, if he does not acquit himself well of his Duty. He adds, That as we are indebted to others, so others are indebted to us; and that if we call to mind those Duties wherein we have been wanting towards others, we shall easily pardon those who have been deficient therein towards us, as God forgives us the faults which we have committed against him; That the Priests forgive in the Name of Jesus Christ the Sins of Men; but that, in imitation of the Priests of the Old Law, they must be instructed by the Holy Ghost who those are for whom they ought to offer up Sacrifices, when, and after what manner they must do it. Wherefore he blames those who not being sensible of what is beyond their Power, boast of their being able to pardon Idolatry, and to forgive Adultery and Fornication; which shews, that at that time they refused Communion to Idolaters in some Churches. Upon these words, And lead us not into temptation, Origen says, That it is impossible to pass through this life without temptations; and he proves it, by giving a Catalogue of those temptations to which we are exposed in all conditions and at all times: from whence he concludes, That we ought not to pray not to be tempted, but only not to sink under temptation. He observes, That God suffers us to fall therein, for a punishment of our sins. He here delivers his Opinion of those Souls that were always free, which were sent into this World for a punishment of the faults which they had committed in the other life. He afterwards discourses of the advantage of temptations, for the trial and proving of our Vertue. Lastly, Upon these words, But deliver us from evil, he says, That God does not deliver us from all the troubles and afflictions of this life, but that he makes us support them with patience.

After having explained the Lord's Prayer, he discourses of the temper and disposition of mind that is requisite for Prayer, of the place where we are to pray, and of the time proper for Prayer. He would have him that is to pray, to recollect and prepare himself, that so he may perform it with the greater attention and fervency; and that after having purified his mind from the thoughts of this World, and banished from his heart all passions and earthly affections, he should reflect upon the excellency of the life to come; That he should drive from his heart all thoughts of hatred and enmity; That he should lift up his hands and eyes towards Heaven, when nothing hinders him; for he allows sick Persons to pray sitting or lying. He observes that kneeling is necessarily when we ask God pardon for our Sins. Concerning the place of Prayer, he says that every place is proper to pray in, but that Custom will have it that we should chuse the most retired part of the House for our Prayer; and that we should prefer the place which is set apart for the Assemblies of the Faithful, where the Angels are present, where we may be sensible of the Efficacy of Jesus Christ, of that of the Holy Ghost, and of the Suffrages of the Saints departed. He would have us always turn our selves to-

Origen. wards the Eaſt, whether we be in our Chamber, or in an open place. Laſtly, He diſtinguiſhes four Branches, or Common Places of Prayer; The Doxology, which ought to be ſaid, ſays he, at the beginning of Prayer, praiſing and glorifying the Father of Jeſus Chriſt through the Holy Ghoſt; It ought to be followed with Thanksgiving; Afterwards we muſt make a Confeſſion, or an Acculation of our ſelves for our Sins; to which we ought to add the craving of Heavenly Benedictions for us and our Friends. Laſtly, We muſt conclude our Prayer by praiſing God through the Son in the Holy Ghoſt. And this is a great part of what is contained in this Treatiſe of Origen's, which ſufficiently ſhews it to be of great uſe. There is nevertheleſs one paſſage which may create a great deal of difficulty to thoſe that read it: For he therein affirms, That we ought to addreſs our Prayers only to God the Father, and not to Jeſus Chriſt; becauſe the Son of God being different from the Father, 'tis abſurd to direct our Prayers to him. This expreſſion is very harſh, and difficult to excuſe: yet we may ſay, That he would have us addreſs our Prayers to the Father alone, for fear we might ſeem to acknowledge ſeveral Gods; and that when he ſays, That Jeſus Chriſt is an Eſſence different from the Father, he takes the term Eſſence for Perſon. And indeed he owns in ſeveral other places, and principally in the fifth and eighth Book againſt Celſus, That we may and ought to direct our Prayers to Jeſus Chriſt. Be the thing as it will, it cannot be denied but that he has aſſerted in this place ſeveral Propoſitions favourable to the Opinion of the Arians, on which it is difficult to put a good Conſtruction. Origen.

There is nothing more for me to do, to compleat all that relates to Origen, than to give an Account of the Quarrels and Diſputes which aroſe in the Church after his Death, upon the Account of his Perſon and his Writings: But this not being a Subject which any ways relates to the Deſign which I have propoſed in this Work, I do not think it neceſſary to engage my ſelf in this Relation, which otherwiſe would be but of very little uſe.

AMBROSE and TRYPHON, Diſciples of ORIGEN.

Ambroſe, and Tryphon. AMBROSE would not have deſerved to be reckoned among the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, had he not been Origen's Friend, and contributed very much to the Publiſhing of his Works, both by furniſhing him with Amanuenſes, and by continually preſſing him to his Work. He had been a Marcionite, and though he was converted, yet he retained ſome of his Errors, (if we believe St. Hierom.) However he was ordained Deacon, and generouſly confeſſed the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, with Theoctiſtus the Prieſt in the time of the Emperor Maximus. He was a Perſon of Quality, and wanted not Parts, which he ſhewed in ſome of his Letters to Origen, that were extant in St. Hierom's time, but now are all loſt. He died before Origen, and St. Hierom ſays that he was blamed becauſe, though he died Rich, yet he left nothing to his Friend, who was Poor.

Tryphon who was likewiſe Origen's Diſciple, and who had written ſome Letters to him, was looked upon in St. Hierom's time as a Man very well verſed in the Learning of the Sacred Scripture, which ſtill appears, ſays this Father, by ſeveral Works which he had compoſed; but more particularly by a Treatiſe concerning the Red Heifer in the 19th Chapter of Numbers, and upon the Diviſion of the Sacrifices made by Abraham in the 15th Chapter of Geneſis: From whence it appears, that Origen's Diſciples following their Maſter's Genius, applied themſelves wholly to Allegories. Ambroſe, and Tryphon.

[It is moſt probable, that Tryphon's Commentaries, are, in imitation of his Maſter Origen's, Allegorical; yet it is only probable, at leaſt, for any thing, that Mr. Du Pin has to ſay againſt it: and when things are loſt, to determine concerning them poſitively, is only beating the Air; and though we our ſelves know how little weight can be laid upon our words beyond conjecture, yet it may lead others into miſtakes, who think we can prove what we ſay, though we do not.]

BERYLLUS.

Beryllus. BERYLLUS Biſhop of Boſtra in Arabia, after he had been, as we have ſaid, undeceived of his Error by the Conference which he had had with Origen, wrote ſeveral ſmall Treatiſes, and particularly ſome Letters, wherein he returned Origen Thanks for his Converſion. The Conference which Origen had with him upon the occaſion of his Error was extant in St. Hierom's time; but at preſent we have nothing of his remaining. Beryllus.

St. CYPRIAN.

S. Cyprian. ST. Cyprian (a) was by Birth an African, and taught Rhetorick with great Reputation before he was a Chriſtian (b). He was converted (c) by the Perſuaſion of a Prieſt called Cecilius, from whom he took afterwards his Sirname. From the time that he was a Catechumen, he made a Reſolution with himſelf to live continently, believing, as his Deacon Pontius tells us, who has written his Life, that it was almoſt impoſſible otherwiſe to come to the Knowledge of the Truth. Preſently after he was baptized, he ſold all his Goods to aſſiſt the Poor. He was afterwards ordained Prieſt, and after the Death of Donatus Biſhop of Carthage, he was Elected Biſhop in his place, in the year 248 (d), by the Suffrages of the Clergy, and the People of Carthage, and the Choice was confirmed by a great Number of Biſhops, who were then aſſembled in that City. The Perſecution of Decius beginning two years or thereabouts, after his Ordination; the Heathens being enraged becauſe he encouraged his People to ſtand firm to the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, demanded him ſeveral times in a full Theatre, to expoſe him to the wild Beaſts. And this obliged him to retire from Carthage, according to the Command which he believed, he had received from God in a Viſion. In this Retreat he wrote ſeveral Letters to his People, his Clergy, the Confeſſors, and the Clergy of Rome, of which we may ſee a Catalogue, with an Account of their Subjects in the Sequel of this Hiſtory. When the Fury of the Perſecution abated, St. Cyprian came back to Carthage, and called a Council there the 15th of May, in the year 251, wherein he, with the Biſhops his Colleagues, regulated whatever related to the Penance of thoſe who had fallen in the time of Perſecution, either by taking Tickets or Teſtimonials from the Magiſtrates, certifying that they had committed Idolatry; or by offering Incenſe publickly upon the Altars of their Gods, or by eating the Meat which was ſacrificed to them. For the firſt they ordained that they ſhould be reconciled; but for the latter, they judged it neceſſary to leave them ſtill under Penance, and S. Cyprian.

(a) Saint Cyprian.] His own Name was Thaſcius, as appears by the Letter to Pipin, and the Acts of his Paſſion.

(b) Before he turned Chriſtian.] This is all we are able to ſay of what concerned him before his Converſion, becauſe Pontius the Deacon in his Life, and St. Jerome in his Catalogue tells us no more of him. What Baronius has cited, taken out of the Oration of St. Gregory Nazianzen, concerning one St. Cyprian a Martyr, does not belong to our Biſhop of Carthage: 'Tis commonly believed that St. Gregory ſpeaks of another St. Cyprian, but 'tis a great deal more probable, that the Greeks, who knew but little of what paſſed in the Weſt, feigned theſe Circumſtances in the Life of St. Cyprian Biſhop of Carthage, as it was a familiar thing with them to adorn and ſet off the Lives of Saints, with ſeveral uncertain and fabulous Narrations.

(c) He was converted.] His Converſion might happen towards the year 246. Having been baptized at Eaſter or at Whitſuntide, he writ his Letter to Donatus in Autumn. He tells us in his 59th Letter to Cornelius, which was written in the year 252, that it was four years ſince he had been made a Biſhop. Thus he was a Biſhop 10 years. He calls Donatus his Predeceſſor.

(d) The year 248.] The Perſecution under Decius began at the end of the year 249, or elſe at the beginning of the year 250.

S. Cyprian. not allow them Reconciliation till they became dangerously sick, provided also that they had begun to do Penance before they fell sick. For as for those who staid till they were seized with some desperate Distemper, before they desired to undergo their Penance, it was thought expedient wholly to refuse them Absolution, because then, (says St. Cyprian) 'Tis not so much their Sorrow for their Sin, as the Fear of Death that obliges them to desire it. Quia eos non tam Delicti Penitentia, quam Mortis Admonitio petere compellit. As for those Ecclesiasticks, who had fallen into Idolatry, it was ordained that they should for ever be excluded from the Clergy, that they should communicate no more with the Faithful but as Laymen, and that even some of them should be obliged to undergo the Severities of Penance. They Excommunicated Felicissimus and those of his party, who had disturbed the Tranquility of the Church of Carthage, in St. Cyprian's Absence. Perhaps it was at this Synod that Privatus, a Heretick of the Colony of Lambesa, presented himself, who had been already condemned in a Synod of Ninety Bishops, and seeing himself so far rejected, that they would not so much as hear him make his Defence, embraced the Party of Felicissimus. The Council, after they had made these Regulations, wrote a Synodical Letter to Cornelius, lately Elected Bishop of Rome, who assembled likewise a Synod of sixty Bishops, and several Priests, who followed the Rules of the African Council in the ordering of publick Penance, and Excommunicated Novatian, who joyning himself to Novatus, refused the Grace of Reconciliation to those Persons, who had once fallen into any sin, and caused himself to be ordained Bishop of Rome, in opposition to Cornelius, by three Bishops, whose Credulity and Easiness he had abused in this Matter. This for a time made a kind of a Schism in Rome, for Novatian drew to his party, not only some Priests, but also the Confessors who were ready to suffer Martyrdom. The Heads of both parties being desirous to obtain the Favour of St. Cyprian, and of the other African Bishops, wrote Letters to them, and sent their Deputies into Africk. But Novatian's were received very ill, and the African Bishops, who had for some time suspended their Judgment, and ceased to send Letters of Communion to either of the two parties, till they were informed of the Matter by two of their own Brethren, whose Names were Caldonius and Fortunatus, whom they had dispatched to Rome on purpose to learn the true state of the whole Affair: after they were fully instructed by them, and two other African Bishops, who were present at the Ordination of Cornelius, after what manner he had been ordained, decided it in Favour of him, and sent him Letters of Communion, having first confirmed the Judgment he had passed against Novatian in Italy. The Judgment of the Church in Africk, and the eloquent Letters of St. Cyprian, brought the Confessors of the Roman Church over to Cornelius's party. Thus the Novatians finding themselves cryed down in Italy, to be revenged upon St. Cyprian, raised Disturbances in Africk, where they caused one Maximus, a Deputy of Novatian to be chosen Bishop; and on the other side, Felicissimus the Deacon, an Enemy to St. Cyprian, got Privatus of Lambesa, whom we have already mentioned, to ordain, in opposition to him, one whose Name was Fortunatus, and afterwards came into Italy, to get his Ordination ratified there by Cornelius, and by the rest of the Italian Bishops, pretending that this Fortunatus had been ordained by five and twenty Bishops, and that St. Cyprian favoured the Party of the Novatians. Cornelius immediately rejected Felicissimus, and those of his Faction, but at last being either frighted by their Menaces, or else shaken by their Discourses, he entertained some Suspicions to the Prejudice of St. Cyprian, and writ to him after a very disobliging manner; to this the Saint returned a vigorous Answer, exposing his Weakness, and acquainting him with the Malice of his Enemies.

In the mean time, while Felicissimus endeavoured to create a Misunderstanding between St. Cyprian and Cornelius, that holy Man assembled a Council of sixty six Bishops at Carthage in April, in the year 252, wherein some Ecclesiastical Regulations were made concerning a certain Priest, whose Name was Victor, whom his Bishop had received to Grace contrary to the Decision of the Council, and also concerning the Baptism of Infants. About the same time he opposed one Fortunatianus a Bishop, who still held his Bishoprick, though he had sacrificed to Idols, and offered to reconcile those, who after they had held out for some time, at last yielded to the Violence of Torments, and who had undergone Penance for this their Transgression three whole Years.

St. Cyprian after this, having had several Revelations, which inclined him to believe that the Church was to be persecuted within a short time, was of opinion, that in order to prepare the Christians for this new Assault, it would be necessary to fortifie them with the Eucharist, and to that Effect, to reconcile them to the Church. So in the year 253, he assembled a Council of several Bishops, who were all of the same Judgment, and signified S. Cyprian. their Resolution to Pope Cornelius, that he might use the same Conduct in his own Church. Soon after happened the Persecution of Gallus. Pope Cornelius was sent into Banishment, and suffered Martyrdom the very same year. Lucius who succeeded him, was immediately banished, from whence he returned after the Death of Gallus, in the beginning of the year 254: but he did not long enjoy the Comforts of Peace, but suffered Martyrdom, after he had held the See of Rome for the space of eight Months only. Stephen was elected in his place towards the end of that year, or the beginning of the next. Under this Pope the Celebrated Dispute about the Validity of the Baptism of Hereticks was warmly discussed between the Churches of Africa and Rome. St. Cyprian being consulted in the year 255 by Januarius, and the other Bishops of Numidia, whether it was necessary to re-baptize those, who after they had been baptized by Hereticks, desired to be re-united to the Church, returned this Answer, as did several African Bishops assembled in Council, that no Baptism could be valid out of the Church; that it was absolutely necessary to re-baptize those who had received the Baptism of Hereticks; and in one word, that this Question had been already decided by the African Bishops their Predecessors. Quintus having also sent the same Demand to St. Cyprian, he made the same Answer, and sent him the Decision of this Synod, which was moreover confirmed in another African Council held in 256, which wrote to Stephen about it, to exhort him to embrace this Discipline. But he was so far from submitting to the Reason of the Africans, whether because he imagined they had a Design to condemn the Roman Church, or because he thought this Question was of too great Consequence, that he was enraged against St. Cyprian and his Colleagues, and used their Deputies ill: Nay, he prohibited all Christians belonging to his Church, to receive or lodge them, depriving them not only of Ecclesiastical Communion, but also refusing them the common Civilities of Hospitality. The Letter he writ back was full of Injuries and Invectives, and his Decision was comprised in these terms: 'If any one comes 'to you, of whatsoever Heresie he is, let there not be 'made the least Alteration in what has been regulated by 'Tradition, but only impose Hands upon him, and so 'receive him.' This Letter being brought into Africk, St. Cyprian moved at the Proceedings of Stephen, sent his Letter, with a Refutation of it, not only to Pompey of Africk, but also to Firmilian, and the other Bishops of Cappadocia, who were all of the same Opinion with St. Cyprian, touching the Baptism of Hereticks. Firmilian having received it, writ a long Letter, wherein he amply refutes the Opinion and Letter of Stephen, and establishes the Discipline which St. Cyprian defended; saying, it had been observed in his Country by an immemorial Custom, and confirmed in two numerous Synods held at Iconium and Synnada. As soon as St. Cyprian had received this Letter, he assembled a Synod at Carthage, in which the Letter he had writ to Jubianus upon this Question was openly read, and all the Bishops gave their Suffrages in favour of St. Cyprian's Opinion: Thus I have delivered in a few Words, the History of this famous Quarrel between two great Bishops, both of whom the Church still reverences as Saints.

However, If I may be allowed to make some Reflections upon their Opinions and Conduct, I shall not scruple to observe after St. Austin, that St. Cyprian shewed a great deal more Moderation in this Dispute, and that we can by no means excuse that Heat and Passion which so far transported Stephen: For though the first maintained his Opinion vigorously, yet he did it with abundance of Candor, and always declared he would leave other Bishops the Liberty to do as they judged convenient, and openly professed he would separate himself from the Communion of no body upon the score of this Controversie, Neminem separantes, said he often, aut a Communione submoventes. Whereas on the other hand, Pope Stephen not only asserted his Opinion with a world of Heat and Rigor, but also treated those Bishops unworthily, who followed a Practice different from his own, calling them false Christians, false Apostles, and Seducers, and refusing their Deputies not only the Communion of the Church, but even Lodging and Hospitality. As for what respects the Merits of the Cause, though 'tis commonly believed that the Pope had the Truth on his Side, yet there is sufficient reason to doubt whether he did not in the heat of his Opposition to St. Cyprian, carry things too far on the other side, and whether the Opinion of St. Austin, which the Church has since embraced, That we ought to receive those Persons without Baptism, who have been baptized by Hereticks in the Name of the Trinity, and to re-baptize those who have not been baptized according to that Form: Whether this Opinion, I say, does not ſteer the middle Courſe between Stephen's (f), who ſeems to have maintained that all thoſe who had been baptized by Hereticks ſhould be received without Re-baptization, which way ſoever they were baptized, à quacumque hereſi, and St. Cyprian's, who aſſerted that all ſuch ought to be re-baptized. Be it as it will, 'tis certain that St. Cyprian never altered his Opinion (g); that the Greek Churches were for a long time after him divided upon this Queſtion (h); that the Council of Arles firſt decided it in the Weſt (i); that it is not improbable that this was the Council which St. Auſtin (k) calls the full Council, which firſt decided this Controverſie; that St. Auſtin followed its Deciſion, and proves it at large in his Books againſt the Donatiſts; that the Weſtern Church has embraced this Opinion, and that though the Eaſtern Churches (l) have not agreed with her abſolutely in this Point, yet they always made a diſtinction between Hereticks, and differently received them. It would be no difficult matter to juſtifie all this; but as this is no proper place to diſcuſs this Queſtion, ſo it would carry us too far from our Subject. The Reader need only conſult our Annotations, to be better ſatisfied.

To compleat what remains of St. Cyprian's Life, it would be neceſſary here to tranſcribe the ancient Acts of his Paſſion, and what his Deacon Pontius has related concerning it; but the Deſcription of his Martyrdom does not concern the Subject or Deſign of this Work; and therefore I ſhall only obſerve, that towards the beginning of Valerian's Perſecution, in the Year 257, on the 30th of Auguſt, he was baniſhed to Curubis, a City about ten or twelve Leagues diſtant from Carthage, by the Command of Aſpaſius Paternus, the Proconſul; that after he had tarried there eleven Months, he was re-called by the Proconſul Galerius Maximus, who confined him to his own Gardens near Carthage; that being informed that the Proconſul had ſent ſome Soldiers to ſeize and carry him to Utica, he retired into a private Place, that he might not ſuffer Martyrdom out of his own Church, or after any other manner than in the Preſence of his own People; and that at laſt being come back again to his Gardens, after the Proconſul's return to Carthage, he was apprehended, and carried before him; where after he had generouſly made Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Faith, he had his Head cut off in a Place called Sexti, near the City of Carthage, on the 14th of September, in the Year 258, under the Conſulſhip of Tuſcus and Baſſus.

The firſt (m) Letter which St. Cyprian writ to Donatus, contains a Relation of a Conference he had with that Friend a little after his Baptiſm: wherein after he has ſpoke of the marvellous Effects of that Sacrament, he eloquently lays open the Perils we run in this World, the Crimes and Injuſtices that are there committed; and afterwards ſhewing the Excellence and Happineſs of thoſe Perſons who conſecrate themſelves to the Service of God; he exhorts his Friend to live a retired Life, to renounce the World, and to apply himſelf diligently to Reading and Praying. This Letter, which we are to conſider as the Firſt-fruits of St. Cyprian's Works, is written in a very gay florid Style, by no means ſuitable to the Matter in hand, as St. Auſtin obſerves in his Book of the Chriſtian Doctrine; adding, That this Martyr did not follow the ſame manner of Writing in his other Letters, but that he took up a more maſculine and graver way of Writing, and which was more becoming a Chriſtian. Theſe Letters are divided according to the Order of Time into five Claſſes (n): The firſt comprehends thoſe which he wrote in his firſt Exile. The ſecond thoſe which he wrote under the Pontificate of the two Popes, Cornelius and Lucius. The third, thoſe which he wrote under the Pontificate of Stephen. The fourth thoſe which he wrote during his laſt Exile, towards his latter End. The fifth, thoſe of which we cannot ſet down the preciſe time when they were written, which are but few. But beſides this general Order, which it is eaſie to obſerve, we are to take notice what Letters follow each other immediately, and this indeed has been attempted by Pamelius, but with very little Succeſs. The Order he has followed, has been reformed by a Learned Perſon, who has tranſlated St. Cyprian's Letters into our Language, in the Preface which he ſets before his Tranſlation. And laſtly, He that publiſhed a new Edition of St. Cyprian in England, has diſpoſed them in a new Order, according to the Series of Time. We ſhall follow either of them as we ſee convenient.

S. Cyprian.

The firſt of thoſe Letters that were written in the firſt Exile of St. Cyprian, in all probability is that which is the fourth in Pamelius's Edition, addreſſed to his Clergy, that is to ſay, to his Prieſts and Deacons, wherein he exhorts them to acquit themſelves in his Abſence of their own Functions and his, ſo that nothing may be defective in relation to Order and Diſcipline: He recommends to their Care thoſe Chriſtians who were impriſoned for the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, to aſſiſt them in their Neceſſities, and to adviſe the Chriſtians not to go in Multitudes to the Priſons, for fear of provoking the Pagans; that the Prieſts, who went to offer the Sacrifice of the Altar in Priſon, ſhould go thither each in their Turns, along with a Deacon; and laſtly, that the Chriſtians ſhould accommodate themſelves to the Times, and take care, as much as in them lay, to ſoften the Rigour of the Perſecution.

[What Du Pin renders to offer the Sacrifice of the Altar; in St. Cyprian, is only to offer. It is well enough known that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was called a Sacrifice,

(f) Between that of Stephen, who ſeems to have maintained.] What induces us to believe that Stephen was of this Opinion, is, in the firſt place, becauſe he makes no Diſtinction at all, but ſays plainly, à quacunque Hereſi. Secondly, Becauſe St. Cyprian and Firmilian take Stephen's Words in this ſenſe; now who can imagine that they would have engaged themſelves in a Diſpute, without ſo much as knowing the Opinion of their Adverſary. Thirdly, There were ſcarce any Hereticks before Stephen, who baptized in the Name of the Trinity, ſo that it had been only a chimerical Queſtion about a thing which had never been practiſed, to diſpute whether it were neceſſary to re-baptize thoſe who had been baptized in the Name of the Trinity by Hereticks, ſince there were almoſt no Hereticks that uſed to baptize after that manner. Fourthly, the ancient Author of a ſmall Book written againſt the Opinion of St. Cyprian, makes no mention of this Diſtinction of Hereticks, but generally approves all Baptiſm whatever given in the Name of Jeſus Chriſt. Fifthly, St. Auguſtine never cites Stephen's Decree for his Opinion; on the other hand, he oppoſes the Opinion of Stephen and St. Cyprian. And in his ſixth Book de unico Bapt. c. 14. he tells us Stephen maintained that no body was to be re-baptized, in nullo iterandum Baptiſma. There are ſeveral other Reaſons which I paſs over in ſilence.

(g) St. Cyprian never altered his Opinion.] There is not the leaſt probability that St. Cyprian altered his Opinion. In the time of the Council of Arles, the Africans ſtill continued this Practice, and in Optatus's time they diſtinguiſhed between Hereticks and Schiſmaticks, receiving the latter without Baptiſm, but re-baptizing the former.

(h) Divided upon this Queſtion.] Denis of Alexandria in Euſebius teſtifies that the Eaſtern Churches were divided upon this Queſtion. St. Athanaſius rejects the Baptiſm of Hereticks. St. Baſil in two Canons of his Letter to Amphilochius examines the different Cuſtoms of ſeveral Churches about this Queſtion, and inclines to the Party of thoſe who reject the Baptiſm of Hereticks as invalid.

(i) Firſt decided it in the Weſt.] The Council of Arles, 1. c. 8. De Afris qui propriâ lege utuntur ut re-baptizent.

(k) Calls the full Council.] This Queſtion has been diſcuſſed with mighty Heat in our time, though it be but of ſmall Importance. It is certain that the Council of Arles has decided it agreeably to the Opinion of St. Auſtin, and that the Africans gave the Name of a full Council to Councils conſiſting of more than one Province, as was that of Arles. However it is, the Council of Nice has not decided this Queſtion, but only ordained that the Paulianiſts ſhould be re-baptized. Now it is not certain whether they baptized in the Name of the Trinity, or no: And St. Athanaſius himſelf ſeems to affirm the contrary; beſides that, though they had not baptized in the Name of the Trinity, yet we cannot ſay that this Council has determined the Queſtion.

(l) The Eaſtern Churches.] Thoſe of the Eaſt did not make uſe of St. Auſtin's Diſtinction either in the Council of Conſtantinople, or in the Council that was held in the Emperor's Palace; but they diſtinguiſhed between three ſorts of Hereticks. Thoſe that were to be re-baptized as the Paulianiſts, and the ancient Hereticks, together with the Eunomians and Sabellians, who did not obſerve three Immerſions. Secondly, thoſe that were to be anointed, ſuch as were the Arians, the Macedonians, the Novatians, the Quarto decimani, and the Apollinarians: And laſtly, thoſe who had nothing more to do than barely to make an Abjuration, as the Eutychians, the Neſtorians, the Severians, the Acephali, and the Monotheliteſ.

(m) The firſt Letter.] 'Tis rather a Treatiſe than a Letter, but all St. Cyprian's Works were called Letters, as it appears by Ruffinus in his Apology. St. Pacian calls the Book de Lapſis, a Letter, Ep. 3. ad Sempronianum. St. Auſtin likewiſe not only calls the Treatiſe to Donatus but the Book of Unity, the Treatiſe of Zeal and Envy by this Name; and in ſome other places he gives the title of the Book to the Letters. It is an eaſie matter however to diſtinguiſh the Letters from the Treatiſes; We leave the Treatiſe to Donatus amongſt the Letters, tho' it is a Treatiſe.

(n) Into five Claſſes.] In the Engliſh Edition before the other Letters of St. Cyprian, we find four that are ſaid to have been written before his Retirement, but they bring no Proofs or Conjectures ſtrong enough to ſupport this Opinion, and therefore we had better own that we cannot tell when they were written.

S.Cyprian. Sacrifice, the Lord's Table an Altar, and the Adminiſtration Offering, in St. Cyprian's Time; and it has been as often proved by all that have given an Account of the Belief of the Fathers in this Matter, That their Opinion was widely diſtant from that of the Church of Rome in this Point.]

This firſt Letter was ſoon followed by another, mentioned by him in his ſixth Epiſtle, wherein he commends the Confeſſors for their Courage, and exhorts them to do nothing unworthy of ſuch glorious beginnings. Monſieur Lombert is of Opinion that it is loſt, whereas the Editor of the Engliſh pretends that it is the eighty firſt Letter which Pamelius ſuppoſes to have been written during his laſt Exile; but it is more probable that this Letter was written in his firſt, becauſe he there excuſes his Abſence, which he would never have done in his laſt, where he was detained againſt his Will (o).

It happened at this time, that a Subdeacon of Carthage, named Clementius, who had gone to Rome towards the beginning of the Perſecution, came back to Carthage, bringing two Letters with him from the Clergy of Rome, during the Vacancy of that See by the Death of Fabian: One of them was directed to St. Cyprian, and gave him Intelligence of the Martyrdom of Fabian Biſhop of Rome; the other was addreſſed to the Clergy of Carthage, exhorting them to take care of the Flock of Jeſus Chriſt in the Abſence of their Paſtor, and encouraging the Faithful to continue ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and to raiſe up thoſe who had the Misfortune to fall; to look after the Priſoners, the Needy, the Widows, and Catechumens; to reconcile the relapſed Penitents at their Death to the Church, and to bury the Bodies of the Martyrs. It reproached the Paſtors who abandoned their Flock in the time of Perſecution; which Paſſage ſeems indirectly to condemn St. Cyprian's Retreat. This Letter is the ſecond in the Order of Pamelius.

St. Cyprian anſwered this Letter of the Roman Clergy, by congratulating them for the glorious Martyrdom of St. Fabian; and having received a copy of the Letter which the Clergy of Rome had writ, to his, though it was both without Inſcription and Subſcription, yet he ſent to Rome to know whether this Letter was really writ by the Clergy of that City, giving them to underſtand that he was concern'd at their ſeeming to diſapprove his Retreat: This is the third Letter. Some time after this, the Proconſul coming to Carthage, perſecuted the Chriſtians after a cruel manner, cauſing ſome of the Priſoners to be put to Death, and amongſt the reſt, Mappalicus, who ſuffered Martyrdom on the 17th day of April. St. Cyprian being inform'd of this, made uſe of their Example to encourage the other Confeſſors to imitate their Conſtancy and Generoſity: and this he did in the 8th Letter. At the ſame time alſo he writ the 36th, addreſſed to his own Clergy, to whoſe care he recommends the Confeſſors that were in Priſon, requiring them to interr the Bodies of thoſe who died there, to reverence them as Martyrs, and to ſend him word of the Day of their Death, that he might offer Sacrifices in remembrance of them. Some of the Chriſtians being then returned home from their Exile, without receiving Orders to do it, St. Cyprian writ a Letter to them, which is the 8th according to Pamelius's Account, wherein he takes occaſion to blame their Conduct.

[Mr. Dodwell, in his 5th Diſſertation upon St. Cyprian, tells us what kind of Sacrifices theſe are: They could not be offered as Propitiations, becauſe the Church believed the Martyrs were already Bleſſed. They were only Anniverſary Celebrations of the Memory of the Martyrdom of thoſe who ſuffered ſo glorioufly for the Faith. Thus all the Saints were alſo remembred in the Diptychs of the Church: Thus the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apoſtles, and the bleſſed Virgin her ſelf, though no Man ever thought they could ſtand in need of the Prayers of the Faithful. But the Chriſtians were careful, even in the moſt Primitive Times, to pay all poſſible Honours to the memories of thoſe who made a glorious Confeſſion of the Faith. The Acts of St. Polycarp's Martyrdom, which are the oldeſt we have, ſhew how ſolicitous the Chriſtians of Smyrna were to have his Aſhes, not to worſhip them, as they themſelves declare, but by paying the laſt Reſpect to them that was poſſible, to ſhew how willing they ſhould have been to ſuffer in the ſame Cauſe, if they had had an equal Call. Nay, all Chriſtians that died in the Communion of the Church, had in thoſe early Ages ſome Honours paid to them after their Death. Therefore St. Cyprian commanded that no Honour ſhould be paid to Geminius Victor becauſe he had left Geminius Fauſtinus, a Prieſt, his Executor by his Will: And ſo Du Pin's Words, when he ſpeaks of this Buſineſs afterwards, are to be underſtood; for the ſame Phraſes are uſed, when he ſpeaks of the Commemoration of Martyrs Anniverſaries, and of this of Geminius Victor there forbidden.] S.Cyprian.

The Perſecution that ſtill continued, as it augmented The Number of Martyrs, ſo it augmented the Number of the Lapſed, that is to ſay, of thoſe Chriſtians who were ſo weak as to deny the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and offer Incenſe to Idols, or elſe ſuch as, to avoid Perſecution, got Certificates or Atteſtations under the Hands of ſome Judge, to certifie that they had ſacrificed. Now thoſe who had once fallen away, being thrown out of the Church, and excluded from Communion, addreſſed themſelves to the Martyrs, whoſe Credit and Authority in the Church at that time was extraordinary, who gave them Tickets, wherein they deſired that they might be admitted to Reconciliation. They writ to St. Cyprian on the ſame account, praying him to take this their Deſire into conſideration, and to receive theſe Perſons whom they recommended, whenever the Church ſhould be in Peace. But ſome of them happening to abuſe theſe Tickets of the Martyrs, demanded to be reconciled immediately, and addreſſing themſelves to Felicifſimus, and ſome other Prieſts, who were Enemies to St. Cyprian, received Abſolution from their Hands. St. Cyprian being inform'd of theſe irregular Proceedings, after he had continued ſome time in ſilence, writ a Letter full of Zeal and Earneſtneſs to his Prieſts and Deacons (this is the ninth) wherein he ſeverely reproves the Prieſts, who forgetting their Rank, and the Duty they owed their Biſhop, had raſhly abſolved thoſe who had fallen into Idolatry. He reproaches them with deceiving the Faithful, inaſmuch as they reconciled them before they had done Penance for their Tranſgreſſions: He remonſtrates to them, that if in Sins of leſs Scandal and Conſequence, it is neceſſary to undergo publick Penance for ſome conſiderable time before the Party offending is re-admitted into the Church, by Impoſition of Hands from the Biſhop and Clergy, it is a ſtrange perverting of Diſcipline to admit theſe to the Communion, who, though they have ſhamefully denied the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſacrificed to Idols, yet have undergone no Penance for their Crime, nor received the Impoſition of Hands of the Biſhop and Prieſts; that as for the Martyrs, they were excuſable, becauſe they did not know the Law; but that thoſe who gave them this falſe Reconciliation were highly to be blamed: That it was a ſcandalous thing for Eccleſiaſticks to abuſe the eaſie Temper of the Martyrs, whom they rather ought to have diſſuaded, in caſe they requeſted any thing which was contrary to the Diſcipline of the Church; but that indeed the Martyrs had demanded nothing like it, ſince they only Writ to him to grant the Favour of Reconciliation to thoſe to whom they had given Tickets, when the Perſecution ſhould ceaſe. At laſt he threatens ſome of his Clergy who had ſhown themſelves raſh, indiſcreet, and preſumptuous upon this Occaſion, if they continued in their Obſtinacy, to forbid them to offer till ſuch time as they gave an account of their Behaviour before himſelf, and the Confeſſors, and the Congregation of the faithful. He writ likewiſe at the ſame time to the Confeſſors, to adviſe them not to be ſo free of their Tickets, or give them to all Petitioners, but to inform themſelves better of the Character of thoſe Perſons, to whom they deſigned this Indulgence; and then diſſuades the People from ſoliciting their Admiſſion into the Church with ſo much Precipitation, by making them ſenſible that a raſh Abſolution was ſo far from appeaſing God's Anger, that it would rather draw his Vengeance down upon them. The Letters are the Tenth and Eleventh.

His Clergy returning him no Anſwer, obliged him to write a ſecond Letter to them, wherein, after he has complained of their Silence, he gives the Prieſts and Deacons leave to reconcile thoſe, who having fallen into Idolatry, had received Tickets from the Martyrs when they were dying; and Orders them to Baptize the Catechumens that were in danger. This Letter is the Twelfth in Pamelius's Order, and was written towards the beginning of the Summer 250. His Clergy ſending him word, that they did not fail to adviſe thoſe that had fallen, not to be over haſty, but to undergoe Penance; and yet, notwithſtanding all the Remonſtrances they made, there was ſome amongſt them who daily preſſed them; he anſwered as he did before in his former Letter, that they ought to reconcile thoſe who had received Tickets, from the (o) Detained againſt his Will.] The five and thirtieth Letter is placed after this, in the Edition lately put out in England, but it ſeems to me to have been written towards the end of the Perſecution, becauſe he there ſpeaks of his Return. We are to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the ſixth, and ſeventh, and the fifth, which were all written at the ſame time.

S. Cyprian. Martyrs, when they were dangerouſly Sick; but that others, though they had received Tickets, ought to wait till the Biſhops could aſſemble to fix this Buſineſs, by common conſent. This Letter is the Thirteenth.

About this time having received Information, That the Letter, a Copy whereof he had by him, without any Subſcription, came from the Clergy of Rome, he writ to them to juſtifie his Retreat, and give them an account of the Paſtoral Care he had of his Flock, all the while he was abſent. This he does in his Fourteenth Letter, wherein he at large acquaints the Clergy of Rome with all that had paſſed upon the Occaſion of the Lapſed; and tells them of the Reſolution he had taken conformable to theirs, not to give Abſolution to thoſe that had fallen, except they were in Danger of Death, till ſuch time as ſeveral Biſhops could meet to deliberate upon the Affair, by communicating the ſame to their Churches.

At the ſame time Celerinus, a Confeſſor at Rome, writ a Letter to Lucian, a Confeſſor at Carthage, wherein he deſires him to pray to God for his Siſter, who having fallen away in the Perſecution, was enjoyn'd Penance: This is the Twentieth. Lucian ſends him word again, that he had reconciled all thoſe who had fallen, purſuant to the Order he had received from the Martyr Paul, but upon condition that they would apply themſelves to their Biſhops, and do publick Penance for their faults: This is the Twenty firſt Letter; and indeed this Lucian had given Tickets in the Name of Paul and Mappalicus, to all the Lapſed, who preſented themſelves before him, after he was informed of the Penance they had done after their Fall, and had Writ to St. Cyprian, deſiring him to acquaint the Biſhops with it: This Letter is the Fifteenth. St. Cyprian having received it, ſent word immediately to his Clergy, that ſince the Demand of the Confeſſors concerned all the Biſhops, he durſt not prevent them, or take upon himſelf the Deciſion of a Matter, wherein all his Brethren had a ſhare; that therefore he would not reconcile the Penitents till Peace was reſtor'd to the Church, and he had the advice of the reſt of his Brethren: This Letter is the Seventeenth. At the ſame time he ſent a Copy of a Letter of a certain Biſhop named Caldonius, who was of the ſame Opinion with himſelf, as to the Reconciliation of thoſe that had fallen, together with his own Anſwer to it. Theſe two Letters are the Eighteenth and Nineteenth. At this Juncture arrived Letters from Rome, one from the Clergy, the other from Moſes, Maximus, Nicoſtratus, and the other Confeſſors.

The firſt is addreſſed to the Clergy, the ſecond to Sturninus, Aurelius, and ſome other Perſons. The Scope and Deſign of both, is to exhort thoſe who had fallen into Idolatry, not to uſe over much haſt in getting themſelves reconciled, but to wait a ſufficient time to undergo a true Penance. Theſe Letters that were full of an Evangelical Spirit, rejoyced St. Cyprian exceedingly, and ſecured him from the Complaints that were made againſt him. He thought himſelf therefore obliged to thank the Clergy and Confeſſors of Rome in two Letters, which he wrote to them. In that directed to the Clergy, the 22d in order, he gives them an Account of all that had happen'd in Lucian's Affair, he complains of the Raſhneſs of that Man, and tells them very properly to this Subject, That the Martyrs don't make the Goſpel, but the Goſpel the Martyrs.

In the other, which he ſent to the Confeſſors (the 24) he commends their Zeal exceedingly, and tells them, That to be true Martyrs, we ought always to obſerve an inviolable Sanctity in our Words, and not to deſtroy the precepts of JESUS CHRIST, when we pretend to die for him. He ordained Saturus a Reader, and Optatus a Sub-deacon to carry theſe Letters, becauſe it was the Cuſtom of Biſhops in thoſe days to ſend their Letters by none but Clergy-Men. He acquainted his Clergy with this Ordination in his 25th Letter, and ſent them a Copy of the Letters he writ to Rome, and excuſed himſelf for being obliged to do this Buſineſs in the Abſence of his Clergy. The Clergy of Rome being fully inform'd of St. Cyprian's conduct, ſent him a Letter of Novatian's compoſing full of Eſteem and Reſpect, which was brought him by Optatus, and Saturus. They acknowledged, that though St. Cyprian being aſſured by the Teſtimony of his own Conſcience, was therefore under no great Neceſſity to juſtifie himſelf; yet he deſerved, however abundance of Commendation, for deſiring that his Actions might be approved by his Brethren; that if he had communicated his Reſolutions to them, it was not becauſe they were his Judges, but only that they might partake the Glory of it with him, by ſupporting and authoriſing them, as they do in the 30th Letter, wherein they declare, that they were of St. Cyprian's Opinion, That it was neceſſary to tarry till Peace were reſtored to the Church, That ſo the advice of the Biſhops, Prieſts, Deacons, and Confeſſors, who continued firm to the Church might be conſulted, before they regulated a Matter of that great importance: That as for themſelves and their Neighbours, they would determine nothing till they had a Biſhop: That in the mean time they defer'd to give thoſe Perſons Abſolution who were able to tarry; but as for thoſe who were in danger of Death, and had given ſufficient Marks of a ſincere Repentance, and unfeigned Sorrow, they looked upon themſelves obliged to relieve them in that neceſſity, leaving to God the Judgment of thoſe Perſons. This Letter is writ with a World of Elegance and Politeneſs, and abounds with admirable thoughts upon the retarding of Abſolution, and alſo upon that Penance that is neceſſary to ſatisfie God. 'Let 'thoſe People, ſay they, who by reaſon of their Crimes, 'have deſerved to be ejected out of the Church, knock 'at the Gates, but not break them open; Let them come 'to the Church-Porch, but let them go no farther: Let 'them demand Peace and Abſolution, but let it be with 'Modeſty, Humility, Patience, and Submiſſion: Let 'their Tears and their Sighs intercede for them, and teſti-'fie the real ſorrow they have for their Sins. S. Cyprian.

The Confeſſors of Rome likewiſe returned an anſwer to St. Cyprian at the ſame time. Their Letter, which is the 25th, though not ſo polite as the former, is equally Learned. They thank St. Cyprian for the Letter he ſent them, and aſſure him they received no ſmall Satisfaction and Comfort from it; they looked upon the Condition of thoſe Perſons who had ſuffered Martyrdom to be extreamly happy, ſince they went directly to Heaven, and thought themſelves to be unfortunate, becauſe they were deprived of that Bleſſing. They commend St. Cyprian for his great Vigilance over his Flock, though he was conſtrained by Neceſſity to be abſent from it. In ſhort, they were of Opinion, that Penitents ought not to be admitted to Reconciliation, before the Church was in a State of Tranquility, ſhewing how neceſſary Repentance is to blot out our Tranſgreſſions, and how dangerous it is to cloſe up a Wound before it be throughly healed.

Theſe Letters being mighty advantageous to St. Cyprian's Affairs, he diſpatched a Copy of them to his Clergy, with Orders to ſhew them to the Faithful of Carthage, and to the Biſhops that were Strangers, as we find in the 31ſt Letter: But notwithſtanding all this Advice, the Lapſi, in a full Body writ a Letter to St. Cyprian in the Church's Name, wherein they demanded of him to grant them reconciliation, as being a thing they might juſtly claim, pretending that Paul the Martyr had given it to all of them before he died. St. Cyprian ſent them word, in the 26th Letter, That the Church conſiſting only of the Biſhop and Clergy, and all the Laicks who continued firm and ſtedfaſt, he wondered how they durſt be ſo bold, as to Write to him in the Name of the Church, and demanded Reconciliation of him as a thing that was their Due, inſtead of Writing to him after a ſubmiſſive manner, as ſome had done before, who, though they had received Tickets from the Martyrs, yet humbly ſignified to him that they acknowledged their Fault, that they were heartily ſorry for it, and were by no means urgent to receive the Peace of the Church: That he deſired them therefore, for the Time to come, to let him know preciſely what they requeſted, and to ſend him their Names, that he might know what to do. He wrote alſo the 27th Letter to the Clergy, to inform them, that if any of his Prieſts and Deacons, or elſe any Stranger ſhould be ſo preſumptuous, as to communicate with the Lapſi, before that Affair were ſolemnly decided, he declared him to be cut off from Communion. He commends them for ſeparating themſelves from Caius a Presbyter of Didda, and his Deacon, who communicated with the Apoſtates, though they had been twice reprimanded by the Biſhops; and declares, that he will not judge the cauſe of Philumenus and Fortunatus the Deacons, and of Favorinus the Acolyth, who had withdrawn themſelves in the heat of Perſecution, but that they muſt tarry till his return before he examined their Cauſe, not only with his Colleagues, but alſo with the People; that in the mean time he would have them deprived of the Diſtribution that was given to the Clergy, though in ſuch a manner, as ſhould not do any Prejudice to the Merits of their Cauſe. He afterwards, in his 28th Letter, Acquaints the Clergy of Rome with all that he had regulated and done about thoſe that had fallen; and they for their Part, return him a very obliging Letter, wherein they commend his ſtedfaſtneſs, and condemn the Precipitation of thoſe that were ſo eager to be reconciled

(p) Celerinus the Confeſſor.] Theſe Letters are placed in this Year, becauſe it is not unlikely that they were written ſome time after the Perſecution was begun. This of Celerinus was written after Eaſter.

S. Cyprian. to the Church; but at the ſame time they excuſed the Martyrs, who ſent them to their Biſhop. Towards the end of the Letter, they thank him for the information he had given them concerning Privatus of Lambeſa, and aſſure him that they think themſelves obliged to ſhew, that they are not indifferent in thoſe things which relate to other Churches, becauſe 'Paſtors ought to watch in common 'for the Body of the whole Church, the ſeveral Parts of 'which are extended in many Provinces. This Letter is the 29th. Towards October, Celerinus of Africa, after he had generouſly confeſſed the Chriſtian Faith at Rome, came back to Carthage; and going to find out St. Cyprian in his Retirement, comforted him exceedingly, by letting him know what an affection Moſes, and the other Confeſſors of Rome bore unto him. This obliged him to write another Letter to them, to acquaint them how ſenſibly he received their Good-will, and to encourage them to perſevere in the reſolution they had taken upon them to dye for JESUS CHRIST. This is the 17th Letter in the Order of Pamelius. It contains an admirable Commendation of Martyrdom; he obſerves in it, that it was almoſt a full Year ſince they were in Priſon; but then endeavours to ſatisfie them, that their Recompence would be proportionable to the Length of their Sufferings, and that immediately after their Martyrdom, they would receive the Happineſs of enjoying GOD. Theſe Confeſſors, animated by this eloquent Letter, ſuffered Martyrdom ſoon after the Receit of it.

In December, St. Cyprian ordained the Readers, Aurelius and Celerinus, both of whom had confeſſed the Faith of JESUS CHRIST, and ſignified this Ordination immediately after to his Clergy and People, in his 32d and 33d Letters, wherein he excuſes himſelf for having Ordained them before he had conſulted his Church, becauſe we need not ſtay for the Teſtimony of Men, when we have that of GOD. He gives them both an extraordinary Character of their Virtue, and the great Conſtancy they ſhewed in ſuffering for the Chriſtian Faith. He ſays, they deſerved to be advanced to the higheſt Dignities of the Church, but that he judged it more convenient to Ordain them only Readers, becauſe they were ſo very young: That in the mean time he deſigned to make them Prieſts; and therefore ordered them to give them their Diſtributions, as if they were ſo already. At the ſame time he aſſociated Numidicus the Prieſt to his Clergy, who was as illuſtrious for the ſtrictneſs of his Virtue and Faith, as for the Glory of his Confeſſion; for after he had, by his Exhortations, ſent a great Number of Martyrs to GOD before him, who were either burnt or ſtoned to Death, and ſaw his Wife, whom he entirely loved, caſt, among ſeveral others, into the Fire, with Joy, he himſelf was half burnt, bruiſed with Stones, and left for Dead. This is related in the 34th Letter, which was writ in his Favour.

In the beginning of the Year 257, the Confeſſors that were in Priſon at Carthage, being ſet at Liberty, ſome of them were licentious in their Behaviour. St. Cyprian being inform'd of it, writ two Letters, one to his Clergy, and the other to the Confeſſors. In the firſt which is the 5th according to Pamelius's Order, he ſends his Clergy Word, that he earneſtly deſired to come back to Carthage, but that the Time not permitting him to do it, he conjured them to ſupply his Abſence, to have a particular Care of the Poor, and to exhort the Confeſſors not to loſe the Honour of their glorious Confeſſion by their Sins, but to ſuffer themſelves to be governed by the Prieſts and Deacons; that as for himſelf he could not regulate the affairs of his Church alone, having obliged himſelf, when he was firſt made Biſhop, to do nothing of his own Head, without the Advice of his Clergy, and the Conſent of the People.

In the Letter which he writ at the ſame time to the Confeſſors, he adviſes them to a ſtrict Obſervance of the Diſcipline of the Church, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould ſeem to renounce JESUS CHRIST, by their irregular way of Living, whom they had confeſſed before with their Tongues. He commends thoſe who behaved themſelves diſcreetly, and vigorouſly reprehends the reſt; he exhorts all Chriſtians to live ſoberly, and to forſake all Vices, that ſo they may be perfectly changed, and become perfect, when Peace, which GOD promiſes to ſend in a ſhort time, ſhall be reſtored to the Church. He gives the ſame Advice to his Clergy in the 7th Letter, where he tells them, that as the Perſecution had been occaſioned by the Corruptions of the Manners of the Chriſtians, ſo it would be impoſſible to obtain a Ceſſation of it from GOD, by any other Means, than offering up Prayers to him in the Spirit of Union, and living a Vertuous Life. Soon after he writ the 35th Letter to his Clergy, wherein he aſſures them, that he paſſionately deſired to come and ſee them, but that he was obliged to have a Regard to the Peace of the Church; and he was afraid that his Preſence might exaſperate the Pagans; that as ſoon as ever they ſent him Word that all was calm, and GOD ſhould inform him of it, he would ſpeedily repair to them. In the mean time he recommended the Poor to their Care, and ſent ſome Money to Rogatianus the Prieſt, to ſupply their Neceſſities; as alſo to relieve Strangers, and thoſe that were Sick. S. Cyprian.

St. Cyprian being not in a Capacity at that time to go to Carthage, diſpatched two Biſhops, whoſe Names were Caldonius and Fortunatus, to relieve the Poor with Money, and to examine thoſe Perſons who were thought worthy to be choſen into Eccleſiaſtical Offices. Feliciſſimus, who had always caballed againſt St. Cyprian, and aſſerted, that it was neceſſary to admit thoſe that had fallen into a Reconciliation, hindered theſe Alms and Examinations, as much as lay in his Power, and threatned to ſeparate himſelf from thoſe that ſhould receive any thing, and obey their Biſhop. After this, he retired to a Mountain, with thoſe of his own Party, and declared himſelf their Head. St. Cyprian being informed of this Defection, writ to the two Biſhops, ſignifying, that ſince Feliciſſimus had threatned to communicate no longer with thoſe who were in his Place, he would deprive him and all the reſt of his Faction, from the Communion of the Church; and that, ſetting this Crime aſide, he deſerved to be Excommunicated for the Rapines, the Cheating, and Adulteries of which he was accuſed. This Letter is the 37th. He writ likewiſe the 39th Letter to his own People, wherein, after he had repreſented what a grief it was to him, that this Diſturbance retarded his return, he remonſtrates with ſome Vehemence, that as there is but one Church, ſo there is but one Chair in every Church, whereof the Biſhop is Maſter; that we cannot ſet up Altar againſt Altar, nor eſtabliſh a new Prieſthood: and that thoſe who revolt from their Biſhop, and ſeparate themſelves from his Communion are out of the Church. In ſhort he threatens, at the ſame time, to exclude thoſe for ever who ſhould joyn themſelves to Feliciſſimus. Caldonius, Fortunatus, and the reſt of St. Cyprians Clergy, had no ſooner received theſe Letters, but they excommunicated Feliciſſimus, and thoſe of his Cabal, and acquainted St. Cyprian with it in the 83d Letter. And thus I have given the true Order, as well as the Subject of all thoſe Letters that were written to St. Cyprian, during the time of his firſt Baniſhment.

The order of the Letters written after his Return is leſs perplexed and confuſed in Pamelius's Edition than in that of the former. The 40th and 41ſt Letters are the firſt in this ſecond Order, and are addreſſed to Cornelius. St. Cyprian had ſent him word of all that had paſſed in Africk, upon the Difference he had with Novatian, and informed him (q) of the Faction of Feliciſſimus. At the ſame time alſo he writ the 43d Letter to the Confeſſors of Rome, to diſſuade them from Novatian's Party, and gave Cornelius information of it in the 42d Letter, wherein he acquaints him, that he had given Orders to his Subdeacon Metius, who carried it, to ſhew to him, leſt he ſhould ſuſpect him to entertain a Commerce with the Schiſmaticks. In the mean time, Primitivus the Prieſt, who had carried St. Cyprian's firſt Letter from Carthage, being returned thither, brought him a Letter from Cornelius, in which he complains that the Letters that were ſent him from Adrumetum, were not directed to him, but to his Clergy, ever ſince Juvenalis and St. Cyprian were arrived there. To this St. Cyprian anſwers in the 44th Letter, that the Reaſon of this was, becauſe they had acquainted the Chriſtians of that Colony with a Deciſion lately made in Africk, which, by reaſon of their Biſhop's Abſence, they were ignorant of, viz. That they ſhould neither Write to Novatian nor Cornelius, but to the Clergy of Rome, till they had received certain News from Caldonius and Fortunatus; and that ſince Cornelius's Ordination was now approved of by all the World, he himſelf in particular had writ about it to all the African Biſhops. Towards the end of this Letter he prays, That GOD, who choſe and eſtabliſhed Biſhops, would not only vouchſafe to protect and defend them, but give them Grace and Knowledge neceſſary to repreſs the Licentiouſneſs of offenders with Vigor, and to manage the good Inclinations of the Penitents with Gentleneſs and Clemency.

In the mean time the Confeſſors of the Church of Rome returning from their Error, and being received by Cornelius in an Aſſembly of the Roman Clergy, where five Biſhops made their Appearance; Cornelius communicated this News to St. Cyprian in the 45th Letter, which he ſent to him by the Hands of the Acolyth Nicephorus (q) The Cabals of Feliciſſimus.] Theſe Letters were carried by Metius the Subdeacon as well as the one and fortieth.

S.Cyprian. cephorus, wherein he gives him a particular account of whatever had paſſed in relation to the Confeſſors, and how they had acknowledged their Fault, and deſired to be publickly pardoned, owning that they had been abuſed by the Perfidiouſneſs and Artifices of Novatian; and that, though they had communicated with him, yet they were always in their hearts united to the Church, and acknowledged at the bottom, that as there was but one God, one Chriſt, and one Holy Ghoſt, ſo there ought to be but one Biſhop in a Catholick Church: That after this ſolemn Profeſſion, they had been received with the Approbation of the People; and that they had granted the Favour to Maximus the Prieſt, to keep his Rank and Dignity. The Perſon that carried this, brought St. Cyprian another Letter from Cornelius, wherein he informs him of the Departure of Novatus and his Companions, Nicoſtratus the Deacon, Evariſtus the Biſhop, Primus and Dionyſius: This is the 47th Letter. St. Cyprian having received theſe two Letters, anſwered them by two others. In the firſt, which is the 46th, he rejoyces with Cornelius at the Return of the Confeſſors. In the ſecond, which is the 48th, he paints Novatus in his true Colours, and accuſes him of ſeveral Crimes. He tells him, it was he who by his Caballing, had got Feliciſſimus to be ordained a Deacon in Africk; and that coming to Rome afterwards, he had been the cauſe of Novatian's being Ordained; but that it was no wonder that this Man could not continue in the Church, who had violated all the Laws of Chriſtian Morality, the Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline; that he had plunder'd the Orphans and Widows; that he had cheated the Churches, by laying out their Money to other Uſes; that he had ſuffered his own Father to die of meer Poverty; and that he had been the cauſe of his Wife's proving Abortive, by Kicking and Ill-uſing her; that he ought not only to be deprived of the Prieſthood, but alſo of the Communion of the Church, for his Crimes; and that he had prevented the Judgment which the Biſhops ought to have paſſed againſt him by his voluntary Separation. At the ſame time likewiſe, the Confeſſors of Rome writ to St. Cyprian, ſignifying, that after they had deliberated among themſelves, concerning the Welfare and Peace of the Church, forgetting what had paſſed, and leaving the Judgment of it to God, they had reconciled themſelves to Cornelius, to the Clergy, and all the Church of Rome. St. Cyprian congratulated them upon their Return, in ſuch a manner as ſufficiently teſtified the Joy he had at ſuch welcome News; as alſo the Sorrow he had formerly entertained at their falling away. Theſe Letters in Pamelius's Edition, are the 49th and 50th.

Towards the beginning of the Year 252, Antoninus an African Biſhop, who had been of Cornelius's Side, having received a Letter from Novatian, to acquaint him, that Cornelius had received Trophimus, and ſeveral other Perſons who had offered Incenſe to Idols, was a little ſtaggered at it, and writ to St. Cyprian, praying him to inform him what was Novatian's Hereſie, and why Cornelius had received Trophimus, and the other Apoſtates. St. Cyprian perceiving him to waver, endeavoured to confirm him by a long Letter; wherein, after he has juſtified the Conduct that was obſerved at Rome and in Africk, concerning thoſe that were fallen, he defends Cornelius, and demonſtrates the Validity of his Ordination. He begins it with making a ſort of a Reproach to this Biſhop for his Inconſtancy, telling him, it by no means became diſcreet Perſons, who had built their Judgments upon ſolid Grounds, to ſuffer themſelves to be carried away with every Wind, and to be always changing their Opinions. After this he proceeds to juſtifie the Meaſures that were taken with thoſe that had fallen into Idolatry, whether by taking Certificates, or Sacrificing to Idols. He tells him, as long as the Perſecution laſted, he had been of Opinion, that it was their Duty to deny them Reconciliation, to encourage them the better to ſuffer Martyrdom; but that after Peace was once reſtored to the Church, and after a mature Deliberation upon this Affair, in a numerous Aſſembly of Biſhops, it was thought convenient to keep a Temper, not by taking away all Hopes of Pardon from thoſe that had fallen, for fear they ſhould live as Pagans, when they ſaw themſelves intirely ſhut out of the Church, but by obliging them to undergo a long Penance before they could be reconciled; that this had been regulated in Councils of ſeveral Biſhops, held in Africa and at Rome. He afterwards comes to the Perſon and Ordination of Cornelius, and tells him, that he had not all on the ſudden arrived to the Epiſcopacy, but that he had formerly paſſed through all the Eccleſiaſtical Dignities; that he had neither deſired it, nor ſtickled for it, but that he had received it with all Humility; that, in a word, he had uſed no manner of Violence, as ſome have done, to get himſelf made a Biſhop, but that he had ſuffered it rather in receiving the Epiſcopacy againſt his Will, Non, ut quidam, vim fecit, ut Epiſcopus fieret, ſed vim paſſus eſt ut Epiſcopatum coactus acciperet; that he had been elected Biſhop by ſeveral Biſhops, who happened to be then at Rome, in expectation of the Choice of the Clergy, and the Suffrages of the People, and with the general Approbation of all Churches, the See being at that time vacant by the Death of Fabian; that after this Ordination, which was approved by all the Biſhops in the World, whoever would get himſelf ordained in the See of Rome, muſt neceſſarily be out of the Church; that no Credit was to be given to the ſecret Calumnies that were publiſhed againſt him; that his Colleagues, after they had diligently examined the Accuſations of his Enemies, found him to be Innocent; that he had never received any Certificates from the Magiſtrates, nor communicated with thoſe Biſhops that had Offered Incenſe to Idols, but that he had followed the Regulations which the whole Church had made concerning Apoſtates; that as for Trophimus, he had only received him for the Good of the Church, and to procure the Return of ſeveral Chriſtians, whom he had brought along with him back again to the Church; that for this Reaſon he had been received, but on this Condition, to be in the Number of the Laity, and not as the Novatians had reported, in Quality of a Biſhop; that ſince the Benefit of Reconciliation was allowed to Adulterers and Robbers, he ſaw no reaſon why Idolaters ſhould be totally excluded; that amongſt theſe, ſome were more to be blamed than others, that the Libellatici, [Thoſe who had Certificates of their having Sacrificed, though they had never done it,] were more excuſable than thoſe that had ſacrificed to Idols; that the firſt of theſe had been reconciled immediately, and that it had been determined, that Abſolution ſhould not be refuſed the latter upon the Point of Death, becauſe there was no Repentance in Hell, with Exception always to thoſe who deferred to do Penance till they were in Danger. After this he largely proves and demonſtrates the reaſonableneſs of this Conduct. S.Cyprian.

He obſerves that ſome of his Predeceſſors formerly had abſolutely refuſed Abſolution to Adulterers, but that they had not therefore condemned their Brethren, who acted indifferently, nor torn the Church, by making a Separation; that no body ought to be alarmed at what Novatian taught, ſince he was out of the Boſom of the Church; that he could not be Biſhop of Rome, ſince the Roman See was filled by Cornelius, who had been legally Ordained, and whoſe Ordination had been approved by all the Biſhops in the World; that the Church being a Body whoſe Members were ſpread over all the Earth after the ſame manner, there was only one Epiſcopacy diffuſed in the Perſon of ſeveral Biſhops united together; and that though Novatian had been rightly Ordained, yet he forfeited that Dignity by ſeparating himſelf from his Colleagues, and diſturbing the Repoſe of the Church, and that there were no hopes of Salvation for him, being out of the Church. In ſhort, St. Cyprian ſhews that it is cruel and unreaſonable to oblige Sinners, as Novatian had done, to undergo Penance, and yet refuſe them the Favour of Reconciliation, to exhort them to make ſatisfaction for their Sins, and yet deny them that Cure which their Satisfaction deſerves, to ſay to them, Weep and Sigh Night and Day, Waſh your Sins in your Tears, endeavour to efface them by your good Works, and yet at the ſame time add, you muſt die out of the Church; do all you can to procure your Peace, though you ſhall never be able to obtain the Peace you ſo earneſtly deſire.

But Cornelius did not defend St. Cyprian at Rome with the ſame Reſolution and Conſtancy as this Saint defended his Party in Africk; for Feliciſſimus arriving there with a Company of factious Perſons to get the Ordination of Fortunatus approved, whom he had cauſed to be Ordained in oppoſition to St. Cyprian, Cornelius at firſt rejected him, and turned him out of the Church, without vouchſafing ſo much as to hearken to him, and writ to St. Cyprian about it. But ſeeing no body came from St. Cyprian, and that he had ſent him no Directions about it, whereas on the other hand it was openly diſcourſed, That Fortunatus had been ordained by Twenty five Biſhops; that St. Cyprian favoured the Party of the Novatians, and that if the Church of Rome refuſed to receive the Letters which they brought againſt him, they would read them in Publick. The Pope was not a little affrighted at the Menaces, and wrote a ſecond Letter to St. Cyprian, wherein he acquaints him that he was ſenſibly concerned at theſe Accuſations, and wondred why he would omit to give him Satisfaction in this Affair. St. Cyprian ſurprized at the Boldneſs of Feliciſſimus, and the Weakneſs of Cornelius, returns him a generous Anſwer, in which he tacitly reprehends him for this Procedure. He tells him, that if the Inſolence of Wicked Men renders them terrible to Biſhops, and that if they can obtain by Menaces and Violence what they could never pretend to get by

S. Cyprian. by Reason and the regular Course of Justice, then there is an end of Episcopacy. As for himself, he declares, that he feared not the Obloquies of his Enemies; that Discipline must not therefore be laid aside, because we are reviled with Calumnies, and ill-affected Persons endeavour to affright us by their threatning Speeches; that the Original of Heresies and Schisms is solely owing to the Disobedience shewn to the Bishop, whom God has established; and because People don't consider that there is only one Bishop and Judge in a Church, who for that time supplies the Place of Jesus Christ; that a Bishop being once Canonically Elected, and acquitting himself worthily in the Functions of his Ministry, whoever separates from him does actually withdraw himself from the Church; that we ought not to impute this Loss to the Bishop, but to themselves, who voluntarily chose it; that the Reason why Bishops are obliged to have so great a Care in the Discharge of their Consciences, is that no body might pretend to leave the Church for their ill Administration; that his own Election was without any Blemish, as having been substituted in the room of a deceased Bishop, Elected by the Suffrages of the People in the time of Peace, protected by God in his Persecution, united inviolably to his Colleagues, approved by the vigilant Administration of his Office for four years, demanded often in the Cirque and Amphitheatre to be exposed to Lions, and that very lately too upon the occasion of a publick Sacrifice. He informs him at last with all that had passed in Africk concerning the false Bishop Fortunatus, who was set up by the Faction of Felicissimus, and ordained by Privatus of Lambesa a Heretick, particularly marked out in the Letters of Fabian and Donatus, and condemned in a Council of Nine Bishops. He tells him, that he forbore to write to him concerning this Matter, because he supposed he knew him well enough, since he was one of the five Priests who had separated themselves from his Church a long while ago, and because he himself had ejected Felicissimus, the Chief of that Faction, out of the Church; that Novatus's Party had likewise chosen one Maximus an African Bishop, and that he had scarce troubled himself to write about these Matters now, but since Fortunatus boasted that he was Ordained by Twenty five Bishops, he assures Cornelius, that except the Heretick Privatus of Lambesa, there was only four Bishops, and those too all Apostates, that assisted at his Ordination. After this, he accuses Felicissimus, and those of his Faction, for reconciling those that had fallen in the time of Persecution, without staying till they had done Penance for their Crime, contrary to the Decree of the African Council. He likewise describes the furious Excesses of this Cabal, and adds; 'After all 'these Irregularities, after having Elected an Heretick 'to be a Bishop, they have still the Impudence to go to 'Rome, and carry Letters from Schismaticks to the 'Chair of St. Peter, to that Chief Church, which is the 'Spring of Sacerdotal Unity. But what can their Design 'be, since they are still resolved to persevere in their 'Crimes? Or what Benefit can they expect from going 'to Rome? If they repent of their Faults, they ought to 'understand that they must come back again hither to 'receive Absolution for them, since it is an Order esta- 'blished all the World over, and indeed but reasonable, that 'every ones Cause should be Examined where the Crime 'was committed. Every Pastor has received a part of 'Jesus Christ's Flock to govern, and shall render an Ac- 'count of his Actions to God alone. Upon this account 'it is not to be allowed, that those Persons who are 'under our Charge, should run to and fro, and sow Dis- 'sention amongst Bishops by their Temerity and Arti- 'fices; but on the other hand, it is necessary for them S. Cyprian. 'to defend themselves in that Place, where they may 'be confronted by their Accusers, and the Witnesses of 'their Crimes. Their Cause has been examined, Sen- 'tence has been pronounced against them, and it would 'be below the Gravity of Bishops to be justly reproach- 'ed with being Wavering and Inconstant. He concludes all with laying open the Method which he used with Schismaticks, that were desirous to come back again to the Church. He says that he is extremely indulgent to those who acknowledge their Fault, and are heartily concerned for it; that his People complain of his Clemency, and that he rather offends by being too mild than too severe, but that at the same time he continues inexorable to those that pretend to enter the Church by Menaces and Force. They ought to be persuaded, says he, that the Church shall be always shut against them. He adds, That he was not in the least apprehensive of their Threats, and that a Bishop who conforms himself to the Rules of the Gospel, and keeps the Precepts of Jesus Christ, may perhaps be murdered, but can never be overcome. At last, he warns and conjures Cornelius to order this Letter to be read to his flourishing Clergy that presided at Rome together with him, that so if these malicious Reports, that were industriously spread about him, had left any ill Impression, it might be entirely effaced by the Reading of this Letter. It was writ four years after his Election to the Bishoprick, that is to say, in the Year 252.

(r) About April, in the very same year, St. Cyprian, who had been consulted by Fidus an African Bishop, upon the occasion of a Priest, whose Name was Victor, to whom his own Bishop Therapius had granted Reconciliation, and upon the Baptism of Infants, proposed these Questions in a Council of Sixty six Bishops, who were come to Carthage at the Festival of Easter, according to the Custom. They were surprized to hear that Therapius had so strangely slighted the Authority of a Decree which they had Synodically passed the Year before; but nevertheless, after they had maturely weighed every thing, they were of Opinion that the Reconciliation he had received from his Bishop was not to be reversed, and so they permitted him to enjoy Lay-Communion, contenting themselves with Admonishing their Colleague, and advising him to do so no more for the time to come. As for what concerned the Baptism of Infants, they declared it was necessary to Baptize them immediately after their Birth, and that there lay no Obligation upon Christians to tarry till the 8th day. St. Cyprian returns this Answer to Finus in his Fifty Eighth Letter.

Soon after, St. Cyprian being consulted by some of his Brethren, who were assembled at Thapsus to ordain a Bishop, about the Case of some Penitents in the City of Thapsus, who having generously confessed Jesus Christ, had at last yielded to the Violence of their Torments, but had done Penance for it three years afterwards; he answers them in the Two and fiftieth Letter, that in his Opinion, they ought by no means to refuse Pardon to such sort of Persons; that their generous Confession ought to attone for the Infirmity of the Flesh, and that, since it had been judged expedient to grant Reconciliation at the Hour of Death, to all those that had fallen, we ought to shew greater Indulgence to those who had maintained the Combat a long time, than to those who had yielded merely through Cowardise: Nevertheless, since this was a Question of great importance, he promises to propose it to the Synod that was to meet about Easter.

(r) About April in the same Year.] The Author of the Annals of St. Cyprian, in the English Edition, believes that this Synod was not held till the end of the Year 253, after the Persecution of Gallus and Volusian was ended: but if it was assembled at that time, the Bishops ought not to have blamed Therapius, for giving the Peace to Victor, since they themselves had freely granted it to all People before the Persecution of Gallus; and indeed so far was he from doing any thing against the last Decree, that he rather seems to have put it into Execution; for it is not true that St. Cyprian makes any mention in this Letter of the two Decrees of the preceding Synods; he only speaks of the first, whereby it was ordained that the Peace should not be given to those that had fallen, unless they fell into any dangerous Disease, or in case of Extremity. St. Cyprian's Words are these, Qua res satis non movit recessum esse à Decreti nostri auctoritate, ut ante legitimum & plenum tempus satisfactionis, & sine petitu & conscientiâ plebis nullâ infirmitate urgente, ac necessitate cogente pax ei concederetur. He speaks only of one Decree, Decreti nostri, and not Decretorum, and he does not distinguish between two, for infirmitate urgente and necessitate cogente signifie the same thing. And though Therapius the Bishop had reconciled Victor before the Persecution, and his Conduct ought for that reason to be blamed, yet it could never be doubted after the Persecution was over, whether this Reconciliation were valid; besides there is no great probability that Fidus should ever be so ill advised as to accuse Therapius for giving Absolution to Victor long after, and at a Juncture too, when all Bishops gave it to those that were fallen. 'Tis infinitely more probable that this Council was held after the first Council of Carthage, which prohibited the giving Absolution to those that had fallen, unless in case of extream Sickness, and the second which granted the Peace to all that had fallen. 'Twas likewise in this Interval, that the 52 Letter was written, but after this Council, which in all probability was held about Easter, in the Year 252. For if Absolution had been granted to all the lapsed, the Question of the Bishops concerning those Persons who yielded only through the Violence of their Torments, and St. Cyprian's Answer had been impertinent; and what is more, it was written three years after the Persecution of Decius. Therefore this could not happen but at the beginning of the year 253, and consequently the Synod of Carthage which granted the Peace, was held in the same year, and not in 252, as Bishop Pearson says. Thus if we would be exact in our Chronology, we ought to place the first Synod of Carthage about Easter, in the year 251, the second at Easter 252, which is that of the Sixty six Bishops, and the third at Easter in the year 253.

S. Cyprian.

About this time alſo he writ againſt Fortunatianus, who had been Biſhop of Aſſuri, his Sixty third Letter, directed to Epictetus, who was Elected in his Place, and to the People of that City. This Fortunatianus had the unhappineſs to fall into Idolatry, and was upon that account diveſted of his Biſhoprick: After his Deprivation he laboured earneſtly to re-poſſeſs himſelf of it, and to perform his reſpective Functions as formerly. St. Cyprian condemns theſe Proceedings in this Letter, wherein he demonſtrates how neceſſary a thing Sanctity is to make our Sacrifices acceptable, and adviſes the People not to ſuffer him to exerciſe his Office, but to ſeparate from him, in caſe he continued in his Deſign. Towards the end of this Letter, he exhorts the Penitents that were amongſt them, not to be impatient at the length of their Penance, but to endeavour to ſatisfie God, and to continue knocking at the Gate of the Church: Which Paſſage evidently diſcovers, that it was writ before the Decree of the Council of Carthage, which granted Abſolution to all Penitents.

This Council was held in the Year 253, about the time that the Emperors Gallus and Voluſian diſpatched Letters to all Parts, to oblige the People to Sacrifice to Idols: ſo that the Chriſtians had reaſon enough to apprehend a general Perſecution. Now to encourage them the more to fight againſt the Enemies of their Faith, the African Biſhops thought it convenient to grant Reconciliation to thoſe who were in a State of Penance ſince their Fall, and having accordingly determined it in this Aſſembly, they writ a Letter to Cornelius, which is the 53d amongſt thoſe of St. Cyprian, to acquaint him with their Decree, and to adviſe him to do the like: They repreſented to him, that though they had reſolved to prolong the Penance of Apoſtates, and not to reconcile them till the Hour of Death, yet ſince they were informed that the Church was going to be perſecuted, they judged it expedient to ſtrengthen the Chriſtians, that ſo they might the better bear the Attacks of their Enemies, and to animate them to the Combat, by giving them the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt, which would inſpire them with Vigor to ſuffer Martyrdom couragiouſly. That if there were any Biſhops who thought themſelves obliged to do otherwiſe, it would certainly lye at their Doors, to render an Account to God of ſo ill-tim'd a Severity; that as for themſelves, they had only done what they they owed to Charity, as well as to their own Conſciences, by declaring, that the time of Perſecution drew near, and not hiding that which God had revealed to his Servants. A little after this Decree, St. Cyprian writ an excellent Letter to the Thibaritans, which is the 55th in Pamelius's Order, wherein he exhorts them in a very vigorous and moving manner, to ſuffer undauntedly for Jeſus Chriſt.

Some time after St. Cyprian being informed that Cornelius was ſent into Baniſhment with many of the Faithful of Rome, he writ immediately to him to congratulate him upon the account of his Conſtancy, which he had ſo viſibly ſhewn by being the firſt of his Church, that confeſſed the Name of Jeſus Chriſt: He extols his Action, and from thence takes occaſion to triumph over Novatian, ſaying, that the Confeſſion of Cornelius had evidently diſcovered which of thoſe two was the true Biſhop; and that the Conſtancy of thoſe who had fallen away in Decius's Perſecution, ſufficiently proved, that there was good reaſon to reconcile them to the Church. At laſt he exhorts Cornelius to paſs Night and Day with all his People in Faſting, Watching, and continual Praying, becauſe the Day of Combat and Triumph was at hand.

It was perhaps at this time, that is to ſay, towards the end of the Reign of Gallus and Voluſian, that the Empire being invaded on all ſides by the Barbarians; and ſeveral Chriſtians happening to be taken Captives by them in Numidia, the Biſhops of that Country contributed to redeem them, and wrote to St. Cyprian, deſiring him to aſſiſt them in that Conjuncture.

St. Cyprian intimates to them in the 59th Letter, that he was extremely afflicted at the Misfortune that had befall'n his Brethren, that Chriſtians, being all Brothers one to another, ought to be concerned at the Captivity of the Faithful, who were carried away Priſoners, as much as if it were their own caſe: That their Suffering ought to repreſent to them the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt, who made himſelf a Captive to deliver us from the Captivity, wherein we were enthralled: That the extreme Peril of the Virgins who were conſecrated to God, and had reaſon to apprehend the loſs of their Virginity, was a convincing Motive to haſten their Delivery. He tells them therefore, that he returns them his Thanks, becauſe they were willing to let him have a Share in their Works of Charity, and for giving him a fertile Field to caſt his Seed in, that ſo he might one day reap a plentiful Harveſt out of it: That all the Chriſtians of his Church had readily and liberally contributed to raiſe a Sum of Money upon this Occaſion: That he had ſent them this Sum, which amounted to an Hundred Thouſand Seſterces, that is to ſay, 7500 Livres, to diſtribute it as they ſhould think fit, and together with it, the Names of thoſe who had contributed towards it, that ſo they might remember them in their Prayers and Sacrifices.

S. Cyprian.

Lucius who was Elected Biſhop of Rome, after the Death of Cornelius, being now returned from his Exile, where he had been ſent immediately after his Election; St. Cyprian writ the 57th Letter, wherein he congratulates him at the ſame time, both upon the Score of his Baniſhment and his Return; as he had before writ a Letter to him, to compliment him for his Election and glorious Confeſſion (s).

About the ſame time Pupienus, an African Biſhop, giving credit to the Calumnies which Feliciſſimus, and the Enemies of St. Cyprian had publiſhed againſt him, writ him a very diſobliging Letter, wherein he aſſured him, that he could not with a ſafe Conſcience communicate with him, becauſe he did not look upon his Ordination to be lawful; and upon that he accuſes him of Pride, and of being the Occaſion of the Diviſions that were in his Church. St. Cyprian anſwered him in the Sixty eighth Letter, That he wondred extremely how he came to call his Ordination in Queſtion, after he had been Elected Biſhop of Carthage, by the conſent of the Clergy and People, that is to ſay, by the Judgment of God himſelf, and had exerciſed that Function for the ſpace of ſix years, which ſhews, that this Letter was writ in the year 254. That it had been approved by all the World, and acknowledged even by the Pagans themſelves; That an infinite Number of Prelates, Martyrs, Confeſſors, and holy Virgins had owned him for their lawful Biſhop; that after this, he deſired Pupienus to judge in his Favour, and to ratifie the Judgment of God, and of Jeſus Chriſt; that he had done him wrong in liſtning to ſcandalous Calumnies, and ſuch too as were juſtly puniſhable, againſt his Brother, and againſt a Biſhop: That even the Pagans were ſenſible of the Effects of his Humility, and that Pupienus had formerly known him when he communicated with him: That there were no Diviſions in his Church, becauſe all his People lived in a wonderful Union with him; and that thoſe only continued without the Church, who deſerved to be ejected out of it, if they had been within. After this, he exhorts Pupienus to repent of his Raſhneſs and Pride, and promiſes to communicate with him, provided he is ſorry for his crime, and endeavours truly to ſatisfie God. He tells him, that God had informed him in a Viſion, that whoſoever would not believe in Jeſus Chriſt, when he eſtabliſhed a Biſhop, ſhould believe him againſt his Will, when he came to take Vengeance upon him: That he very well knew, that the World made theſe Viſions and Dreams paſs for ridiculous, ill-grounded Imaginations, but that the ſame thing had been ſaid of Joſeph's Dreams. At laſt, he concludes with theſe Words: You have my Letter, and I have yours; they will both be read on the Day of Judgment, before the Tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt.

Towards the beginning of Pope Stephen's Pontificate, St. Cyprian was conſulted by the Biſhops of France and Spain, about two Affairs of great Conſequence. To give the Reader a ſhort Account of that which related to France, he is to know, That the Hereſie of Novatian having ſpread it ſelf in that Country, Marcianus, Biſhop of Arles, being infected with it, joyned himſelf to Novatian, and brought over ſeveral Perſons to his Party. And becauſe he was not excommunicated by Name, he arrogantly inſulted over his Brethren. Fauſtinus Biſhop of Lyons, and the other Biſhops of that Province, writ to Stephen and St. Cyprian about it, earneſtly deſiring that they would concur with them in excommunicating Marcianus. Stephen neglecting to ſend them any Anſwer, Fauſtinus writ the ſecond time to St. Cyprian about it, who adviſed Stephen in the 66th Letter (t), to ſatisfie the Deſires

(s) His Election and glorious Confeſſion.] The Engliſh Annaliſt ſays, that this Letter was written before the Death of Gallus and Voluſian in 252, becauſe St. Cyprian there ſpeaks of the Perſecution as not being quite over, or at leaſt as being ſtill to be feared; but this does not prove that Lucius returned before their Death, but only that though theſe Emperors were dead, there was reaſon ſtill to apprehend a Perſecution, and he actually ſuffered Martyrdom ſoon after, at the beginning of the Empire of Galienus, or under Emilian.

(t) Who adviſed Stephen in his 66th Letter.] Baronius and ſome others have made uſe of this Letter to advance the Authority of Rome, but with ſmall Succeſs; for firſt of all St. Cyprian only adviſes Stephen to do what he himſelf might do, and what he had really done. Secondly, the Galliſan Biſhops sires of the Gallican Bishops, and dispatch Letters into Provence, and principally to the Inhabitants of the City of Arles, wherein he should declare Marcian Excommunicated, and give them notice to elect another Bishop in his room. He remonstrates to him, that since this Bishop had joyned himself to Novatian, who was notoriously excommunicated, there was no necessity of having a new Judgment against him; that all Bishops were obliged to take care that Admission into the Church should not be denied to Penitents; that the numerous Body of Bishops being united to one another, by a Bond of mutual Charity, they were all bound, in case any one should make himself Chief of an Heresie, or the Flock of Jesus Christ, which they feed in common, should be attacked or carried away, to come to their Relief, and to re-unite the Sheep of Jesus Christ, like good Shepherds that truly love their Flock.

The Bishops of Spain likewise had recourse to St. Cyprian, about an Affair of the same Nature, Basilides and Martialis, one the Bishop of Leon, the other of Astorga, having been publickly proved to have taken Certificates of their having sacrificed, and convicted of several other Crimes, were deposed, and Felix and Sabinus elected in their Places. Basilides owning his Crime, had voluntarily quitted his Bishoprick, and was placed in the Rank of Penitents, where he thought himself over happy, if he could but communicate as a Laick: Nevertheless, these two Bishops being afterwards pushed on by their Ambition and Envy, used their utmost Endeavours to regain their Sees; and finding they could not compass their Designs there, they went to Rome, not to demand their Re-establishment from Stephen, but only that he would be pleased to admit them to his Communion, which they said would be very serviceable to them to procure their Re-establishment. They acted their Parts so dextrously, that Stephen granted them what they requested; so upon this they went back to Spain, where they became more insolent than ever, and would by all means re-possess themselves of their Sees by Force. The Clergy and People of Spain writ to St. Cyprian about it, and deputed Felix and Sabinus, who were ordained Bishops in the room of these two Apostates, to go to him, to know what they were to do in this Exigence. But Felix, Bishop of Saragossa, whom St. Cyprian calls a great Defender of the Faith, writ to him likewise in particular. The Saint judging this to be an Action of no small Importance, read the Letters sent him from Spain, in a Synod of the African Bishops, who after they had diligently examined the Matter, came to this Resolution, that the Deposition of Basilides and Martialis ought to stand good, as well as the Ordination of Felix and Sabinus in their place. They writ a Synodical Letter concerning it to the Clergy and People of Leon and Astorga, which is placed the 67 amongst those of St. Cyprian, and sent them word, that they had no reason to suffer Basilides and Martialis to re-enter upon their Episcopal Functions, after they had been found guilty of such enormous Crimes, and Basilides himself had acknowledged so much; that since the People had Power to elect good Bishops, and to reject the bad, they would appear culpable before God, if they communicated any longer with them; that the Ordination of Felix and Sabinus was lawful, since it was made with the Consent of the People by the neighbouring Bishops; that it ought not to be reversed, though Basilides had surprized Stephen, who, by reason of his great Distance from the place, could not exactly inform himself of the truth of Affairs; that this Conduct was so far from effacing their Crimes, that on the other hand it augmented their Guilt, because, tho' Stephen was in some sort excusable for suffering himself to be deceived merely out of Negligence; yet we ought to have a Detestation for those Persons, who had so maliciously imposed upon his Easiness; that they extremely commended their Faith and Zeal, and desired them to maintain a Correspondence no more with Bishops of such a profligate Character, who were notorious for so many Crimes.

S. Cyprian.

In the same Year another Synod of Bishops was held (u) in Carthage, who being consulted by Januarius, and the rest of the Numidian Bishops about the Baptism of Hereticks, returned them this Answer, that it was necessary to re-baptize all those who had been Baptized by Hereticks, according to the ancient Regulation made by Agrippinus in Africk.

St. Cyprian writ the same Year to one Quintus, a Bishop, who had ordered the same Question to be put to him by Lucian the Priest. This Letter is the 71st, as Pamelius has ranged them. He assures him, that some of his Brethren were of a different Opinion from him in this Affair, who pretended that it was the ancient Custom before Agrippinus, not to re-baptise Hereticks after they had been once admitted into the Church. To weaken the Authority of this pretended Custom, he lays it down for an undoubted Truth, that we are not to be determined by any Customs of that Nature, but to examine whether they will bear the Test of Reason; That St. Peter, in his Dispute with St. Paul upon the Business of Circumcision, did not treat that Apostle with Arrogance and Pride; That he never alledged his Primacy, or told him, that the new Disciples of Jesus Christ, as St. Paul was, who had likewise been a Persecutor of the Church, ought blindly to obey him, and not to question his Decisions, but gave him the Hearing, and humbly received the Counsel of Truth which St. Paul gave him, and readily submitted to the Powerful Reasons of that Apostle, teaching us by that Behaviour to be peaceable and Patient, and not to espouse our own Opinions with Heat and Obstinacy, but to embrace the Advices of our Brethren, whenever they are useful and agreeable to Truth.

Some time after this, St. Cyprian assembled at Carthage a Council of Seventy one Bishops, as well of the Province of Africk as Numidia, who confirmed all that had been determined by the preceding Synod, concerning the Baptism of Hereticks, and decreed, that all Priests and Deacons who were ordained amongst them, or who, after having been sometime of their Party, returned to the Church, should be received only in the Quality of writ to St. Cyprian as well as to Stephen. Thirdly, they addressed themselves to them, because Marcianus had alledged in his own defence, that these Bishops had not excommunicated him. Fourthly, St. Cyprian does not write to him to cite or depose Marcianus, but only to declare him separated from the Communion, and to advise the People of Arles to elect another Bishop, because he was notoriously excommunicated and deposed, for joyning himself to Novatian, who was then out of the Church. Fifthly, he does by no means ground the Necessity of Stephen's writing into France upon his Authority, but only upon a Motive of Charity, whereby Bishops were obliged to assist one another, and upon the Unity of the Episcopacy. Monsieur Launoy has endeavoured to bring the Truth of this Letter into question, and has proposed some Conjectures to shew that it is spurious, but they are weak and ill-grounded, and scarce any body has been induced to embrace his Opinion, because this Letter is really St. Cyprian's Stile, which has a peculiar Character, as St. Austin well observes, by which it may be easily known. The first difficulty relates to the Time of this Letter, but this is easily answered, by saying that it was written at the end of the year 255, and that the Quarrel between Stephen and St. Cyprian began not till the year 256. The second is taken from the Silence of the Ancients, but we ought not to be surprized that this particular Fact was not taken notice of, since that of Basilides and Martialis, which are not questioned by Monsieur Launoy, were also as much forgotten. Add to this, that St. Austin, Lib. 6. de Bapt. contra Donatist. Ch. 15. makes mention of a Letter of St. Cyprian to Pope Stephen, which takes no notice of the Question about Baptism, and cannot be any other than this. The third Objection of Monsieur Launoy is, that it is not to be found in several Manuscripts, as in that of the Vatican, and above twenty more, according to the English Edition; but then it is to be found in three ancient ones, as Rigaltius has observed, and there are three several Letters of St. Cyprian that are wanting in some Manuscripts. The principal and last is taken from the History of Trophimus, who came not to Arles, of which Place he was Bishop (if we may believe the ancient Author of the Life of St. Saturninus, quoted by Gregory of Tours) till the time of Decius, which is four or five years before this Letter of St. Cyprian was written, though it appears by this Letter that Marcianus was Bishop of Arles, and not Trophimus, and the Christian Religion had been a long time established in that City. This we must confess to be the greatest Difficulty, but we may answer it by admitting the Epocha of Sulpitius Severus, who tells us, that Trophimus came some years before Decius, and that it is not the Author of the Life of Saturninus, but Gregory of Tours, who upon occasion of what this Author says, that Saturninus was Bishop of Tholouse in the time of Decius, adds seven other Bishops of France, amongst whom is Trophimus, and it is possible that he might reckon some who came some time before. The fifth Epistle of Zosimus, which Quesnellus has defended against the Conjectures of Monsieur Launoy, confirms our Opinion, for there it is said, Trophimus being sent to Arles by the holy See, was as it were the Spring of all those Rivers that run through the whole Body of France. Which Passage shews, that it is probable that he came some years before the Empire of Decius, though it were a long time after the times of the Apostles, and several years after the Martyrdom of St. Irenaus.

(u) In the same Year another Synod of Bishops was held.] This Synod must of necessity have been assembled in the Year 255, as what follows sufficiently shews. It is different from that which was held upon the account of Basilides and Martialis, at least the Names that are to be seen at the Head of two Synodical Letters, are different. Hence it follows, that there must have been more than one held that very Year, and we are not to wonder at it, because it was the Custom of the Africans to hold two every Year, one in the Spring, and the other in Autumn. This might be assembled in the Month of September, in the Year 255, the next in the Spring 256, and the last in the Month of September in the same Year.

Laicks: and after this, to maintain that Honour and Friendſhip which Biſhops owed to one another, they acquainted Pope Stephen with theſe Conſtitutions, by a Synodical Letter, which is the Seventy ſecond amongſt thoſe of St. Cyprian in Pamelius's Order, and towards the end of it repreſented to him, that ſince the things they had ordained were conformable to the Chriſtian Religion, and to Truth, they hoped he would make no difficulty to approve them; That nevertheleſs they knew there were Some Biſhops in the world, who could be hardly perſuaded to change their Opinions, and yet though they kept up their own particular cuſtoms, would never break the Laws of Peace and Charity; That after the ſame manner they would not pretend to preſcribe Laws, or conſtrain any Perſons, ſince they were ſatisfied that every Biſhop was free to behave himſelf, as he ſaw expedient in the Adminiſtration of his own Church, for which he was accountable to God alone. S. Cyprian.

About the ſame time likewiſe, St. Cyprian immediately after this Council, writ a long Letter to Jubaianus a Biſhop, who had alſo conſulted him about this Queſtion, wherein he urges abundance of Reaſons, and Texts of Scripture to ſupport his own Opinion; and after he has anſwered the Objections that were brought againſt it, concludes with this new Proteſtation, that he had not the leaſt Deſign to impoſe Laws upon any of his Colleagues, or to fall out with them upon this occaſion, but inviolably to preſerve Faith and Charity, the Dignity of the Prieſthood, and concord with his Brethren. Stephen having anſwered St. Cyprian very roughly, Pompey Biſhop of Sabra, a Maritime City of Africk, deſired him to let him know what Stephen had writ to him. So he ſent him a Copy of the Letter, with another of his own, wherein he beſtows a particular Anſwer upon the Pope's Letter, which is the Seventy third, as Pamelius has placed them. In it he principally oppoſes the Truth of the Goſpel, and the firſt Traditions of the Apoſtles, both to the Cuſtom and Tradition which Pope Stephen had alledged for himſelf. He ſent likewiſe by Rogatianus the Deacon, another Copy of Stephen's Letter to Firmilian Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, and to the other Biſhops, giving them an Account of what had been determined in Africk upon this Queſtion, and deſiring them to acquaint him with the Opinion of their reſpective Churches. He could not have expected a more favourable Anſwer than what he received from Firmilian, for that Biſhop openly condemns, and that in Terms ſevere enough, the Procedure of Stephen; extols St. Cyprian's Conduct, declares himſelf entirely in favour of the laſt, proves it by ſeveral Reaſons, and aſſures him it was the Ancient Cuſtom of the Aſiatick Churches; and that it had been regulated many years before in two numerous Synods held at Synnada and Iconium. This Letter of Firmilian, which is the Seventy fourth amongſt thoſe of St. Cyprian, was written in Autumn in the Year 256 (x).

Before this Letter came to St. Cyprian's Hands, he writ to Magnus, who had asked his Opinion about the Baptiſm of the Novatians, whether theſe Hereticks were to be excepted out of the Number of thoſe who were to be re-baptized, ſince they owned the ſame Faith as the Catholicks did in relation to the Trinity, and Baptized after the ſame manner. He anſwers him, I ſay, in the Seventy fifth Letter (y), that they ought to be re-baptized as well as the reſt, foraſmuch as there was no true Baptiſm out of the Church. In this Letter he anſwers another Queſtion, propoſed to him by Magnus, concerning the Baptiſm of Clinicks, that is to ſay, of thoſe that were Baptized in their Sickneſs, that there was no reaſon to doubt of the Validity of this Baptiſm; That the Sacrament was equally efficacious, whether the Perſon was plunged into the Water, or had it ſprinkled upon him. He concludes with repeating his uſual Proteſtation, that he would give Laws to none, but leave them an entire liberty of doing what they thought convenient, and that every one muſt give an account of his Conduct to GOD alone.

Thus we have given an exact Acount of all the Letters extant in St. Cyprian's Works, that treat of the Baptiſm of Hereticks. To theſe we ought to add the Acts of the laſt Council of Carthage, conſiſting of Eighty ſeven Biſhops, who aſſembled there the ſame Year in the Month of September. In the firſt place, the Letters of Jubaianus to St. Cyprian, and thoſe of St. Cyprian to that Biſhop, were read in the Council. After that St. Cyprian propoſed to all the Biſhops that were preſent, to deliver their Opinions freely, but yet ſo as not to condemn or excommunicate thoſe that were of a different Judgment. 'For none of us, ſays he, ought to make himſelf a Bi-'ſhop of Biſhops, or pretend to awe his Brethren by a Ty-'rannical fear, becauſe every Biſhop is at liberty to do as 'he pleaſes, and can no more be judged by another, than 'he can judge others himſelf. But all of us ought to 'wait and tarry for the Judgment of Jeſus Chriſt, who a-'lone has Authority to ſet us over the Church, and to judge 'our actions. After this Propoſition the Biſhops gave their Opinions, and concluded all in Favour of St. Cyprian. S. Cyprian.

The Perſecution of Valerian, that was raiſed againſt the Church in the Year 257, put an end to the Controverſie about the Baptiſm of Hereticks. This Emperor, who was puſhed on by Marcianus, a profeſſed Enemy to the Chriſtians, and a great Protector of the Ægyptian Superſtitions, declared himſelf againſt the Chriſtians, and publiſhed an edict againſt them in July that very Year, whereby he prohibited them to meet in the Cœmeteries, or any where elſe upon Pain of Death. Pope Stephen having been found in a Cœmetery, contrary to the Emperor's Prohibition, ſuffered Martyrdom for it on the Twentieth of Auguſt, the ſame Year, and Xyſtus was elected in his Place (z).

On the 30th day of the ſame Month, St. Cyprian generouſly confeſſed the Chriſtian Faith before Paternus, the Proconſul, and was baniſhed to Curubis. At the ſame time the Præfect of Numidia condemned ſeveral Chriſtians to the Mines, and amongſt the reſt many Biſhops and Prieſts of his Province, after he had put ſome of them to Death, and ordered others to be ſcourged. St. Cyprian, from the place of Exile, ſent them a Letter, which, according as Pamelius has diſtributed them, is the 76th, and is the firſt of the 4th Part of St. Cyprian's Letters. In it, with wonderful Eloquence he heightens the Glory of their Confeſſion, and encourages them to ſuffer with Conſtancy. He comforts them in their difficulties, and principally the Prieſts that were not able to offer Sacrifice in thoſe Places, by repreſenting to them that they themſelves continually offer'd up their own Bodies as living Sacrifices to the Lord. He excites them at laſt to uſe more fervency in their Prayers, that ſo God may give Grace to all the Confeſſors, to finiſh their Courſe couragiouſly, in order to be crown'd with everlaſting Glory. He ſent this Letter to three different Places, where theſe Holy Confeſſors were diſperſed, and remitted ſome Money to them to ſupply their preſent Extremities. It appears by the anſwers they made him, what Conſolation and Joy this Letter gave them in the midſt of their Sufferings. Theſe anſwers are the 77th, 78th, and 79th Letters, written from three ſeveral places, in which they return him their Thanks for his great Charity and Kindneſs in a ſimple unaffected Style, and aſſure him, that this Letter had raiſed their declining Spirits, healed their Wounds, and rendred their preſſures more light, and ſupportable to them.

The 80th Letter, which is directed to the Confeſſors in Priſon, was rather writ in his firſt Exile than in this, as we have obſerved after the Author of the Engliſh Edition. The 81ſt was writ at the beginning of the year 258, after the Death of Pope Xyſtus, and the return of St. Cyprian. It is addreſſed to one Succeſſus, a Biſhop, and in it he ſends him word, That he was informed by ſome Letters he had received from Rome, that Valerian had directed a Reſcript to the Senate, by which he ordered all Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons to be put to Death without delay, and that the Senators, the Roman Knights, and all other Perſons of Quality, who were Chriſtians, ſhould be deprived of their Offices and Eſtates; and that if they continued, after this Edict, to make Profeſſion of the Chriſtian Religion, they ſhould be condemned to Die; That the Ladies ſhould not only forfeit all their Fortunes, but be Baniſhed, and that thoſe of Cæſar's Houſhold ſhould be ſent to Priſon. He adds, that this Emperor had diſ-

(x) Was written in the Autumn, in the Year 256.] We are told in this Letter, that it was written about Twenty two years after the Empire of Alexander, who died in the year 235, and that it was compoſed in haſte, becauſe Rogatianus was obliged to return by reaſon of the approaching Winter. It could not be written in 257, becauſe St. Cyprian was baniſhed at the end of that Year.

(y) In the 75th Letter.] The Engliſh Annaliſt thinks that this is the firſt Letter which was written concerning the Queſtion of Baptiſm, becauſe it does not plainly and openly make mention of the Synods that were held in Africk upon that Occaſion. It appears more probable to me, that it was written afterwards, becauſe it ſuppoſes the general Queſtion to be decided, and the Author clearly ſpeaks of ſome of his Colleagues that received the Baptiſm of Hereticks. He ſays he knew no reaſon why Chriſtians ſhould take the part, if he might ſo ſay, of Antichriſts, which induces me to believe, that it was written after his Quarrel with Stephen; beſides it is more natural to imagine, that this Queſtion which regards the exception of the general Rule, was made after the Deciſion. For Magnus propoſes it to him as a new difficulty. You demand of me, ſays he, whether thoſe that come from Novatian's Party, are to be baptized as well as other Hereticks.

(z) St. Xyſtus was elected in his Place.] This Perſecution laſted forty two Months, according to St. Denis of Alexandria, and Valerian was taken by the Perſians in 261, ſo it began about July 257.

patched

S. Cyprian. patched Letters to the Governors of Provinces, wherein he enjoyn'd them to Punish the Christians with all Rigour and Severity, who daily expected to see these Orders put in Execution against them; That Pope Xystus had suffered Martyrdom on the sixth day of August, and one Quartus along with him; That the Præfects of the City of Rome were very violent against the Christians, causing some of them to be executed every day, and that they confiscated the Goods of all those that were presented before them. In fine, he desires this Bishop to communicate the news to the rest of his Brethren, that all Christians might prepare themselves the better for the Combat.

The last Letter of St. Cyprian is that which he writ a little before his Martyrdom, when he withdrew from his Gardens where he was ordered to Reside, because he received information, that the Proconsul had sent some Soldiers to carry him away to the City of Utica, and he was not willing to suffer Martyrdom in a place distant from his own Church and People. But least this retirement should be interpreted to proceed from a fearful degenerous Spirit, he acquainted his Clergy and People with the reasons that moved him to preserve himself; and at the same time conjures them not to raise disturbances, but to preserve Peace and Unity, and that no body should be permitted to present himself of his own accord to the Gentiles, since it was sufficient to speak couragiously when they were apprehended by them.

Besides these Letters of St. Cyprian, the time of whose writing we know, there are five others that respect some points of Discipline, and have no certain Date. The Author of the English Edition has placed four of them at the head of all the Letters, and affirms that they were written by St. Cyprian, before his first Banishment in the Year 246. The first, which is the Sixty Sixth in Pamelius's Order, is directed to the Clergy and People of Furni, and is writ against one Geminius Victor, who by his Will, had nominated a Priest called Geminius Faustinus to be Guardian to one of his Relations. He sends them word, That both himself and his Colleagues were extremely surprized when they were informed of it, because it had been prohibited long before by a Council of Bishops to name any Clergyman in a Will to be a Guardian or Executor, since those that were honoured with the Priesthood, and undertaken the Office of Clerks, ought only to serve at the Altar, and the Holy Sacrifices, and should not take any other employment than that of Praying to the Lord. He shews them that for this very reason the Laity supplied them from time to time, with all things necessary for Life, as in the time of the Old Testament they paid Tithes to the Levites and Priests. He concludes, that since Victor had violated a Constitution made some time ago by a Council, they ought not to Pray for him after his Death, or suffer his Memory to be honoured in the Prayers of the Church.

The second, which is the Sixty first in Pamelius's Order, was writ upon the occasion of an Actor upon the Stage, who, after he had turned Christian, continued to follow his Profession. St. Cyprian tells Eucratius, who had consulted him to know whether he should let him stay in the Church, that is was below the Divine Majesty, the Evangelical Discipline, and the honour of the Church, to permit a Man that exercised so infamous a Profession to be in her Communion; That if the Law forbid Men to put on Female Habits, it certainly forbad them much more to Personate the Gestures and Postures of Women, and to represent unseemly and lascivious Actions; That though this Actor had forborn to appear on the Stage himself, yet he was no less Criminal in teaching his scandalous Art to others; That if he pretended in his own excuse that he was Indigent, and had no other way left him to maintain himself, he should be relieved as the other Poor belonging to the Church were, provided he would be content with that little Subsistence the Church allowed him, and did not believe, that this was given him by way of recompence for sinning no more, since he alone reaped the benefit of it.

The third, which is the Sixty fifth in Pamelius's Order, was writ to Rogatianus, against one of his Deacons, who forgetting the respect he owed to his own Bishop, had treated him after an undutiful manner. St. Cyprian and his Brethren, to whom this Bishop had writ about the Matter, answered him that he might have punished him immediately after his Boldness, if he had been so pleased, and that his writing to him about it was only an Effect of his Humility. They enlarge upon the Respect and Obedience that is due to Bishops, affirming, that the Original of all Schisms and Heresies proceeded from the Contempt that was shewn to them. At last they advised this Bishop, in case his Deacon still continued to provoke him with new Injuries, to make use of his Episcopal Authority, and to Excommunicate him, together with the other who had joyned himself with him; hoping nevertheless that he would give him full Satisfaction, Because, say they, we had rather overcome the Evils we receive by Patience, than revenge our selves by the Sacerdotal Power. S. Cyprian.

The Fourth Letter, which is the Sixty second in Pamelius's Edition, was writ in the Name of a Council to Pomponius a Bishop, who had consulted St. Cyprian's Advice about some Virgins, who having made a Resolution to keep their Virginity, had been too familiar with some Persons, and particularly with a Deacon. He commends this Bishop for depriving the Deacon, and the rest that had lived with them, of the Communion. As for what concerned the Case of the Virgins, it was ordained, that those who had lost their Virginity should do publick Penance for their Crimes a considerable time, as being Adultéresses in respect of Jesus Christ their Spouse, and that if they would not quit the Company of those Persons, with whom they had maintained this criminal Correspondence, they should be for ever turned out of the Church, without hopes of Pardon and Salvation, since it is impossible to be saved out of the bosom of the Church. And then as for those who had not lost their Virginity, he judged it expedient to admit them to the Communion of the Church, but with this warning, That if they still continued to live in the same House with those Persons, they should be punished after a more severe manner, and must no more expect to be pardoned so easily. Thus I have briefly run over these four Letters, which the Author of the Annals of St. Cyprian has placed at the head of his English Edition, and pretends to have been written before any of the rest; because St. Cyprian (yz) makes no mention of any Persecution either present or past in them, as he does in almost all the rest. [The Reader ought to consult Mr. Dodwell's Learned Dissertation upon this Letter to Pomponius, wherein he will see what gave occasion to those Virgins to live in so Scandalous a manner with the Deacons, fully explained.]

There remains nothing now but the 63 Letter, which the Author of the Annals in the English Edition, affirms to have been written in the year 253 (aa), in the time of the Persecution under Gallus and Volusian. It is addressed to Cæcilius and condemns the Error, or rather the Abuse of some Priests, who offered only Water in the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. He confronts this ill Custom, which was introduced in some places, with the example and precept of Jesus Christ, and shews that we ought to offer in the Chalice nothing but wine mingled with Water. He speaks of this after such a manner as may incline us to believe that it was absolutely necessary in his Opinion to mingle Water with the Wine, for he tells us, that as the Body of Jesus Christ could not be only of Meal unless it were tempered with Water, so likewise the Blood of Jesus Christ could not be of wine alone, if it is not mingled with Water. But besides that, in the Explication of these Words we may understand them of the Body of Jesus Christ taken in a Mystical sense, we ought not to wonder that the Fathers speak often thus of Customs established in their own time when they are Ancient; such as this is, which came from the example of Jesus Christ, and the Tradition of the Apostles; we are not at all to wonder, I say, if they speak of them as of necessary things, without scrupulously examining whether they are of absolute necessity, taking them in the rigorous sense. He observes in this Letter, that they used in his time to Celebrate the Sacrifice of the Mass in the Morning; and that Baptism was a necessary preparation for the Eucharist. He speaks of this Sacrament in such terms, as plainly shews, that he believed it really contained the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ; and yet he lays down several Mystical Reasons to explain why they made use of Bread, and Wine mingled with Water. He tells us, that Jesus Christ is figuratively represented by the Wine, and that the Water which is mingled with it signifies the Union of the People with Jesus Christ. Upon these grounds it is that he says, that if we offered pure Wine, the Body of Jesus Christ would be without us; and that if we offered only Water, we should be without Jesus Christ; And lastly, That as several grains of Corn ground and kneaded together make one Loaf, so after the same manner we are (yz) St. Cyprian.] The principal Reason is, because he does not speak of any Persecution in his Letters, though this reason is not absolutely convincing.

(aa) Pretends to have been written in the Year 253.] Because it appears that St. Cyprian was then a Bishop. Cum mediocritatem nostram semper humili & verecundâ moderatione teneamus: Besides that, there he speaks of the Persecution, and says, that this was the cause why some of the Faithful abstained from offering Wine. [This rather, as I intimated above, was the true Reason of this Innovation.]

one and the ſame Body in Jeſus Chriſt, who is that Celeſtial Bread. [See here the power of Prejudice! The extract which Mr. Du Pin has given of this Letter, demonſtrates that St. Cyprian underſtood the Inſtitution of the Euchariſt to be only Myſtical; Cæcilius deſired to know what St. Cyprian thought of a Cuſtom newly taken up of uſing Water alone in the Morning when they adminiſtred the Lord's Supper; It was in dangerous times, when by their Breaths the Chriſtians might have been diſcovered, if they ſhould have drank Wine ſo Early: This Innovation of theirs does not ſeem to have proceeded from a wilful Contempt of the command of Chriſt, but from the Notions they had always been inſtructed in, concerning the Euchariſt. They believed that the Lord's Supper was only a commemorative Sacrifice; and ſo they thought the Death of Jeſus Chriſt could equally be remembred by Water in a Morning, as by Water and Wine together in an Afternoon. The Queſtion then is, whether if St. Cyprian had believed that Jeſus Chriſt was Corporeally preſent in the Sacrament, he would have uſed ſuch Myſtical Arguments to perſuade them to break off ſo unwarrantable a practice. He ought according to Roman Catholick Principles to have confuted their Error by a right Explication of the Nature of the Euchariſt: He ought to have ſhewed them that it was not a Myſtical but a Real Sacrifice, and that Jeſus Chriſt is as literally offered up in that Sacrament as he was upon the Croſs; and eſpecially he ought to have told them, that Water could not have ſerved inſtead of Wine, becauſe upon Conſecration it could not have been Tranſubſtantiated into the Blood of Chriſt, and ſo by conſequence it had been no true Sacrament for want of that real Preſence, ſince Jeſus Chriſt had never given his Miniſters a Power to turn any thing beſides Wine into his Blood, upon Pronouncing the words of the Inſtitution. Whereas here St. Cyprian owns the Euchariſt to have been a Myſtical Sacrifice, and gives this as a principal Reaſon why Water alone without Wine is ineffectual, becauſe there was a poſitive Inſtitution from which the Church had no Warrant to recede.

S. Cyprian.

This is further confirmed by his ſecondary Arguments; In the firſt place, he ſays there muſt be Wine, Quia non poteſt videri Sanguis ejus, quo redemti & vivificati ſumus, eſſe in Calice; quando Vinum deſit Calici, quo Chriſti Sanguis oſtenditur: Becauſe, ſays he, his Blood by which we are redeemed and quickned cannot ſeem to be in the Cup, if the Wine that repreſents the Blood of Chriſt be not in the Cup. If St. Cyprian had believed Tranſubſtantiation he ought to have ſaid, That the Blood of Chriſt is not in the Cup, unleſs Wine had been put into it. But he ſays, It cannot ſeem to be there, i. e. cannot be typically repreſented by Water ſo well as by Wine. This is no force upon his Words; becauſe he afterwards brings ſeveral Texts out of the Old Teſtament to prove that the Blood of Chriſt was repreſented by Wine, and not by Water, and that Baptiſm only was typified by Water by the Prophets. This reaſoning does not agree with modern Gloſſes; no Man ever ſearches for a myſtical reaſon, when he can give a plain one. Wine after Conſecration is not a Figure of Chriſt's Blood, but the Blood it ſelf, according to the Church of Rome. And it is improper to ſay, that the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt could not ſeem to be in the Cup if the Wine did not repreſent it, if the Wine were believed to be the real Blood; To be, and to be repreſented are very different things. And tho' St. Cyprian calls the Euchariſt a Sacrifice, yet ſince he deſcribes it as a commemorative one, by which we are myſtically united to Jeſus Chriſt, by Faith in him, it is impoſſible to gather from thence, that he believed any other Preſence of the Body and Blood of Chriſt in the Sacrament, than that which is taught by the Church of England.]

S. Cyprian.

Hitherto we have not been willing to interrupt the order of the Letters, by mingling them with his other Books, according to the Series of the time they were written in, becauſe we could not poſſibly have made an Abridgment of them without breaking the Continuation of the Letters, but nothing hinders us now from doing it: We ſhall carefully ſet down the years wherein they were compoſed, and this will be full as well for the Chronology of them, as if we had introduced them among the Letters.

It is probable that St. Cyprian's firſt Book, I mean after his Addreſs to Donatus, is, that ſmall Treatiſe, Intituled, The Vanity of Idols (bb), wherein he refuted the Pagan Religion which he had lately quitted. This Treatiſe may be divided into three Parts. In the firſt, he proves that the Deities of the Heathens are not true Gods; In the ſecond, he ſhews that there is only one God; And laſtly, in the third, he ſhews that Jeſus Chriſt is the WORD of God, who was ſent to bring Salvation to Men. The two firſt parts are almoſt word for word taken out of Minutius Felix, and the laſt out of Tertullian.

The firſt Books of the Teſtimonies to Quirinus (cc) were alſo in all probability writ by St. Cyprian before he was Biſhop, when he wholly employed himſelf in reading and ſtudying the Holy Scriptures. Theſe Books are a Collection of ſeveral Texts out of the Bible, and principally the Old Teſtament upon different Matters. In the firſt Book he cites thoſe paſſages that prove, that the Jewiſh Law was to be only for a time; that it ought to be aboliſhed, and the Jews to be rejected; that Jeſus Chriſt was to come to eſtabliſh a New Temple, and New Sacrifices; a New Prieſthood, and a New Church; that the Gentiles ought to believe in him, and through his means to obtain Remiſſion of their Sins. In the ſecond he urges thoſe places that concern the Myſtery of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and particularly thoſe that ſhew that Jeſus Chriſt is the Wiſdom and WORD of God, who took our Nature upon him, to redeem Mankind, with the Prophecies wherein it is foretold that he was to be born of the Race of David in the City of Bethlehem; that his firſt Coming was to be without Glory; that the Jews were to Crucifie him; that he ſhould riſe the third Day, and come at laſt to judge the World. The third Book was compoſed after theſe (dd), upon a quite different Subject.

It is a Collection of ſeveral Teſtimonies, taken as well out of the Old as the New Teſtament, containing many Precepts of Morality, that either have a relation to Chriſtian Virtues, ſuch as are the Fear and Love of God, Patience under Sufferings, Martyrdom, and Virginity; or that diſſuade from Vices, ſuch as Anger, Evil Speaking, Pride, the ſuperfluous Ornaments of Women, and the inordinate Love of Riches: Or laſtly, thoſe that lay down the Manner how Chriſtians ought to behave themſelves towards their Superiors; ſo that we may juſtly ſay of this Treatiſe, that it is a very uſeful Collection of all the Morality in the Holy Scriptures.

The Book of the Diſcipline, or the Conduct and Apparel of Virgins, ſeems to be the firſt Work that St. Cyprian compoſed, after he was ordained Biſhop (ee). The Deſign of it is to inſtruct the Virgins, with the care of whom he was entruſted, to preſerve in their Habits, and the whole Tenour of their Life a truly Chriſtian Modeſty. He begins with recommending Diſcipline, that is to ſay, a good (bb) That ſmall Treatiſe, intituled, the Vanity of Idols.] This Book is cited by St. Jerome, Epiſt. 84. ad Magnum. Cyprianus, quod Idola Dii non ſunt, quâ brevitate, quâ hiſtoriarum omnium ſcientiâ, quo verborum & ſenſuum ſplendore perſtrinxit. It is probable that it was written in the year 247.

(cc) The firſt Books of the Teſtimonies to Quirinus.] Theſe Books are not only cited by Bede, and by Gennadius, but alſo by St. Jerome, adverſ. Pelag. and by St. Auſtin, lib. contra duas Epiſt. Pelag. c. 8. & 10. who teſtifies that Pelagius the Heretick had made a Collection of ſeveral Teſtimonies out of the Scripture, to imitate, or rather to compleat the Work of St. Cyprian. St. Jerome cites the third Book. He and St. Auſtin have drawn ſome paſſages out of it, ſo that though they are not to be found in ſeveral Manuſcripts, yet we are not in the leaſt to doubt of them. Quirinus, to whom this Work is addreſſed, was in all probability a Neophyte, when it was written to him; for St. Cyprian calls him his Son, and tells him in his Preface, that he ſent him theſe Teſtimonies to give him the firſt tinctures of the Faith, and that he preſented him with a little Water drawn out of the Divine Fountains, which he might make uſe of till he could go to drink of them himſelf at the Spring-Head.

(dd) Has been compoſed ſince theſe.] In the Preface of the firſt Book he only ſpeaks of two Books, and the third is not to be found in ſome ancient Editions: but it is cited, as we have obſerved, by St. Jerome and St. Auſtin, Retract. lib. 2. c. 1. adverſ. Pelag. c. 9. de Predeſtin. Sanct. c. 3. and 'tis properly ſpeaking, a Work by it ſelf: For the two firſt were written to inſtruct Quirinus in the firſt grounds of the Chriſtian Faith, and the deſign of this is to teach him the Precepts of Morality. Some few Texts of Scripture may have been ſince added to it, which follow the vulgar Latin. This Treatiſe might perhaps be written in the year 249.

(ee) After he was ordained Biſhop.] He was then a Biſhop, for he ſpeaks to them, as having Authority over them, and calls himſelf their Father. Pontius inſinuates, that it was not compoſed till after his Retirement; for, to prove that St. Cyprian's Retirement was of great advantage to the Church, becauſe of the Books he wrote, during his Solitude, he places the Book about the Conduct of Virgins in this number. Who is it, ſays he, who has taught the Virgins to preſerve Diſcipline, to wear modeſt Apparel, agreeable to their Condition? But Pontius in this place enumerates the Works of St. Cyprian, like a Rhetorician, ſince the firſt he mentions is the Epiſtle to Donatus, which was certainly written before his Confinement, and in all appearance the Luxury of Women, the uſe of frequenting Baths, and the other Irregularities he reprehends in that Treatiſe, better agree with a time wherein the Church had long enjoyed Peace. Be it as it will, Pontius always places the Book of the Conduct of Virgins firſt.

Conduct;

S. Cyprian. Conduct; as being the Guardian of Hope, the Anchor of Faith, and the Guide to the way of Salvation. He shews by several Texts of Scripture that it is of great Necessity, and afterwards addressing himself to the Virgins, and extolling their Condition, he exhorts them to maintain this Discipline with the greatest Exactness, as having more need of it than any Persons besides. He convinces them, that Christian Continence can by no means suit with prophane Ornaments; that their Wealth did not excuse this Vanity of dressing; that God gave them Riches not to throw away upon idle Superfluities, but to employ them to good Uses, to feed and relieve the poor; that a great Fortune, unless employed after this manner, does only become a great Temptation; that although these Ornaments that Virgins made use of, did not of themselves destroy them, yet they ought to abstain from them, since they had proved the Ruin of others, by drawing the Eyes of young Men after them, and by that means kindling the fire of Love in their Hearts; that rich Attire and Care in Dressing only became Prostitutes, and that the Scripture always speaks of them after this manner; that they abused the Works of God to set themselves out, and that they disfigured the Image he made by the Painting and Curling, and abundance of other Ornaments. After this he advises the Virgins, carefully to avoid all those things that might injure their Chastity, and severely reprehends those who were not ashamed to go to publick Baths, though they did it without entertaining the least ill design. In short, after having given these Instructions to the Virgins, he takes occasion to speak of the great advantages of Virginity, and tells them it was the neatest State to that of Martyrdom; that Virgins avoid the curse pronounced against the first Woman; that they are equal to the Angels; that Virginity is not of absolute necessity, but that it is a great deal more excellent than any other Condition. At last he concludes with desiring the Virgins to remember him when they should receive the Recompence of their Virginity. Tantum mementote tunc nostri, cum incipiet in vobis Virginitas honorari: Words which make it appear that in St. Cyprian's time they believed that the Saints interceded for us before God.

The Treatise concerning those that had fallen away in the time of Persecution, and that of the Unity of the Church were composed in the year 251, immediately after the Persecution of Decius. This last was writ upon the occasion of the Schism of the Novatians, and the Faction of Felicissimus; and the first was writ against those of the Faction of Felicissimus that rashly granted the grace of reconciliation to all that had fallen in the Persecution. He read both these Books in an African Council held that very year, and afterwards sent them to Rome, as he testifies in his fiftieth Letter, according to Pamelius's Order.

In his Treatise concerning those who had fallen away during the Persecution, he begins with giving Thanks to God that Peace was restored to the Church, and makes an honourable Elogium of the Holy Martyrs and Confessors. He deplores the lamentable fall of those Persons that had Apostatized, and observes that God never permits a Persecution but to punish the Corruptions and Vices of the Christians. He detests the crime of those who had presented themselves before the Magistrates to deny the Faith of Jesus Christ, and carried their Children to the Altars of the Gods to make them, if it were possible, partakers of their Crimes, and cause them to lose, as one may say, the Grace of Baptism. He observes that a Love for the World and an Inclination to earthly things occasioned the Fall of the greatest part of those Persons who had Apostatized, and even hindered them from flying to avoid the Persecution: He affirms that the fault of those who were overcome by the extremity of their Torments was a great deal more excusable; but that those who had fallen away merely out of fear of suffering, before they ever did suffer, could alledge nothing in their own defence. After he has shewn the greatness of the crime of these Apostates, he passes to the Remedies, and greatly blames those that admitted them to a rash and over hasty Reconciliation. He maintains that a Priest of God ought by no means to deceive Christians by a pernicious Complaisance, but to heal them with wholesome Remedies, herein imitating a skilful Chirurgeon, who makes deep Incisions that so he may perfectly heal up the Wound, and never hearkens to the Complaints and Crys of his Patient, who will certainly thank him for it as soon as he is healed; that the liberty some Persons had assumed to themselves to grant Reconciliation unadvisedly to those that had fallen, was a new calamity that succeeded the Persecution; that this false peace was pernicious, as well to those that gave it, as fatal to those that received it; that a Sinner ought to have time sufficient to expiate his Sin by a true and lawful Satisfaction; that it was abominable Sacrilege to approach the Holy of Holys, and to receive the Body of Jesus Christ, S. Cyprian. while their Hands were still polluted with sacrificing to Idols, and had scarce digested the Meats offered to false Gods; that this in Effect is to drink the Cup of the Lord, and the Cup of Devils, to eat at the Table of the Lord, and at that of the Devil, and to offer violence, as one may say, to the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ; that they deceive themselves who think that the Reconciliation which is given them before they have expiated their Crime by a publick Penance, and purified their Conscience by Sacrifice and Imposition of Hands from the Bishop, is a true Reconciliation; that is rather a War, a new Persecution, a new Temptation, whereof the Enemy makes use to consummate the destruction of those that fell, by taking away from them the Spirit of Repentance; that they ought not to flatter themselves because they were absolved by the Martyrs, since Jesus Christ only can pardon Sins; that the Merits and Works of the Martyrs can indeed do much, but that only for the day of Judgment, and that it is downright rashness to believe that they can without distinction grant Remission of Sins to all the World, against the express Command of Jesus Christ; that if what the Martyrs ordain is just and lawful, it ought to be granted at their request; but if what they demand is against the Law of God, and the Gospel, it is not reasonable that it should be granted; besides, that it is not to be presumed that those who are Martyrs for the Gospel, would attempt any thing in Derogation to it. After this to strike Terror into those who had fallen, he relates several Examples of Persons, whom God had severely punished for being so bold as to receive the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ after their Apostacy. Then he addresses himself to those who had taken Certificates from the Magistrates, which testified that they had sacrificed, though they had really done no such thing, and advises them not to flatter themselves, as if there was no necessity of repenting, since to confess that one has committed a Crime, is effectually the same thing as to commit it, and that this Declaration was a solemn renouncing of the Christian Religion; that though this Crime did not appear very shameful in the Eyes of Men, yet it was heinous before God, who knows the most secret Motions and Inclinations of our Hearts. At last he mightily extolls the Piety of those who had neither offered Sacrifice, nor taken Certificates; However, since they had a desire to do it, he exhorts them to confess themselves largely and with Sorrow before the Priests of God, discovering the Secrets of their Conscience, to quiet their Consciences, and to search out a remedy for their Wounds, though they appeared to be slight and insignificant; and he persuades those that were conscious to themselves of this fault, not to be ashamed of discovering it, and to do Penance for it, that so they may obtain Pardon. He concludes all with an Exhortation to Sinners, to renounce the Pleasures and Vanities of the World, and to satisfie the Divine Justice by a long and sincere Repentance.

In his Treatise of the Unity of the Church (ff) he begins with advising all Christians to joyn Prudence to Simplicity, and to take diligent care to keep themselves from the secret Attacks of the Devil, as Heresies and Schisms, whereby he draws Christians, before they are aware, to separate themselves from the Unity of the Church. After this, he demonstrates, by several Reasons, that the Church of Christ is essentially One, and that there cannot be more. He tells us, That for a visible Mark of this Unity, Jesus Christ had built his Church upon St. Peter; and that he gave the Power of his Keys only to him, tho', after his Resurrection, he gave equal Power and Authority to all his Apostles; that as the Church is One, so there is One Only Episcopacy, a part whereof every Pastor truly and really possesses; that such as are out of this Church, have no Salvation to hope for; that a Man may be killed indeed out of the Church, but that he could not be crowned unless he were actually in the Church; that Schism and Heresie are the most enormous Crimes a Man can be guilty of, which God has always punished with the greatest Severity; that the Example of a few Confessors ought not to stagger or scandalize any one; for besides that, we are not to imitate them in the faults they may commit; there was still a very great number of them that continued stedfast in the Unity of the Church. At last, he exhorts all Christians whatsoever, to return to it again, to promote Union by their joynt Endeavours, and to have no manner of Commerce with Schismaticks.

[In the Account which our Author gives of this Discourse of St. Cyprian, he seems not to be so fair as he is at other times. He says from St. Cyprian, That for a visible Mark of this Unity of the Church, Jesus Christ had (ff) In the Treatise of the Church.] Pontius mentions this Treatise. It is cited by St. Austin in his second Book, Contra Crescon. and by Facundus, lib. 1. cap. 16. under the name of the Treatise of Unity; and in some ancient Editions, it is Intituled, A Treatise of the Simplicity of Pastors.

S.Cyprian. built his Church upon St. Peter, and gave the Power of the Keys only to him; tho', after his Reſurrection he gave equal Power and Authority to all his Apoſtles. St. Cyprian's words are theſe, Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum, ego tibi dico, inquit, quia tu es Petrus, & ſuper iſtam Petram ædificabo Eccleſiam meam, & portæ inferorum non vincent eam, &c. & iterum eidem poſt Reſurrectionem ſuam dicit, Paſce oves meas. Super unam ædificat Eccleſiam ſuam. Et quamvis Apoſtolis omnibus, parem poteſtatem tribuat, & dicat, ſicui remiſeritis peccata, remittentur illi: Si cui tenueritis, tenebuntur; tamen ut Unitatem manifeſtaret, Unitatis ejuſdem originem, ab uno incipientem ſua auctoritate diſpoſuit. Hoc erant utique & cæteri Apoſtoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari conſortio præditi & honoris & Poteſtatis, ſed exordium ab unitate proficiſcitur, ut Eccleſia una monſtretur. 'The Lord 'ſaid unto Peter, I ſay unto thee (ſays he) that thou art 'Peter, and upon that Rock I will build my Church, and 'the Gates of Hell ſhall not prevail againſt it, &c. and 'again, after his Reſurrection, he ſays to the ſame Pe'ter, "Feed my Sheep. He builds his Church upon one. 'And though he gives equal Power to all the Apoſtles, 'and tells them, whoſe Sins ye retain, they ſhall be re'tained, and whoſe Sins ye forgive, ſhall be forgiven; yet 'that he might make that Unity manifeſt, he ordered by 'his own Authority, that the Original of that very Unity 'ſhould begin from one. For the other Apoſtles were the 'ſame as he, equally Partners of Honour and Power, but 'the beginning ſprings from Unity, that the Church may 'be ſhewed to be but one.

Here is no Diſtinction made of different Powers granted before and after the Reſurrection. S. Cyprian ſeems to have deſigned to obviate this Objection; and leſt any Man ſhould think that any Primacy, except that of being named firſt was intended, he ſays, that the other Apoſtles were St. Peter's equals, both in Honour and Power. But this paſſage has had foul dealing ſhewed to it long ago; Manutius publiſhed it at Rome with Interpolations in his Edition in 1563. Rigaltius was aſhamed of it, and ſo printed it in his Notes faithfully. The wonder is, how Mr. Du Pin ſhould ſay, That Jeſus Chriſt gave the Power of the Keys to St. Peter only, when he had the Oxon. Edition before him, and all the other Editions that preceded Manutius's, of which he has given us a Catalogue. One ſees the Reaſon now, why he deſires afterwards that ſome Catholick Divine (as he calls them) would reprint St. Cyprian, and illuſtrate him with Catholick Commentaries. This is the Reaſon why the Oxon. Edition could not ſatisfie him: Biſhop Fell's Notes are too candid and ſincere for any one of that Communion; ſo that though he could not omit ſpeaking honourably of it, leſt his judgment ſhould have been queſtioned, yet the want of Catholick Commentaries was ſo very deplorable a thing, that he thought by this ſlye inſinuation to depreciate ſo valuable an Edition of ſo great a Father: for St. Cyprian alone cannot be put into all Mens Hands without danger; and it is an unanſwerable argument how little Antiquity favours their Cauſe, when the Father who wrote more and more earneſtly for Catholick Unity, and the ſupport of Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline againſt Schiſmaticks, and Diſturbers of the Peace of the Church, than any Man before the Council of Nice, cannot be brought to ſpeak as they would have him, without uſing the moſt palpable miſrepreſentation, and the moſt unjuſt dealing that can be ſhewn to the Writings of any Author whatever.]

The Treatiſe about the Lord's Prayer immediately follows that of the Unity of the Church, in Pontius the Deacon's Catalogue, and it is probable, that it was compoſed ſoon after, towards the beginning of the Year 252. In this Book he highly recommends Amity and Concord, which ſhews that he writ it ſoon after the former, when he had his Head full of the ſame thoughts, and at a juncture when it was neceſſary to inforce them the ſecond time on the World. we may divide it into ſeven Parts: In the firſt, he demonſtrates, that the Lord's Prayer is the moſt excellent and efficacious Prayer, ſince Jeſus Chriſt himſelf compoſed it for our uſe. In the ſecond, he ſets down Rules how we ought to Pray, and tells us we muſt do it with a World of Reverence and Modeſty; that the tone of our Voice ought not to be high; that when Chriſtians aſſemble together to celebrate Divine Sacrifices with the Biſhop, it is convenient that they ſhould remember to be moderate, and not to make a confuſed noiſe with their Voice, becauſe it is not the Voice, but the Heart which is to be elevated to Heaven; that we muſt pray with great humility, which he confirms by the example of Hannah, the Mother of Samuel, and of the Publican mentioned in the Goſpel. In the third part, he inſtructs us what things we are to pray for; and taking occaſion to explain the Lord's Prayer, he obſerves in the firſt place, that we do not ſay, My Father, but Our Father, becauſe the Prayer of every Chriſtian is a common Prayer, who does not Pray for himſelf alone, but for the whole Congregation of the Faithful, which make up but one body; that we invoke God by the name of Father, S.Cyprian. becauſe we are made his Children by Baptiſm; that we beſeech him that his name may be ſanctified in us, that is to ſay, we pray him to ſanctifie and purifie us continually to the end of our Life; that the Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, which we expect, is the recompence we hope to receive in the other Life, at the day of Judgment; that when we pray to God that his Will may be done, our meaning is not, that he would do whatever pleaſes him, but that he would Work in us what he would have us to do, that is to ſay, that he would make us accompliſh his Will, which no body is able to do by his own ſtrength alone, without the aſſiſtance of God's Mercy; that this Will of God, which we are required to fulfil, is no other than what Jeſus Chriſt has done and taught, that is to ſay, Humility, Stedfaſtneſs in the Faith, Prudence, Juſtice, Mercy, a good Deportment, to do wrong to none, to preſerve Peace with our Brethren, to love God with all our Heart, and to prefer nothing before Jeſus Chriſt, ſince he himſelf preferred nothing before us; that when we pray that his Will may be done in Earth, as it is in Heaven, we mean (according to his Explication) in our Body, and in our Mind, or rather in the Unbelievers as well as the Believers. After this he ſays, that the daily Bread we pray for in the Lord's Prayer, may be underſtood either of Spiritual or Corporeal Bread; that the Spiritual Bread we beg for is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt in the Euchariſt, which the Chriſtians who are truly devoted to Jeſus Chriſt deſire to receive, daily fearing to be ſeparated from it by ſome great Sin; that if we underſtood it of Corporeal Bread, the meaning is that we are not to beg of God what is neceſſary for our Suſtenance every day, unleſs we carry our deſires farther: That in Praying to God that he would Forgive us our Treſpaſſes, we acknowledge that we Treſpaſs continually, and impoſe upon our ſelves at the ſame Time a Law not to obtain remiſſion, but only upon condition, that we forgive our Brethren the Treſpaſſes they have committed againſt us: When we deſire of God that he would not permit us to fall into Temptation, we intimate, that our Enemy has no power over us, if God does not give him leave to tempt us, and that he never gives him leave but for two Reaſons, either to puniſh us for our ſins, or elſe to try us: That the Lord's Prayer concludes at laſt with a Petition, which is a ſort of an abridgment of all the reſt; for when we beſeech God to deliver us from all Evil by his Almighty Power, nothing more remains for us to ask.

In the fourth part he tells us, that Jeſus Chriſt has inſtructed us to pray as well by his Example as by his Words; and ſince he who was without Sin Pray'd often, certainly we who are Sinners are to Pray continually. In the fifth, he recommends vigilancy and attention in our Devotions, exhorting us to think upon nothing but only him to whom we addreſs our ſelves, and to baniſh all carnal Thoughts out of our Hearts. To impreſs the greater Authority upon this Exhortation, he takes notice of the Prayer which the Prieſt repeated at that time, when he celebrated the Euchariſt, ſaying, Surſum corda, Liſt up your Hearts, and obſerves, that the People anſwer'd, We liſt them up to the Lord.

In the ſixth part, he adviſes all Chriſtians not to content themſelves with vain barren Prayers, but to joyn Almsgiving, and other Actions of Piety to them. And laſtly, in the ſeventh part, he Diſcourſes of the Time of Prayer, after he has taken notice, what are the moſt ſolemn hours to Pray in. He concludes with affirming, that Chriſtians ought to Pray to God at all times; and ſince the ſerious performance of theſe duties will procure for them, one day, everlaſting Happineſs, they ought even now, to begin to thank God. This Treatiſe of St. Cyprian was ſo highly approved by St. Auſtin, that he recommended it to the Monks of Adrumetum, to whom he addreſſed his Book about Grace and Free-will, to read it over carefully, and to learn it by Heart; and he obſerves, that this Saint ſpeaks after ſuch a manner in this Treatiſe, as ſhews that he was perſuaded we ought to Pray to God to give us his Grace to perform what he commands us to do in his Law. And indeed, amongſt all the Treatiſes that were compoſed in the firſt Ages of the Church, perhaps there is not one that aſcribes ſo much to the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt as this does, or contains more formal Paſſages to prove the efficacy and neceſſity of it.

The Exhortation to Martyrdom, directed to Fortunatianus, at a time when the Chriſtians expected the Perſecution of Gallus and Volufian, was writ in the Year 253. 'Tis a Collection of Texts of Scripture, to excite all Chriſtians to confeſs the Name of Jeſus Chriſt Courageouſly, and to ſuffer Martyrdom for the Truth. In the firſt Chapter he cites thoſe places, that diſcovered the vanity of Idols. In the ſecond thoſe that ſhew, that we muſt only Worſhip God. In the third, thoſe that mention the severe Punishments wherewith God threatens to visit those that Sacrifice to Idols. In the fourth and fifth, those that declare, that God will not easily pardon Idolatry, but punishes those with Death who counsel others to adore Idols. In the sixth, he urges those Texts that may induce us to consider that since we have been redeemed and enlivened by Jesus Christ, we ought not to prefer any thing before him, since he himself preferr'd nothing before us. In the seventh, those that represent to us, that since we have once escaped the snares of the Devil, and the Ambushes of the World, we ought to take heed that we fall into them no more, but make the best use of that delivery. In the eighth, those that recommend Perseverance in the Faith, and all other Virtues. In the ninth, those that shew, that Persecutions and afflictions are sent only to try us. In the tenth, those that give us Consolation, and teach us not to be afraid, since God is more powerful to Protect us, than the Devil to overcome us. In the eleventh, those that prove, that it was foretold, that the World would hate us, and stir up Persecutions against us; and that Good Men always suffered. In the last, there is a Collection of Texts to encourage Christians to suffer Martyrdom, out of hopes of finding a sufficient recompence in Heaven. Here is an Abridgment of this Treatise made by St. Cyprian himself, which he sent at the end of his Letter to Fortunatianus, to whom he dedicates this Book. He observes in this Letter, that it is the duty of the Bishop to train and exercise those Soldiers, whom Jesus Christ has committed to his Charge; and that Observations drawn out of the Holy Scripture, are the best Arms he can give them. S. Cyprian.

The Treatise of Morality was composed upon occasion of a certain Pestilence (gg) that afflicted the Roman Empire, but principally Africk, the Year after the Death of Gallus and Volusian. He shews in his Treatise, that Christians ought not to be afraid of Sickness or Calamities, but that they rather ought to wish for them, since they furnish them with an opportunity to exercise their Patience, and to merit the Rewards of Heaven; that they ought not to fear Death, but rather to desire it, since it delivers them from all the miseries of this Life, and unites them to Jesus Christ for ever; that we ought not to be surprised, that the Pestilence seizes Christians as well as Pagans, since all the miseries of the Flesh are equally common to both, nay, that a Christian ought to suffer more than the other; that the difference that ought to be between him and one that does not know God, is, that the latter complains and suffers his evils with impatience, whereas a Christian shews his Faith at such a juncture, by being not afraid of Death, and his Vertue in bearing every thing patiently, and his Charity in helping his Neighbour; that though the Good die as well as the Bad, yet their end is very different, because the Good after their Death, are sent into a place of refreshment, whereas the Wicked are thrown headlong into a place where they are Tormented for ever; that the first die to be put into a better state of security, and the last to be more severely punished: That Sicknesses prepare us for Martyrdom, and make us Martyrs of Jesus Christ; that for this reason we ought not to be afflicted, because they deprive us of the Glory of Confession, since not to mention, that it does not depend upon our selves to be Martyrs, and that it is the Grace of God to let us dye with a Will of suffering Martyrdom, God will crown us as if we had really suffered it: That it would be to no purpose to beg of God, that his Kingdom may come, if the Captivity wherein we are does still please us: That we ought not to bewail those of our Brethren, whom God has taken to himself, since we have not lost them, and they have only gone a Journey before us, which we are all to make one time or another: That we do in some sort distrust the promises of Jesus Christ, if we concern and afflict our selves at the Death of our Neighbours and Friends, as if they were no more, and that we ought rather to rejoyce that they are passed into a better Life, and enjoy a state of repose and tranquility that will never end: At last he exhorts all Christians heartily to wish for the happy day of their Death, which will free them from the exile of this Life, and give them admission into the Kingdom of Heaven, which is their Country, where they will be everlastingly in the Company of the Saints, and with Jesus Christ. S. Cyprian.

His Treatise to Demetrianus a Judge (hh) in Africa, was likewise composed during the rage of this Pestilence, immediately after the Death of Gallus and Volusian (ii). He there refutes a Calumny, which the Pagans frequently formed against the Christians for being the cause of those Wars, Famines, Plagues, and other Calamities that wasted the Roman Empire. He shews, that those misfortunes that daily happen in the World, which grows old every day, ought to be rather attributed to the Crimes and Impiety of Men; and the Christians were so far from being the occasion of them, because they did not adore false Gods, that the Pagans rather drew down all these heavy Visitations upon Mankind, because they did not Worship the true God, and Persecuted those that Worship'd him: That all this was the immediate hand of God, who to revenge himself for the contempt they shew'd of him, and of those that served him, punished Men after this rigorous manner, and made them feel the weight of his displeasure: That the Gods of the Pagans were so far from being able to exercise this Revenge, that they were fettered and ill used, as I may say, by the Christians, who ejected them by force out of the Bodies of those Persons, whom they had possest: That the Christians suffered patiently, as being assured that their Cause would be soon revenged, that they endured the same Evils which the Pagans did in this World, but that they comforted themselves, because after their Death they should possess everlasting Joy, whereas the Pagans at the day of Judgment would be condemned to everlasting Torments. He exhorts them at last, with great zeal and ardour, to quit their Errors, and to repent of them while they are in a condition to do it; because after this Life is once over, there is no room for Repentance, and afterwards the Satisfaction is useless, since it is here upon Earth, that every Man renders himself worthy or unworthy of everlasting Salvation: That neither Age nor Sins ought to hinder any one from suffering himself to be Converted, since, as long as we are in this World, there is still time for us to Repent, the Gate of the Divine Mercy being never shut to those that diligently search the Truth. Though you were, says he, at the point of Death, if you pray'd to have your Sins forgiven, and implored the goodness of God, you would obtain remission of your Crimes, and pass from Death to Immortality. Jesus Christ has procured this favour for us by conquering and triumphing over Death on the Cross, by redeeming those that Believe with the price of his Blood, by reconciling Man to God, and communicating a new Life to him by a celestial Birth. Let us follow them all if it is possible, and receive this Sacrament, and his Sign, &c.

It is probable, that the Treatise of Mercy and Alms-giving (kk) was writ when St. Cyprian gathered considerable Alms to redeem the Christians, who had been taken Prisoners by the Barbarians, towards the Year 253. He demonstrates in this Book, by several Authorities of Scripture, and many Convincing Reasons, the necessity of giving Alms; he refutes the frivolous excuses, and vain pretences used by Rich Men to avoid the doing such acts of Charity; and observes, that in his time every one brought a Loaf at the Celebration of the Eucharist, (which was always once a day, in the Morning before it was Light, and often at Night after Supper.)

St. Cyprian tells us himself, in his Letter to Jubaianus, that he composed his Book of Patience, upon the occasion of a Question concerning the reiteration of the Baptism of Hereticks, to shew that we ought to preserve Charity and Patience in all Disputes with our Brethren. So this Treatise was composed, at the beginning of the Year 256, and St. Cyprian sent it as soon as it was finished to one Jubaianus a Bishop (ll), together with the Letter which he writ to him. In it he exhorts Christians to Patience, by the Example of Jesus Christ, and the Saints as well of the Old as the New Testament.

(gg) Upon occasion of a certain Pestilence.] It had its rise in Arabia, then spread it self in Ægypt and Africa, from whence it passed into all the West. It was an Epidemical Distemper, a great deal worse than a common Pestilence. It began under the Empire of Gallus and Volusian, and lasted several years; it raged with twice the violence, under the Empire of Galienus, as we have already observed. This Treatise was written in the year 253, or 254.

(hh) Judge.] It has been commonly believed, that he was Proconsul: But the Author of the English Edition has very well observed, that St. Cyprian does not speak to him as to a Proconsul; and that what he says of him, viz. that he often came to him to dispute with him, and that he drew several Persons over to his Party, is by no means suitable to the Character of a Sovereign Magistrate of Africk.

(ii) After the Death of Gallus and Volusian.] This Treatise was written during the Plague, to shew that the Christians were not the cause of it. He there speaks of the late Fall of Kings, which is to be understood of the Death of Gallus and Volusian, who were killed by their Soldiers.

(kk) The Treatise of the Works of Mercy and Almsgiving.] This Treatise is cited by Pontius, by St. Jerome, Ep. ad Pamm. by St. Austin, contr. Jul. contr. Pelagianos & alibi.

(ll) To one Jubaianus a Bishop.] Ep. ad Jub. Teneatur à nobis patienter, & firmiter Charitas animi, Collegii honor, vinculum fidei, & concordia sacerdotii; propter hoc etiam libellum de bono patientiæ, quantum valuit nostra mediocritas, permittente Domino, & inspirante conscripsimus, quem ad te pro mutuâ dilectione transmisimus. Pontius mentions it, St. Jerome cites it, adv. Lucif. and St. Austin in several places.

S. Cyprian.

The Book of Envy was writ a little after that of Patience (mm). In it he diſſuades Chriſtians from that Vice, which is the occaſion of all Miſchief, and exhorts them to the practice of Charity and Chriſtian Humility.

Hitherto we have only mentioned thoſe Works that unqueſtionably belong to St. Cyprian, I ſhall now ſpeak a few words of thoſe that are falſly attributed to him, which are put by themſelves in Rigaltius's and the Engliſh Edition. There is a great number of theſe Books, ſome of which are really uſeful and ancient, though we don't know their Authors, ſome carry the Names of their Authors at preſent, and ſome are of a later date, and deſervedly deſpiſed.

In the number of the firſt, we muſt place the following Treatiſes. That againſt publick Shews, the Book of Charity, and the Homily againſt Novatian, all which works ſeem to proceed from one Author; and might be attributed to St. Cyprian (nn), if it were not for the difference that is ſo viſible between the Style of this Father, and that of theſe three Books.

The Treatiſe or Homily againſt Gameſters (oo), is yet more different from St. Cyprian's Style than any of the former, being an intricate confuſed Book, and abounding with barbarous Words. The Scriptures are cited there after another manner than they are in St. Cyprian; and the Author mentions a Book, Intituled, The Doctrine or Doctrines of the Apoſtles, which, in all probability, was compoſed ſince St. Cyprian's time.

The Book of the Cœlibacy of the Clergy is extremely uſeful: In it he proves, that Churchmen ought not to live with Women; ſome have attributed it to St. Cyprian upon the Faith of ſome MSS. others to St. Auſtin, others to St. Jerome, and laſtly, others to Gaudentius Brixienſis. However, it is certain, that it was never writ by St. Cyprian, as the difference of Style, and the barbarous words (pp), ſufficiently witneſs. Nor is it a Tranſlation out of Origen but the work of ſome Latin Author: In ſhort, it is neither written in the Style of St. Jerome, nor Origen (qq).

The Author of the Engliſh Edition ſuppoſes that this Treatiſe was writ in the time of Venerable Bede, when the famous Queſtion of the Cœlibacy of Churchmen was ſo warmly diſcuſſed in the Weſt: But this is only a bare conjecture, ſupported by no ſolid reaſon; ſo that we can ſay nothing poſitive concerning the Author of this Work.

The Book of the Twelve Abuſes of the Age, which is likewiſe attributed to St. Auſtin, was neither written by that Father, not by St. Cyprian; for, beſides that, it has not the leaſt reſemblance of their Style or manner of Writing, the Scripture is always cited there, after St. Jerome's Verſion. Pamelius has aſcribed it to one Erardus, whoſe Name he found in the Margin of this Treatiſe in a MS. of St. Auſtin. Others again beſtow'd it upon St. Patrick Biſhop of Ireland, and ſome upon St. John Climacus.

To theſe Treatiſes we muſt joyn an Oration in praiſe of Martyrdom, and another about double Martyrdom, both which were compoſed by ſome Author who is not very ancient, for his Diverſion. The firſt is penn'd in an elaborate affected Style; and it ſeems probable, that the Perſon that made it, only tried how he could make an Harangue in form. He begins with an Exordium, as if he delivered it before an Aſſembly; the Periods are carefully wrought, his Thoughts are odd and uncommon, and the whole Turn is extremely Stiff. The Oration about double Martyrdom is writ after a more negligent way by ſome young Author, who had a mind to imitate St. Cyprian's Style. Gravius imagined that Eraſmus was the Author of this Cheat; but in all probability, ſo able a Man as he was, would have carried on the Impoſture better than it is managed in this Book: For though the Author pretends that he writ it 240 Years after Jeſus Chriſt; yet he makes no ſcruple of telling us, that the Chriſtian Religion was farther extended than the Empire. He ſpeaks of the Perſecution under Dioclefian, and Maximin or Maximian, of a War againſt the Turks, and makes mention of Monks and their Practices: And theſe are the Books falſly attributed to St. Cyprian, which may be of ſome uſe, whoſe Authors are not known.

S. Cyprian.

The Treatiſe of the Cardinal, or principal Works of Jeſus Chriſt, which was attributed to St. Cyprian, though it does not reſemble his Style, has been reſtored upon the Faith of ſeveral Manuſcripts, to Arnoldus Bonævallis, a Friend of St. Bernard's, who addreſſed it to Pope Adrian IV. and who compoſed ſome other Treatiſes beſides this, in the very ſame Style, viz. one concerning the Sayings of Jeſus Chriſt, another upon the Croſs, the Work of the Six Days, and the Praiſes of the Virgin, all which are Printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum; and laſtly, a Treatiſe of Meditations, which was never Printed before, but has been added in the Engliſh Edition of St. Cyprian, to all the other Works of the ſame Author.

The Explication of the Apoſtles Creed belongs undoubtedly to Ruffinus. The Treatiſe of the Baptiſm of Hereticks, Publiſhed by Rigaltius, but directly contrary to St. Cyprian's Opinion in the matter, was writ by an ancient Writer who lived before St. Auſtin's time, and perhaps was a Contemporary of St. Cyprian.

The other Treatiſes attributed to St. Cyprian are not only ſpurious, but are full of nothing elſe but Impertinencies and Errors. The firſt is a Treatiſe of the Mountains of Sion and Sina, writ by ſome body who was wholly beſotted with the dreaming Enthuſiaſms of the Rabbines and Cabaliſts. The Supper is a ridiculous impertinent Book. The Revelation of John Baptiſt's Head is a fabulous Story, writ after the time of St. Athanaſius, St. Cyril, Theodoſius, the Vandals, the Chronicle of Marcellinus and Pipin, whom it mentions. His Preface attributed to Celſus, upon the diſpute of Papiſcus and Jaſon addreſſed to Vigilius, and the Treatiſe againſt the Jews, are two Books, wherein there is nothing regular or ſolid. The two Treatiſes directed to the Martyrs, and the Confeſſion or Repentance of St. Cyprian the Martyr, are Books which the Modern Greeks have attributed to the Martyr Cyprian, who perhaps is the Biſhop of Carthage, whoſe Life they have amplified.

The Secrets and Prayers of St. Cyprian, are Treatiſes full of Superſtition and Impiety. There remains nothing behind but a Calendar upon Eaſter (rr), Printed under St. Cyprian's Name in the Engliſh Edition. 'Tis the Work of an ancient Author, but the Style is wholly different from that of St. Cyprian. I ſay nothing of the Poems that are attributed to him, becauſe they go likewiſe under Tertullian's Name, and I ſpoke of them when I gave an Account of that Author. [A Man muſt have a very nice taſte of Styles, that can throw away a Book that is almoſt all Calculation, from any Author to whom it is attributed, if he has no other Reaſon to reject it.]

St. Cyprian is the firſt of the Chriſtian Authors that was truly Eloquent, as Lactantius has obſerved; and we may ſay, that there has been never another ſince him, * if we except Lactantius, who was Maſter of ſo much true, noble, and genuine Eloquence. He profeſſed Rhetorick with mighty Reputation, before he was Converted to Chriſtianity; and what he writ afterwards is admirable in its kind. For as Lactantius adds, 'He had an eaſie, 'fertile, agreeable Invention; and what is more, a Spirit 'of Perſpicuity reigns throughout all his Works, which 'is one of the beſt Qualities belonging to any Diſcourſe. 'He has a great deal of Ornament in his Narration, an 'eaſie Turn in his Expreſſions, and Force and Vigour in 'his Reaſonings, in ſuch a manner that he had all the

* This can only be underſtood of the Latins.

(mm) The Book of Envy was writ ſome time after that of Patience.] It was written after the Book of Patience, becauſe when he writ to Jubaianus, he ſent him only the Treatiſe of Patience. It is cited by Pontius, by St. Jerome, in Epiſt. ad Gal. c. 5. and by St. Auſtin in many places.

(nn) Might be attributed to St. Cyprian.] I ſay it might be, for beſides the difference of Style, which is obvious to every Eye, they are not attributed to St. Cyprian in the Manuſcripts, but only in the Printed Books.

(oo) The Treatiſe againſt Gameſters.] It was writ by ſome Biſhop, but we are not to conclude, that it was by a Biſhop of Rome, becauſe he calls himſelf the Vicar of Jeſus Chriſt, for anciently that name was given to all Biſhops.

(pp) Barbarous Words.] Such as Repulſorium, Conſtitutionarios, Vulgaritatis, Flumirorum, Probroſitatis, Participiis, Adunari, Vanificat, Egeſtoſam, Procurativa, Abſentarii, Conjugaliter.

(qq) In ſhort, it is neither written in the Style of St. Jerome, nor Origen.] That which has given occaſion to attribute it to Origen, is, becauſe the Author ſeems not to condemn a Man's making himſelf an Eunuch; but Origen was at laſt of a contrary Opinion, and repented of his Action. There is only one Manuſcript in the King's Library, that attributes it to Origen; as ſome Modern Authors think, after Vincentius Bellovacenſis: But it rather reſembles the Style of Gaudentius Brixienſis, were it not, that in no Manuſcripts or Printed Editions it is ever attributed to him.

(rr) A Calendar upon Eaſter.] It has been cited under St. Cyprian's Name, by Paulus Diaconus. The Scripture is cited there according to the Verſion made uſe of by St. Cyprian, but there are ſome words in it that have nothing of the Purity of St. Cyprian, and the turn of the Phraſe is wholly different. To diſcover the Truth of this, we need only ſet down the very firſt Period. Multo quidem, non modico tempore anxii ſumus & æſtuantes, non in ſæcularibus, ſed in ſanctis & divinis ſcripturis quærentes invenire, quidnam ſit primum diei, non menſis, in quo menſe præſcriptum eſt Judæis in Egypto XIV. Lunâ comedere Paſcha. Cyprian would have never uſed ſuch a turn as this is to expreſs his Thoughts. This Author tells us, That Jeſus Chriſt celebrated the Paſſover five times, and died the ſixth, in the 16th year of Tiberius, after he had Preached for the ſpace of an year only. This Syſtem is ancient.

S. Cyprian.

'three Talents required in an Orator, which are to pleaſe, 'to teach, and to perſuade; and it is not eaſie to ſay 'which of theſe three he poſſeſſes in the moſt eminent 'degree. As St. Jerome ſaid, that his Diſcourſe reſembled a Fountain of pure Water, having a ſweet and gentle Stream, ſo we may ſay, that it does likewiſe very often reſemble an impetuous Torrent, that carries away with it every thing it meets, ſince he was capable of raiſing what Paſſions he pleaſed, and of perſuading us to do whatever he had a mind to. Whether he gives Conſolation, or whether he exhorts or diſſuades, he does it with ſo much force, that one cannot poſſibly avoid being ſenſibly comforted or encouraged, or deterred by what he ſays. His Eloquence is natural, and far removed from the Style of a Declaimer. There is no inſipid, mean Railery, no common Proverbs; in ſhort, nothing that has the tincture of ordinary Literature in his Writings, but the Chriſtian and the Biſhop ſpeak all along: A Man may ſee that his Tongue ſpoke out of the abundance of his Heart, and that as he had ſearched into the deepeſt Chriſtian Truths, ſo he expreſſed them nobly and generouſly: Though we muſt at the ſame time own, that after all his endeavours to ſpeak as diſtinctly and purely as was poſſible, there is ſomething of the African Genius in him; and he could not forbear now and then to intermix ſome harſh terms (ff). So difficult a matter it is to vanquiſh Nature, or to abſtain from thoſe words we daily hear from thoſe with whom we converſe.

His ſtudying and reading of Tertullian, whom he looked upon to be his Maſter, might in ſome meaſure contribute to corrupt his Style: But then on the other hand we muſt acknowledge, that it furniſhed him with ſome Advantages, and that he has borrowed ſeveral Thoughts out of him, which he ſets off and beautifies, though he was Religiouſly careful to avoid all his Faults and Errors. For, at the bottom, the Characters of theſe two Authors are exceeding different. Tertullian is harſh and obſcure; St. Cyprian is polite and clear; Tertullian is hot and fiery; St. Cyprian, though he does not want all neceſſary force upon occaſion that requires it, is ſoft and gentle: Tertullian reproaches his Adverſaries, and inſults over them in a bitter railing manner; St. Cyprian is infinitely more moderate, and if he is obliged at any time to ſpeak ſome Truths that diſpleaſe them, he takes care to ſoften them by the agreeableneſs of his Narration: Tertullian vents abundance of falſe Reaſons, and teaches ſeveral Errors; on the contrary, St. Cyprian argues almoſt every where with a World of Juſtice and Solidity, and is exempt, I mean, not only from groſs Errors, but even from thoſe of ſmall conſequence, commonly found in the Fathers of the Three firſt Centuries; He ſays nothing concerning the Myſteries of the Trinity, or the Incarnation, that carries any difficulty with it, or ſtands in need of an explication. He rejects the Error of the Millenaries, and that of the State of the Soul before the Day of Judgment. He is the firſt that ſpoke clearly of Original Sin, and the Neceſſity of the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt. He plainly diſtinguiſhes between Baptiſm and Impoſition of Hands, as two different Sacraments. He ſpeaks of the Euchariſt as of a Sacrament, wherein the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt is received, and which requires great Purity and great Preparation to be worthily received. He eſtabliſhes the matter of this Sacrament, but he urges the neceſſity of mingling Water with the Wine, with too much heat. He is the firſt that talked largely of Penance, and of the Power of the Prieſthood to bind and unbind. He zealouſly demonſtrates how neceſſary it is towards Salvation, to be within the Church: he diſcourſes very advantageouſly of the Biſhop of Rome, and looks upon the Biſhop of that See to be the Superintendent of the firſt Church in the World. But then he was of Opinion, that he ought not to aſſume any Authority over the reſt of the Biſhops that were his Brethren, or over their Churches: That every Biſhop was to render to God an account of his own Conduct: That the Epiſcopal Authority is indiviſible, and that every Biſhop has his Portion of it. That in caſe of neceſſity, all Biſhops may aſſiſt their Brethren with their Counſels, though they are not under their ordinary Juriſdiction: That Cauſes ought to be determined in the reſpective Provinces, where the Accuſers and Witneſſes are to be found: That Councils or Aſſemblies of Biſhops are extremely uſeful: That the Keys were given to the whole Church in general, in the Perſon of St. Peter, to denote Unity: It may be proved out of his Writings, That they uſed to Offer Sacrifice for the Dead in his time; That they were perſuaded that the Saints interceded for us, and that Sacrifices were Offered in Honour of their Memory: That they made uſe of Holy Water, that they had Virgins who made Profeſſion of Virginity; and that this condition was mightily honoured amongſt the Chriſtians. I take no notice of abundance of other points of Diſcipline and Morality, which may be obſerved in the Abridgment we have made of his Works, where the Reader, as he peruſes them, may collect them for himſelf; and indeed, they are of great importance to all People. S. Cyprian.

The firſt Edition of St. Cyprian, which appear'd a little after the Invention of Printing, neither bears the name of the Printer, nor of the City where it was Printed. It is more Correct, and freer from Faults than the following ones.

The ſecond Edition is that of Spire, by Wendelinus, in the Year 1471, in Folio. It is mighty full of Errors.

In the year 1512, Reinboldus cauſed this Author to be printed at Paris, and was the firſt that divided the Letters into ſeveral Books. Afterwards Eraſmus having reviewed and corrected it, printed it with a Preface and ſome Annotations, in the beginning in 1520, and 1525, for Frobenius. It was likewiſe printed the very ſame year at Colen. Afterwards at Paris, for Langelier, in 1541. At Antwerp in Octavo, in the year 1542, by Crinitus, and for Frobenius, in 1549. At Lyons for Gryphius, in Octavo, in 1544, and 1550. At Baſil, according to Eraſmus's Edition, in Folio, for John Hervagius, in 1558. Gravius cauſed it to be printed with ſome Notes at Colen; and it was alſo printed at Lyons, in 1535, 1543, 1549, and 1556, in Octavo. At Venice in the ſame Volume, in 1547. After theſe Editions, which are none of the moſt correct, Manutius cauſed it to be printed at Rome, corrected by ſeveral Manuſcripts in 1563, in Folio, in a very neat Character, and augmented with a fifth Book of Letters. Morellus's Edition at Paris in the year following, is larger and more accurately done. It was printed too at Geneva, in the year 1593, with the Notes of Goulartius and Pamelius.

Pamelius, after he had taken pains with Tertullian, ſet himſelf to publiſh a more exact Edition of St. Cyprian's Works. He is the firſt that diſpoſed the Letters according to the Series of Time, diſtributing them, as we have done into five Claſſes: but he has not been very exact in diſtributing thoſe of the ſame Claſs in their natural Order. He likewiſe writ St. Cyprian's Life, and has made large Obſervations upon this Author; wherein he applies himſelf more to confirm the Doctrine and Diſcipline of our Times, than to explain the Difficulties of his Author.

Pamelius's St. Cyprian has been printed twice at Antwerp, in 1568, and 1589. And at Paris in 1607, 1574, 1616, 1632, and 1644. Theſe Editions are compared with ſeveral ancient Manuſcripts, and the former Editions. In Imitation of him, Rigaltius, after he had publiſhed Tertullian, undertook St. Cyprian, and without making the leaſt alteration in the Order obſerved by Pamelius, he only corrected the Works of this Author, upon the different readings of two Italian Manuſcripts, which Monſieur de Monchal, Archbiſhop of Tholouſe, had copied in the Margine of his St. Cyprian, and made ſome Notes to explain the moſt difficult places; and ſome Obſervations to enlighten the Diſcipline that was in vigor in this Saint's time. Some of theſe Obſervations ſeem to be bold, and he endeavours to excuſe himſelf for them in his Preface. This Edition was printed at Paris for Dupuis, in 1648.

In the year 1666, Dupuis reprinted the Works of this Saint, as he did thoſe of Tertullian, that is to ſay, he added to the Text, which is conformable to the Edition of Rigaltius, the entire Notes and Obſervations of that learned Man; together with ſome choice Obſervations of Pamelius, and joyned to this Author Minutius Felix, Arnobius, Firmicus, and the Inſtruction of Commodianus. In the year 1681. Frederick Reinard, a Miniſter in Germany, put out St. Cyprian's Letters at Altdorf. There is nothing particular in this Edition, but the great number of Manuſcripts with which it was compared.

Monſieur Lombert having tranſlated the Works of St. Cyprian into French, and followed Pamelius's Method in his Tranſlation, has reformed ſome part of this Method in his Preface, and has given us by the aſſiſtance of ſeveral judicious Men, a more accurate order of the Letters and Treatiſes of St. Cyprian, than that of Pamelius. [He is quoted with great reſpect by the Biſhops of Oxford and Cheſter, in the Oxford Edition of this Father's Works.]

After all, two Engliſh Biſhops, not long ſince, put out a new Edition of St. Cyprian, which is more correct, and exact, and larger than all the former. The Text is here printed in a very fine Character, reviſed upon four new Manuſcripts, and ſeveral different Readings, copied out of other Manuſcripts by very able Men. The Margin is all along charged with a very ſhort and clear Summary of all that is contained in the Text. Juſt under the Text, the different Reading of the Manuſcripts and Editions are ſet down. At the Bottom of the Page are placed the (ff) Some harſh Terms.] Such as exambire, remiſſa, ſanctificati, magnanimitas, mortalitas, confundi, abſtinere to excommunicate, Dominicum, &c. words which are not Latin. He has likewiſe ſome harſh turns; as for example, he uſes the Pronouns, ſe, ſui, inſtead of iſte, iſtic for hic, quando for cum, quamdiu for donec, imo for potius. He has alſo ſome Alluſions and Antitheſes proper to the Africans.

S. Cyprian. Notes, ſome of which are borrowed from Rigaltius and Pamelius, and the reſt which are new, are made by the Biſhop of Oxford. Moſt of them are Theological. His Tracts precede the Letters in this Edition, and are diſpoſed according to the Order wherein they are ſuppoſed to have been written. The Letters likewiſe are diſtributed after a new Method, but very exact. The Books that are falſly attributed to St. Cyprian, are printed at the end in a ſmaller Character, with the Works of Arnoldus Bonævallis that carry his name, with a Book of Meditations never printed before. The Calendar of Eaſter is at the end of the Volume. At the Head of all, there is an Advertiſement to the Reader, containing the general Deſign of this Edition; St. Cyprian's Life, by Pontius his Deacon; ſome Teſtimonies of the Ancients concerning St. Cyprian; a Table as well of the Books according to the different Editions, as of the Texts of Scripture cited in the Works of St. Cyprian, and the matter of them. This is followed with a Book written by Doctor Pearſon, Biſhop of Cheſter, Intituled, The Annals of St. Cyprian, becauſe it contains the Hiſtory of the Life and Works of this Saint from year to year. [After all, there are ſome Diſſertations of Mr. Dodwell's upon difficult places, wherein he not only explains his Author, but makes large Digreſſions to clear ſome of the moſt conſiderable Queſtions in all Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity: and to illuſtrate thoſe matters of Fact, and points of Diſcipline which are only alluded to in St. Cyprian, as things at that time perfectly known.] S. Cyprian.

I have been lately informed, that a Doctor of the Faculty in Paris, a Man of prodigious Learning, deſigns to oblige the World with a new Edition of St. Cyprian. It were to be wiſhed, that this Deſign were put in Execution, it being a matter of great Importance, that St. Cyprian ſhould be publiſhed by a Catholick Divine, who is throughly verſed in the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church, and who, in his Annotations would not depart from the Rule of Faith, nor condemn or diſapprove the practice of the Church; that ſo by this means the Works of this Father might without any danger be put into the hands of all People.

PONTIUS.

Pontius. ST. Jerome reckons Pontius amongſt the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, who writ the Life of St. Cyprian, whoſe Deacon he had been. Some Learned Perſons, and Rigaltius in particular, ſeem to have doubted whether this Work was not ſuppoſititious; and indeed, we muſt own, that it is written with ſo much Affectation of Eloquence, that it might well be ſuſpected to be ſpurious, if St. Jerome had not owned it as genuine: But, after the Teſtimony of that Learned Father, I don't think we ought to queſtion the truth of it. This Life is not written, as Rigaltius has well obſerved, after an Hiſtorical manner, but in the Language of one that deſired to be thought an Orator, and has more Rhetorical Ornaments, than Hiſtorical Exactneſs in it. The Narration which ought to be plain and ſingle, is full of Rhetorical Figures; and the Style, which ought to be conciſe, is ſwelling. In ſhort, as I have obſerved already, there is rather an Affectation of Eloquence, than any true Eloquence in this Book. Pontius.

CORNELIUS.

Cornelius. Cornelius was ordained Biſhop of Rome, towards the beginning of the year 251. Soon after, Novatian got himſelf ordained by three Biſhops, but his Ordination being irregular, was condemned, and Cornelius acknowledged to be the true Biſhop of Rome by all the Biſhops in the World.

He was ſent into Baniſhment in the Perſecution of the Emperor Gallus, and then received the Crown of Martyrdom, towards the end of the Year 253. after he had preſided in the Roman Chair, two Years and ſome Months.

There are two Letters of this Pope amongſt St. Cyprian's, and Euſebius mentions three more (a).

In the firſt, he informs Fabius, Biſhop of Antioch, of what had paſſed in the Synod held at Rome againſt Novatian, and ſends him the Opinion of the Italian and African Biſhops.

In the ſecond, he gives a more particular Account of the Decrees of this Synod; and in the third, he deſcribes the manners and actions of Novatian. Euſebius has preſerved a long Fragment of this laſt Letter, wherein Cornelius deſcribes the artifices which Novatian had uſed, to get himſelf ordained Biſhop, by abuſing the ſimplicity and eaſineſs of three Biſhops, one of whom having acknowledged his Crime, did Penance for it. He afterwards obſerves, that there were at that time in the Church of Rome, 44 Prieſts, 7 Deacons, and as many Sub-Deacons, 42 Acolyths, 52 Porters, and Exorciſts, without reckoning the Widows and Poor, upwards of 1500, and a very great multitude of People (b).

He adds, That Novatian could never hope to arrive to the Epiſcopal Order, becauſe he was baptized in his Bed, and never received Impoſition from the hands of the Biſhop, that is to ſay, the Sacrament of Confirmation, and was afterwards ordained Prieſt, only at the requeſt of a Biſhop, contrary to the Order of the Church, which prohibits the ordaining of thoſe who had been baptized after that manner: He reproaches him for denying his Sacerdotal Function in time of Perſecution; as alſo for obliging thoſe of his own Party, when he gave them the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt (inſtead of anſwering Amen, as was the Cuſtom of the Church) to ſwear, that they would never return to Cornelius's Party. Laſtly, he informs Fabius, that the Confeſſors of Rome had left his Party, and that ſeveral Biſhops, whoſe names he ſends him, were condemned in a Synod. This Letter, as well as the others, ſent by Cornelius to the Eaſt, were in all probability written in Greek. In the Bibliotheca Patrum, we find a very ſhort Letter, attributed to Cornelius, directed to Lupinicus, Biſhop of Vienna; but that Letter does not belong to this Pope, no more than the two others which go under his name in the Decretals. For firſt of all it is not of the ſame Style with thoſe we find in St. Cyprian. Secondly, the word Maſi, which was unknown at that time, occurs there. And thirdly, it is unworthy of this Pope, and 'tis plain, it was counterfeited by ſome ignorant Impoſtor. The Style of Cornelius, as far as we are able to judge of it, by thoſe few Letters of his that are ſtill extant, is not very lofty; though he ſets off what ever he ſays, turning every thing to his own advantage, and does not ſpare his Enemy in the leaſt. Cornelius.

(a) Euſebius mentions three more.] St. Jerome reckons four Letters, but he is miſtaken, and Euſebius takes notice only of three.

(b) And a very great multitude of People.] There were at that time ſeveral Churches at Rome, for they had but one Prieſt to one Church: And this is the Reaſon why Optatus, ſpeaking of the Churches that were at Rome in the time of Dioclefian, ſays, that there were above forty of them.

NOVATIAN.

Novatian. Novatian, who had been a Philoſopher before he was a Chriſtian, was, as we have hinted already, Baptized in his Bed, being dangerouſly ill. He was afterwards ordained Prieſt of the Church of Rome, at the Inſtance of his Biſhop, who obtained this Favour for him from the Clergy and People, who would have oppoſed it. Cornelius accuſes him for abſconding in a Chamber during the Perſecution, and for anſwering the Deacons, who deſired him to go out and Baptize ſome Catechumens, That he would not be a Prieſt any longer, but that he would follow another ſort of Philoſophy. Being Maſter of a great deal of Wit, Knowledge, and Eloquence, he might have been very ſerviceable to the Church, if his Ambition to be a Biſhop, which was, in a manner, the ſole occaſion of the Apoſtacy of the firſt Hereſiarchs, had not carried him to a Separation. After the Death of Pope Fabian, he wrote in the name of the Clergy of Rome, a very elegant Letter to St. Cyprian, which is the thirtieth amongſt Novatian.

Novatian. amongst those of that Father, and he still continued in the Communion of the Church during the Vacancy of that See. But as soon as Cornelius was chosen in Fabius's room, pushed forward by his Envy and Jealousy, he attacked his Ordination, accused him of several Crimes, and published a Libel against him. The principal Plea he made use of, was, That Cornelius admitted those who had been guilty of Idolatry to Communion; and to make the best advantage of this Accusation he maintained, that we never ought to suffer those Persons to participate of the Communion, who had fallen into Idolatry. So he separated from Cornelius, and from those who believed, that the Church might receive them again. The greater part of those who had suffered Couragiously for the Faith of Jesus Christ, not being able to endure that others, who had not shewn the same Constancy and Resolution, should (if I may use the Expression) stand on the same level with themselves, embraced his Party, together with some Priests. Novatus, a Priest of Africk, who had raised great Feuds against St. Cyprian at Carthage, joyned himself to Novatian, and brought with him those of his own Faction. It was he who gave him that pernicious Advice (a), to get himself Ordained Bishop. Novatian, the better to execute this design, sent two of his own Cabal to three simple ignorant Bishops, who lived in a small Province of Italy, and prevailed with them to come to Rome, under a pretence of accommodating Affairs, and putting a stop to some Divisions. As soon as these three Bishops were come to Rome, he shut them up in a Chamber, and caused himself to be ordained Bishop of Rome by them, about Ten a Clock at Night, and this after he had made them drunk, if we may believe Cornelius. Immediately after his Ordination he dispatched two Letters to the Bishops of the other Provinces, and sent some Deputies into Africk to get his Ordination approved: But the African Bishops rejected his Deputies, and ratified Cornelius's Ordination. The rest of the Bishops also adhered to Cornelius: And one of the three who had ordained Novatian, acknowledged his Fault, and did Penance for it. The Confessors gave him up to Cornelius, who having got him condemned in a Synod of Sixty Bishops, wholly turned him out of the Church. He continued however still to teach this Doctrine, That the Church neither could nor ought to admit those to the Communion who had Apostatized: And as this Severity pleased abundance of People, so he became the Head of a Heresie, which disturbed the Peace of the Church for a very long time.

Besides, this Letter which he writ before his Separation in the name of the Clergy of Rome, St. Jerome tells us, he composed the following Treatises, viz. of the Passover, the Sabbath, Circumcision, the High-Priests, Prayer, Jewish Meals; of Firmness of Mind with the relation to Attalus, and many more, together with a great Volume about the Trinity, which is, as it were an abridgment of Tertullian's Work, that has been by several Persons attributed to St. Cyprian; not that Tertullian made a Book expresly about the Trinity, but because he had borrowed whatever he says out of the Books of Tertullian upon the Trinity. We have none of these Works under the Name of Novatian, but 'tis extreamly probable, that the Treatise of the Trinity, and that of the Jewish Meats, that are to be found in Tertullian, are the same which St. Jerome attributed to Novatian.

And indeed, as for the Book of the Trinity, Ruffinus observes, that it was not composed by St. Cyprian, under whose Name it went, but by Tertullian. St Jerome, who saw farther into this matter than Ruffinus, takes notice in the Apology which he has composed against him, that it was not written by Tertullian, but by Novatian. There are several Reasons which make it evidently appear, that the Book we now have, is the very same with that mentioned by St. Jerome and Ruffinus. For in the first place, it carries the same Title. Secondly, it imitates Tertullian, and uses his Arguments. Thirdly, the Style of it is polite enough, and the Terms very Pure. Fourthly, we find some Passages there against the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, a Fault which Ruffinus and St. Jerome observe to have been in the Book of the Trinity, which they cited, and which might have been inserted afterwards by the Macedonians. For this Author establishes very Orthodox Principles concerning the Mystery of the Trinity, which prove the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, as well as that of the Son. Novatian.

It is very probable likewise, that the Treatise about Jewish Meats, attributed to Tertullian, belongs to Novatian, as well by reason of the conformity of the Style, as because the Author observes in the beginning, that he wrote two Letters, wherein he demonstrated, that the Jews knew not what is the true Circumcision, or what is the true Sabbath. All which agrees with Novatian, who, according to St. Jerome, wrote two Treatises upon the same Subjects.

The design of this Tretise is to shew, That the Animals forbidden to be eaten by the Mosaical Law, were not absolutely, and in themselves impure. To demonstrate the Truth of this Assertion, he tells us, that the Fruits of Trees were the first Nourishment of Mankind; that afterwards they eat the Flesh of Animals; that the Law came in afterwards, which made a distinction between those Creatures that might be eaten, and those that were prohibited; that under this Dispensation they were called Unclean, not because they were really so in their own Nature, since they were the Creatures of God, but first, to instruct Men to avoid the Vices that were figured, and represented by these Animals (b); and in the second place, to serve as a Remedy against Intemperance; that Jesus Christ, who is the end and accomplishment of the Law, has given liberty to Men to eat of all sorts of Meats, provided they don't violate the bounds of Christian Sobriety; and from thence he takes occasion to reprove the Irregularities and Disorders of some Christians, who lived intemperately. He observes, that this is by no means fitting for those Persons who are to pray Night and Day. At last, out of the number of Meats that are permitted to be eaten, he excepts those that have been offered to Idols, from which the Primitive Christians abstained very Religiously; and he concludes all with these Words, that are an Abridgment of his whole Discourse: 'Having therefore shewn what 'is the nature of Meats (for he had before discovered the Genius of the Mosaical Law, and explained the nature of the Evangelical Liberty) 'Let us live up to the Rules 'of Temperance, and abstain from things Offered to I-'dols, giving thanks to our Lord Jesus Christ his Son, 'to whom be Praise, Honour, and Glory, for ever and 'ever Amen.

Some think that Novatian writ this Letter during the Persecution of Decius, before he had separated from the Church; but his way of speaking, at the beginning, makes me rather believe, that it was composed after he became Chief of the Party, in the Persecution of Gallus and Volusian. This Author has abundance of Wit, Knowledge and Eloquence; his Style is pure, clean and polite; his Expressions choice, his Thoughts natural, and his way of Reasoning just: He is full of Citations of Texts of Scripture that are always to the purpose; and besides, there is a great deal of Order, and Method in those Treatises of his we now have, and he never speaks but with a world of Candor and Moderation.

(a) It was he who gave him that pernicious Advice.] St. Cyprian in his 41st Epistle tells us, that Novatus had ordained a Bishop of Rome, as one Felicissimus a Priest had done at Carthage; not that he made them so himself, for he was no Bishop, but because he had made him so by his Counsels and Faction.

(b) Represented by these Animals.] As for Example, he says, that the Prohibition of eating Swines-flesh is to intimate to us, that we are not to lead a Carnal Life: That when we are forbidden to eat Weasils, the meaning is, we are forbidden to Steal; that by Crows Pleasures are signified, &c.

St. MARTIALIS.

St. Martialis. Saint Martialis came into France with St. Dionysius, under the Emperor Decius (a) toward the year of our Lord 250. Two Letters attributed to him, one written to the People of Burdeaux, the other to those of Tholouse, which were said to be found in the Vestry of St. Peter of Limoges (b) in the Eleventh Century, and have been since frequently Printed (c), and inserted into the last Bibliotheca Patrum, though no Man questi- St. Martialis.

(a) Under the Emperor Decius.] St. Gregory of Tours is the Man that fixes this Epocha of the coming of St. Denis, Martialis, and their Colleagues into France. There is no Author extant, who is either more ancient or more worthy to be believed than St. Gregory, that has given us any account of their arrival there any sooner.

(b) Peter of Limoges.] This Story is related by a Monk called Gaufins, in a Chronicle which is to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum, p. 288, 289. first printed in the year 1521 with Abdias, and afterwards in 1571, and 1614.

(c) Frequently Printed.] They were first Printed by Badius in the Year 1521, afterwards by Bordet in the Year 1573, with the notes of Elmenhorstius at Helmstad in 1614, at Basil in 1655, at Colen in 1560.

St. Martialis.

ons that these Letters are Suposititious. For in the first place the Author tells us, that he lived with Jesus Christ, which can by no means agree with him who was Bishop of Limoges in 252. Secondly, in the eighth Chapter of the Second Letter, he saith, that he Baptized King Stephen, and another Tyrant with his Noblemen. Now in the time of Martialis there was neither King nor Tyrant in France. Thirdly, he tells us, that in his Time the Temples of the Gods were demolished, and that Churches were built by the King's Authority, which does not agree with the time of St. Martialis. Fourthly, the Texts of Scripture quoted in these Letters follow the vulgar Translation, which was composed long after. Fifthly, the Author tells us, that he had eaten with Jesus Christ at the last Supper, though it is certain that none but the Apostles were there.

St. Martialis.

The Life of St. Martialis, Printed at the end of Abdias, which carries the Name of Aurelian Bishop of Limoges, is a spurious Piece, no less than the Epistles of that Bishop, and full as Fabulous as the History of Abdias, to which it is joyned. The Author by a very gross Error supposes, that Vespasian succeeded Nero immediately. He tells us, that St. Martialis received from Jesus Christ after his Resurrection, the same Power which the Apostles had; that he never suffered either Hunger, Thirst, or Pain; and recounts several other Fables concerning him, which are no less ridiculous than those that are to be found upon the same Subject in the two Councils of Limoges, held in the Years 1029, and 1031.

SIXTUS or XYSTUS.

Sixtus.

IT is a long time ago, since under the name of Pope Sixtus, who presided in the Roman Chair in the Year 257. Ruffinus published a Book of a certain Pythagorean Philosopher named Sixtus, translated out of Greek into Latin. St. Jerome often reproaches him with this Imposture (a); St. Austin suffered himself at first to be deceived by it, and has cited it in his Book of Nature and Grace, as if it had been composed by Pope Sixtus, but afterwards he retracts his Error (b). Gelasius placed it amongst the Heretical Books, supposing it to have been written by some Christian. It is still extant (c), being a medley of Philosophical Sentences, useful indeed in themselves, and serviceable to the Truth, but having little of the Spirit of Christianity in them. There is no mention made in it either of Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Prophets, or the Apostles; and it is full of the Errors of the Pythagoreans, and the Stoics. It renders Man equal to God, and affirms that he is made of a Divine Substance, and would have him be without Passion, according to the Principle of the Stoics, and without Sin, pursuant to the Doctrine of the Pelagians. There are several other Pelagian Errors to be found in it.

St. GREGORY THAUMATURGUS.

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

ST. Gregory, whose Name at first was Theodorus, and afterwards Sirnamed Thaumaturgus, that is to say, the worker of Miracles, (by reason of the great number of Miracles he is supposed to have wrought, both in his Life-time and after his Death) was born in the City of Neo-Cæsarea in Pontus, descended of a Family that was very considerable as well for its Nobility, as for its great Possessions. He was educated in the Idolatrous Worship, having a Father who was extremely bigotted to Paganism. After he had lost him at the Age of Fourteen years, his Mother would have him study Rhetoric to qualifie himself for the Bar. His Sister being married to a Lawyer, who was afterwards Governor of Palestine, and being obliged to follow her Husband, Gregory and Athenodorus her Brothers went along with her, intending to go as far as Berytus, and there apply themselves to the Study of the Laws in a Celebrated School of that City. but being arrived at Cæsarea in Palestine, they there met Origen, who having exhorted them to study Philosophy, by little and little inspired into them the Principles of the Christian Faith, and soon after made them his Disciples. After they had been with him for the space of five years, Gregory being willing to testifie the great Obligations he had to Origen, and besides, to give him some publick Marks of his Acknowledgment, as he took his leave of him, composed a very eloquent Discourse, which he recited before a numerous Assembly invited to that Solemnity. After his return to Neo-Cæsarea, he retired for some time, and lived a solitary Life, and was at last, contrary to his Inclinations, ordained bishop of Neo-Cæsarea by Phædimus Bishop of Amasea, towards the year of our Lord 240. At that time there were but very few Christians in that City, but the number of them was soon Augmented by his Vigilance and care, and by his Miracles, so that this Church became in a little time one of the most flourishing Churches in the World. He assisted at the first Council of Antioch held against Paulus Samosatenus, as Eusebius tells us in the Sixth Book of his History, ch. 23. and Died a little after in the Year 265. This is an Abridgment of this Bishop's Life, drawn out of his Discourse to Origen, out of Eusebius, St. Basil, St. Jerome and St. Gregory Nyssen in the relation that he gives of the Life of this great Saint.

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

The Works of this Father (part whereof of Zanus's Version were Printed at Venice in Latin in 1574, and at Rome in 1594) were collected and Printed in Greek by Gerrard Vossius, at Mentz in Quarto 1604, and afterwards in Folio at Paris 1621, with some other smaller Fathers.

The first, as well as the most Eloquent Work he has composed, is the Harangue he made to thank Origen, which was separately Published by Hoeschelius at the end of his Edition of Origen against Celsus in 1605. He begins his Exordium, with the difficulty of commending Origen as he deserved. Afterwards he tells him in what a strange manner the Providence of God conducted him to Cæsarea, the Conversations this great Man held with him and his Brother to exhort them to the study of Philosophy, and to possess them with a Veneration for the Holy Scriptures and the Christian Religion; and afterwards he testifies the Regret he had to be obliged to quit a Master whom he had so tenderly loved. This Harangue is very eloquent, and we may say it is one of the most consummate pieces of Rhetoric that are any where extant amongst the Ancients. It was Printed under the Name of Gregory Thaumaturgus in Greek, and in Latin at Antwerp in 1613. in Octavo.

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

The Second Book mentioned by Eusebius and St. Jerome as well as the first, is his Paraphrase upon Ecclesiastes. It was Translated by Jacobus Billius, who attributed it to St. Gregory Nazianzen upon the Credit of a Manuscript in the King's Library. But certain it is, that it belongs to Gregory Thaumaturgus, not only because we read in Eusebius, and in St. Jerome, that he composed a Book bearing that Name, which we are no where told of St. Gregory Nazianzen, but also because we find there Word for Word a long Passage cited by St. Jerome, upon the fourth Chapter of Ecclesiastes, as taken out of the Paraphrase upon Ecclesiastes, done by Gregory Bishop of Pontus. I have no more to say of this Book, but only that it is a Paraphrase which largely explains the Moral Reflections in Ecclesiastes.

St. Gregory Nyssen in his Life of this Father, takes notice of a Creed, which, as he pretends, this Saint received from St. John in a Vision which he saw in the Night, and which was still preserved, being as he says, written by the Hand of Gregory Thaumaturgus. This Profession of Faith is as follows: 'There is only one God the Father, 'who is the Father of the Living WORD, his essential 'Wisdom, his Power, and his eternal Image; it is he who 'being Soveraignly perfect, has begotten a Son Soveraignly perfect as himself. He is the Father of the only Son. 'There is only one Lord, the only Son of the only Father, God begotten of God, the Character and Image of 'the Divinity, the efficacious WORD by which all Creatures were formed, the true Son of the true Father, 'the invisible Son of the invisible Father, the Incorruptible of the Incorruptible, the Immortal of the Immortal, the Eternal Son of him who is from all Eternity; 'and there is only one Holy Ghost, who proceeds from 'God, and was given to Men by the Son, he is the Image 'of the Son, and a perfect Image of him that is perfect. 'He is Life, and the principle of Life, to those that Live; 'He is the Holy Spring, Holiness it self, and the Author 'of Sanctification. By him God the Father is made manifest, who is above all things, and in all things, and God 'the Son, who is equally in all things. This is the perfect

Trinity

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

'Trinity, which is not divided, but is One in Glory, in 'Soveraignty and Eternity.

The following Words, which ſome Perſons do ſtill attribute to Gregory Thaumaturgus, belong to St. Gregory Nyſſen, who draws this Concluſion from the above-mentioned Profeſſion. 'There is therefore no created 'Perſon or dependent Being in the Trinity, it admits in-'to it nothing that is Foreign, nothing that has been 'out of it during a time, or which afterwards began to 'be there; the Father was never without the Son, nor 'the Son without the Holy Ghoſt, but the Trinity has 'ever been immovable and invariable.

There is likewiſe attributed to St. Gregory Thaumaturgus another Expoſition of Faith, much longer, and tranſlated by Turrianus, which ſome People might believe to be that which is cited by St. Baſil, in his Sixty Fourth Epiſtle, directed to one whoſe Name was Ælian. But it is manifeſt, that this is different from that mentioned by St. Baſil, and that it could not be compoſed by St. Gregory Thaumaturgus: For, in the firſt place, it is different from that St. Baſil ſpeaks of, which was addreſſed to Ælian, and made in form of a Diſpute, wherein he ſays, That the Father and Son were one in Hypoſtaſis, and only diſtinguiſhed by abſtraction of the Mind, the words which the Sabellians abuſed; whereas in this which is neither addreſſed to Ælian, nor compoſed after the manner of a Diſpute, the Error of Sabellius is clearly rejected; and it is formally ſaid, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt are Three Perſons, and Three Hypoſtaſes. In the ſecond place, it cannot be of the time of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus; for the Author expreſly refutes the Arians, ſaying, That thoſe who affirm, that the Son is created of nothing, are Enemies to the Faith of the Church, and that thoſe who reject the Word Conſubſtantial, are out of the Church. Beſides, when he explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation, he ſpeaks after a manner which makes it credible, that he had the Neſtorians and Eutychians in view. Caniſius attributes this Profeſſion of faith to Apollinarius, but it too plainly refutes the Error of that Heretick to be ever his. However it be, it was compoſed after the time of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus. We ought to paſs the ſame Judgment upon the twelve Anathema's, which follow this Expoſition, and are likewiſe compoſed out of the Errors of the Neſtorians and Eutychians.

No body doubts of the Canonical Epiſtle of this Saint, which is cited in the ſixth Council, and is ſet down by Balſamon. It has all the Characters of Antiquity, which any one can deſire in ſuch Monuments. It was written after the Goths had ravag'd Aſia, under Galienus, and it is directed to a Biſhop, whoſe Name we know not, to inſtruct him how he was to preſcribe Penance to thoſe who had fallen into any ſcandalous Crimes, during the Inundations of the Barbarians. In the firſt Canon he ſays, that thoſe who having been taken Priſoners by the Barbarians, had eaten the Food which was given them, ought not upon that account to ſuffer Penance, as well becauſe the Barbarians did not ſacrifice any Victims to Idols, as alſo becauſe that which defiles the Man is not the Meat which enters into the Man, but that which goes out of the Man. That for the ſame reaſon thoſe Captive Women who had been forcibly carried away by the Barbarians, were not to be blamed; but nevertheleſs, that thoſe who had lived diſſolute Lives before their Captivity, were not eaſily to be admitted to Communion.

In the ſecond Canon, and the three following, which to ſpeak properly are only one Canon, he deteſts the Avarice and Injuſtice of thoſe Perſons, who took the advantage of the Captivity of theſe miſerable Creatures to plunder them of their Goods. He ſhews, that they are obliged to make Reſtitution, and that they cannot keep in their Poſſeſſion the Goods of other Men. In the ſixth, he endeavours to ſhew with what Horror the World ought to look upon the Cruelty of thoſe Perſons, who detained as Captives thoſe who had freed themſelves out of the hands of the Barbarians. In the ſeventh he ordains, that ſuch Offenders ſhould not be received ſo much as into the number of Hearers, (this was the firſt Degree of Penance) who joyning themſelves with the Barbarians, had fallen upon the Chriſtians, either by Murdering them, or ſhewing the Infidels where they were fled for ſhelter. In the eighth, he decrees the ſame Puniſhment againſt thoſe who ſhould be convicted to have broken open any ones Houſe during the Ravage of the Barbarians; but then he moderates this Rigour in favour of thoſe who ſhould make a voluntary Confeſſion, and theſe he places in the third degree of Penitents. 'Tis alſo under this Claſs, that in the ninth Canon he ranges thoſe who kept back the things which belonged to others, which they found in the midſt of the Field, or in their Houſes, as ſoon as they were convicted of it: But if they confeſſed the Fact, he believed them not to be unworthy to communicate at Prayers, which was the laſt degree of Penance. In the tenth, he exhorts thoſe that were willing to reſtore their Neighbours Goods, to do it without making any ſordid Gain, by exacting any thing for what they had diſcovered, kept or found, or for any other reaſon whatever it might be. The laſt Canon is an Explication of the different degrees of Penance. Weeping and Groaning, ſays he, conſiſt in ſtanding without the Church Porch, where the Sinner ought to beg earneſtly of thoſe who go in to pray to God for him, and this is the firſt degree. The ſecond degree is that of Hearers, and is performed in the Church-Porch, where the Sinner is to tarry with the Catechumens, and go out with them, after having heard the Holy Scripture, as being unworthy of Prayer. In the Subſtration, which is the third degree, the Party offending is admitted into the Body of the Church, but muſt go out with the Catechumens. Laſtly, the fourth degree is that of ſtanding up when the Perſon may tarry in the Church with the Faithful, without being obliged to go out of it with the Catechumens; and this is followed with the participation of the Sacraments. Morinus queſtions whether this laſt Canon belongs to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and conjectures, that it has been added by one of the Modern Greeks, to explain the Letter of this Saint. This Conjecture ſeems to be well grounded.

St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.

There goes likewiſe, under the name of this Father, a Diſcourſe about the Soul, addreſſed to one Tatian, which contains the Deciſion of ſeveral Queſtions concerning the Nature of the Soul, and follows the Principles of the Peripatetics, but in truth it has not the leaſt reſemblance of St. Gregory's Style; and beſides, it ſeems to be the product of the following Age, when Ariſtotle's Philoſophy began to be in ſome Reputation. To be ſhort, it is rather the work of a Philoſopher, than of a Biſhop.

I am no leſs ſatisfied, that the Sermons which carry the name of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, do really belong to another Author; for beſides, that none of the Ancients have ever mentioned them, they are altogether of a different Style, which is ſo far from approaching the Elegance and Politeneſs ſo familiar to St. Gregory, that it is mean and childiſh. Secondly, The Author of theſe Sermons ſpeaks of the Myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, in ſuch terms as ſhew, that he lived after the riſe of the Hereſies of the Arians and Neſtorians (a). He often affects to make uſe of the word Θεοτόκος when he ſpeaks of the Virgin Mary, and beſtows exceſſive Praiſes upon her, which were not cuſtomary till after the Council of Epheſus. Laſtly, it is evident, that theſe Homilies were compoſed when the Church enjoy'd Peace, and celebrated its Feſtivals with great Solemnity.

The three Sermons upon the Annunciation reſemble the Style of Proclus of Conſtantinople, as it has been obſerved by him, who has made ſome Notes upon the Homilies of that Author. The laſt of the three has alſo been attributed to St. Chryſoſtome, but the difference of the Style ſhews that it is not his.

The fourth Sermon is upon the Baptiſm of JESUS CHRIST, which Feſtival was anciently celebrated on the day of Epiphany; it is more eloquent than the three preceding ones, and appears to be compoſed by another Author, who nevertheleſs was not St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, for the very ſame reaſon we have offered before; there we find the term Θεοτόκος, and that of Conſubſtantial.

(a) THE Arians and Neſtorians.] For Example, in the firſt of theſe Homilies, it is ſaid, that JESUS CHRIST is born of the Virgin, that he is God and Man without Confuſion, and without Change, perfect in the Divinity, and the Humanity, like his Father in all, and conſubſtantial to us. In the ſecond, there are extraordinary Praiſes of the Virgin, whom he calls Θεοτόκος, which was not begun to be commonly practiſed till after the Synod of Epheſus. The Trinity is there called Conſubſtantial.

St. DIONYSIUS of Alexandria.

St. Dionyſius of Alexandria.

Dionyſius (a), who had formerly been a Diſciple of Origen, and Catechiſt of the Church of Alexandria, ſucceeded Heraclas in the Epiſcopal See of that Church, in the Third Year (b) of the Empire of Philippus, and 247 of the Nativity of our Saviour. He was one of the moſt Learned and moſt Illuſtrious Biſhops of his Age; and being conſulted from all parts upon matters of Religion, wrote a vaſt number of Letters to the moſt famous Biſhops of the Church, beſides ſeveral Works againſt the Hereticks, and ſome Treatiſes of Divinity and Diſcipline. St. Jerome has compoſed a Catalogue of all his Works, and Euſebius has enriched his Hiſtory with ſeveral Paſſages that he has borrowed out of him. The Fragments that are yet extant in Euſebius and St. Athanaſius, make us greatly regret the Loſs of his Writings, as Works that would have been of infinite Advantage and Uſe in the Explication of the Doctrine of the Church. The Catalogue of them, as it is ſet down by St. Jerome, being without any order, we ſhall therefore endeavour to make another of all the Volumes of this Dionyſius, whereof we have any knowledge, according to the order of time in which they were written, not forgetting at the ſame time to take notice of thoſe Fragments that are to be found in Euſebius and in St. Athanaſius.

The firſt Letter which he wrote, is directed to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch, immediately after the Perſecution of the Emperor Decius; that is to ſay, at the end of the year 250. Euſebius has preſerved two Fragments of it in the Sixth Book, Chap. 41. and 44. of his Hiſtory. In the firſt, he gives an Account of the horrid Cruelty of the Perſecutors that fell ſo ſeverely upon the poor Chriſtians of Alexandria, as well towards the end of the Empire of Philippus, as alſo after Decius had publiſhed his Edict againſt them; and he gives us a Narrative of the Martyrdom of ſeveral Perſons. In the Second, he relates the Hiſtory of an Old Man, whoſe Name was Serapion, who having fallen away in the time of Perſecution, was enjoyn'd a courſe of Penance, till being ready to die, he ſent a Young Boy to fetch him the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, that he might die in the Communion of the Church.

He deſcribes the Perſecution of Decius in his Letter againſt Germanus, though it was not writ till long after; and he particularly relates what happen'd to himſelf; how, having been forcibly hurried away out of Alexandria by ſome Soldiers againſt his Will, he was conducted to a Town called Tapoſiris, where being reſcued by a Company of Country Fellows that fell upon his Guards, he was obliged to abſcond for a while, being only accompanied by ſome Prieſts.

This is that Perſecution (c), which is mentioned in the Fragment of a Letter to Domitius, and Didymus, related by Euſebius towards the end of the Eleventh Chapter of his Hiſtory, Lib. 6. It was alſo about the end of this Perſecution, when he was as yet in Exile, that he wrote a Letter concerning Penance to the Brethren in Ægypt, wherein he delivered his Own Opinion, as to the manner with which they ought to treat thoſe that had fallen away; and he there diſtinguiſhes between the different degrees of Offences. He likewiſe wrote at the ſame time a Book upon the ſame occaſion to Conon Biſhop of Hermopolis, a Letter to his Clergy at Alexandria, one to the Chriſtians of Laodicea, where Thelymidres was Biſhop, and one to the Armenians, over whom Meruzanes was Paſtor, which treated of Penance; and a ſmall Treatiſe of Martyrdom to Origen.

After Peace was reſtored to the Church in the Year 251. Dionyſius having received a Letter from Cornelius Biſhop of Rome againſt Novatian, who had alſo written to him himſelf, he anſwered both one and the other. His Letter to Novatian, whom he calls Novatus, is taken notice of by Euſebius in his 7th Book, Chap. 45. He adviſes him, if he had a mind to perſuade the World that he was Ordained againſt his Will, as he publickly affirmed, to return back to his Duty, and uſe all his Endeavours to re-eſtabliſh Peace and Concord. His Letter to Cornelius is plainly what they called in the Language of thoſe times, a Letter of Communion. He informs him, that he was ſummoned to a Synod of Antioch by Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus, by Firmilian of Cappadocia, and Theoctiſtus of Paleſtine, in which they reſolved to confirm the Diſcipline of Novatus; that word was ſent him, that Fabius Biſhop of Antioch was dead, and Demetrian elected in his room; that Alexander Biſhop of Jeruſalem died in Priſon. To theſe Letters he added one to the Chriſtians at Rome, concerning Peace and Penance; and another to the Confeſſors to diſſuade them from the Faction of Novatian. Afterwards he wrote another to the Romans, which he ſent by Hippolytus, wherein he diſcourſes of the Duty and Function of Deacons; and two more to the Confeſſors of Rome, after they had entred into the Unity of the Church. Theſe are the Letters which he wrote under the Pontificate of Cornelius, and are mentioned by Euſebius in the laſt Chapter of his Sixth Book.

St. Dionyſius of Alexandria.

Under the Pontificate of Pope Stephen, that ſucceeded Cornelius, in the beginning of the Year 255. Dionyſius wrote a Letter to him, in which he acquaints him, That all the Eaſtern Churches were at laſt agreed to condemn the rigorous Novelty of Novatus, and ſpeaks to him of the Queſtion concerning the Validity of the Baptiſm of Hereticks, that was in Agitation between him and St. Cyprian. After the Death of Stephen, which happened in the Year 257. he wrote another upon the ſame Subject to Sixtus his Succeſſor, and begs of him to conſider the Conſequence of that buſineſs, and not to purſue it with the heat of his Predeceſſor, who had written Letters to Helenus, to Firmilian, and to all the Biſhops of Cappadocia and Cilicia, wherein he ſent them word, that he would not Communicate any more with them, becauſe they rebaptized Hereticks; which, he ſays, was determined in the Councils of the Biſhops. In the ſame Letter, he ſpeaks againſt the Error of the Sabellians, that aroſe in Ptolemais a City of Pentapolis; againſt which, as he tells him there, he had written a long Letter, or rather a Diſcourſe which he ſent him. He wrote likewiſe to Dionyſius and Philemon, Presbyters of the Church of Rome, about the Baptiſm of Hereticks. In his Epiſtle to Philemon, he tells him, That his Predeceſſor Heraclas cauſed the Hereticks to abjure their Errors without Baptizing them a-new; that this was the Cuſtom of his Church; but nevertheleſs that he had been informed, that the Africans had for a long time obſerved the contrary, and that it was Eſtabliſhed in the Eaſt in a very numerous Aſſembly of Biſhops held at Iconium and Synnada, and in many other places; that matters ſtanding thus, his Advice was, that their Cuſtoms and Decrees ought not to be reverſed, ſince it is written, That we muſt not remove the Land-mark which our Fathers have given us. This is the true Opinion of Dionyſius concerning this matter, and St. Jerome wrongfully accuſes him to have been of St. Cyprian's Party, ſince he tells us in expreſs Terms, That we ought to follow the Judgment of the Church in this Point. He ſays the ſame thing in his Letter to Dionyſius, who was afterwards Biſhop of Rome, and delivers his Sentiments there very boldly againſt Novatian. Laſtly, He wrote a Letter, which is his Fifth, to Sixtus, concerning the Baptiſm of Hereticks; in which he maintains, That if a Man has been Baptized amongſt Hereticks, with Ceremonies wholly different from thoſe of the Church, and comes at laſt to diſcover it, after he has continued in the Church a long time, participating of the Prayers, and Communicating as others, without having been Baptized, he needs not be Baptized anew, ſince he has received the Body of Jeſus Chriſt ſeveral times, and anſwered Amen with the reſt of the Faithful. Euſebius ſeems to mention a fifth Letter, written upon the ſame occaſion to the ſame Pope; where, as he tells us, he has examined this Queſtion more copiouſly, though perhaps it is not different from this laſt.

After Sixtus's Death, Dionyſius of Alexandria wrote a Letter concerning Lucian, to Dionyſius that ſucceeded Pope Sixtus, towards the end of the year 258. 'Twas in this, or rather in the following year, that he wrote his Letter againſt Germanus; in which, after he has deſcribed the Perſecution he ſuffered in the time of Decius, he relates what happened to him under that of Valerian; how the Prefect Æmilianus prohibited him to hold any more

(a) Dionyſius.] He is Sirnamed the Great, by the Ancients. Euſeb. St. Baſil. Ep. ad Amphil. Maximus and Metaphraſtes give him this Name. He had formerly been a Rhetorician, if we may believe Maximus, upon the fifth Chapter of the Hierarchia Cæleſtis. He was unqueſtionably deſcended of a good Family. See Euſebius Lib. 7. Ch. 11. and the Notes of Valeſius.

(b) The third Year.] 'Tis ſo ſet down in Euſebius's Hiſtory, Lib. 6. Chap. 35. and in his Chronicon 'tis the Fifth. But the Account of his Hiſtory is the trueſt; for he ſuppoſes in his Chronicon, that Philip reigned Seven years, whereas he was Emperor but Five.

(c) This is that Perſecution.] Euſebius refers it to the Perſecution under Valerian; but the Circumſtances agree with what happened to him under the Perſecution of Decius, and not what he ſuffered under the Perſecution of Valerian, in which he was not carried away by Violence. One needs only conſulting the two Fragments of his Letter to Germanus (where he gives an Account of what befel him in theſe two Perſecutions) to be perſuaded in the matter.

Aſſemblies

St. Dionysius of Alexandria.

Assemblies of Christians; how having refused to obey his Orders, he was sent along with his Presbyters, to a Village near Cephro in Lybia; how these Proceedings did not hinder the Christians from holding their ordinary Assemblies. Lastly, how he preached the Gospel, and converted great numbers of Pagans to Christianity, whilst he tarried at Cephro.

While he continued in this Exile, he wrote some Paschal Letters; that is to say, Letters in form of Homilies upon the Festival of Easter; in which, according to the ancient Custom, he ascertains the time of that Feast. He sent one of them to Flavius, another to Domitius and Didymus, which I imagine to be different from the first that is addressed to the same Persons; wherein he proves, That the Feast of Easter ought not to be celebrated till after the vernal Equinox. He composed a Canon or Table of eight years. He likewise wrote another to the Church of Alexandria, and to many others. Peace was no sooner restored to the Church, but he returned back to Alexandria; though he was immediately obliged to depart from thence, by reason of a Sedition that arose in that City (d).

It was during this Retreat, that he wrote a Letter to Hierax, a passage out of which Eusebius has borrowed, that gives an Account of a Riot that happened at that time. He likewise wrote another Letter to his Church, which he sent to them on Easter-day.

A Pestilence (e) that succeeded this War, obliged St. Dionysius to comfort and encourage his Congregation with another Letter, in which he describes that admirable Charity wherewith the Christians relieved and buried those who were seized with the Plague in a lively manner.

In short, during the whole time of his Retirement, he never ceased to write to his Brethren, and did them more good by his Letters, than he could have done by his Presence. Eusebius mentions another Paschal Letter of his concerning the Sabbath, and one concerning spiritual Exercises, and a third to Hermammon, written in the seventh year of Galienus, which fell out in the year 264. some Fragments of which he has preserved in Lib. 7. c. 1, 10, and 23. And yet St. Dionysius was not only content to exhort, or instruct the Faithful by his Letters; but he applied himself vigorously to confute and extinguish the Errors that sprung up in his time.

An Ægyptian Bishop named Nepos, understanding the Promises of the Gospel in a gross Sense, and maintaining the Reign of Jesus Christ upon Earth for a thousand years, with an inflexible Obstinacy composed a Book which he Entituled, A Confutation of the Allegorists, where he endeavoured to prove his Opinion out of the Apocalypse. He brought over abundance of People to this Opinion in that part of Ægypt that was called Arsinoe, which unhappily proved an Occasion of Schism and Division in those Churches. Dionysius happening to be there, judged it expedient to examine this Doctrine publickly: And because they generally set up Nepos's Book as an unanswerable Treatise, he confuted it Viva voce, and afterwards wrote two Books against it, Entituled, Of the Divine Promises. In the first, he delivers his own Opinion upon this Question. In the second, he answers all the Reasons urged by Nepos, and his Testimonies drawn out of the Revelations. Saying upon this last head, that some Persons have rejected the Apocalypse, as being the Book of the Heretick Cerinthus, who admitted of no other Beatitude, but that which consisted in carnal Pleasures; that as for himself, he durst not entirely reject it, since it was esteemed by a great many Christians, but that he was persuaded it had a hidden meaning, which could not be comprehended by any body; that he acknowledged that Book to be written by an Author inspired by the Holy Ghost, though he did not believe it to have been written by St. John the Evangelist, but by another of the same Name; as he endeavours to prove by the difference of the Style and Thoughts. Eusebius has preserved considerable Fragments of this Book, from whence we have drawn the above-mentioned Passages. See the third Book of his History, Ch. 28. and l. 7. Ch. 24, and 25.

Another Error, that Dionysius of Alexandria opposed and stifled (if I may use the Expression) in its Cradle, was much more considerable. There were several Bishops in Pentapolis that embraced the Error of Sabellius, who confounded the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity. This Opinion was so deeply rooted and established in those Quarters, that the Son of God was seldom mentioned in their Churches. Dionysius, to whom this Province belonged, by virtue of the Preheminence of the Patriarchal See of Alexandria, to preside and watch over all the Churches of Ægypt, sent his Legates to that place to undeceive the People that were in an Error; but being not able to go thither himself in Person, he was constrained to write to them to confute this Heresie. His first Letter was addressed to Ammon Bishop of Berenice, the second to Theleſporus and Euphranor, and the last to Ammon and Euporus. The end which he proposed to himself in writing these Letters, was to persuade these People, who had not been very well instructed, that the Father was not the Son, and that He was not the Father, but the Son that was Incarnate, and died for us. But that happened to Dionysius in this affair, that usually happens to most Men, that while he opposed and attack'd one Error, he spoke very favourably of the contrary. Thus going about to prove, that the Son was a distinct Person from the Father, he chanced to say, That he was the Work of the Father; That he was with respect to the Father, what a Vine is to the Vine-dresser, a Ship to the Builder. And lastly, That the Son did not exist before he was made. These Expressions, that seemed to establish an opposite Error to that of Sabellius, which afterwards was taken up by Arius, gave occasion to some well-affected Catholick Persons, to carry a Complaint to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, against the Bishop of Alexandria. But he being advertised of the Matter, wrote four Books which he presented to the Pope; wherein he refutes not only the Error of the Sabellians, but also that which was attributed to himself; and having desired the Pope to send him all the Objections that were urged against him, he wrote a Treatise which he called, a Refutation and an Apology; because he refutes the Errors of other Men, and likewise justifies himself. St. Athanasius, from whom I have borrowed this Account, relates divers other Passages, that were extracted out of this Work, in a Book which he wrote about the Opinion of Dionysius of Alexandria; in which, he invincibly proves against the Arians, (who had the Confidence to make use of his Authority) That his Notions of the Trinity were very conformable to those of the Church, though he did not much approve of the term Consubstantial.

St. Dionysius of Alexandria.

To conclude, Dionysius of Alexandria a little before his Death, defended the Divinity of Jesus Christ against Paulus Samosatenus Bishop of Antioch: For, being invited to the Synod that was held at Antioch against that Heretick in the year 264, and not being able to go thither, by reason of his old Age and Infirmity, he wrote several Letters to the Church at Antioch, wherein he explains his own Opinion, and refutes the Error of Paulus Samosatenus, whom he looked upon as so great a Criminal for advancing this Error, that he would not even condescend to salute him in his Letter, considering him already as an Heretick, and one that was separated from the Church; as we find it observed by the Fathers of the Council of Antioch, and by Eusebius after them, in his seventh Book, Chap. 27. and 29.

Baronius thinks that this Letter of Dionysius, is the same with that which Turrianus published, which is inserted in the first Volume of the last Edition of the Councils, P. 850. But he is mistaken; for that Letter, which the Fathers of the Council of Antioch speak of, was written to the Church of Antioch; whereas we find this is addressed to Paulus Samosatenus, as appears by these first Words, We answer what you demand of us, that we may oblige you to speak your Thoughts plainly and openly. From whence it is manifest, That this Letter, if it is not suppositious, was written soon after the first Synod of Antioch, when Paulus Samosatenus promised to renounce his Opinion; and in all appearance seem'd to have chang'd it effectually. But it is probable enough, that this Letter, which is cited by none of the Ancients, and which was unknown to the World before Turrianus's time, was never written by Dionysius of Alexandria. For in the first place, The Fathers of the second Council of Antioch tell us plainly, That Dionysius of Alexandria would by no means salute Paulus Samosatenus: What reason is there therefore to imagine, that he wrote to him twice, as this Letter supposes? Secondly, The Style of this Letter is extremely different from that of the other Letters writ by Dionysius. In the third place, The Author of this Letter approves of the Word Consubstantial, and expressly tells us, That the Fathers called the Son of God by that Name. Now it is certain, that both Dionysius of Alexandria, and the Synod of Antioch, disallowed that term; and in the time of St. Dionyſius, a Man could not ſay, that the Fathers commonly made uſe of it. And if St. Dionyſius of Alexandria had ever uſed it, is it to be believed that St. Athanaſius would have forgotten or omitted ſo memorable a Paſſage, when he was writing in his Defence.

(d) Arose in that City.] 'Tis undoubtedly that Commotion, that was occasioned by Æmilianus, Governor of Alexandria, who caused that City, and likewise all Ægypt, to revolt from the Emperor Galienus; as Pollio reports it. This Æmilianus was a different Person from him that took up Arms in Mœsia, and marched against Gallus and Volusianus some years before. These two Æmelians are distinguished in the Epitome of Aurelius Victor.

(e) A Pestilence.] This Pestilence began in the time of Gallus and Volusianus, but it broke afresh under Gallus; as it is observed by Aurelius Victor and Pollio. Dionysius of Alexandria speaks of the latter Pestilence, and St. Cyprian of the former. Thus those Persons that imagined they spoke of the same Infection, are mistaken.

St. Dionyſius of Alexandria.

It is not to be imagined, that we have given a Catalogue of all the Works of Dionyſius of Alexandria; for he compoſed ſo great a number, that notwithſtanding all the Diligence that Euſebius uſed in drawing a perfect Catalogue, he is forced to ſay at laſt, and ſeveral other Letters. Now the Letters of this Father were Treatiſes, and his Treatiſes were written in the way of Letters; for after this manner he wrote ſome Books concerning Nature, to a young Gentleman named Timotheus; a Book of Temptations to Euphranor, and ſeveral Letters to Baſilides; in one of which, he tells him that he had compoſed a Commentary upon the beginning of Eccleſiaſtes. We have only now one of his Letters to Baſilides, printed in the firſt Tome of the Councils, where he treats of ſome matters relating to Diſcipline. 'Tis divided into four Canons; in the firſt of which, he diſcourſes about the Faſt, which the ancient Chriſtians obſerved before Eaſter; and tells us, That ſome Chriſtians faſted ſix days before Eaſter; others two, others three, after an extraordinary manner; That we ought not to break our Faſt before Midnight; and that thoſe that were able to hold on till Eaſter-morning, were more generous; That there were ſome Perſons, who, though they did not faſt at all, nay, had ſpent the four firſt days of the laſt Week in ſumptuous and delicate Entertainments, yet imagined they did wonderful things in faſting only two days: But that they were not to be compared with thoſe that faſted ſeveral. In the ſecond Canon he ſays, That Women ought not to enter into the Church, or receive the Body and Blood of Jeſus Chriſt while they have their Courſes, but to offer their Prayers to God at home; ſince none by right ought to enter the Sanctum Sanctorum, that is not pure in Body and Spirit. In the third, he particularly counſels thoſe that are ſuperannuated, to abſtain from the uſe of Marriage, that they may the better attend their Devotions. In the fourth, he leaves thoſe Perſons that have had an Illuſion in the Night-time, at liberty to receive or forbear the Euchariſt, following the Dictates and Motions of their own Conſciences.

St. Dionyſius of Alexandria.

Anaſtaſius of Nice, in his 23d Queſtion upon Geneſis, cites a paſſage drawn out of a Book of Dionyſius of Alexandria againſt Origen; but there is no ground to believe that it was written by our Dionyſius, who was ſo far from being his Adverſary, that he was both his Diſciple and Defender. He died in the year 264, after he had held the See of Alexandria ſeventeen years, and had one Maximus for his Succeſſor. The Style of this Author is pompous and lofty; he is excellent in his Deſcriptions and Exhortations; in his Polemical Diſcourſes he falls upon his Adverſaries with all the Vigor imaginable; he perfectly well underſtood the Opinion, the Diſcipline and Precepts of the Church; he had a ſound piercing Judgment; he was very moderate, very diſcreet, and ready to take Advice. In ſhort, the Loſs of his Works is one of the moſt conſiderable Loſſes we could have ſuſtained in this kind.

THEOGNOSTUS.

Theognoſtus.

THeognoſtus of Alexandria, is an Author, (unknown to Euſebius and St. Jerome) whom St. Athanaſius cites with Commendation, and whoſe Books were extant in Photius's time, who read them over. We don't preciſely know the time when he liv'd, though we cannot doubt but he was ſome time after Origen, and long before the Council of Nice. Photius informs us, That he compoſed ſeven Books, Entituled, Hypotypoſes; that is to ſay, Inſtructions; and he gives us this Account of that Work: In the firſt Book he treats of the Father, and endeavours to ſhew, 'That he is the Creator 'of all things, againſt the Opinion of thoſe that ſuppoſe Matter to be Eternal. In the ſecond, he advances ſome Arguments, whereby he pretends it neceſſarily follows, that the Father had a Son; but ſpeaking of this Son, he ſays, 'That he is a Creature above all Creatures that 'have Reaſon: He likewiſe attributes to the Son of God 'ſeveral other Qualities of the like nature, as Origen has 'done: Whether he was of the ſame Opinion, or whether he ſpeaks after that manner, rather by way of diſputation, than a Deſign to propoſe his own as true Doctrine; or in ſhort, whether he was ſomewhat miſtaken 'in the Truth, and that to accommodate himſelf to the weakneſs of his Auditors, who having no knowledge of the 'true Religion, were not capable of comprehending a 'perfect Inſtruction, he ſuppoſed it more expedient to give 'them an imperfect Knowledge of the Son of God, than 'not to ſpeak of him at all. But though a Man may follow this Method in a Diſpute, or in a Diſcourſe, when 'he is conſtrained to ſay the ſame things often, that are 'not altogether conformable to his own Opinion of the 'matter; yet 'tis a Weakneſs to make uſe of this Pretence, to excuſe thoſe Errors that are publiſhed in any 'Book, where we are obliged to ſpeak the Truth to all 'the World. In the third Book, ſpeaking of the Holy Ghoſt, 'he brings ſome Arguments to prove, that there is an 'Holy Ghoſt; but in the reſt he falls into the ſame Extravagancies with thoſe of Origen in his Book of Principles. 'In the fourth, he talks erroneouſly about Angels and Demons, and aſſigns ſmall Bodies to them. In the fifth 'and ſixth, he treats of the Incarnation, and uſes all his 'Endeavours to demonſtrate after this manner, That it 'was poſſible for God to make himſelf Man. This Book 'likewiſe is full of ſeveral groundleſs Fancies: As for 'Example, when he has a mind to prove that the Son of 'God is circumſcribed in place by our Imagination; tho' 'in Truth he cannot be known there. In the ſeventh, 'which he wrote concerning the Creation of God, he 'diſcourſeth of Matters of Religion after a manner conformable to the Doctrine of the Church, and eſpecially 'of the Son of God, of whom he treats in the laſt part. 'His Style is elevated, and very Ἀσιγητῶν ἁβδὸς: His 'Diſcourſes have the Beauty of Old Athens, but without 'Affectation, ſo that in his Compoſitions he does not go 'very far from the ordinary manner of Converſation; 'and yet he avoids ſaying mean things.

Theognoſtus.

Thus I have ſhewn you what Photius has informed us of this Author. St. Athanaſius calls him an admirable Man, ſtudious and eloquent; and is ſo far from accuſing him for having any unorthodox Sentiments about the Divinity of the WORD, that he cites him as a Witneſs of Conſubſtantiality. 'Learn (ſays he) O Arians, ye Rebels to 'Jeſus Chriſt, that the Eloquence of Theognoſtus has made 'uſe of the Word Subſtance; for behold after what manner he diſcourſeth in his ſecond Book of Inſtructions: 'The Subſtance of the Son is not a ſtrange Subſtance, 'he was not produced of Nothing, but was begotten of 'the Subſtance of the Father, as the Ray is of the Light, 'or a Vapour of Water; for the Vapour is not Water, nor is the Ray Light; but neither one nor the other is a Stranger to that which produces it: Thus the 'Son is as it were the gentle running of the Subſtance 'of the Father; yet ſo as that the Father ſuffers no Diviſion: For as the Sun is not diminiſhed though it produces Rayes continually; ſo likewiſe the Father is not 'diminiſhed in begetting the Son, who is his Image. This Paſſage, and the Authority of St. Athanaſius, ought to convince us, that Photius hath wrongfully accuſed Theognoſtus to have erred concerning the Divinity of the Son, upon the ſcore of a few Expreſſions that did not agree with thoſe of his own Age; without taking notice, that though the Ancients have ſpoken differently as to this Point, yet the Foundation of the Doctrine was always the ſame; and that it is an horrid Injuſtice to require them to ſpeak as nicely, and with as much Precaution, as thoſe who lived after the Birth and Condemnation of Hereſies. But 'tis an ordinary Fault with Photius, who lived in an Age when theſe Myſteries were illuſtrated, and in which People talked with a great deal of Exactneſs, to condemn the Ancients almoſt all along with too much Severity.

Theognoſtus.

The ſame St. Athanaſius in another Work concerning the Explication of theſe Words in the Goſpel; He that blaſphemes againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhall receive Forgiveneſs of his Sin, neither in this World, nor in that to come; tells us, that Origen and Theognoſtus have written, that the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt was falling away after Baptiſm, and after he has delivered the paſſage out of Origen: He likewiſe adds that out of Theognoſtus, who ſays, 'That 'he who has paſſed only the firſt or ſecond Bounds is 'leſs culpable; but he that paſſes the third, has no hopes 'of Pardon. That the firſt and ſecond Bound is the Knowledge of the Father, and that the third is Baptiſm, which makes us Partakers of the Holy Ghoſt; which is confirmed by theſe Words of the Goſpel, I have ſtill many things to tell you, &c. after which, continues he, 'Our 'Saviour levels (if I may ſo ſay) his Diſcourſe in Favour of thoſe who cannot comprehend the moſt perfect things; whereas the Holy Ghoſt dwells in thoſe 'who are perfect. But we muſt not therefore conclude, 'That the Doctrine of the Holy Ghoſt ſurpaſſeth that of 'Jeſus Chriſt, but that our Saviour abaſeth himſelf in favour Theognostus.

'vour of those that are not altogether perfect; whereas the 'Holy Ghost is the Seal of Perfection, which we receive 'in Baptism: Thus it is not that the Holy Ghost is more 'excellent than the Son, because the Sin which is com-'mitted against him, is without hopes of Remission; but 'it is, that these imperfect Men, that is to say, those that 'are not baptized, may obtain Forgiveness of their Sin; 'whereas those that have once tasted the Celestial Gifts, 'and once are touched, have no more excuse, nor means 'to avoid Punishment. St. Athanasius afterwards confutes this Explication, which appears to be very agreeable to the Opinion of Novatian, and gives another Interpretation, which is far more natural.

ATHENOGENES.

Athenogenes.

TO Theognostus we may joyn the Martyr Athenogenes, who composed a Hymn, before he was cast into the Fire, wherein he speaks of the Trinity; as St. Basil assures us in the 29th Chapter of his Book of the Holy Ghost.

DIONYSIUS Bishop of Rome.

Dionysius Bishop of Rome.

Dionysius Bishop of Rome, who presided in that See, from the year 258. to the year 270. writ a Letter against the Sabellians, a Fragment whereof remains still preserved by St. Athanasius in his Book concerning the Decision of the Council of Nice; in which, discoursing against the Sabellians, he falls upon the contrary Doctrine, that was afterwards maintained by the Arians. He proves that the WORD was not Created, but Begotten of the Father from all Eternity, and distinctly explains the Mystery of the Trinity. This Fragment is plainly taken out of a Letter written by Dionysius, in the Name of the Roman Synod, at the time when Dionysius of Alexandria was accused of falling into the opposite Error to that of the Sabellians.

MALCHION.

Malchion.

Malchion, a very eloquent Man, was (after he had taught the prophane Sciences with a great deal of Reputation in the City of Antioch) ordained Presbyter of that Church, for the Purity of his Faith and his Doctrine. He had a famous Dispute against Paulus Samosatenus in the second Council of Antioch, held in the year 270. in which, after he had clearly discovered the Errors which that Heretick endeavoured to conceal, he prevailed with the Council to condemn him. This Conference was taken in Writing by some Notaries, and was extant not only in the time of Eusebius and St. Jerome, who mention it, but also in the time of Leontius; that is to say, towards the end of the sixth Century: He speaks of it in his first Book against the Nestorians, and recites some Fragments of it in the third Book. However it is not certain that they are genuine, any more than the Fragments of another Letter of the Council of Antioch, mentioned by Eusebius. St. Jerome tells us, that he was likewise Author of a Letter written in the Name of that Council, against Paulus Samosatenus, and spoken of by Eusebius in the seventh Book of his History, Chap. 30.

Malchion.

ARCHELAUS.

Archelaus.

Archelaus Bishop of Mesopotamia, published a Dispute in the Syriack Language, which he had with a Heretick of the Manichean Party, that came out of Persia; and St. Jerome assures us, that in his time it was Translated into Greek. This Author flourished in the time of the Emperor Probus. There is a Fragment of this Writing in the Sixth Catechetick Lecture of St. Cyril of Jerusalem. [This Dispute it self, Translated into Latin by an Ancient Hand, was published by Valesius at the end of the Edition of Socrates and Sozomen at Paris, 1668. It is imperfect. Bigotius found it in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and communicated it to Valesius.]

Archelaus.

ANATOLIUS.

Anatolius.

ABout the same time, under the same Emperor, and under Carus his Successor, Anatolius also flourished, born at Alexandria, and Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria; a Man of profound Learning, very well skill'd in Arithmetick, Geometry, Physick, Astronomy, Grammar, and Rhetoric. Eusebius and St. Jerome assure us, that the greatness of his Spirit, the force of his Eloquence, and the depth of his Knowledge, abundantly appear in a Book of his concerning Easter; and that he shew'd the Dexterity of his Address and Politicks in the Siege of Alexandria, which by his prudent Counsels he saved from an entire Destruction that threatned it. Eusebius in the last Chapter of his Seventh Book, has preserved a Fragment of this Treatise about Easter, concerning the time wherein that Festival is to be Celebrated. This same Author likewise composed Ten Books of Arithmetick, and left behind him several Monuments of his Learning and Exactness; particularly in those things that concerned the Holy Scriptures.

Anatolius.

Ægidius Bucherius hath given us an entire Version of the Treatise about Easter, by Anatolius, which he copied out of an ancient Manuscript. He pretends that it was done by Ruffinus, and that it answers the Treatise of Anatolius. And indeed, the Fragment cited by Eusebius, is to be found entirely in Latin, and the passages cited by Bede are there word for word. But it would be no strange thing, for an Impostor to insert a Passage mentioned by Eusebius, that was so easie to find, and for this Work to be forged since Bede's time. Though I am of Opinion, that this Canon is ancient, though full of Errors, and perhaps a little corrupted by him that Translated it.

VICTORINUS.

Victorinus.

Victorinus Biſhop of Paſſaw (a), a City of the ancient Pannonia, ſituate upon the Drave in Styria, and not of Poictiers in France, paſſeth for a very indifferent Author. St. Jerome ſays of him, That he did not underſtand Latin ſo well as Greek (b); that the Style of his Works is ſimple and mean, though the Senſe is very high; that he had no Notion of Style, though he underſtood the Holy Scriptures very well; that he had no Learning, but that he had great Inclinations that way. His Works, whereof St. Jerome has compoſed a Catalogue, are, beſides a Treatiſe againſt all Hereſies, ſome Commentaries upon Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Iſaiah; and as far as the Viſion of the Four-footed Beaſts in Ezekiel; Eccleſiaſtes, the Canticles, and the Revelations (c).

We have in the Bibliotheca Patrum, a Commentary upon the Apocalypſe by Victorinus, with a Preface attributed to St. Jerome. It is ſaid in this Preface, that Victorinus was of the ſame Opinion with Papias and Nepos, touching the Reign of the Thouſand Years; and the very ſame thing is likewiſe obſerved by St. Jerome in his Catalogue: Nevertheleſs we find the contrary in this Commentary, and that Opinion ſeems to be plainly rejected there, as belonging to the Heretick Cerinthus. There is alſo mentioned in this Book an Epitome of Theodorus, who reckoned Twenty Four Books of the Old Teſtament. Now this Theodorus having lived under Juſtinian, we muſt of neceſſity conclude, that the Author of this Commentary lived ſince that time; however, 'tis far more probable that this Citation of Theodorus has been added ſince, becauſe the Author of this Commentary lived before Juſtinian's Age. For he believed with the Ancients that the Souls of Men ſhould not be happy till after the Day of Judgment; and that Nero was Antichriſt; which Opinions were no where maintained in Juſtinian's time. 'Tis likewiſe very probable, that they have altered ſomewhat of what he ſays in his Commentary, concerning the Reign of the Thouſand Years; beſides that, he formally rejects only the Error of Cerinthus, who believed no other Beatitude but that of a Temporal Reign. 'I don't believe, ſays he, that the 'Reign of the Thouſand Years will be at the end of the 'Judgment; or if there is one, we ought to believe that 'it ends after the Thouſand Years are compleated. Thus we cannot be certainly aſſur'd, that this Commentary does not belong to Victorinus; on the contrary, 'tis ſomewhat probable that it is his.

Victorinus.

(a) Biſhop of Paſſaw, a City of the Ancient Pannonia, and not of Poictiers in France.] Monſieur Launoy has written a Diſſertation on purpoſe, to prove that he was not Biſhop of Poictiers in France, but of a City in Pannonia called Petabion or Petavion, now called Paſſaw. He quotes in this Diſſertation Five ſeveral places of St. Jerome, where mention is made of this Victorinus, twice in his Catalogue, once againſt Vigilantius, once againſt Helvidius, and once upon the Thirty ſixth Chapter of Ezekiel; we find in the ancient Editions Petabionenſis, or Petavionenſis, or Pictabienſis or Pictabionenſis; and that he is alſo called by this Name in the Martyrologies of Uſuardus and Ado, and in ſome other Ancient Writers, as well as in the firſt Edition of the Councils by Merlinus; and in the Edition of the Commentary upon the Apocalypſe attributed to this Author. And he concludes from all theſe Authorities, and from ſeveral other reaſons that he produceth, that this Victorinus was not Biſhop of Poictiers, but of a certain City in Pannonia called Petabion or Petavion, and now Paſſaw. He likewiſe obſerves in another ſmall Diſſertation, that there were five Authors of this Name. The Firſt is the Defender of the Opinion of Praxeas, whereof Tertullian makes mention. The Second is our Author. The Third is a Rhetorician of Rome, of whom St. Auſtin ſpeaks in the eighth Book of his Confeſſions, Chap. 2. The Fourth is mentioned by Gennadius, who was of Marſeilles. And the laſt is an Orator, Sirnamed Lampadius, mentioned by Photius, Cod. 101. See this Diſſertation.

(b) St. Jerome ſaith of him, that he did not underſtand Latin ſo well as Greek.] Theſe paſſages of St. Jerome are in this Catalogue: Non æque Latine ut Græce noverat; inde opera ejus grandia ſenſibus, viliora ſunt compoſitione verborum. And in his Commentary upon Iſaiah, Lib. 1. Imperitus ſermone, non tamen ſcientia. Epiſt. ad Magnum: Victorino Martyri in ſuis libris licet deſit eruditio, non deeſt tamen eruditionis voluntas.

(c) And upon the Revelations.] He likewiſe wrote ſome other Works, and made a Commentary upon St. Matthew, as St. Jerome tells us, Præfat. in Matt. And in his Catalogue he ſays, That he compoſed ſeveral other Works.

PIERIUS.

Pierius.

Pierius, a Prieſt and Catechiſt of Alexandria, Inſtructed the People of that Church under the Empire of Carus and Dioclefian, at the ſame time when Theonas was Biſhop of that Place. He compoſed ſeveral ſorts of Treatiſes, that were extant in St. Jerome's time, with ſo much Eloquence, that he was called the young Origen. It is certain, he lived a very auſtere Life, and embraced a voluntary Poverty. He was excellently well skilled in Logick and Rhetoric. The Perſecution being ended, he came to Rome, where he continued a conſiderable time. He wrote a great Homily upon Hoſea, which he recited on Eaſter-Eve, wherein he takes notice, that in his time on Eaſter-Eve the People tarried in the Church till after Midnight. Photius tells us, That in this Homily he diſcourſed about the Cherubims that Moſes placed over the Ark. The ſame Author read another Work compoſed by Pierius, but he does not acquaint us with the Title of it, that contained a dozen Volumes; in which, according to the Teſtimony of Photius, he has ſome particular Opinions different from thoſe of the Church. His Doctrine upon the Trinity is Orthodox concerning the Perſons of the Father and the Son, though he uſes the Word Subſtance and Nature to ſignifie a Perſon. But his manner of ſpeaking about the Holy Ghoſt is dangerous, and ſcarce Orthodox; becauſe he ſays, That the Glory of the latter is leſs than the Glory of the Father and the Son. Photius moreover adds, that he wrote a Book upon St. Luke's Goſpel; in which he proves, That the Diſ-reſpect ſhewn to Images, falls back upon that which they repreſent. As for his Style, he tells us, It is clear, ſmooth and eaſie; that it is by no means elaborate, but flows equally and gently, as in Diſcourſes compoſed Extempore; and that it is full of Enthymems.

METHODIUS.

Methodius.

Methodius, Biſhop of Olympus or Patara (a) in Lycia, and afterwards of Tyre in Palæſtine, (who ſuffered Martyrdom at Chalcis, a City of Greece, towards the end of Dioclefian's Perſecution in the Year 302. or 303) compoſed in a clear elaborate Style, a large Work againſt Porphyrius the Philoſopher; an excellent Treatiſe about the Reſurrection againſt Origen; another about the Pythoniſſa againſt the ſame; a Book Entituled, The Banquet of Virgins; one about Free-Will; Commentaries upon Geneſis and the Canticles, and ſeveral other Pieces that were extant in St. Jerome's time. At preſent, beſides The Banquet of Virgins that was publiſhed entire not long ago by Poſſinus a Jeſuit, we have ſeveral conſiderable Fragments of this Author cited by St. Epiphanius and Photius, and others, found in Manuſcripts, and collected together by Father Combefis, who has Printed them, together with the Works of Amphilochius and Andreas Cretenſis. But afterwards Poſſinus found The Banquet of Virgins entire in a Manuſcript belonging to the Vatican Library, and Tranſlated it into Latin, and ſent it into

Methodius.

(a) OR Patara.] St. Jerome tells us, he was Biſhop of Olympus; Suidas adds, or of Patara. Though we are not therefore to think that there were two Methodius's. But it is probable that Patara, which was a City of Lycia, was likewiſe called Olympus; becauſe it was built upon a Mountain ſo called. Methodius likewiſe calls himſelf Eubulus, and that is the Name he uſes in his Banquet of Virgins. Euſebius does not ſpeak of this Author, becauſe he wrote againſt Origen. St. Jerome reports, that ſome Perſons ſaid, he ſuffered Martyrdom in the time of Decius and Valerian; which Account is followed by Suidas. But St. Jerome, and the Martyrologies after him, relate that he ſuffered Martyrdom at Chalcis towards the end of the laſt Perſecution.

Methodius.

into France, where it was Printed in the Year 1657. Revised and Corrected by another Manuscript. We cannot doubt, that this is the true genuine Work of Methodius; as well because it carries all the Marks of Antiquity in it, that a Book can possibly have; as also because it contains Word for Word all the Passages that Photius has cited out of this Work of Methodius; and another place cited by St. Gregory Nyssen. 'Tis written by way of Dialogue, in which he introduces a Woman named Gregorium, who tells her Friend Eubulus all the Conversation that passed in a Meeting of Ten Virgins, which she learnt of Theopatra. It was composed by Methodius, in imitation of a certain Book, very much resembling it, written by Plato, and Entituled, The Banquet of Socrates. After that Gregorium and Eubulus have exchanged the usual Compliments, and Gregorium has given a short Description of the Place, where these Ten Virgins were assembled; she feigns that Arete, in whose Garden they were met, requests each of them to make a Discourse upon Virginity; which she repeats one after the other.

The First is that of Marcella, who enlarges very much upon the Greatness and Excellence of Virginity. She makes it appear how choice a thing Virginity is; and that it is a difficult thing to preserve it amidst so many Thousand Temptations we meet with: That it is necessary to meditate incessantly upon the Holy Scripture, in order to keep it unspotted and undefiled: That Virginity was scarce so much as known under the ancient Law, when Men were permitted to Marry even their own Sisters, and to take several Wives: But that God by little and little has taught Men, in the first place to preserve their Chastity, and afterwards to embrace Virginity: That Jesus Christ came into the World to instruct them in this Virtue by the Influence of his own Example; that he is the Prince of Virgins, as well as the Prince of Pastors; that the Company of Virgins has the first place in his Kingdom; though they are the least in number: And this she justifies by a Passage out of the Revelations, Chap. the 14th.

Since this Conversation of Marcella might seem to throw some Dis-reputation upon the Sanctity of Marriage, Theophila proves in the second place, that Jesus Christ in making the great Excellencies of Virginity known to the World, did not design thereby to banish Marriage, and entirely abolish so Sacred an Institution. She says, That the Ecstasie of Adam denotes and signifies the Passion of Marriage; that God is the Author of Generation, and that he forms the Infants that come into the World. Here Marcella interrupts the Series of her Discourse, and enquires of her, How it comes to pass, if Infants are conceived and born by the Will of God, that he permits the Children of Adulterers to come into the World; that these Children thrive, and are often more perfect in their Body and Mind, and also become better Christians than others: That nevertheless, Experience daily acquaints us with the truth of this Assertion; so that we ought to understand this Saying in the Scripture, The Children of Adulterers shall be consumed by Fire, only of those that corrupt the Word of God. Theophila returns this Answer to the Objection, That God is not the Author of Adulterers, though he forms the Infants that are born of such Copulations; and this she illustrates by the Example of a Man that makes Earthen Vessels in a place enclosed with four Walls full of Holes, through which he is furnished with Clay, of which he makes his Work: Now if those that serve him are mistaken in taking one hole for another, and it so happen that his Work is not such as it ought to be, the fault would lie neither in the Workman himself, nor in the Clay, but in those that had made a wrong Application of the matter; That after the same manner, we ought not to cast the Sin of Adulterers either upon God that makes Men, or upon the Matter of which they are made, or upon the Power that is given to Men to beget Children, but upon the wicked Inclinations of those Persons that use these things in a dishonest manner; that every thing in the World is really Good in it self, but becomes Ill through the ill use and management of it. She continues afterwards to prove, by the admirable Beauty and Harmony that so visibly appears in the Contexture of our Bodies, that God is the Author of them. She observes that all Infants, even those that are begotten in Adultery, have their tutelar Angels to guard them immediately after their Conception; that the Soul is in its Nature immortal; that it is not generated by our Parents, but proceeds from God who inspireth it. In short, after she has thus answered this Objection, she concludes, That it is permitted for Men to Marry, though Virginity is a more perfect State than Marriage.

The Third Discourse goes under the Name of Thalia, who applies the words of Adam to his Wife in Genesis, to our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, and his Church; and following the Opinion of the Apostle, she adds, That the Word was the Wisdom of God; who existing before all Ages, communicated himself after a very particular manner to the first Man; but that Man having violated and transgressed the Commandments of God, became Mortal and Corruptible; and that it was necessary for the Word to make himself Man, to deliver him from the Curse and Tyranny he had rendered himself obnoxious to, and save him from Corruption by his own Death and Resurrection. That it is upon this account, that the Son of God came into the World, to unite himself to the Church as to his Spouse, which through this means became his Flesh and his Bone; that he died for her; that he purified her by Baptism, and by his Holy Spirit; that these words, Increase and Multiply, are accomplished and fulfilled every day in the Church, which encreases in Greatness and Beauty by the Communication of the Word, and by the Union it maintains with him; that Catechumens are as it were Infants, that are as yet in their Mothers Belly, that being perfectly instructed, they are born through Baptism, and at last become perfect full grown Men; that we ought not therefore to abuse these Words, and employ them, to oppose Virginity, to which St. Paul exhorts the Faithful, not allowing Marriage it self, and second Marriages in particular, but as a Remedy for Incontinence; like one that should desire a Person that is Sick and Indisposed to eat on a Fast-day, and say to him, It were to be wished that you were able to Fast, as all of us have done to day, for you know eating is forbidden; but since you are sick, it is expedient for you to eat, that you may not die.

Methodius.

In the Fourth Discourse, that goes under the Name of Theopatra, it is maintained, That nothing is more efficacious than Virginity, to make a Man enter again into Paradise, and enjoy a blessed Immortality.

In the Fifth, Thalusa endeavours to demonstrate, That the most excellent Gift we can present to God, and the most worthy of Him, is to embrace Virginity; and she gives several Cautions and Advertisements to Virgins how to preserve their Virginity without Spot or Blemish.

Agatha, that manages the Conference after Thalusa, undertakes to prove in the Sixth Discourse, that Virginity ought to be accompanied with Virtue and good Works; and to this purpose she explains the Parable of the Ten Virgins.

Procilla afterwards begins the Seventh Discourse, wherein she shews the Excellency of Virginity; because of all Virtues, this is that which has the Honour to be the Spouse of Jesus Christ. She explains a certain place out of the Sixth Chapter of the Canticles, ver. 7. and 8. There are threescore Queens, and fourscore Concubines, and Virgins without number. My dove, my undefiled is but one.

Thecla, assuming the Discourse after this, observes, That the Greek word that signifies Virginity, only by adding one Letter to it, denotes an Union with God, and a frequentation of Heavenly Things. She takes occasion from thence to shew, That Virginity elevates us up to Heaven, and makes us despise the Vanity of things below; and having cited a place in the Revelations, Chap. 12. concerning a Woman that is there described, she explains it of the Church. In short, after she has drawn some Allegories from Numbers, she exhorts all Virgins to persevere in their Virginity, and to resist the Attacks of the Serpent; that is to say, the Temptations of the Devil. From thence she launches out into other matter, and shows that Men are free Agents, and that they are not necessitated to do good or ill by the Influences and Configurations of the Stars, deriding the Effects that the Astrologers attribute to the Constellations because of their Names. 'For, says she, if there 'was any such thing as fatal Necessity from the beginning 'of the World, it was to no purpose for God to place the 'Stars of Men, and the Stars of Beasts in order; and that 'if there was not a necessity at that time, wherefore should 'God establish it, since the World was then in its full 'perfection, and in a time which they called the Golden Age? She afterwards demonstrates, That if we were necessitated by the Fatality of our Nativity under such and such a Constellation, it would follow, that God who is the Author of the Stars, and of their Motion and Disposition, would likewise be the Author of Sin and Iniquity. She adds, That Laws being contrary to things that are done by a fatal Necessity, it is impossible that these Laws should be made by mere Fatality. 'For, says she, 'it is not to be supposed that this Fatality would destroy 'it self. Now, if those that had a share in making these Laws, were not subject to this fatal Necessity, why should we not pass the very same Judgment upon others? Besides, if such a Fatality really took place, it would be Injustice either to recompence the Good, or punish the Bad; or rather, there would be neither Good nor Evil in the World, since every one would be constrained to Good or Evil. Afterwards to explain the Cause of Evil, she says, There are two contrary Motions in us; one of which is called the Concupiscence of the Flesh; the other, the Concupiscence of the Spirit; that This is the Original of all Good, and the Other the Cause of all Evil.

Methodius. After this, Tyſiana taking up the Diſcourſe, explains in the Ninth Diſcourſe a place of Leviticus, v. 36. Chap. 23. where mention is made of the Feaſt of the Seventh Month; that is to ſay, the Fifteenth of September, which is the Scenopegia, or Feaſt of Tabernacles. She reprehends the Jews for ſtopping at the bare Letter of Scripture, without penetrating into the hidden myſterious Senſe; and for taking the Figures of things to come, as Marks of things that were already paſt. She inſtances in the Paſchal Lamb, which they did not comprehend to be a Type of Jeſus Chriſt, who at the Day of Judgment ſhall ſave Souls marked with his own Blood; That the Law was the Figure of the Goſpel; That theſe Shadows and Repreſentations are no more, but that we ſhall have a perfect Knowledge of all things when we ſhall be raiſed up from the Dead; That Man was created Immortal, but that his Sin cauſing him to incline towards the Earth, God made him Mortal, leſt he ſhould continue a Sinner everlaſtingly; That for this reaſon he ſeparated the Soul from the Body; that ſo the Sin, which is in the Body, being dead and deſtroyed, he might raiſe it up again immortal, and delivered from the tyranny of Sin; That we ought to adorn this Body, which may be called a Tabernacle, with Faith, with Charity, Virtue, and particularly with Chaſtity; That thoſe that live chaſtly in the ſtate of Marriage, adorn it in part, but not ſo perfectly as thoſe that have made a Profeſſion of Virginity; That thoſe Perſons who have thus adorned and ſet out the Tabernacle of their Bodies in this Life, ſhall enjoy after the Reſurrection a Thouſand Years of Repoſe and Felicity upon the Earth with Jeſus Chriſt, that afterwards they ſhall follow him to Heaven; and that this is the promiſed Beatitude, in which there ſhall be no more Tabernacles; that is to ſay, in which our Bodies ſhall be changed, and become incorruptible, and Men ſhall be made like Angels.

Laſtly, Domnina, to ſhew the Excellency of Virginity, falls into a very obſcure Allegory upon a place of Scripture taken out of the Book of Judges. After her Harangue is ended, Arete, aſſuming the Diſcourſe, tells them, That to be truly a Virgin, it is not ſufficient barely to preſerve and keep Continence of Body, but that it is likewiſe neceſſary to purifie ones ſelf from all Senſual Deſires; That we actually diſhonour and ſully Virginity, when we abandon our ſelves to Pride, or permit a Spirit of Vanity to poſſeſs us, becauſe we have preſerved our Bodies chaſt; That this is to do like the Phariſees, who made every thing appear clean without, while they were full of Impurities within; That we ought to be Virgins both in Body and Spirit, and that we muſt watch and labour inceſſantly, leſt Idleneſs and Negligence give an open Entrance to other Sins. After this Diſcourſe, all of them ſing their Prayers, and ſeveral times repeat, 'I preſerve my ſelf 'chaſte for thee, O my Divine Spouſe, and deſire to walk 'before thee with a burning Lamp. At laſt, Gregorium and Methodius (ſirnamed Eubulus, who entertained themſelves with the Diſcourſes of theſe Virgins) diſcuſs this Queſtion, viz. Who were the moſt perfect Virgins, either thoſe that feel no Motions of Deſire, or thoſe that feel them, and though they are aſſaulted and tormented by them, yet heroically reſiſt and extinguiſh them? Gregorium gave the Preference to the firſt: But Methodius ſhews her by the Example of Mariners, Phyſicians, and Wreſtlers; that thoſe Virgins who preſerve themſelves chaſte in the midſt of thoſe violent Agitations and Tempeſts that are excited by their Paſſions, who have the Art to cure the various Diſeaſes of Concupiſcence, and cannot only reſiſt, but alſo defeat the diſorderly Motions of the Fleſh, deſerve a great deal more than thoſe that have no Appetites and Inclinations to ſtruggle with.

This Dialogue is full of Allegories, and Citations out of Scripture explained in a myſtical Senſe; and the Doctrine contained in it is exceeding orthodox. He does not condemn, or ſpeak diſhonourably of Marriage, even when he is ſetting out Virginity to the greateſt Advantages; a Moderation ſeldom to be found in the Ancients. Photius tells us, That this Book has been corrupted by the Hereticks; and that there are ſome Expreſſions in it, which the Arians uſe. And indeed he tells us in the ſeventh Diſcourſe, that the Son who is above all Creatures, made uſe of the Teſtimony of the Father, who alone is geater than he. But if by reaſon of this ſingle Expreſſion, we muſt immediately cry out, that this Dialogue has been abuſed by the Arians, we muſt likewiſe ſay the ſame thing of the Goſpel of St. John; and there is no greater difficulty in giving a good Senſe to this Expreſſion in Methodius, than in the Goſpel; and ſo much the rather, ſince in the ſame place, and indeed as often as he ſpeaks of the WORD in this Dialogue, he ſays, That he was before all Ages: And towards the end of the following Diſcourſe, which is the eighth, explaining theſe Words of the Pſalmiſt, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. 'We 'ought to obſerve (cries he) that he ſays, Thou art my Son; 'being willing to have it known that he had from all 'time the Quality of the Son, that he will never ceaſe 'to have it, and that he who was begotten, was, and ever 'will be the ſame. As for what concerns the following 'Paſſage, this day have I begotten thee; it is to ſhew, that 'he who was before all Ages in Heaven, was born in 'Time for the Good of the World. A little after he takes occaſion to ſpeak of the Hereticks, who have erred concerning the Trinity. 'Some of them (ſays he) as Sabellius, have erred concerning the Perſon of the Father, who 'maintained that it was the Almighty that ſuffered: Others concerning the Son, as Artemas and ſome others, 'that affirm, he was only a Man in outward Appearance: 'Others concerning the Holy Ghoſt, as the Ebionites, who 'pretend that the Prophets ſpake of themſelves: For I 'will not ſpeak of Marcion, Valentinus, and Helceſaites. Theſe Words demonſtrate, that we may very well defend Methodius from the Imputation of any Error concerning the Trinity. I cannot ſpend any more time to obſerve, that he taught the Opinion of the Millenaries in this Treatiſe, or to give an exact relation of his Doctrine, which may be learnt out of the Abridgment we have made of his Banquet of the Virgins. The Treatiſe of the Reſurrection was written againſt Origen's Opinion, who believed that Men were not to be raiſed up again from the Dead in the Fleſh. This Book alſo was compoſed in form of a Dialogue between Aglaophon, who maintained Origen's Aſſertion, and Proclus, and Methodius or Eubulus, who diſpute againſt him. St. Epiphanius has cited a large Fragment of it in his Account of the Hereſie of Origen; and Father Combefis has added ſome other Fragments to it, taken out of a Manuſcript of Sirmondus. He firſt of all proves under the Perſon of Proclus, That Man was created Immortal, that Death was occaſioned by his Sin, of which it is the Puniſhment; That Sin was cauſed by the Envy of the Devil; and that the Devil himſelf, who was created in Righteouſneſs like to the other Angels, fell through the Sin of Envy, and an inordinate Paſſion he had for Women; That our firſt Parents had a real Body and real Fleſh before their Tranſgreſſion; That the Fig-leaves wherewith they covered themſelves, denote that after the Death of Man, Sin ſhall be entirely rooted out of the Heart: For, though Men's Sins are blotted out by Baptiſm, yet nevertheleſs there remains a Root ſtill, that ſhoots up young Branches in this Life: So that all we can do to hinder theſe Branches from ſpreading, is to root them up, and prune them often with the Pruning-knife of the Word of God. He tells us, that Man is like a caſt Statue, which having been disfigured by ſome Accident, the Workman that made it, caſts it anew before he erects it again; That after the ſame manner, God Almighty who made Man, was willing that his Work which was disfigured by Sin, ſhould be deſtroyed by Death, that ſo he might re-eſtabliſh him by the Reſurrection; That it is a folly to imagine a Reſurrection of the Soul, ſince the Soul does not die; That Air, Earth, Heaven and the World ſhall not be deſtroyed at the Day of Judgment, but that they ſhall only be purged and renewed by the Fire of Heaven; That Men ſhall not change their Nature at the Reſurrection, and that they ſhall not be transformed into Angels, but that they ſtill have Body and Fleſh, though immortal and incorruptible. All this is extracted from the Words of Proclus. St. Epiphanius afterwards cites thoſe of Methodius, who continues to refute Origen's Error about the Reſurrection, and who likewiſe endeavours to prove in the ſame place againſt the ſame Author, That the Body cannot paſs the Chains and Priſon of the Soul; That the Paradice where Adam lived was upon Earth; That Man does not conſiſt of the Soul alone, as Plato believed, but that the Body and Soul are the two parts of him; That 'tis fabulous to ſay, that Souls were thrown headlong down from Heaven in their Bodies, or that they paſſed through Vortices of Elementary Fire, and through the Waters of the Firmament before they came to the Earth. And at laſt he makes ſeveral curious uſeful Remarks upon the Scriptural Notion of Fleſh, and of the Sin that dwells in our Bodies, explaining at the ſame time ſeveral places of the Apoſtle. Photius has cited theſe Explications all along, and added beſides, what the ſame Author has delivered about thoſe Perſons that were raiſed up to Life before Jeſus Chriſt, about the Apparitions of the Dead, and the Parable of Dives and Lazarus; in which he concludes, that Souls keep the Form of their Bodies in another World, and are there puniſhed and rewarded before the Day of Judgment. There ſtill remains a certain Paſſage of it, which is ſuppoſed to belong to the ſame Work quoted by St. John Damaſcene, in his third Oration concerning Images; wherein he ſays, 'That 'Chriſtians make Golden Images repreſenting Angels for 'the Glory of God. But I very much queſtion whether this Paſſage belongs to Methodius; or if it does, it muſt be taken in another Senſe than that in which St. John Damaſcene

Methodius.

Methodius. mascene understood it; and that by Angels, Principalities and Powers, he means the Kings of the Earth, as the words that immediately precede seem to intimate.

The Treatise of Free-Will was composed in Form of a Dialogue or Dispute between a Valentinian and a Catholick. The former affirms, That Matter which is Eternal, was the cause of Evil, or of Sin. On the other hand, the Orthodox Christian makes it appear, that there could not be two Eternal Principles; that if Matter were Eternal, yet Evil would not be Eternal, because the Qualities of Matter could not be Eternal; that Matter is not the cause of Evil; and that God is not the cause of Evil, because Evil consists not in a real thing, but in the ill use that we make of our Liberty; that Man having been created with a Liberty either to obey, or not to obey the Commandments of God, he sins, when using this Liberty the wrong way, he does things contrary to the Law of God.

These are the Works of Methodius, which St. Jerome mentions. Photius has made an Extract of a Treatise about created things, written by Methodius. In the first, he says, That these Words of Jesus Christ, cast not Pearls before Swine, ought not to be understood of Doctrine, but of Virtues; and that the meaning is not, that we must conceal Mysteries from the Infidels, but that we must not prophane the Christian Virtues; such as Chastity, Temperance and Justice, with the Pleasures of the World that are signified by the Swine. In the second, he confutes those that thought the World had no beginning; an Opinion which he attributes to Origen. In the third, he says, That the Church is so called, because it calls Men to fight against Pleasures. [In the Greek Ecclesia, which signifies a Church, or an Assembly of Men, comes from καλέω, to call; because the publick Assemblies were convened by publick Cryers, who called the People together.] In the fourth, he says, That there were two Virtues or Powers that concurred to the Creation of the World; the Father that created it of nothing, and the Son that polished and compleated the Work of the Father. The Son (says he) who is the Almighty hand of the Father. In the fifth he asserts, that Moses was the Author of the Book of Job; and he explains the first Words of the Book of Genesis, In principio, in the beginning, of the Wisdom of God. He observes, that GOD the Father begot the WORD, or the Wisdom which was in Him before the Creation of the World; that this Wisdom being a Principle without Beginning, became the Principle of all things; which is a Catholick way of speaking, and far remote from the Arian Opinion; though it does not seem to be altogether conformable to the Expressions of our Age. To conclude, In the last Fragment he cites a Passage of Origen, who would endeavour to prove by Allegories, That the World existed long before the Six Days, that preceded the Formation of Adam. Methodius looks upon this as a trifling Opinion.

Theodoret, in his first Dialogue, cites a Passage taken out of a Sermon of Methodius concerning the Martyrs; where he says, that Martyrdom is so admirable, and so much to be desired, that Jesus Christ the Son of God would honour it himself; and that he who was equal to his Father, was willing to crown human Nature, to which he himself was united with that excellent Gift. Methodius.

The Sermon composed upon the Nativity of Jesus, and upon his being presented in the Temple, Entituled, Simeon and Ann, published by Pantinus in the Year 1598. and afterwards printed by Father Combefis amongst the rest of the Works of Methodius, is neither cited by any of the Ancients, nor mentioned by Photius, tho' it is written in Methodius's Style. The Author of it endeavours to confute the Errors of Origen, and calls himself the Author of the Banquet of Virgins, in the beginning of his Discourse, which shews that it belongs to Methodius. Tho' we must own that he speaks so clearly of the Mysteries of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, of the Divinity of the WORD, whom he calls in several places, Consubstantial to the Father, of the Hymn called the Trisagion, of the Virginity of Mary, even after her Delivery, and of Original Sin, that it gives us some Reason to doubt, whether some thing has not been added since to this Sermon. Besides, the Style of it is more swelling, and fuller of Epithets than that of Methodius.

Besides all this, Father Combefis upon the Authority of a Manuscript in the King's Library, has restored to Methodius another Sermon upon Palm-Sunday, that was formerly printed under the Name of St. Chrysostome, by Sir Henry Savil, upon the Authority of another Manuscript. It is certain, that it approaches nearer to the Style of Methodius than of St. Chrysostome; but he explains the Mystery of the Trinity so clearly in one place, and opposes the Hereticks so very plainly, that there is some reason to believe, that either this place has been since added, or that this Homily was not written by Methodius. Father Combefis has likewise collected some other Fragments attributed to Methodius, cited by St. John Damascene, and by Nicetas, drawn out of his Books against Porphyrie. But besides, that we cannot entirely depend upon the Authority of these two Authors, who are not very exact, these Fragments have nothing considerable, and we think it not worth the while to say any thing more concerning them. We shall not take any notice of some Latin Prophecies about Antichrist attributed to Methodius, that are printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum, since it is agreed on all hands that they are not his.

The Style of Methodius is Asiatick, that is to say, diffuse, swelling, and full of Epithets. His Expressions are Figurative, the Turn of his Sentences affected, he is full of Comparisons, and far-fetched Allegories, his Thoughts are mysterious, and he says a few things in abundance of words. Setting these things aside, his Doctrine is sound, and free from some Errors that were common to the Ancients; particularly concerning the Virginity of Mary, concerning Original Sin, concerning Guardian Angels, and several other Points; as may be observed in the Abridgment that we have made of his Works.

PAMPHILUS.

Pamphilus. PAmphilus, a Presbyter of Cæsarea in Palestine, and a Friend of Eusebius (a), suffered Martyrdom, during Maximine's Persecution. He wrote almost nothing himself, unless it be a few Letters to his Friends; but he took extraordinary pains to gather the Books of ancient Writers (b), and particularly those of Origen, for whom he had a particular Esteem. He transcribed several Volumes with his own hand, and amongst the rest, his twenty five Books of Commentaries upon the Prophets, and that very Transcript was to be seen in St. Jerome's time. Pamphilus when he was in Prison composed five Books with Eusebius (c) in defence of Origen, and Eusebius added a fifth after his Death. Pamphilus.

(a) FRiend of Eusebius.] Eusebius wrote the Life of Pamphilus, and was from him firnamed Pamphilus.

(b) The Books of ancient Writers.] He laboured along with Eusebius to copy out exactly, and to correct the Version of the Septuagint, that was in the Tetrapla, and Hexapla of Origen, intending to publish it by it self.

(c) Five Books with Eusebius.] St. Jerome in his Catalogue of the Ecclesiastical Writers, makes him the Author of the Apology for Origen; but he afterwards retracted what he had said in his Apology against Ruffinus. The Truth is, The five first Books were composed by Pamphilus and Eusebius together; and the last, which Ruffinus quoted, was Eusebius's alone. See Photius, Cod. 108.

LUCIAN.

Lucian. LUcian, a Presbyter of Antioch, applied himself vigorously to the Study of Scripture, and published a new Edition of the Version of the Septuagint (a), which was afterwards called Lucian's Edition. He was a Man of great Eloquence, and wrote several small Treatises concerning Faith, and some Letters. Amongst others, he wrote one, when he was in Prison, addressed to a Christian of Antioch; the end of which Letter is preserved in the Chronicle of Alexandria, and is as follows: 'All the Martyrs that are with me, Salute you. Lucian.

(a) OF the Septuagint.] The Version which he corrected, was the common Version of the Septuagint. Upon this account, St. Jerome (Præfat. in Paralipomena) distinguishes between three different Editions of the Version of the Septuagint. The first, was that of Eusebius and Pamphilus, which he calls Palestine, that was taken out of the Hexapla of Origen, who corrected it by an ancient Version, and added several things borrowed from the Versions of Theodotion, A-

Lucian. ‘I ſend you word that Biſhop Anthimus died a Martyr. Lucian is accuſed to have been the firſt Author of the Arian Opinion: And indeed, all the Heads of that Party were his Diſciples. He ſuffered Martyrdom at Nicomedia, under the Perſecution of the Emperor Maximinus (b), and was buried at Helenopolis, a City of Bythinia. Lucian.

quila, and Symmachus. The ſecond was that of Alexandria, whereof Heſychius was Author, who likewiſe corrected the common Verſion of the Septuagint. The laſt, that of Lucian. This gave occaſion to St. Jerome to ſay, That Totus Orbis hac inter ſe triſaria varietate compugnat.

(b) Of the Emperor Maximinus.] Euſebius l. 9. c. 6. Hierom. in Catalog. And therefore Baronius is miſtaken, when following the Acts of his Martyrdom, he ſays, That he ſuffered under Maximian; for 'tis a common miſtake amongſt the Greeks to take Maximian for Maximin.

PHILEAS.

Phileas. PHileas, deſcended of a Rich and Powerful Family in the City of Thmuis in Ægypt, after having paſſed through ſeveral Offices and Honours, and acquired to himſelf the Reputation of an extraordinary Philoſopher, was elected Biſhop of the City where he lived, and had his Head cut off for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, under the Emperor Maximinus. Before he ſuffered Martyrdom, he wrote a famous Letter to the Inhabitants of the City of Thmuis; in which he deſcribes the Puniſhments which the Chriſtians were forced to endure in the City of Alexandria. He deſcribes the Conſtancy with which they ſupported themſelves, and exhorts his Flock to keep up the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt after his Death, which he foreſaw would ſhortly happen. Euſebius in the eighth Book of his Hiſtory, Chapter the Tenth, has preſerved a Fragment of this Eloquent Letter, which St. Jerome ſcruples not to call a Book. He likewiſe tells us, that they had the Anſwers which he made to the Judge, who would have obliged him to offer Sacrifice. We have the Acts of his Martyrdom, that were printed at Antwerp: But they are corrupt, as moſt of the reſt are; and ſome things are inſerted which are taken out of Euſebius and Ruffinus. Phileas.

ZENO Biſhop of Verona.

Zeno Biſhop of Verona. ’TIs commonly believed, that there was one Zeno, Biſhop of Verona, that ſuffered Martyrdom under the Empire of Gallienus, and ſome Sermons are attributed to him, that were publiſhed by Guarinus, Printed at Venice and Verona in the Years 1508. and 1586. and afterwards inſerted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum. But this Author being wholly unknown to all Antiquity, his Works have been abſolutely rejected; nay, ſome have doubted, whether it be true, that there ever was a Biſhop of Verona of that Name, that ſuffered Martyrdom under the Emperor Gallienus. St. Gregory the Great is the firſt that ſpeaks of Zeno, as a Martyr; but before him St. Ambroſe, in a Letter written to Syagrius, Biſhop of Verona, makes mention of one Zeno, the Predeceſſor of this Syagrius, who ſeems to have govern'd the Church of Verona in the time of Conſtantius, or Julian the Apoſtate. The Teſtimony of St. Ambroſe has obliged thoſe that poſitively maintain that there was one Zeno Biſhop of Verona, a Martyr under the Empire of Gallienus; it has obliged them, I ſay, to diſtinguiſh between two Zeno's Biſhops of Verona; one put to Death under Gallienus, and another that lived in the time of Julian the Apoſtate. But it is better to own frankly, that 'tis a miſtake to believe, that there was one Zeno Biſhop of Verona in the time of Gallienus. St. Gregory does indeed give the Name of Martyr to Zeno of Verona, but he does not tell us under what Emperor he ſuffered Martyrdom: and perhaps he might beſtow that Title upon him, becauſe he ſuffered ſome Perſecution under Conſtantius, or Julian the Apoſtate. Be that as it will, Molanus obſerves, that heretofore in the Roman Martyrology, they placed him amongſt the conſiderable Biſhops that were Confeſſors: And Onuphrius Panvinus adds, That the Church of Verona Anciently honoured him under that quality, and that Lippomanus Biſhop of Verona, was the firſt that procured him the honour of a Martyr.

’Tis very certain, that the Sermons which we have under the Name of Zeno, cannot belong to him whom they ſuppoſe to have ſuffered Martyrdom under Gallienus; for this Author in his Fifth Sermon ſpeaks of the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt againſt the Hereticks that affirmed the Word to be God, but did not believe him to be Eternal as the Father, and ſuppoſed there was a time when He was not; which viſibly demonſtrates, That the Hereſie of the Arians was then on foot. Neither can theſe Sermons belong to that Zeno of Verona, who lived under Conſtantius and Julian; becauſe they are borrowed out of other Authors. There are Four Sermons of them that are entirely St. Baſil's (a). All the Homilies upon the Pſalms are taken word for word out of the Commentaries of St. Hilary (b); which ſhews, that theſe Sermons attributed to Zeno of Verona, are a Collection of Sermons ſtolen out of ſeveral Authors (c), and heaped together without any Choice. Some are ſhort, others are long; ſome are well written, and in an elevated Style; others are ill, and in a mean pitiful one; ſome are clear, others obſcure. In ſhort, nothing can be imagined to be more unequal. In the Sermon of Continence, he reckons more than 400 Years ſince St. Paul wrote his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and yet in other Homilies, he ſpeaks of Temples, Martyrs and Catechumens. All theſe things ſet it paſt Diſpute, that theſe Sermons attributed to Zeno of Verona, and unknown to all Antiquity, are a Collection of Sermons taken out of ſeveral Authors of different Times and different Countries, put together indiſcreetly by ſome ignorant Copier. Zeno Biſhop of Verona.

The ſame Cenſure ought in all probability to be paſſed upon the eighteen Sermons cited by Turrianus under the name of Euſebius of Alexandria. This Author is unknown to the Ancients; neither was there a Biſhop of Alexandria of this Name (d), for the three firſt Ages of the Church: Therefore theſe Sermons belong to a more modern Author.

(a) Entirely St. Baſil's.] The Sermons of St. Baſil upon theſe Words, Attende tibi, & de Livore & Invidia, are entirely ſtolen; and the two other Homilies about Faſting and Temptation, are part of the two longeſt of St. Baſil.

(b) Of St. Hilary.] Theſe Sermons upon the 126, 127, 128, 129, and 130 Pſalms, belong to St. Hilary. Thoſe upon the 49, 79, and 100 Pſalms, might be his alſo, becauſe we have loſt the Commentaries of this Father upon the Pſalms.

(c) Stolen out of ſeveral Authors.] Some of the long ones are taken out of Greek Authors, and the ſhort ones out of the Latin Writers, and Fragments of Homilies.

(d) A Biſhop of this Name.] Euſebius indeed, Lib. 7. Chap. 11. of his Hiſtory, gives a good Character of one Euſebius a Deacon, that lived with Dionyſius of Alexandria, who was afterwards Biſhop of Laodicea; but this Man ought rather to call himſelf Euſebius of Laodicea, than Euſebius of Alexandria.

ARNOBIUS.

Arnobius. THough Arnobius and Lactantius lived the better Part of their time in the Fourth Century of the Church, yet we ſhall nevertheleſs joyn them to the Authors of the Third, becauſe they wrote with the ſame Spirit, and after the ſame manner; that is to ſay, they did not employ themſelves in Writing againſt the Hereſies that roſe in the Fourth Age, but only in confuting the Pagans in Imitation of the Ancients.

Arnobius was Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Sicca, a City of Numidia in Africk under the Emperor Dioclefian (a). He was firſt a Pagan; but as St. Jerome tells us in Euſeb. Chron. being deſirous to be converted, that he might more eaſily prevail with the Biſhops to admit him amongſt the Faithful, he compoſed, when he was but a Catechumen, Seven Eloquent Books againſt the Religion he had then left, and theſe Books were as Pledges or Hoſtages that Three Hundred Years, more or leſs, ſince the Chriſtians began to appear in the World. Arnobius.

(a) Under the Emperor Dioclefian.] He wrote his Books toward the end of the Third, or beginning of the Fourth Century; for in his Firſt Book he expreſly tells us, That it was procured

Arnobius. procured for him the favour of that Baptism he so earnestly sollicited. Now though it must be confessed, that he did not perfectly understand the Christian Religion when he wrote these Books, in which some errors are to be found, yet he confuted the Absurdities of Paganism with singular Dexterity, and Vigorously defended the principal Articles of our Religion.

He begins his first Book with confuting that Popular Calumny, which the Pagans so industriously advanced against the Christians, viz. That they were the Authors of all the Calamities and Miseries that afflicted the World. He shews, that this is a groundless and unreasonable Fancy, that there were Plagues, and Famines, and Wars before our Saviours appearance, and that nothing had been changed since his coming: That he was so far from being the Author of their Miseries, that on the contrary, he brought abundance of Good unto the World; That Miseries proceed from Natural Causes, and that it often happens, that those things which in the common acceptation of Mankind pass for Misfortunes, don't prove so in effect; That if the Christians were the cause of these Calamities, the World would have had no Interval without them ever since the appearance of Jesus Christ; that if the Pagan Deities sent these Miseries to Men for the Punishment of the Christians, they were unjust as well as weak; That the Christians worship the true God, and apprehended no dangers from false ones; That they adore Jesus Christ, but don't consider him as a Man that suffered Death for his own Transgressions, But as a real true God, who took the Human Nature upon him to manifest himself to the World, to teach Mankind the ways of Truth, and to accomplish all those things for which he appeared upon Earth; That he died, and afterwards was raised up from the Grave, to satisfie all Men that the Hopes of their Salvation were certain. He proves the Divinity of Jesus Christ by the Exemplary Holiness of his Life, by the Innocence of his Manners, by the great Number of Miracles and Prodigies that were wrought by him, and by others that had Commission from him, by the Signs that appear'd upon Earth at his Death; and then he shews, that we cannot reasonably question the Truth of these things, because the Evangelists, who have delivered them in writing, were Persons of great Integrity and Simplicity; That there is no reason to Imagine they were so Vain, or indeed so Mad, as to pretend they saw those things that they never did see; especially since they were so far from reaping any Advantages from such Inventions, that they thereby exposed themselves to the Hatred of all the World.

In his Second Book, he demonstrates that Jesus Christ was wrongfully Persecuted, since he had done nothing to deserve the hatred of any one, since he was no Tyrant, and destroy'd no body, since he acquired no Riches for himself, and did no manner of Injustices to the meanest Person. He likewise shews, that the Pagans had no certain Principles whereby to judge which was the true or false Religion; that they were very much in the wrong, for laughing at the Credulity of the Christians; since in the generality of things that have a relation to Human Life, Men usually manage themselves by the belief which they repose in particular Persons; That Jesus Christ merited a great deal more than all the Philosophers in the World, because of the Miracles which he wrought; that the Pagan Philosophers believed the same things that are received by the Christians; as for Instance, The Immortality of the Soul, the Resurrection of the Body, and Hell Fire. He takes occasion from thence to discourse of the Nature of Souls, he pretends that they are of a middle quality between a Spirit and a Body; that they are by Nature Mortal; but that God of his Goodness immortalizes the Souls of those who repose their Confidence in him. He confutes Plato's Notions concerning the Soul's Immortality, and its Excellency, Dignity, Exile or Imprisonment in the Body. He supposes that it is Corporeal and ex tradvce; That Man is but very little different from the Beasts; That his Soul is mortal by Nature, but that it becomes immortal by the Grace of God: Opinions unworthy of a Man that had been perfectly Instructed in the true Religion. What he at the same time observes, that in the matters of Religion we ought not to indulge a fond Curiosity, nor endeavour to penetrate into the Reasons of God Almighty's Conduct, nor judge of it by our own Light, is infinitely more worthy of a Christian. 'Jesus Christ, 'says he, was God, and I ought to tell you so, though 'you are not willing to understand it, yet he is God, and 'speaks unto us from God. He has commanded us not 'to perplex our selves with unprofitable Questions; let 'us therefore leave the Knowledge of those things to 'God, and not amuse our selves in a vain pursuit after 'them. And yet he does not forget to Answer those Questions that were ordinarily proposed by the Pagans concerning Jesus Christ. Now they often demanded the reason, why our Blessed Saviour (since his coming was so absolutely necessary for the saving of Souls from Death) would suffer so long an Interval of time to pass before he came to deliver them. Arnobius replies, 'Is it possible 'for Man to know after what manner God dealt with 'the Ancients? who has told you that he never relieved 'them any other way? Do you know how long it is 'since Men have been upon the Earth, or in what place 'the Souls of the Ancients are reserved? Who has informed you that Jesus Christ did not deliver them by his 'coming? Forbear then to torment your selves about these 'things, and meddle not with those Questions which 'tis 'impossible for Human Reason to resolve: Be persuaded that God has shewn Mercy to them; Jesus Christ 'perhaps had taught you how, and when, and after what 'manner it was done, if it would not have afforded matter 'to your Pride. But wherefore, continued the Pagans, did not Jesus Christ deliver all Mankind? 'He invites, he 'calls upon all the World, says Arnobius; he rejects no 'body, he readily receives those that come to him; he 'only requires that Men would desire and wish for him; 'but he constrains and forces no Man, for otherwise it 'would be Violence and not Grace. But are none but 'Christians delivered from Death? No, assuredly; for Je'sus Christ alone has power to effect it. But, say the Pagans, this is a new upstart Religion; and why should we quit that of our Ancestors for it? 'Why not, reply'd Ar'nobius, provided it is better? Did we never change our 'ancient Customs? Did we never alter our old Laws? 'Is there any thing in the World which had not a begin'ning at first? Ought we to esteem a Religion for the 'Antiquity of it, or rather for the sake of the Divinity 'which we honour? Within less than Two Thousand 'Years, none of the Gods that are now worshipped by the 'Pagans, were in being, whereas God and his true Re'ligion has been from all Ages. Jesus Christ had his Rea'sons why he appeared when he did, though they are un'known to us. But why does he suffer those that Wor'ship him to be Persecuted? 'And why replies Arnobius, do 'your Gods suffer you to be afflicted with Wars, with 'Pestilence and Famine, &c. As for us, 'tis not to be ad'mired that we suffer in this Life, for nothing is promi'sed to us in this World: on the contrary, all the Evils 'And Calamities which we suffer here, make way only 'for our Deliverance.

Arnobius.

In the Three following Books, Arnobius falls upon the Pagan Religion, and shews, that the Christians had very great reason to reject a way of Worship so very foolish, Extravagant and Impious.

In his Sixth and Seventh Books, he demonstrates that the Christians did very wisely not to build Temples, or trouble themselves with the Pageantry of Statues, Images and Sacrifices, and that is a ridiculous piece of Folly to imagine, that God dwells in Temples, that the Images are Gods, or that the Divinities are contained in them. Or lastly, That we honour the true God, when we Sacrifice Beasts, burn Incense, or pour out Wine in Adoration of him.

Thus we have considered the Subject of the Seven Books of Arnobius, that are written in a manner worthy of a Professor of Rhetoric. The turn of his thoughts very much resembles that of an Orator, but his Style is a little African, that is to say, his Words harsh, ill-placed, unpolish'd, and sometimes scarce Latin; and 'tis likewise evident that he was not perfectly acquainted with the Mysteries of our Religion. He attacks Paganism with a greater share of Skill and Vigour, than he defends Christianity, and discovers the Folly of That, better than he proves the Truth of this. But we ought not to be surprized at it, for 'tis the ordinary Fate of all new Converts, who being as yet full of their former Religion, know the weakness and blind-side of it better than they understand the Proofs and excellencies of that persuasion which they have newly embraced. I will say nothing concerning the Latin Commentary upon the Psalms, that carries the Name of Arnobius, because it is a certain Truth, in which all the Learned World agrees, that this Arnobius is a different Person from him of whom we have been speaking; that he is of a later Date, and lived after the Council of Chalcedon, since he mentions the Pelagians and Predestinarians.

The Books of the Senior Arnobius were first published by Faustus Sabæus, and Printed at Rome by Theodorus Priscianensis in the Year 1542. out of a Manuscript belonging to the Vatican Library, but with abundance of Faults that were to be found in that Manuscript. Gelenius, who afterwards set out another Edition of them at Basil, in 1546. and 1560, by Frobenius, took the liberty to Correct them upon his own bare Conjecture, and to insert his own Emendations into the Text. Thomasius printed them at Paris 1570. Canterus Corrected the Edition of Gelenius, and was the first Man that wrote Annotations upon Arnobius: His Edition was printed by Plantin at Antwerp 1582. in Octavo. Elmenhorstius published a larger Comment upon him, and reviewed his Seven Books out of an ancient Manuſcript. They are likewiſe printed with Heraldus's Notes, in the Year 1583, and 1603, at Paris 1605, and at Hamburg 1610. Stewechius a Learned Man took pains alſo with the ſame Author, and Printed him at Doway 1634. in Octavo. Thyſius afterwards reviſed his Edition, and cauſed it to be Printed at Leyden by le Maire, with the Notes of ſeveral others, 1652. and 1657. in Quarto. Laſtly, Priorius Printed the Books of Arnobius againſt the Gentiles, at the end of St. Cyprian's Works, at Paris by Dupuis in 1666.

LACTANTIUS.

Lactantius Lactantius

Lucius Cælius (a) Firmianus, Sirnamed Lactantius, was Converted in his Youth (b) to the Chriſtian Religion: He ſtudied Rhetoric in Africk in the School of Arnobius, but far ſurpaſſed his Maſter in Eloquence. Whilſt he was there, he writ a Book, Intituled, Convivium, or The Banquet; which acquired him ſo great a Reputation in the World, that he was ſent for to Nicomedia to teach Rhetoric there. But meeting with few Scholars there, becauſe it was a Grecian City, where they had no very great value for the Roman Eloquence; he gave himſelf altogether to the writing of Books. St. Jerome informs us, That he wrote a Poem in Hexameter Verſe, wherein he gave a Deſcription of his Voyage; and another Piece which he called, the Grammarian; but imagining, that he was obliged to employ his Learning and Time upon a better and higher Subject, he entred the Liſts in behalf of Religion. The Firſt Treatiſe, which he compoſed after this manner, was that about the Work of God; He afterwards undertook his Seven Books of Inſtitutions, about the Year of our Lord 320 (c), in which he ſtrenuouſly defends the Chriſtian Religion, and likewiſe Anſwers all thoſe that had written againſt it. After he had finiſhed them, he abridged them, and added the Book concerning the Anger of God to the reſt.

He likewiſe wrote Two Books to Aſclepiades, and Eight Books of Epiſtles; Four to Probus, Two to Severus, and Two to Demetrianus, but all theſe Books, that were extant in St. Jerome's time, are loſt at preſent. We have only recovered one ſmall Treatiſe concerning Perſecution mentioned by St. Jerome, which Baluzius has lately Publiſhed under the Title of De Mortibus Perſecutorum. He Promiſes ſeveral other Works of the ſame Author, as his Diſputes againſt the Philoſophers, againſt the Jews, and againſt the Hereticks; but there is no reaſon to believe that Lactantius ever compoſed theſe Pieces, ſince St. Jerome doth not mention them; at leaſt, that they were contained in his Epiſtles.

Conſtantine afterwards took him to be Tutor to his Son Criſpus, to inſtruct him in all manner of Learning. In the midſt of all theſe Honours he was ſo very Poor that he often wanted Neceſſaries, being very far from making any purſuits after Pleaſure. This is all that we know of the Hiſtory of this great and excellent Perſon, but even this very Circumſtance alone, as we find it related in Euſebius's Chronicon, may paſs for an extraordinary and magnificent Commendation of him, and ought to inſpire us with no mean Idea of his Piety. For he muſt certainly have been a very Virtuous Man, that could live poorly in a Court, that could neglect the Care even of Neceſſary things in the midſt of Plenty and Abundance, and had not the leaſt taſte of Pleaſures, when he reſided amongſt Perſons that were overwhelmed in them.

We are now to conſider the Subject of the Seven Books of Lactantius, which, beſides the general Title of Divine Inſtitutions, have each of them a particular Inſcription, that acquaints us with the Matter whereof it Treats. The Firſt is Intituled, De falſa Religione, of falſe Religion; The Second, De Origine Erroris, of the Original of Error. The deſign of Lactantius in theſe Two Books is to demonſtrate the falſity of the Pagan Religion. In the firſt, after he has informed his Reader of the Reaſons that moved him to undertake ſuch a Work, and has made his Addreſſes to the Emperor Conſtantine, he ſhews that there is a Providence in the World, and that it is God who Rules and Governs it. He particularly enlarges upon this ſecond Propoſition, and makes it evident by ſeveral Arguments, by the Authority of the Prophets that have Eſtabliſhed it, and by the joint-Teſtimonies of the Poets, of the Philoſophers, of Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, of the Sybils, and the Oracle of Apollo, that there is only one God that Governs the World: And laſtly, towards the latter Part of this Book, he demonſtrates the Falſity of the Pagan Religion, by ſhewing that the Gods to whom they paid their Adoration, were Mortal Men; and not only ſo, but for the moſt part wicked and profligate Wretches. In the Second Book he goes on to confute the Pagan Religion, and directs his Diſcourſe chiefly againſt the Idols and Repreſentations of their Deities; and plainly proves, that it is the higheſt Degree of Madneſs and Stupidity to pay Adorations to them as Divine Beings. After this, coming to aſſign Reaſons for the Prodigies and Oracles, which the Pagans attributed to their Idols, he riſes as high as the Creation of the World, to furniſh himſelf with a fit occaſion of diſcourſing about the Nature of Demons, to whom he aſcribes all thoſe wonderful miraculous Effects. Laſtly, he ſhews, That the principal Cauſe of the Errors and Malice of Men is owing to the perpetual Temptations and Snares of the Devil; as alſo to the abandoning of Cham and his Poſterity.

The Third Book is Intituled, De falſa Sapientia, Of falſe Wiſdom; becauſe it is chiefly levelled at the Pagan Philoſophers, the Vanity of whoſe Philoſophy he endeavours to expoſe and diſcover: From hence he draws this Concluſion, That the only Wiſdom of Man is to know and worſhip God.

The Fourth is concerning true Wiſdom; and 'tis in this Book chiefly that he lays open the Doctrine of the Chriſtians. In the beginning of the Book he ſhews, That the Philoſophers were not able to find out the true Wiſdom, becauſe they never ſearched after it amongſt the Jews, and becauſe it is inſeparable from the Worſhip and Knowledge of the true God. He afterwards explains the Doctrine of the Chriſtians with relation to Jeſus Chriſt; and evidently proves, That the Pagans themſelves acknowledged that he was the Word and Wiſdom of God exiſting before the World; That this Word was begotten of God after an incomprehenſible manner; That he deſcended from Heaven, and was born of a Virgin, according to the Predictions of the Prophets, that the Gentiles might know the true God. He then gives an Account of the Life, the Miracles, and Death of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſhews, That it was neceſſary for him to undergo the infamous Puniſhment of the Croſs.

He afterwards demonſtrates, That though the Chriſtians do acknowledge that the Son is God, as well as the Father, yet they worſhip but one God; That the Father and Son are one Spirit, and one ſubſtance, and one God; which he illuſtrates and explains by the Compariſons of a Fountain and its Stream, of the Sun and its Rays, &c.

Towards the End, he declaims in general againſt Hereſies; and tells us, That the Catholick Church only has retained the true Worſhip of God; That it is the Source of Truth, the Habitation of Faith, the Temple of God; That thoſe Men who never enter into it, or who depart from it, are out of hopes of obtaining Everlaſting Salvation; That no Man ought to flatter himſelf, whilſt he continues ſtedfaſt in his Obſtinacy, ſince his Eternal welfare is concerned in the Matter, which he will be in danger of loſing, unleſs he takes particular Care; That though all the Sects of Hereticks pretend and boaſt to be the Church, yet there is but one properly ſo called, which heals the Wounds of Man by the wholſome Remedies of Confeſſion and Repentance.

In the Fifth Book, that treats of Juſtice, He ſhews that the Pagans have no ſuch thing as true Juſtice; That 'tis impoſſible to find it any where but in the Chriſtian Religion; That it is a great Injuſtice to perſecute the Chriſtians, becauſe of their Perſuaſion; and that though they were in an Error, yet their Adverſaries ought to recover them out of it, by the force of Reaſon and not of Puniſh-

(a) Lucius Cælius.] This is his proper Name. There are ſome Manuſcripts where he is called Cecilius. 'Tis ſuppoſed that he was Sirnamed Firmianus from his Country, and Lactantius from the ſweetneſs of his Elocution; but this is not certain.

(b) Converted in his Youth.] See the Seventh Book of his Inſtitutions, Chapter the laſt, the Third Chapter of his Epitome, l. 2. c. 10. where he ſeems to reckon himſelf in the Number of thoſe, who after they had acknowledged their Error, were converted to the Truth. St. Jerome tells us, That he was the Diſciple of Arnobius.

(c) About the Year of our Lord 320.] Lactantius was at Nicomedia at the time of Dioclefian's Perſecution in the Year 302. as he himſelf tells us, Lib. 5. of his Inſtit. Chap. 2. He tarried there till the Perſecution was over; afterwards he went to France, where he wrote his Book of Inſtitutions: for he ſpeaks of the Perſecutors in the Beginning of his Firſt Book, as if he were then in another Country; he therefore wrote it in the time of the Perſecution carried on by the Emperor Licinius, which began in the Year 320. So that the Name of Arians, that is to be found in ſome Manuſcripts of his Books, might perhaps have been added ſince.

ments; That we cannot, and that we ought not to constrain Men to be of any Religion; which is a thing not to be defended by Killing of others, but by dying for it our selves; not by Cruelty but Patience; That the Sacrifices which are extorted from Men by Violence, neither signifie any thing to those that offer them, nor to those that cause them to be offered, nor to the Gods themselves; That 'tis a surprizing thing that the Pagans could suffer the Superstitions of the Egyptians, and the Atheism of the Philosophers, and yet should bear such an incurable hatred to the Religion of Jesus Christ: In short, That though God sometimes permits Truth and Justice to be persecuted; yet he never fails at last to punish Persecutors with the utmost Severity.

The Sixth Book treats of the true worship of God. He distinguisheth between Two sorts of Worship, True, and False; and two sorts of Ways, one that leads to Hell, and the other that leads to Heaven. He tells us, That this last is a difficult Way, that we must pass through Poverty, Ignorance, and a long Series of sufferings before we can arrive at Virtue; That the Philosophers search'd after it to no purpose, since they neither knew what was Good, or what was Evil; having no Knowledge of God, who was the Author of Good, nor of the Devil who is the Author of Evil; That the Law of God, is made clear and manifest to us; That this Law contains two Principal Heads; The First of Piety; The Second of Humanity. That Piety consists in worshipping God, and that Humanity which is also called Mercy and Charity, consists in our mutually assisting one another to our utmost Endeavours, since we are descended from the same Father; That if we would acquit our selves of this Duty, we ought to bestow Alms, to relieve the Sick and Necessitous, to protect Orphans and Widows, to redeem Captives, and bury the Dead; and that the Apprehension of becoming poor, ought not to hinder us from giving considerable Alms, because they blot out and efface our Sins.

He afterwards discourses about the Passions, and demonstrates, contrary to the Sentiments of the Philosophers, That Mercy or Compassion is not a Vice, but a Virtue; and that Fear and Love, which are Vices when they carry a Man to Earthly things, are Virtues when they move him towards Heaven. From hence, he proceeds to the Precepts of Justice that are less general, such as are the following ones; Not to Lye, not to be guilty of Usury, not to exact Gifts from the Poor, not to revenge our selves of our Enemies, to speak well of those that revile us, to moderate our Passions, and to refrain from the pursuit of Sensual Pleasures. After he has thus shewn the way of Justice, he says, That if it should happen that a Man should forsake this way by falling into some Sin; yet he ought not to despair, but turn away from his Evil Practices, and satisfie God, who knows our secret Thoughts. In one word, That the Sacrifice, which we are to present, ought to be Spiritual, and that we ought to offer him the Purity of our Hearts, and the Praises due to his Divinity.

The last Book of his Institutions treats about Happiness, and a happy Life. He shews, that this supposes the Immortality of the Soul, which he demonstrates by several Arguments; and likewise that this Mortal Life can never be Happy, unless we take care to preserve Justice. He afterwards discourseth of the End of the World, which he imagines must happen Six Thousand Years after its Creation (d), and of the Signs that shall precede it, amongst which he reckons the Destruction of the Roman Empire, and of the last Judgment; wherein he tells us, God shall, as it were, weigh both Good and Evil; and that those who have committed more Evil than Good, shall be condemned to Everlasting Punishment; That on the contrary, those who are altogether Just, shall not in the least manner feel the Divine Fire; but that those who are in a middle condition, shall be examined by it, and so purified from their Sins; That after this Solemn Trial is over, Jesus Christ shall Reign a Thousand Years upon Earth with the Just, and when that Course of time is finished, the World shall be renewed, all Mankind shall be raised again, and God shall make the Just like to Angels, that they may be in his Presence, and serve him during a happy Eternity; but that he will throw the Wicked headlong into Everlasting Fire. He concludes all, with exhorting Mankind to be Converted and Repent while they have an Opportunity of so doing; that so they may put themselves in a Condition of fearing nothing at that Great and Terrible Day. 'We cannot carry any thing along 'with us, says he, but the Innocence of our Lives. 'Those only shall appear rich before God, that bring a- 'long with them, if I may use the Expression, the Vir- 'tues of Mercy, of Patience, of Charity, and of Faith. 'This is the Inheritance which cannot be ravished from 'us, and which we cannot transmit to any one besides: 'And who are they that desire to acquire these Blessings? 'Let them that are Hungry come to the Celestial Bread 'of the Word of God, that they may be everlastingly 'satisfied. Let them that are Thirsty come to quench 'their Thirst with the Water of this Heavenly Fountain; 'Let no Man ground his hopes upon his Riches, or his 'Power; for these things are not able to make us happy 'for ever; but let us bind our selves to the observation 'of Justice, which will accompany us even to God's 'Tribunal, where we shall certainly receive the recom- 'pence, which he has promised us.

Lactantius

The Epitome or entire Abridgment of these Seven Books composed by Lactantius himself, is lost: what is extant, begins at the End of the Fifth Book, the rest was lost in St. Jerome's time. This Abridgment contained the very same things with the Books themselves, only more succinctly treated, and thrown into a narrower compass.

In the Book of God's Anger, Lactantius endeavours to prove, that God is capable of Anger, as well as of Mercy and Compassion.

In the Book of the Work of God, he establisheth Providence by demonstrating the Excellence of his Principal Work, which is Man; for which Reason, he makes an Elegant Description of all the Parts of his Body, and the Proprieties or Faculties of his Soul.

The Book of Persecution, or rather of the Deaths of the Persecutors, lately published by Baluzius, and quoted by St. Jerome, was writ immediately after the end of that Persecution, which was begun in the Year 303, under Diocletian, and ended 313, by the Death of Maximinus, when Licinius and Constantine were Masters of the Empire. 'Tis written to a Confessor, whose Name was Donatus; who suffered several times couragiously for the Christian Religion during that Persecution. The Subject which Lactantius proposes to himself in this Treatise, is to shew, That the Emperors who persecuted the Christians, died all miserably. He there describes and relates the several Persecutions which the Church suffered; and likewise the exemplary Punishments which God deservedly inflicted upon these persecuting Tyranrs. After he has in a few Words briefly run over the Sufferings of the Church under the Emperors Nero, Domitian, Decius, Valerian, and Aurelian, and given an account of the Tragical Deaths of these bloody Princes; he enlarges more copiously upon the following Persecution. He gives a particular Account of the History of Diocletian, Maximian, Galerius, Severus, Maxentius, and Maximinus, and tells us how they came to be Emperors, and what was the occasion of the Divisions, and Wars that were raised between them. He represents in lively colours the horrid Cruelties which they exercised upon the poor Christians, and how by the visible Chastisement of God Almighty, they came to a lamentable End. This small Treatise is writ with a great deal of Flame and Elegance, and is exactly agreeable in the Historical Part to the Revolution of the Roman State under these Emperors. We find several Matters of Fact related there, which were unknown to us before, and many other Passages are illustrated, and set in a better light. He there discovers the Policy and Designs of all these Emperors; And lastly, makes it visibly appear, that the Hand of God was upon them to punish them for their Cruelty and ill Usage of the Christian Professors. There are few things in this Book that relate to the Doctrine of the Christians, but he seems to take notice, that St. Peter came not to Rome till the Beginning of Nero's Reign: And he likewise tells us, That as the Emperor Maximinus was offering Sacrifice, one of his Officers made the Sign of the Cross, and thereupon to their great trouble, the Demons disappeared.

Besides these Works, whereof we have already discoursed, there are three Poems attributed to Lactantius, which are not mentioned by St. Jerome, nor are to be found in the ancient Manuscripts; and therefore in all probability they are none of his.

The First, is a Poem concerning the History of the Phœnix, but the Author of this Piece was certainly no Christian but a Pagan; for he not only describes the Deluge like a Heathen, and contrary to Moses's Account, but he also speaks of Phœbus; as if he owned and acknowledged him for a God. The second Poem concerning Easter, is addressed to one Felix a Bishop, and was composed by a Christian Author, who lived after Lactantius; 'tis attributed to Venantius Fortunatus, upon the Testimony and Authority of some Manuscripts in the Vatican Library. The Third is about the Passion of Jesus Christ, but is not to be found in any ancient Manuscript of Lactantius; besides, it does not in the least come up to the Purity and (d) Six Thousand Years after its Creation.] So that he seems to have thought that there were no more than 200 Years to reckon from his own time to the Day of Judgment.

Lactantius. Eloquence of his Stile, and beſides he mentions the Adoration of the Croſs. There are likewiſe ſome Arguments upon Ovid's Metamorphoſis, and Notes upon the Thebais of Statius, that ſome Perſons have attributed to Lactantius, but they really belong to Lactantius Placidius, a Grammarian. They are quoted by Boetius and Sedulius.

Lactantius is the moſt Eloquent of all the Eccleſiaſtick Authors that wrote in Latin; His Stile is Pure, Equal and Natural; in a word, it is extremely like Cicero's, and he juſtly deſerves the Name of the Chriſtian Cicero, not only for the cleanneſs and purity of his Language; but alſo for the turn of his Phraſe, and his Way of Writing, which is ſo conformable to that of Tully, that the moſt accurate Criticks have been troubled to find out any difference between them: Nay, there have been ſome Perſons in the World, as we are informed by Picus Mirandula (e), who made no difficulty at all of preferring his Stile to Cicero's.

Be that as it will, we are very certain that Lactantius abundantly ſurpaſſeth Cicero in his Thoughts, becauſe the Matter of that Religion, which he ſo handſomly defends, does infinitely excel the Maxims and Doctrine of the Philoſophers. He confutes Paganiſm with all the Ardour and Spirit imaginable, and he likewiſe ſolidly eſtabliſhes the Chriſtian Religion. He diſcourſes of God after a very ſublime exalted manner; He explains the Divinity of the Word, and the Myſtery of the Incarnation in an Orthodox Way; He deſcribes the Creation of the World, and the Day of Judgment, by as lively and ſolemn a repreſentation as any Body has ever yet uſed; but at the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged, that he has ſometimes inſerted falſe, uncertain and fabulous things into his Diſcourſes. He is full of admirable Precepts of Morality; he lays down Deſcriptions of all the Virtues clearly and perſpicuouſly, and with an invincible Eloquence exhorts Mankind to the Practice of them; he ſhews them the way of Juſtice, and deterrs them from purſuing the Paths of Iniquity; he teaches them to honour God with a true ſincere Adoration, and to be throughly Penitent for their Sins. We ought however to own that he has handled Theology after a very Philoſophical manner; but that he did not examine all our Myſteries to the bottom, and that he has committed ſeveral Miſtakes.

Pope Damaſus writing to St. Jerome, is pleas'd to ſay, That he took no great pleaſure in reading Lactantius's Books; becauſe he frequently turned over ſeveral Pages, where he diſcourſeth of things that have no manner of Relation to our Religion.

St. Jerome paſſes this Judgment of him, That he was better able to deſtroy and confute the Errors of the Gentiles, than to maintain the Doctrine of the Chriſtians; He is accuſed of doubting whether the Holy Ghoſt was the third Perſon, and to have ſometimes confounded him with the Son, and ſometimes with the Father; but it may be alledged in his defence, That he meant nothing elſe, but that the Name of the Spirit in Scripture, is common to the Father and Son. But whatever the Matter is, we find no Footſteps of this Error in any of his Works that are now remaining, though in ſome places he takes occaſion to ſpeak of the Holy Ghoſt. He ſeems to have been of Opinion, that the Word was generated in time; but it is an eaſie matter to give a Catholick ſenſe to that Expreſſion, as we have ſeen it done to others, and we may be with Juſtice allow'd to do ſo, ſince he plainly eſtabliſhes the Divinity of the Word in that very place. His Opinion concerning Angels, that being ſent to guard and protect Men, they were afterward ſeduced by the Temptation of the Devil, and that falling in Love with Women, they begot Terreſtrial Demons upon them; as it is properly peculiar to him, ſo it is an erroneous Imagination without any Grounds to ſupport it. What he ſays about the End of the World, the Reign of a thouſand Years, the Fire of Judgment which will prove Men that have been Sinners, is common to him with divers other Authors; as alſo what he delivers about the ſtate of Souls after Death, being kept in a Common Priſon in expectation of the Day of Judgment, pretending that God created them all before the Creation of the World. I take no notice of ſeveral other Errors of leſs Conſequence, and ſome harſh Expreſſions, which may be interpreted in a favourable ſenſe (f). Lactantius.

The Works of this Author have been Printed often. The firſt Edition that appeared, was at Rome 1468. in Folio by Conradus Leweynheim. The Second at Rome 1470. was Reviſed by an Italian Biſhop. The third was at Venice 1472, and it was afterwards Printed in the ſame City in the Years 1483. 1490. 1493. Eraſmus, Thomaſius, Iſæus, Barthius, Thiſius, Thaddenſis, Galæus, have wrote Notes upon this Author, that are joyned together in this laſt Edition.

The laſt Edition is that which was Printed at Amſterdam, with the Commentaries of ſeveral Authors. I have been aſſured by a very Learned Man, That it is not only far from being the beſt, but that it is one of the worſt Editions that ever came out of this Author.

[Since the Edition of Amſterdam, Dr. Spark ſet out an Edition of Lactantius at Oxon. to which he annexed his Book De mortibus Perſecutorum, with Notes of his own, and a Diſſertation of Mr. Dodwell's De Ripa Striga; to explain a difficult Paſſage in that little Book. Before this Edition came out, it was Printed by it ſelf at Oxon. in 12°. in the year 1680. Corrected in many places by the Biſhops of Oxford and St. Aſaph, and by Dr. Iſaac Voſſius, who endeavoured to ſupply the Lacunæ, which were in Baluzius's Manuſcript Copy, from whence theſe Editions were taken. The Cambridge Edition 1685. in Octavo, of this little Book was taken from theſe. Since it was publiſhed again by it ſelf at Abo, with ſome Notes of Cuperus at the end, by Toinardus.]

(f) Interpreted in a favourable ſenſe.] In the First Book, Chapter the 7th. he ſays, That God made Himſelf. His meaning is, That he is of Himſelf, and was not Created. He tells us, Lib. 4. Cap. 14. That Jeſus Chriſt is never called God, leſt it ſhould be thought that there were two Gods. In the Fourth Book, Chap. 13th. he ſays, That the Son of God was made Man, that he might be Anthropos, as well as he was Arthrepos, which is a vain Conceit. He ſays, Lib. 2. Cap. 9. That Darkneſs is from the Devil, who imitates God; and in the Second Book, Chapter the 12th. That Man was compoſed of two Natures that ſtrive together; words that carry a Tincture of the Manichean Doctrine, unleſs they be favourably interpreted. In the Sixth Book, Chap. 13. He ſays, That Alms blot out the Sins of the Fleſh: And he ſeems in the ſame place to maintain, That they who ſin without Paſſion and without Surprize, ſhall never obtain Forgiveneſs for their Sins. In the Seventh Book, Chap. 5. and 14. he ſpeaks of Immortality after ſuch a manner, as might make us believe, that he was perſuaded that the firſt Man was created Mortal. He falls into horrible groſs Miſtakes in his Chronology; as for inſtance, when he tells us, Lib. 4. Cap. 5. that Moſes was 900 years, and Salomon an Hundred and Fifty before the taking of Troy. In the Third Book, Chap. 23. He denies that there are any ſuch thing as Antipodes.

COMMODIANUS.

Commodianus. HEre are two Authors of the Fourth Century, Whoſe Works have the ſame Character and Genius with thoſe that were compoſed by the Writers of the three firſt Centuries.

The firſt is called Commodianus: He is no where mentioned by the Ancients; but in reading his Poetry, 'tis an eaſie matter to ſee that it is not Suppoſititious. Gelaſius places his Books amongſt thoſe which he calls Apocryphal, becauſe the Millenary Opinion is here maintained, and Gennadius ſpeaks of this Author in the following Words, 'Commodianus giving up himſelf to the ſtudy of 'Human Learning, read alſo the Books of the Chriſtians. Commodianus. 'This gave him a favourable Opportunity of embracing 'the Faith. Being now become a Chriſtian, and deſirous 'to offer to Jeſus Chriſt the Author of his Salvation a 'Preſent befitting a Man of Learning, he wrote a Treatiſe againſt the Pagans in Verſe, which is compoſed in a 'middle Stile, neither Verſe, nor Proſe: And becauſe he 'had but ſlightly turned over our Authors, he was able 'to confute the Pagan Religion with more eaſe, than to Commodianus.

'eſtabliſh

'eſtabliſh that of the Chriſtians. Hence it is that he ſpeaks 'of the Divine Recompences after a groſs manner, fol-'lowing in this the Opinion of Tertullian, Lactantius and 'Papias. But his Morals are excellent, and he perſuades 'Men to embrace a voluntary Poverty. This is the O-pinion of Gennadius concerning this Author, who lived in the beginning of the Fourth Age, in the Time of Pope Sylveſter (a). he calls himſelf Commodianus (b), and by way of Alluſion Gazæus (c), and gives himſelf the Title of the Beggar of Jeſus Chriſt. He tells us, that he was once engaged in the Errors of the Heathens; but that he was converted by reading the Law of the Chriſtians. His Work is entituled, Inſtructions; and is compoſed after the faſhion of Verſe: I ſay after the faſhion of Verſe, becauſe he neither obſerves Meaſure, nor Cadence in it; but only takes care that every Line ſhall compriſe a finiſhed ſenſe, and ſhall begin with an Acroſtick, in ſuch a manner, that all the Letters of the Title of every Strophe are to be found one after another at the beginning of each Verſe; and thus by taking all the firſt Letters of the Verſe, we find the entire Title.

His Stile is harſh, his Words barbarous, and his Thoughts are ſeldom elevated. The Author appears to have been a Good Man, very ſimple, very humble, very charitable, throughly affected with the love of Jeſus Chriſt, zealous for his Religion, auſtere in his Morals, an enemy to Vice, far removed from the Pleaſures of the World, and a ſingular good Monk as Rigaltius has obſerved of him. Though after all, we muſt own, that he was not very ignorant; for there is a tolerable ſtore of Prophane Learning in his Work, and we meet there with ſeveral Remarks upon the Pagan Deities that are exceeding Curious and Rare, as well as Entertaining. He ſeems to have had a great deal of good Senſe, of Quickneſs, and Chriſtian Morality: This Treatiſe was for a long time buried in Obſcurity, and was lately found in our Days. Sirmondus had it Copied from an old Manuſcript, and Rigaltius made uſe of this Copy, and Printed it ſeparately in the Year 1650. We may divide it into three Parts. The Firſt, which contains Thirty ſix Strophes, is addreſſed to the Gentiles; whom he exhorts to embrace the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, after he has expoſed the Falſhood of the Divinities which they Adored. The ſecond is directed to the Jews; whom he likewiſe perſuades to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, ſhewing them, that the Law was merely Figurative. He there ſpeaks concerning Antichriſt, the laſt Judgment, and the Reſurrection. The Laſt is addreſſed to the Chriſtian Catechumens, to the Faithful, and to the Penitents, to whom he gives admirable Inſtructions in Morality. It begins at the Forty ſixth Strophe.

We find in this Author moſt of the Errors of the Ancients. He is of Opinion that the Demons were Angels, that were debauched with the love of Women; and that the Giants came from this Illegitimate Commerce; That the World will end after Six Thouſand Years; That Nero was Antichriſt; That there will be Two Reſurrections, That of the juſt before the Reign of the Thouſand Years, and the General one at the Day of Judgment; That the Juſt after the Firſt Reſurrection, ſhall live a Thouſand Years upon the Earth; That after that time, all Men ſhall be judged, the Wicked thrown headlong into Fire, and the whole face of Nature Changed. His Moral Inſtructions are very excellent. He recommends to the Conſideration of the Catechumens to lead a Life free from Sin. He adviſes the Penitents to Pray Night and Day, to live after an auſtere manner, that they may obtain Remiſſion of their Sins. He Exhorts the Faithful to avoid all Evil, and to baniſh from their Hearts the very motions of Hatred, aſſuring them, that Martyrdom will ſtand them in little ſtead, if they have an Averſion towards their Brethren. He repreſents to Apoſtates the greatneſs of their Sin, and admoniſhes all Chriſtians in general, that being Soldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, they ought continually to wage War with their Paſſions. He prohibits them to appear at the Prophane Shows. He adviſes Chriſtian Women to be modeſt, to avoid Luxury and Magnificence of Apparel. He gives incomparable Inſtructions to Miniſters and Prieſts, that they may acquit themſelves worthily in their Miniſtry, and perſuades them to lead a Life unblameable, and exempt from Avarice; but above all, to relieve the Neceſſities of the Poor. He counſels the Rich not to value themſelves the more highly upon the ſcore of their Riches, but to communicate part to the Indigent; to aſſiſt and viſit thoſe that are in Sickneſs, and to comfort thoſe that labour under Affliction. He ſays, That we ought not to lament the Death of our Children or Relations. He condemns all funeral Pomps, and proud Interments. He powerfully reprehends thoſe Perſons that don't obſerve Silence in the Church. 'The Prieſt of the 'Lord, ſays he, has ſaid, Lift up your Hearts to God; 'you anſwer, that you have; and yet immediately forget 'the Word. He prays to the Lord in behalf of the Peo-'ple, and in the mean time you are entertaining one another 'with Stories, you Laugh, you ſpeak evil of your Neigh-'bours, you talk inconſiderately, as if God were abſent, 'even he that has made all, that ſees all, and underſtands 'all. He adviſes thoſe that pray to God, to purifie their Hearts, before they addreſs themſelves to him by way of Prayer. In a word, the laſt part of his Inſtructions contains excellent Exhortations, to incline Chriſtians to the Love and Practice of Virtue, to turn them away from Vice, and his Remonſtrances concerning the corrupt manners of the Chriſtians, and the Irregularities of his own time, carry a very near reſemblance to thoſe of our Age.

Commodianus.

(a) IN the time of Pope Sylveſter.] Chap. 23. He exhorts the Pagans to joyn themſelves to the Congregation of Sylveſter; which plainly ſhews, that he lived at that time, and wrote in Rome or in Italy, though his Stile is African.

(b) Commodianus.] At the end of his Work he tells us, that his Name may be found out by ſearching after it in his Verſes; now if we may take the firſt Letters of every Verſe in the laſt Strophe, and put them together, we ſhall find Commodianus Mendicus Chriſti.

(c) Gazæus.] In all probability he is ſo called à Gaza, as he is named Commodianus à Commodis.

JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS.

THis Author, of whom none of the Ancients have made mention, has written a Treatiſe, Intituled, Of the Errors of prophane Religions, which he has addreſſed to the Emperors Conſtantius and Conſtans, the Sons of Conſtantine. The Stile and Matter of this Book abundantly convince us, that it is no ſpurious Piece, and the Title it carries, gives us an occaſion to conjecture, that it was writ after the Death of Conſtantine, the eldeſt Son of Conſtantine the Great, which happened in the year 340, and before that of Conſtans, who was ſlain by Magnentius in the year 350, for it being addreſſed to Conſtantius and Conſtans, there is reaſon to believe that Conſtantine their eldeſt Brother was already dead, and 'tis very evident that Conſtans was then alive. We don't know what the Author was, of what Country, or of what Profeſſion. Baronius believes that he was Biſhop of Milan (a); but without any ſolid Foundation. There are eight Books of Aſtronomy that bear the ſame Name. Now ſome Perſons are of Opinion that they were compoſed by another Author. Labbé maintains, that they belong to the ſame Man (b); but we cannot poſitively aſſert either one or the other. This Treatiſe De Errore profanæ Religionis was printed at Venice in the year 1499. At Baſil by Herwagius in 1533. At Strasburgh in 1562. And afterwards with Wouverus's Notes by Frobenius in 1603. Afterwards it was joined with Minutius Felix, and printed at Amſterdam in 1645. and in 1652. At Leyden in 1562, in Quarto. 'Tis likewiſe to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum. And laſtly, it was put at the end of the laſt Edition of St. Cyprian, which was printed at Paris 1666. The Author of it Diſcovers the Original of all the ſeveral Religions amongſt the Pagans, and ſhews the abſurdity of them. In the firſt place, he ſhews how prodigiouſly Men have debaſed themſelves in making Gods of (a) BAronius believes, that he was Biſhop of Milan.] Baronius imagines that he was Biſhop of Milan in the time of Julius, and that he aſſiſted at a Council held at Rome under that Pope. There is indeed mention made of one Maternus a Biſhop of Milan, who ſuffered in Dioclefian's time in the Martyrologies of the 18th of July. But he that was the Author of this Treatiſe, never took upon him the Quality of a Biſhop; and we don't find it related in any Authors of Credit and Reputation in the World, that there ever was a Biſhop of Milan of that Name. On the contrary, it appears by St. Athanaſius, That in the time of Julius there was no Biſhop of that Name at Milan: And the Roman Council, of which Baronius is to be underſtood, is a Chimerical Council invented by Iſidorus.

(b) Labbè maintains, that they belong to the ſame man.] Poſſevinus and Simlerus diſtinguiſh them, and call the laſt the younger of the two. Labbè pretends, that he lived in the years 334 and 337, and according to this Computation, he might perhaps be the Author of the Treatiſe, De errore profanæ Religionis.

Lactantius

the four Elements. Secondly, he lays open the Extract and Riſe of the fabulous Deities, giving an hiſtorical Account of thoſe things which the Poets have ſo diſguiſed in Fiction. In the third place, he demonſtrates the Abſurdity and Impiety of the Pagan Theology, where ſeveral Perſons have had the good luck to drop into an Almightyſhip, only for being more exquiſitely villainous than the reſt of their Fellow-Creatures. In the fourth place, he takes occaſion to refreſh their Memories with ſeveral particulars relating to their Gods, as how they have been ſlain, wounded, and ill-uſed by Men. Fifthly, he pretends that the Religion of the Ægyptians derived its Original from Joſeph, and that their God Serapis is the ſame with the above-mentioned Patriarch, who is ſo called, becauſe he was the Son of Sarah. (This Reaſon in my opinion appears to be weak, and ill-grounded.) Sixthly, he obſerves, that Men have Deified abundance of things which they either love, or have frequent occaſion for; and thus they call Eating and Drinking their Dii Penates, or their houſhold Gods: Thus Veſta is the domeſtick Fire we daily uſe, and the ſame Judgment may be paſſed of ſeveral others, and for this Reaſon it has happened, that the Names of their Gods denote the Properties of natural things. In a word, he deſcribes and enumerates the prophane Signs, or myſterious Words that are uſed by the Pagans in their way of Worſhip, and he applies them to Jeſus Chriſt with a great deal of Wit. To ſay the Truth, this Treatiſe is exceeding elegant, and is abundantly ſtored with a great deal of profound Learning; the Author of it ſhews a conſiderable Stock of Knowledge, Wit, and Eloquence; he frequently exhorts the Emperors to deſtroy the Pagan Temples, to ſuppreſs their Religion, and to make uſe of ſtrong and violent Remedies, to cure Men of their Maladies, and to retrieve them from their Extravagancies and Errors. At the ſame time he exhorts all Men to feed and nouriſh themſelves with the Bread of Jeſus Chriſt, which is his Word and his Doctrine, (for he does not ſpeak of the Euchariſt in this place, as ſome Perſons have vainly imagined) to embrace the Light, and come to the Marriage of the Celeſtial Bridegroom. He tells us there, that God made himſelf Man to ſave us, and reſtore us to that Immortality, which we loſt and forfeited by the Fall of Adam; that if he had not aſſumed a Body in the Womb of the Virgin, and ſuffered an ignominious Death for the ſake of Mankind, all the Jews, even thoſe of the Old Teſtament, had never been in a Capacity of obtaining Salvation. He teaches us, that the Soul is immortal and ſpiritual, and that the Demons were frequently diſturbed, and ejected out of the Bodies of thoſe Perſons, whom they had poſſeſſed, by the powerful Prayers and Interceſſions of the Chriſtians. He acquaints us with ſeveral Figures or Types of the Croſs, drawn out of the Old Teſtament. Laſtly, to ſpeak a Word or two concerning his Morals; he ſeverely declaims and inveighs againſt thoſe that diſguiſe themſelves in Female Habits. Theſe are the Principal and moſt conſiderable Heads that are diſcourſed of in this Treatiſe. As for his Aſtronomical, and Mathematical Books, they are divided into eight Parts. That Work was firſt printed by Aldus Manutius at Venice, in the year 1499. Reviewed by one who calls himſelf Paſcennius, and afterwards printed in the ſame place in 1501. Laſtly, it was publiſhed at Baſil by Hervagius, and corrected by Bucherius in the year 1551.

Lactantius

EUSEBIUS of Cæſarea.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

Euſebius Sirnamed Pamphilus (a), was born in Paleſtine (b), towards the latter end of the reign of Galienus (c). He was ordained Prieſt by Agapius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, and ſettled a famous School in that City. When the Perſecution of Diocleſian aroſe, he exhorted the Chriſtians of Cæſarea to ſuffer with Courage for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and more particularly aſſiſted his dear Friend Pamphilus, who ſuffered Martyrdom after two years Impriſonment. Some have accus'd him of offering Incenſe to Idols during this Perſecution (d), to releaſe himſelf out of Priſon; but this Accuſation is groundleſs, and 'tis much more probable, that he continued alway ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt (e). Immediately after this Perſecution was ended, Euſebius was choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea in the room of Agapius (f), in the year 313, or 314, from the Birth of Chriſt: And from that time he was much engaged in the Controverſie of Arius, a Presbyter of Alexandria, whom he (as well as other Biſhops of Paleſtine) at firſt protected, thinking that he was unjuſtly perſecuted by Alexander of Alexandria his Biſhop. He did not only write to this Biſhop in favour of Arius; but finding that he could not prevail to reſtore him, he permitted him and his Followers to keep their places, and to hold the ordinary Aſſemblies of the faithful in their Churches, upon condition that they ſhould ſubmit to their Biſhop, and earneſtly deſire to be re-united to his Communion.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

It appears by a Letter of Euſebius to Alexander, which is produced in the ſecond Council of Nice, that he did verily think that Arius, and thoſe of his Party, acknowledged the Eternity of the Word, and that he believed the contrary Doctrine was falſly charged upon them, which

(a) Sirnamed Pamphilus.] From the Name of the Martyr Pamphilus his Friend, and not of his Brother, as Nicephorus believed; for in the ſeventh book of his Hiſtory, he ſays, That he was firſt acquainted with him when he was a Prieſt.

(b) Paleſtine.] All the Ancients call him Euſebius of Paleſtine. In the firſt book of the Life of Conſtantine, he teſtifies, that he had his Education in Paleſtine, and in the ſecond book of the ſame Work, after he has repeated a Law of Conſtantine directed to thoſe of Paleſtine, he adds, This was the firſt letter which Conſtantine addreſſed unto us. 'Tis not known who were his Kindred. Some have thought that he was the Kinſman of Euſebius of Nicomedia, becauſe in a Letter of Arius to this Biſhop, Euſebius of Cæſarea is called his brother. Neither is it known who were his Maſters. In the ſeventh book of his Hiſtory, he ſays, that he heard Dorotheus a Prieſt of Antioch, expound the Scriptures; from whence Trithemius, and ſome others, have concluded that he was his Scholar. Acacius Succeſſor to Euſebius wrote his Life, but 'tis loſt.

(c) Towards the latter end of the reign of Galienus.] There is ſome proof of this Epocha: For in his Hiſtory book 3. ch. 28. he ſays, that Denys of Alexandria, who died the 12th year of the reign of Galienus, lived in his time: And in the fifth book he ſays, that Paulus Samoſatenus revived the error of Artemon in his time; and in his ſeventh book, where he gives an Account of what was done under Galienus, he ſays, After we have related the tranſactions of former times, we come now to thoſe things which happened in our own time.

(d) Some have accuſed him of offering Incenſe to Idols during this Perſecution, &c.] This he was charged with by Potamon a Confeſſor and Biſhop of Egypt, at the Synod of Tyre; for if we give credit to St. Epiphanius, in Hereſie 68, this Biſhop perceiving Euſebius of Cæſarea there preſent, cry'd out, O Euſebius, How came you to ſit as Judge upon the innocent Athanaſius? Who can endure it? Tell me, I pray you, were not we in Priſon together in the time of Perſecution? I loſt an Eye there, for maintaining the Truth, but you have loſt no part of your body, you have ſuffered nothing: How then did you get out of priſon? Epiphanius adds, that Euſebius hearing this, roſe up and diſſolv'd the Aſſembly, ſaying, Seeing you charge me with things of this nature, in a place where you are Strangers, it muſt be true which your Accuſers ſay; for if you exerciſe ſuch Tyranny here, much more will you do it in your own Country. This is confirmed by the Biſhops of the Council of Alexandria, who ſay in their Letter, That Euſebius of Cæſarea was accuſed by the Confeſſors of ſacrificing to Idols. In the mean time, this Charge of Potamon is groundleſs: For although it were true, that Euſebius was caſt into Priſon for the Faith of Chriſt, it does not follow that he muſt have ſacrificed to Idols to obtain his Liberty, becauſe he loſt no part of his body, ſince he might have been delivered from that Perſecution for many other Reaſons, without loſing any of his Members; and it was a raſh Cenſure of his Neighbour in Potamon, to accuſe, as he does, a Biſhop of ſo heinous a Crime, upon ſo weak a Conjecture as this; but the good Man had more Zeal than Prudence.

(e) 'Tis much more probable that he continued alway ſtedfaſt in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt.] Firſt, becauſe we muſt always think well of our Neighbour, when it does not evidently appear that he has done ill. Secondly, becauſe 'tis no ways probable, if he had committed ſuch a Crime, when he was Prieſt, that he would have been afterwards choſen Biſhop of Cæſarea.

(f) In the room of Agapius.] Baronius and Blondel place Agricolaus between Agapius and Euſebius, whoſe Name is to be found among the Subſcriptions of the Council of Ancyra. But Euſebius in his ſeventh book reckoning up the Names of thoſe Biſhops who governed the Church while the Perſecution laſted, endeth his Catalogue of the Biſhops of Cæſarea with Agapius, of whom he ſays, that he took a great deal of pains for his Flock during that Perſecution: And Euſebius himſelf was ordained immediately after the Perſecution; for he aſſiſted in the quality of a Biſhop, at the Dedication of the Church of Tyre, which was done immediately after peace was reſtored to the Church, before Licinus had taken arms againſt Conſtantine, which happened in the year 313. And therefore, if there was one Agricolaus Biſhop of Cæſarea, he did not hold that See for any long time, for Euſebius was ordained ſo it in the year 314.

may in some measure excuse his Proceedings in this Affair: For as soon as Arius did clearly discover his impious Sentiments in the Council of Nice; Eusebius with all the other Bishops, condemned them, and proposed a very Orthodox Confession of Faith. But because it seemed not to renounce the Heresie of Arius formally enough, therefore the Fathers of the Council added to it the word Consubstantial, together with Anathematisms against the Errors of Arius. This new term Consubstantial, gave some trouble to Eusebius, and he refused at first to assent to it; but being afterwards fully satisfied of its true meaning, he made no scruple of subscribing to it, and of signing the Confession of Faith made by the Council of Nice, which he was never known afterwards openly to violate, though he always maintained an intimate Correspondence with the Bishops of Arius's Party. He was present with them at the Council of Antioch, held in the year 330. wherein they unjustly depos'd Eustathius, then Bishop of Antioch. But, if he was to be blam'd for consenting to that unjust Deprivation of a Bishop who was his Enemy; yet it must be acknowledged that he deserves great Commendation for refusing to succeed him in his See: For being elected both by the Bishops and the People, in order to his Ordination to the Bishoprick of Antioch, after the deposing of Eustathius, he did absolutely refuse it; and when the Bishops wrote about it to the Emperor Constantine, that he would oblige Eusebius to agree to this Election, he wrote to him himself, humbly praying that he might have leave to refuse this Bishoprick; which at last the Emperor granted, and greatly commended his Moderation. Nevertheless, Eusebius continued always to take part with Eusebius of Nicomedia, and assisted at the Council of Tyre, held against St. Athanasius, in the year 325, and also at the Assembly of Bishops, which was held at Jerusalem at the time of the Dedication of the Church of that City: And in fine, he was sent in the Name of those Bishops to the Emperor Constantine, to justifie what they had done against St. Athanasius. Then it was, that he spoke a Panegyrick in honour of the Emperor, at a time of publick rejoycing for beginning the 30th year of his reign, which was the last of his Life; And Eusebius himself did not long survive this Emperor, whom he mightily loved and honoured, for he also died about the year 338.

He has written many very learned Books. The first were his five Books of Apology for Origen, which he compos'd with the Holy Martyr Pamphilus, during the Persecution of Diocletian; and to which he only added a Sixth, after the Death of this Martyr. About the same time he wrote a Treatise against Hierocles, who had written two Books against the Christian Religion. After he was chosen Bishop of Cæsarea, he compos'd his fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, and twenty Books of Evangelical Demonstration (g): After this he wrote a Chronicle from the Beginning of the World down to the 20th. Year of Constantine the Great. After this Chronicle follow'd his Ecclesiastical History (h), divided into ten Books, which seems to have been finish'd some time after the Council of Nice, though it reaches no further than the 20th Year of Constantine. About the Year 332, he compos'd a Cycle for Easter, at the desire of the Emperor, to whom he dedicated it, and caus'd some very fair Copies of the Holy Scriptures to be written out, as he himself tells us in the fourth Book of the Life of Constantine, Chap. 34, and 35. St. Jerome and Bede make mention of this Paschal Cycle of Eusebius, compos'd, as they say, in imitation of that of Hippolytus. His Books against Marcellus of Ancyra were written after the first Condemnation of that Heretick in the Council of Constantinople, held in the Year 335, or 336 (i). In short, the four Books of the Life of Constantine, were compos'd after the Death of that Emperor, to which he has added three Tracts, viz. The Harangue which he made at the Dedication of the Church of Jerusalem, the Discourse of Constantine to the Convention of the Saints, and a Panegyrick in Praise of this Emperor.

Besides these Works, whose Chronology is known, he hath also written, as St. Jerome testifies, five Books of the Theophany, or the Incarnation, ten Books of Commentaries upon Isaiah, thirty Books against Porphyrie, ten whereof were lost in St. Jerome's time; and a Book of Topography, which is the same that St. Jerome translated and entituled, a Book of the Country of the Hebrews, which was afterwards publish'd in Greek by Bonfrerius in the Year 1631. There is mention made in this Book of two other Tracts of the same Nature, whereof one contains an explication of the Names which the Hebrews give to other Nations, and the other was a Topographical Description of the Holy-Land and the Temple. St. Jerome also places in the Catalogue of Eusebius's Works, three Books of the life of Pamphilus, some little Tracts upon the Martyrs (k), the Commentaries upon the 150 Psalms, translated afterwards by Eusebius of Verceilles, and the Rules for reconciling the four Evangelists, together with a Letter to Carpianus. He mentions also, in an Epistle to Pammachius, Eusebius's Commentary upon the first Epistle to the Corinthians; and he testifieth in another place, that he caus'd to be publish'd an Edition of the Version of the Septuagint, taken from the Hexapla of Origen. St. Basil cites a Treatise of Eusebius concerning the Polygamy of the Patriarchs, of which Eusebius himself speaks, Book I. Chap. 9. of the Demonstration, and Book VII. Chap. 3. and 7, of the Preparation. In fine, Theodoret tells us, that Eusebius wrote Eclogues upon the whole Scriptures: But we must not forget the Letter which he wrote to the Cæsareans mention'd by Theodoret in his History, nor those Letters to Alexander and Euphration concerning Arius, which are cited in the second Council of Nice, Act. 5. and 6. To these we may add, the Letter to the Empress Constantia, which is quoted by the Bishops that condemn'd Images, whereof there is a Testimony related in the same Council, Act. 6. Photius mentions a Book of Eusebius entituled, Apology and Refutation, that is to say, an Apology for the Religion of Christ, and a Refutation of the Errors of the Gentiles, divided into two Books; and also two other Books, which were, as he says, very little different from the two former. The Commentary upon the Canticles, publish'd by Meursius, is falsly ascribed to Eusebius, since in it are cited the Testimonies of Authors much later than Eusebius, such as Gregory Nyssen, Philo Carpathius, and many others. It is not certain, that Eusebius was the Author of that little Tract of the Life of the Prophets, publish'd in Greek before Procopius, by Curterius, from a Manuscript of the Cardinal of Rochefoucauld, and printed at Paris in the Year 1580, though it appears to be ancient. To conclude, there are some Treatises or Discourses publish'd by Sirmondus, which are believed to be a Translation from the Greek of Eusebius of Cæsarea: But though these Treatises, which seem indeed to be translated from the Greek, were compos'd by some ancient Author, and have something of the Air and Genius of Eusebius's Writings, neither do they contain any thing unworthy of him; yet there is no full assurance that they are his, because they are not mention'd by any of the Ancients, and we cannot now judge with any certainty from a Version, of the Stile of Eusebius.

Eusebius of Cæsarea.

After we have given a Catalogue of all the Writings of Eusebius, whereof we have any Testimony, we must now Discourse more largely of those that are come to our Hands. His Ecclesiastical History is the most considerable of all his Books, which is a Collection of all the Memorable things which happen'd in the Church from the Birth of Jesus Christ to his own time. He has exactly noted the Succession of Bishops to the Sees of all the Great Cities in the World; he has given an Account of Ecclesiastical Writers and their Books, together with the History of Heresies, and some Remarks concerning the Jews. He has described the Persecutions of the Martyrs, the Controversies and Disputes touching Ecclesiastical Discipline; and, in a Word, all things which concern the Affairs of the Church. He Writes nothing of History as from himself, but almost every where, in his Works, he cites the ancient Authors or their Monuments, from whence he had his Relations, and inserts long Extracts taken out of them, as Men usually do when they write Annals or Memoirs. This manner of writing History, is less agreeable indeed, but much more profitable than any other, and gains Credit and Weight to that which is related: For when a Writer reports the Transactions of (g) After he was chosen Bishop of Cæsarea, he compos'd his fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, and twenty Books of Evangelical Demonstration.] These are cited in his Ecclesiastical History, B. I. Ch. 2. Blondel believes the contrary, that the History is cited in the sixth Book of his Evangelical Demonstration, Ch. 23, but he was deceived by the Translation.

(h) After this Chronicle followed his Ecclesiastical History.] He saith expressly in the beginning of his History, that the Chronicle was written before it, in these Words, Formerly I made an Abridgment of these things in my Chronicle, but now I will give a more ample Declaration of them here in this work.

(i) His Books against Marcellus of Ancyra were written after the first Condemnation of that Heretick in the Council of Constantinople held in the Year 335, or 336.] They are Dedicated to Flacillus Bishop of Antioch, who was not chosen Bishop of that Church until the year 335. Besides, in the first Book of Ecclesiastical Theology, Ch. 14. he says, That Marcellus was condemned.

(k) Some little Tracts upon the Martyrs.] We have one Book of these Tracts concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, but it is probable that he wrote more. The Martyrology supposed to be translated by St. Jerome, has been ascribed to him, but that Work is none of his, neither is the Translation St. Jerome's.

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

Ancient Times without citing the Authors from whence he had them, he cannot ſo eaſily gain Credit with his Readers, as when he cites his Vouchers, and produces their Teſtimonies for the Truth of what he ſays, ſince thoſe Relations muſt certainly be agreeable to Truth, which are founded on the Authority of unqueſtionable Witneſſes. But beſides this general Reaſon, there is alſo a particular one, why this way of writing Hiſtory, which is followed by Euſebius, is of wonderful Advantage unto us; which is this, that for the moſt part, thoſe Authors and their Works which were more ancient than Euſebius, have been loſt ſince his Death by the injury of time; and therefore we are mightily oblig'd to him who hath preſerved in his Hiſtory, not only the Memory of thoſe Authors, but ſome conſiderable Fragments of their Works. In ſhort, without the Hiſtory of Euſebius, we ſhould ſcarce have any Knowledge, not only of the Hiſtory of thoſe firſt Ages of the Church, but even of the Authors that wrote at that time, and their Works, ſince no other Writer but he, has given an Account of thoſe things. For it is obſervable that the Hiſtorians who followed after him, as Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, begun their Hiſtory where he ended his, either becauſe they thought that he had Collected in his all that was Remarkable of thoſe firſt Ages, or becauſe they had no other way of coming to the Knowledge of them but by him. Nicephorus Calliſtus, who pretended to write a New Hiſtory in the Fourteenth Century, has mixt in it a great many fabulous and uncertain Tales, becauſe they were not taken out of Euſebius, nor confirm'd by the Authority of any Ancient Author. Nevertheleſs, it muſt be confeſs'd, That even the Hiſtory of Euſebius is not altogether ſo perfect as were to be wiſh'd, for it is not written ſmoothly, neither is it always exact (l). Our Author does often enlarge too much upon thoſe things that ought to be ſlightly paſs'd over; and on the contrary, ſometimes he expreſſes ſuch things very ſuccinctly, which deſerve a much larger Account. But notwithſtanding theſe Faults, it is a moſt Excellent Hiſtory, and highly to be priz'd.

There is at the End of the Eighth Book, a ſmall Tract of the Martyrs of Palæſtine, in which he deſcribes the Martyrdom of thoſe that ſuffered in this Province for the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. Some have confounded this with the eighth Book, but againſt Reaſon; for it is a diſtinct Tract, and, as it were, a Supplement to it.

Ruffinus is the firſt who Tranſlated this Hiſtory of Euſebius, but he, according to his uſual manner, took a great liberty in doing it. He has paſt over the whole Tenth Book, and has added to it two more which contain the following Hiſtory down to the Death of Theodoſius. His Tranſlation is clean, neat, and elegant enough, it gives the Senſe and Thought of the Author in a very agreeable Stile, and ſometimes more faithfully than thoſe Interpreters who have tranſlated him ſince. This Verſion has been the great Magazine to all the Latin Authors, who have drawn from thence whatever they either wrote or underſtood of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Firſt Ages.

Muſculus the Proteſtant undertook a new Tranſlation of the Hiſtory of Euſebius, which he performed happily enough. He ties himſelf up very much to the Letter, and has tranſlated the Text with much politeneſs and brevity: But he does not always underſtand his Author aright, and ſo he has committed many Faults in his Verſion. The Tranſlation of Chriſtophorſon is more Elegant, and his Stile more Ciceronian, but it is too Copious for an Hiſtorian, whoſe Stile ſhould be conciſe and cloſe. He hath Corrected many Faults of Muſculus, and yet his own Verſion is not altogether free.

The Learned Henricus Valeſius having obſerved the Faults of all the former Verſions, undertook to make a new one, more perfect. He publiſhed it with the Greek Text, reviſed by four Manuſcripts, and added to it moſt learned Notes. His Verſion deſerves univerſal Applauſe, and the ſingular eſteem of all Learned Men, for it has two qualities that rarely meet together, being both Elegant and Literal; And yet the Criticks have obſerved ſome Faults in it: But it is impoſſible to ſatisfie all Men, and very difficult to avoid all Miſtakes, in a Work of ſo great a length. Euſebius of Cæſarea.

It was very fit that the Hiſtory of Euſebius ſhould be Tranſlated, that thoſe who neither underſtand Greek nor Latin might not be depriv'd of the Hiſtory of the Church in its Original Purity. The Preſident Couſin has done the Publick this Service, who has Tranſlated this Hiſtory into French, with as great Purity as Faithfulneſs, and has prefix'd to his Verſion a Preface, wherein he briefly takes notice of the principal Errors of Euſebius, and paſſes a very ſound and ſolid Judgment upon his Hiſtory and his Perſon.

The Chronicle of Euſebius, or the Abridgment of the Univerſal Hiſtory of all Times and Places from the Beginning of the World down to his own time, was divided into two Parts: The firſt was entituled, Canons of Univerſal Hiſtory, or Univerſal Chronography; and the Second, Chronical Canons. In the firſt, he has collected the Origin and Hiſtory of all Nations ſeverally, the Succeſſion of all Kings and Princes of the World, of the High-Prieſts of the Jews, and the Biſhops of the Chief Churches from the Birth of Jeſus Chriſt. In the ſecond, he has enlarg'd and digeſted theſe Hiſtories according to the order of Time. St. Jerome has tranſlated both Parts (m): But there was nothing remaining of the Tranſlation of the Firſt, but ſome Extracts containing the Names of Kings, which are Printed with the Verſion of the Second Part. This Tranſlation of St. Jerome which was thus Printed at Baſil, was afterwards Publiſh'd more exactly by Arnaud de Pontac, Biſhop of Bazas, in the Year 1605. But none took care to Collect the Greek Fragments of the Original of Euſebius, before the famous Joſeph Scaliger, who Publiſh'd them in the Year 1606, in a Book entituled, The Treaſure of Time; wherein he gives a larger Verſion of the Firſt Part of the Chronicle than any other Edition, and renders the Verſion of the ſecond Part more Correct and Exact; to which he adds many very conſiderable Greek Fragments, taken out of ſome later Greek Authors.

This Book of Euſebius is a Work of Prodigious Study, and moſt accompliſh'd Learning: For he muſt have read an infinite number of Books and Ancient Monuments, to compoſe ſuch an Univerſal Hiſtory; and at the ſame time he muſt have a well-poiz'd Judgment, to collect ſo many Particulars, and relate every one of them in their proper time. This infinite Labour, is an evident Proof, that Euſebius was a Man of vaſt Reading and a Prodigious Memory: Nevertheleſs, it muſt be confeſs'd, that the Chronicle of Africanus was a great help to him, and that he took almoſt all his Chronicle, from Africanus's Chronicon, which he had Copied. He corrected indeed ſome of the Faults which he found in him, but then he himſelf committed many more (n): and indeed it is next to impoſſible to avoid all Errors in ſo long and knotty a Work as an Univerſal Chronicle. Theſe Faults are pardonable in a Book of this Nature, and do not hinder, but that it ought to be eſteemed one of the moſt uſeful Books of all Antiquity.

The Four Books of the Life of Conſtantine, are, properly ſpeaking, a Panegyrick; in which, he gives an Account as an Orator, rather than as an Hiſtorian; not only of the Life of this Emperor, but alſo of the Revolutions of the Empire, and the Affairs of the Church, in which Conſtantine had a hand. The Stile of this Work is more Sublime and Florid than that of the other Books of Euſebius, and yet it is not finer, nor more agreeable. He does nothing for the moſt part, but give ſlight hints of the Relations which he has given at large elſewhere, and deliver the Heads of them, leaving out the Circumſtances and Particulars.

He has added at the End of thoſe Four Books, Conſtantine's Oration to the Convention of the Saints, i. e. to the Chriſtians, and a Harangue in Praiſe of this (l) Neither is it always Exact.] Many Faults are obſerved in it contrary to the Truth of Hiſtory, and contrary to Chronology. In his firſt Book he ſaith, That the Taxing which Joſephus ſpeaks of in his Eighteenth Book of the Hiſtory of the Jews, is the ſame that St. Luke writes of. In the ſame Book, Ch. 9. he ſays, That Lyſanias Tetrarch of Abylene was Brother to Philip, and Herod the younger, which is not true. In Ch. 7. he ſays, that Herod Junior, was baniſhed to Vienna, contrary to the Teſtimony of Joſephus, who aſſures us, Book XVIII. Ch. 9. That he was ſent to Lyons. He thinks that Jeſus Chriſt ſpent four Years in his preaching. He is miſtaken in the Epocha of the Voyage of St. Paul to Jeruſalem. In Book I. Ch. 12. he diſtinguiſhes Cephas who was rebuked at Antioch by St. Paul, from the Apoſtle St. Peter, tho' he was certainly the ſame. I ſhall not mention his other Faults, which he committed by taking things upon hear-ſay, nor the Apochryphal Books, which he cites very often. He miſtakes the Jews of Alexandria, mentioned by Philo, called Therapeutæ, for Chriſtians. B. II. Ch. 17. he confounds Novatus and Novatianus. B. VI. Ch. 45. he makes miſtakes in the years of the Pontificates of Sixtus and Eutychianus.

(m) St. Jerome has tranſlated both Parts.] St. Jerome in his Commentary upon Daniel, Ch. 9. ſaith, that there was found in the Verſion of the Chronicle of Euſebius an Explication of two Paſſages of Scripture, both which were in his Firſt Part. Marcellinus ſays alſo plainly, That St. Jerome tranſlated the firſt Part. St. Jerome in the Preface to his Verſion ſays, that he tranſlated Euſebius word for word, from the time of Abraham to the taking of Troy; and that from the taking of Troy to the time of Conſtantine, he had added many things of his own Head, particularly about thoſe Matters that concern the Roman Hiſtory, which Euſebius had neglected; and that he was the Author of what follows after the time of Conſtantine, down to the Sixth Conſulſhip of Valens.

(n) But then he himſelf committed many more Errors in Chronology.] You may ſee them obſerv'd by Scaliger in the Prolegomena to his Treaſure of Time.

Emperor

Eusebius of Cæsarea.

Emperor, which he spoke before him at the Festival Solemnity of the 30th Year of his Reign. In this Piece he enlarges upon the Praises of God, the Wonders of his Providence, the Mystery of the Incarnation, the Benefits of Jesus Christ to Mankind, more than upon the Commendation of the Emperor, which he intermixes only now and then; for he praises him as a Christian Prince ought to be prais'd; that is to say, by publishing those Virtues which have a relation to Piety and Religion. This Discourse is the most Eloquent of all his Works, and is compos'd with much Art and Fineness.

The Fifteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, address'd to Theodorus (who is believed to have been Bishop of Laodicea) and is mention'd in the 32d. Chapter of the Seventh Book of his Ecclesiastick History) were written on purpose to dispose the Minds of Men to embrace the Christian Religion. In them Eusebius shews, that the Theology of the Pagans was ridiculous, and contrary to good Sense; and That the Christian Theology was Holy and Reasonable. The first Part of this Proposition he proves in the First Six Books, and the second Part in the other Nine. He begins with a general Description of the Doctrine of Christ, and to render it the more enticing, he gives an account of the Ineffable Blessings it has revealed to Mankind, and how it conduces to Piety, by teaching them to know and honour one God. After this he alledges some Prejudices in favour of the Christian Religion, such as the accomplishment of Prophecies, the Holiness of the Lives of Christians, and the wonderful facility, which all Persons, even those that were more dull and barbarous, found in comprehending the greatest and sublimest Truths. After he has thus disposed his Readers to be favourable to the Christian Religion, he destroys the Religions of all the Nations of the World, and lays open the Falshood of every one of them in particular, not only as to what concerns their History, but as to their pretended Mysteries and prophane Morality. In the Fourth Book, he confutes the strongest Argument of the Pagans, taken from the Predictions of their Oracles. He shews, that the Gods whom they worship'd were evil Spirits, call'd Demons, as the Philosophers themselves have acknowledg'd. In the Sixth Book he opposes Destiny or fatal Necessity, and proves there by many reasons and Testimonies, that Man is entirely a free Agent.

In the following Nine Books, he shews that the Christians had reason to embrace the Theology of the Hebrews, because none but that affords solid Foundations for a Sincere Piety, together with Sound and true Doctrine. This he proves by a particular Induction of their Opinions, because there is no Theology but this which teaches the immortality of the Soul, which commands Men to Adore one God only; which informs them, that he was the Creator of the World, which teaches them that the Word is the Son of God, and that the Holy Ghost is to be Worship'd with the same Worship that is due to the Father and the Son; There is no other Religion but this, which teaches Men, that they must not Adore the Angels as Gods, but honour them as the Ministers of God; which gives a rational account of the Fall of some of the Angels, and instructs Man that he is made after the Image of God: In a Word, there is none but this, whose Doctrine is agreeable to Right Reason. After this, he subjoyns a long Fragment out of a Treatise of Maximus, which demonstrates that Matter is not Eternal.

In the Eighth Book he gives the History of the version of the Septuagint, and to prove the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, he makes it appear by the Testimony of the Jews, that their Law is Mystical and very Significant, which he afterwards represents as worthy of all Esteem by the holiness of their Lives who have embrac'd it, by the Example of the Essenes, whose manner of Life he describes and by the Wisdom of Philo.

In the Ninth Book, he relates the Testimonies of the Pagans, who have spoken in favour of the Jewish Religion, and of those who allow the Truth of Moses's History. In the 10th he shews, that Plato and the Pagan Philosophers have taken the greatest part of what they have written, from the Books of Moses. In the 11th Book he demonstrates particularly, That the Doctrine of Plato is agreeable to that of Moses, and compares many of the Opinions of that Philosopher with those of the Jews. He carries on that Comparison in the 12th and 13th Books. But in the mean time, he demonstrates that this Philosopher had his Errors, and that no Book but the Scriptures is wholly free. In the 14th and 15th Books, he relates the Opinions of the Philosophers, he shews their Contradictions, and oftentimes confutes one of them by another: From all which he concludes, that the Christians had reason to forsake the Religion of the Pagans, and embrace that of the Jews.

After he has thus prepar'd the Minds of Men to receive the Christian Religion, by establishing the Authority of the Religion, and of the Books of the Jews, he demonstrates the Truth of it against the Jews themselves by their own Prophecies. This is the Subject of his Books of Evangelical Demonstration, of which there are only Ten remaining of Twenty which he compos'd. In the First Book he shews, that the Law of the Jews was calculated for one Nation only, but the New Testament was design'd for all Mankind; That the Patriarchs had no other Religion but that of the Christians, since they ador'd the same God and the same Word, honour'd him as they do, and resembled their holy Lives. In the second Book he shews by the Prophecies, that the Messias was to come into the World for all Mankind. In the Third he makes it appear in favour of the Faithful, that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the World, and demonstrates against the Infidels that he was no Seducer, as his Doctrine, his Miracles, and many other Reasons do evidently prove.

Eusebius of Cæsarea.

In the Fourth Book he shews, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and gives an account of the Reasons for which he was made Man; he explains the Name of Christ, and cites many Prophecies wherein he was foretold by that Name. In the following Books he brings abundance of Prophecies to demonstrate that the coming of Jesus Christ, the time of his Birth, the Circumstances of his Life and Passion, and in a Word, all things that concern'd him, were foretold in the Books of the Old Testament. What we have of these Books, ends with the last words of Christ upon the Cross; and in the following Books he recited the Prophecies concerning his Death, his Burial, his Resurrection, his Ascension, the Establishment of the Church, and the conversion of the Gentiles: But these are wholly lost.

These Books of Evangelical Preparation and Demonstration, are the largest Work that has been made by any of the Ancients upon this Subject, where a Man may find more Proofs, Testimonies and Arguments for the Truth of the Christian Religion, than in any other. They are very proper to instruct and convince all those that sincerely search after Truth. In fine, Eusebius has omitted nothing which might serve to undeceive Men of a false Religion, or convince them of the true.

The Treatise against Hierocles, was written against a Book of that Philosopher, publish'd by him under the Name of Philalethes, against the Christian Religion; wherein, to render it ridiculous, he has compar'd Apollonius Tyanæus with Jesus Christ, and says, That Apollonius wrought Miracles as well as Christ, and ascended into Heaven as well as he. But Eusebius has prov'd in his Answer, that Apollonius Tyanæus was so far from being comparable to Jesus Christ, that he did not deserve to be rank'd among the Philosophers, and that Philostratus who wrote his Life is an Author unworthy of Credit, because he contradicts himself very often, he doubts himself of those very Miracles which he relates, and he reports many things which are plainly Fabulous. At the end of this Treatise Eusebius has given some Observations against Fatal Necessity.

In the First of the Five Books against Marcellus of Ancyra, Eusebius endeavours to prove, That this Bishop wrote his Book upon no other Motive, but the hatred of his Brethren; he charges him with Ignorance of the Holy Scriptures, and rallies him for the impertinent Explications of some Greek Proverbs brought in not at all to the purpose. In fine, he blames him for accusing Origen, Paulinus, Narcissus, Eusebius of Nicodemia, and Asterius, of Error touching the Mystery of the Trinity, and endeavours to justifie their Doctrine about it. In the Second Book, he discovers the Errors of Marcellus, and proves, from many passages of his Book, That he believes the Word was not a Person subsisting before he was born of the Virgin, that he denies the distinction of the Son from the Father, that he is positive in asserting the Flesh and not the Word to be the Image of God, the Son of God, the King, the Saviour, and the Christ; and in short, That he durst affirm that this Flesh shall be destroyed, and annihilated after the Day of Judgment.

After he has discovered the Errors and the Malice of Marcellus of Ancyra, he confutes his Opinions in the Three following Books, entituled, Ecclesiastick Theology, and Dedicated to Flacillus Bishop of Antioch.

In the first Book he proposes the Faith of the Church which he explains very exactly, rejecting the Errors of the Ebionites, Paulianites, Sabellians and Arians. After this, he shews that Marcellus is guilty of the Sabellian Heresy, and proves by Thirty Arguments drawn from Scripture, That the Word is a Person subsisting of himself. In the Second and Third Books, he goes on to confute the Consequences of Marcellus's Error, and the Arguments which he alledges for it, and proves by many Passages of the Old and New Testament, that the Word is a Subsistence, or a Person Subsisting distinguish'd from the Person of the Father.

Euſebius of Caſarea.

From theſe Books we may learn the true Opinion of Euſebius concerning the Divinity of the Word. He has declar'd in many places, That the Word is God, and the Son of God; and he ſays plainly, That he was not made of nothing, nor created in time; but begotten from all Eternity of the Subſtance of the Father. He does expreſly reject the Error of thoſe that ſay the Word, was made of Nothing, and ſo place him in the number of Creatures. But he ſeems to inſinuate in ſome Places, and chiefly B. II. Ch. 7. That the Perſon of the Son is not equal to the Perſon of the Father, and that the ſame Adoration is not due to him (o). And it is not only in theſe Books that he ſpeaks after this manner; for he does the like in all his other Writings; wherein he rejects the Impious Opinion of thoſe that ſay, the Son was made of nothing, That he is not of the Subſtance of the Father, That there was a time when he was not: But then at the ſame time he ſeems to admit ſome inequality between the Father and the Son, and to acknowledge ſome ſort of Dependance upon, and Inferiority of the Son to the Father. For this reaſon it was that he made no ſcruple to declare in the Council of Nice, That the Son was God from all Eternity; where he alſo plainly diſavow'd the Impiety of Arius, who ſays, That he was made of nothing, That there was a time when he was not: Yet he found ſome difficulty to approve the term Conſubſtantial, that is, to confeſs, That the Son is of the ſame Subſtance with the Father; and after he had conſented to it by his Signing, he gave ſuch a Senſe of the Word in a Letter which he wrote to his Church, as does not at all Confirm the Equality of the Father and the Son: His Words are theſe, When it is ſaid, That the Son is Conſubſtantial with the Father, the meaning is only, That the Son of God has no reſemblance to any Creature that was made by him, but a perfect reſemblance to the Father by whom he was begotten, and not by any other Subſiſtence or Subſtance. This plainly ſhews, that Euſebius did not approve this term as it eſtabliſhes a perfect equality between the Father and the Son (p), but only as it ſignifies the reſemblance of the Son to the Father, and that the Son was begotten of the Father. It may be ſaid to excuſe Euſebius, That he did not admit this Inequality between the Father and the Son for any other reaſon, but becauſe the Son receiv'd his Subſtance from the Father: But he does every where make uſe of ſuch Emphatical Expreſſions to denote this Inequality, that it is difficult to explain them in this Senſe, eſpecially ſince he wrote his Books againſt Marcellus, wherein he ſpeaks after the ſame manner, in a time when this Queſtion was debated and even determined: For theſe Expreſſions which might be Innocent in former times, ought to be ſuſpected after the Deciſion of the Council of Nice. We might further add the Correſpondence which he maintain'd with the Biſhops of Arius's Faction, the Praiſes which he always gave them, his affected Silence in his Hiſtory, as to what concerns the Council of Nice, and the diſadvantageous Way that he ſpeaks of it in his Books of the Life of Conſtantine. But though Euſebius's Doctrine could be juſtified as to the Divinity of the Son, yet it will be much harder to Defend what he ſays of the Holy Spirit; for he aſſerts, not only in his Books of Evangelical Preparation and Demonſtration, but alſo in his Third Book of Eccleſiaſtic Theology, That he is not truly God: The Holy Spirit, ſays he, is neither God, nor the Son of God, becauſe he does not derive his Original from, the Father as the Son does, being of the number of thoſe things which were made by the Son. What we have hitherto ſaid concerning the Opinion of Euſebius about the Trinity, does plainly demonſtrate on the one ſide, That Socrates, Sozomen, and ſome late Authors are to blame, who wholly excuſe him; and on the other ſide, That it is a great Piece of Injuſtice to call him Arian, and the very head of the Arians, as St. Jerome has done, whom many others have followed, ſince he formally rejected the Principal Errors of Arius, which are, That the Word was made of nothing, That he is not of the Subſtance of the Father, That he is unlike the Father, and that there was a time when he was not.

His Sentiments about the other Articles of the Chriſtian Religion, appear to be very Orthodox: He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in a moſt Catholick manner (q), acknowledging in Jeſus Chriſt two Natures united in one and the ſame Perſon, and yet diſtinguiſh'd by their properties. His Diſcourſe is very ſound as to the cauſes of Chriſt's coming, and his Death, and the merits of his Sacrifice which he offer'd upon the Croſs to make ſatisfaction for Mankind, where he ſaith, that his Divinity ſuffer'd not, but only his Humanity.

He Diſcourſeth often of the good Offices of the Angels to Men, and of the Worſhip that's due to them; he gives an Account of the fall of the Evil Angels, and demonſtrates that the Ancient Patriarchs had ſome knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, and that they were ſaved by the Merits of his Death. He attributes much to the free-will of Man. He praiſes the State of Virginity as more perfect, and the Celibacy of Prieſts, without blaming Marriage. He acknowledges, that the Monuments of the Saints, have a juſt Right to be honoured. He diſcourſes of the Oblation of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, of which he ſaith, The Bread offered by Melchiſedech, was a Figure. In fine, He approves the Prayers of the Church for the Dead. Photius, Epiſt. 144. accuſes him of denying with Origen the general Reſurrection, and at the ſame time takes notice, that many have not obſerved this Error in his Writings, and that it is not to be diſcovered there but by a careful Examination of them. But, however it may be in other Books, there is not the leaſt footſtep of it in thoſe that are now extant.

St. Jerome maintains in his Book againſt Ruffinus, That Euſebius alone was the Author of the ſix Books of Apology for Origen, which have been aſcribed to Pamphilus: But it appears by the Teſtimony of Euſebius himſelf, B. 6. of his Hiſtory, Ch. 33. and alſo by that of Photius, That he compos'd the 1ſt. five Books, together with Pamphilus, and added the 6th. after his Martyrdom. We have the Tranſlation of the 1ſt. of thoſe Books, which he begins with an Invective againſt thoſe that accuſe the Perſon and Doctrine of Origen; and then he produces many paſſages out of his Works to juſtifie him, concerning the Trinity and the Incarnation, the Pains of the damn'd, and concerning the Nature and State of Souls. St. Jerome accuſes Ruffinus of having changed thoſe places in his Verſion, which ſeem'd to favour the Error of the Arians, about the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Ghoſt: Ruffinus does not deny the Charge, but only pretends that thoſe paſſages had been ſince added. Some Books of this Apology contain'd the Life of Origen, and a Catalogue of his Writings, as appears by the Teſtimony of St. Jerome, and the Report of Photius, Vol. 118. of his Bibliotheque.

The Book of Topography, or the Names that the Hebrews give to ſeveral Countries, tranſlated by St. Jerome, and lately publiſhed in Greek, is a Geographical Explication of all the Countries, Cities, and Places, which are mentioned in the Books of the Old Teſtament. This Treatiſe is very exact and curious, and ſhews that Euſebius was an able Man in every thing.

(o) He ſeems to Inſinuate in ſome places——That the Perſon of the Son is not Equal to the Perſon of the Father, &c.] B. I. Ch. 2. of his Hiſtory he calls the Son the Miniſter of the Father's Will, and ſecond Cauſe next to him. He ſays, that the Father Commands, and the Son Executes, and that 'tis not Poſſible for the Father to aſſume a Human ſhape. In his Oration at the Dedication of the Church of Tyre, he calls the Son of God, the Second Cauſe of our Bleſſings, the Angel of his Councel, and the Captain of the Armies of God. Yet theſe Expreſſions are more tolerable than that which is found B. V. Of Evangelical Preparation, Ch. 4. That the Son is not adorable but upon the account of the Father that dwelleth in him; and Ch. VIII. That the Son is a Lord inferior to the Father. In ſhort, what he ſays, B. II. Ch. 7. Of Theology, and in other places, is inexcuſable, That the Glory of the Son is leſs than the Glory of the Father, and that the Son does not deſerve Equal honour with the Father.

(p) That Euſebius did not approve this Term Conſubſtantial, as it Eſtabliſhes a perfect Equality between the Father and the Son.] St. Athanaſius teſtifies in his Treatiſe of Synods, and in his Book of the Deciſion of the Council of Nice, that he did by no means approve of the Explication that Euſebius gave of this Term.

(q) He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in a moſt Catholick manner.] In a Letter to the Empreſs Conſtantia, cited in the Second Council of Nice, and aſcribed to Euſebius, he ſeems to aſſert, that the Human Nature was changed into the Divine, from whence ſome took occaſion in the Council to accuſe him of the Error of the Theopaſſians: But he teaches the contrary in the Fourth Book of his Demonſtration, where he formally denies that the Divine Nature ſuffered. Yet in the 14th. Ch. he ſays, that after the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, the Man was ſwallowed up of the Divine Nature, and that the Word was become God as he was before he was Man, the Man being made God. But this is only a Figurative Expreſſion, to denote the Glory of the Humanity of Chriſt, for he plainly rejects this Error, in his Books of Myſtic Theology againſt Marcellus, eſpecially, B. III. Ch. 10, 11, &c.

The

Euſebius of Cæſarea.

The Harmony of the Evangeliſts, or the Rules for reconciling them, contains ten Tables, in each of which, he has mark'd by Arithmetical Figures, with wonderful Art, what is related by 4, by 3, by 2, or by 1 Evangeliſt only: So that in reading the New Teſtament, where the Figures of thoſe Tables are mark'd in the Margin, one may preſently know, by having Recourſe to that Table, not only by how many, and by which of the Evangeliſts, but alſo in what places it has been related. He compos'd theſe Rules, according to the Harmony of Ammonius, to which they were inſtead of a Table, as he himſelf obſerves in his Letter to Carpianus at the beginning of them.

We have a Latin Fragment yet extant, of the Harmony of the Evangeliſts, upon the Subject of their apparent Contradictions about the Time of the Reſurrection of Chriſt, tranſlated by the Monk Ambroſius, which is believed to be Euſebius's.

It is ſaid, There are ſome Greek Commentaries of Euſebius upon Iſaiah, mentioned by Heinſius. St. Jerome in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, ſpeaks of Euſebius's Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Corinthians. Theodoret in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, ch. 16, ſays, That he made Abridgments of the Scripture. 'Tis reported that in the Library of Florence, there are ſome Manuſcript Commentaries upon the Pſalms, which are aſcribed to Euſebius; and Gelaſius in his Book of the two Natures, cites a Paſſage of Euſebius taken out of thoſe Commentaries. I do not mention the Commentaries upon the Canticles, publiſhed by Meurſius under Euſebius's Name, becauſe they are none of his, but compoſed by a much later Author, as we have already proved.

The Treatiſe of the Lives of the Prophets, is a ſhort Abridgment of their Lives, and of the moſt remarkable things that are in their Prophecies.

The Tracts or Diſcourſes publiſhed in Latin by Sirmondus, have much of the Air of Euſebius; whereof the two firſt were written againſt the Hereſie of Sabellius, to refute that Error, and prove by the Scriptures, that the WORD is a Perſon diſtinct from the Father, and there he occaſionally diſcourſes againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, whom he calls the Galatian. In the following Diſcourſe he treats of the Reſurrection, and having eſtabliſhed the Providence and Juſtice of God by ſenſible Proofs, he thence concludes, That there is a Reſurrection; becauſe if there were no other Recompence but in this Life, it would follow, that God were unjuſt, ſeeing good Men are oftentimes deprived of all the Advantages of this Life, which wicked Men moſt commonly enjoy. He ſhews by the Reſolution that appeared in Abraham, when he went to ſacrifice his Son, and by all the Circumſtances of that Action which he deſcribes very eloquently; he ſhews, I ſay, That this Patriarch muſt needs believe a future Reſurrection, for otherwiſe he would never have attempted with ſo much Confidence and Zeal, to ſacrifice that which was deareſt to him in this World. He confutes the Opinion of the Phariſees, who held that Men are raiſed again from the dead to eat and drink, and enjoy the ſame Pleaſures which they had in this Life.

The fourth Tract, is a Diſcourſe upon the Day of the Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, wherein he proves the truth of his Reſurrection and Aſcenſion, by the Conſtancy of the Martyrs and Apoſtles, and by the wonderful Promulgation of the Goſpel. He obſerves how impoſſible it was, that ever the Apoſtles ſhould undertake to preach the Chriſtian Religion, and ſucceed in their Attempt, if God had not encouraged them by his Spirit, and diſpoſed the Hearts of Men to receive their Doctrine. In this Diſcourſe, he deſcribes alſo the Martyrdom of St. Romanus Deacon of Antioch. In the ſix following Tracts, he diſcourſes of things ſpiritual and inviſible; and, in the firſt, he ſhews, That God is incorporeal and inviſible, and demonſtrates that things incorporeal and inviſible, are infinitely more excellent than thoſe that are material and earthly. In the ſecond and third, he proves, That the Soul of Man is immortal and ſpiritual, and deſcribes the great advantages it gives a Man above the Beaſts. The fourth Tract is, concerning the Thought of Man, which has theſe remarkable Properties; Firſt, That it knows it ſelf; and, ſecondly, That it reſiſts and checks the Motions of Luſt. In the fifth, He goes on ſtill to prove, That God is inviſible and incorporeal, and takes notice as he goes along, That Angels are ſpiritual. In the ſixth, He anſwers ſome Paſſages of Scripture which ſeem to attribute Members to God. Euſebius of Cæſarea.

The following Diſcourſe is, concerning the Advantages of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and the great benefits it hath procured to Mankind. There he explains that ſaying of our Saviour, I came not to bring peace, but war; by ſhewing, That Jeſus Chriſt came indeed to bring peace; but Men being unwilling to receive it, there muſt be war, by neceſſary conſequence, as ariſing only from the bad diſpoſition of their own Hearts. Towards the end of this Diſcourſe, he praiſes thoſe that ſuffer for the Religion of Jeſus Chriſt, and continues the ſame ſubject in the following Diſcourſe, wherein he ſhews upon occaſion of thoſe Words of our Saviour, Preach ye upon the Houſe-tops, what has been ſaid to you in ſecret. That nothing can diſpence with a Chriſtian's ſuffering for the Religion of Chriſt. He adds, that though there be no Perſecution, yet we are obliged to ſuffer, and to be (as one may ſay) continually Martyrs, becauſe we are always to fight againſt the World and our ſelves. The two laſt Diſcourſes are concerning good Works; in the firſt of which, he recommends it to Chriſtians, if they would be happy, to follow after that which is good, and ſhun that which is evil. And in the ſecond, he exhorts them to the practiſe of good Works, and chiefly to giving of Alms. This is the ſubject of thoſe Diſcourſes, which are more concerning Doctrines than Morality, wherein there appears a great deal of Wit, good Senſe, and Eloquence, but little of Order and Method.

Euſebius was one of the moſt learned Men of all Antiquity, as both his Friends and Enemies do equally acknowledge (r); of whom it may be ſaid without fear of miſtaking, That there was no Man of ſo great Reading and Learning amongſt all our Greek Authors. Almoſt all his Books are the Effects of prodigious Labour, and very long and laborious Enquiries. And yet it muſt be confeſſed, that he had great helps by the Memoirs of thoſe who had written before him upon the ſame Subjects, whoſe Works he makes no ſcruple to tranſcribe. He did not much ſtudy to poliſh his Diſcourſes, which is the common fault of almoſt all thoſe that make Knowledge and Learning their chief Buſineſs. His Stile is neither elegant nor grateful, as Photius has many times obſerved, but dry and barren, and extremely unpleaſant. He is very proper to teach thoſe who apply their minds ſeriouſly to ſtudy and ſearch after Truth, and love to conſider it abſolutely naked, deſpoiled of all the Ornaments of Language; but he is not at all proper to entice thoſe who are taken with the manner of expreſſing things, and the force of Eloquence. I ſhall not here add any thing to what I have ſaid concerning his Learning: But as to what concerns his Perſon, he ſeems to have been very impartial, very ſincere, and a great Lover of Peace, Truth and Religion. For although he maintained an intimate Correſpondence with the Enemies of St. Athanaſius, it does not appear that he was his Enemy, nor that he ſided much with any party in the Controverſy of the Biſhops of that time. He was preſent, indeed, in the Councils, wherein unjuſt things were done to Euſtathius and St. Athanaſius; but it does not appear, that he gave any Signs of an angry Temper, nor that he ſerv'd the Paſſions of other Men. He was not the Author of new Confeſſions of Faith, neither did he carry on any Plot, to the Deſtruction of St. Athanaſius, or the Ruin of his Party; but he only deſired to accommodate Differences, and reconcile the two Parties. He did not abuſe the Credit which he had with the Emperor, to advance himſelf, nor to deſtroy his Enemies, as Euſebius of Nicomedia did; but he only made uſe of it for the Welfare and Advantage of the Church. I do not doubt but ſo many good Qualities obtained him a place among the Saints, in the Martyrologies of Uſuardus and Ado, and ſome other Ancient Offices of the Church of France (s); for though I muſt con-

(r) Euſebius was one of the moſt learned Men of all Antiquity, as both his Friends and Enemies do equally acknowledge.] See here a part of the Teſtimonies which the Ancients have given to the Learning of Euſebius. Conſtantine in his Epiſtle to thoſe of Antioch, and in a Letter which he wrote to himſelf, praiſes his vaſt Learning. St. Baſil in his Book of the H. Spirit, ch. 29. calls him an Author worthy of credit, becauſe of his univerſal Learning, διὰ πολυπειρίαν ἀξιόπιστος. St. Jerome, though the great Enemy of Euſebius, could not forbear oftentimes to praiſe his Learning, to confeſs that he priz'd his Books, and to ſay in his ſecond Book againſt Ruffinus, That he was a moſt learned Man, Vir doctiſſimus Euſebius; doctiſſimum dico, non Catholicum: The moſt learned Euſebius, I call him moſt learned, but not Catholick: It is not to be wondered at, that Ruffinus his Friend gives him the ſame Title. Antipater of Boſtra, though he did not favour him, yet gives him the Name of πολυίστωρ, i. e. one very knowing in moſt Matters; and further ſays of him, that he had read all the Books of the Ancients, examined and explained all their Opinions, and that he had written himſelf moſt uſeful Books. Philoſtorgius praiſes him for his Hiſtory, Socrates and Sozomen vindicate him, Victorius calls him a moſt learned Man. Gelaſius the Pope durſt not reject his Hiſtory, becauſe of its great Learning, and ſingular uſefulneſs for Information. Pelagius aſſures us, That there is no Hiſtory that deſerves greater Eſteem, than that of Euſebius. Photius, who cenſures the Stile and Doctrine of Euſebius, nevertheleſs, commends his Knowledge and Learning. I take no notice of the Teſtimonies of modern Authors.

(s) Obtain'd him a place among the Saints in the Martyrologies of Uſuardus and Ado, and in ſome ancient Offices of the Church of France.] The Author of the Life of St. Valerian calls him, Euſebius of holy Memory. Uſuardus in June 21, calls him, St. Euſebius of Paleſtine, Biſhop and Confeſſor, an excellent Wit and Hiſtorian. Notkerus in June 21, ſays, The Depoſition of St. Euſebius in Cæſarea. Manecharius in a Letter to Ceraunius Biſhop of Paris, which is before the Paſſion of the Martyrs, Speuſippus, Eleſippus, and Meleuſippus, call him Saint. There is in a Manuſcript Breviary at Limoges, three Lectures to his praiſe. In an ancient Breviary of the ſame Church, printed in 1587. at feſs he kept not peaceable Poſſeſſion of this Honour of Saintſhip, yet in my mind, it would be a raſh Cenſure to judge him altogether unworthy of it.

Since the Works of Euſebius have been printed ſeverally, we will now give an Account of the ſeveral Editions of every one of them.

There were but two Greek Editions of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory before that of Valeſius. The firſt was only Greek, printed by Robert Stephen, in the year 1544.

The ſecond was Greek with the Verſion of Chriſtophorſon, on the other ſide, printed at Geneva, in the year 1612.

The Verſion of this Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, made by Ruffinus, was printed at Rome, in the year 1476, in Folio, and in the year 1479, at Mantua, and at Haguenaw in the year 1500.

There was an old Edition printed without date at Paris, in 8vo. by Renault, and publiſhed by the care of Godfrey Bouſſard, Dr. of the Faculty of Paris, who has put an elegant and ſenſible Preface before it, addreſſed to Stephen Poncher, then Preſident of the Parliament of Paris. He obſerves in this Preface, that the Hiſtory of Euſebius, tranſlated by Ruffinus, had been already printed. There have been ſince that time, ſeveral Editions of the ſame Verſion of that Hiſtory in ſeveral places, in the years 1544, and 1528, and at Lyons, in 1523, and with all Euſebius's Works in 1542, and 1559, and at Paris in 1541.

The Verſion of Muſculus was printed at Baſil, in 1554.

The Verſion of Chriſtophorſon, [Biſhop of Chicheſter in England,] was printed at Cologne and Baſil, in 1570, at Paris, in 1571, and with the Amendments of Suffridus, in 1581.

At laſt, the Verſion of Valeſius was printed with the Greek on one ſide, revis'd by four Manuſcripts, at Paris, by Vitré, in the year 1659, together with the Critical Notes of that learned Man; to which he has added four Treatiſes or Diſſertations: The firſt concerning the Schiſm of the Donatiſts, where he has cleared up many Points of that Hiſtory, which before were very dark and confuſed, and diſcovered ſome conſiderable Errors, into which almoſt all the Hiſtorians of our time had fallen. The ſecond is a Letter to a Friend, where he ſhews, That it is the ſame Church at Jeruſalem, which is called by the Name of the Reſurrection, and which bears the Name of the Death of Jeſus Chriſt. The third, clears up ſome Difficulties concerning the Verſion of the Septuagint. And the laſt, is a Critical Account of ſome Martyrologies. This is the faireſt and moſt correct of all the late Editions in Greek and Latin; which has been ſince re-printed by Petit: But this ſecond Edition falls much ſhort of the Neatneſs of the firſt. The Chronicle has likewiſe been printed apart in 4to. in the year 1470, and 1512, and together with the Hiſtory, and the other Works of Euſebius, as has been noted above.

Monſieur de Pontac, Biſhop of Bazas, publiſh'd it in 1605, at Bordeaux, and it has been ſince printed at Antwerp, in 1608.

Scaliger's Theſaurus, printed in 1606, contains the Latin Chronicle of St. Jerome, the Supplements of the two Proſpers, the Chronicle of Victor, John and Idacius, of Marcellinus, of Marcellus, and an Hiſtorical Collection in Latin, extracted out of the Chronicles of Africanus and Euſebius, by an ignorant Man, together with the Greek Fragments of the Chronicle of Euſebius, an Abridgment of Hiſtory from Adam, down to the ſecond Year of Heraclius, which bears the Name of the Faſti Siculi, or the Chronicon Alexandrinum, and has been ſince publiſh'd in 4to. Greek and Latin, by Raderus, in 1615. [All which Editions have been lately ſuperſeded by an Edition in Folio, printed at the Louvre by Mr. du Cange.] After this Abridgment, follows the Chronography of the Patriarch Nicephorus, and an Epitome or abridgment of many Hiſtories, compos'd by way of Chronicle. After theſe, follow the Notes of Scaliger, and a Work, Entituled, Canon Iſagogicus, or an Introduction to Chronology. There was a ſecond Edition of this Work, printed at Amſterdam, in 1658, wherein the Notes of Scaliger are more Large and Correct.

Euſebius of Caſarea.

The Books of Euſebius concerning the Life of Conſtantine, have almoſt always been printed with his Hiſtory. The Verſion of thoſe Books by Forteſius was annex'd to the Verſion of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory by Ruffinus.

Chriſtophorſon tranſlated three of thoſe Books to add them to his Hiſtory, and the Fourth was finiſhed by Suffridus. Valeſius made a New Tranſlation of them. The Oration made in the Praiſe of Conſtantine, was alſo printed by it ſelf in Latin at Cologne, in 1581. The Verſion of the fourteen Books of Evangelical Preparation, and of the ten Firſt of Evangelical Demonſtration, made by Georgius Trapezuntius, was printed at Venice in 1497, and at Paris in 1534; but it is very unfaithfully done, becauſe that Author gives himſelf the Liberty to add to it, or take away what he pleaſes, in that which concerns the Trinity. The Fifteen Books of Preparation, were alſo printed in Greek at Paris, by Robert Stephen in the Year 1544; and the Year following, the ſame Printer publiſh'd the ten Books of the Demonſtration. Since that time, the Verſion of the ten Books of the Demonſtration made by Donatus of Verona, together with that of the fourteen Books of the Preparation made by Georgius Trapezuntius, and that of the Fifteenth by Hopperus, was ſubjoyn'd to the Verſions of the other Works of Euſebius, in the Editions which we have already mention'd.

To conclude, the Books of Evangelical Preparation and Demonſtration (which deſerve to be ſeparated from the reſt, ſince they belong to different Subjects) have been Printed in Greek at Paris in the Year 1628. in two Volumes in Folio, with a new Verſion of the fifteen Books of the Preparation, made by the Jeſuit Vigerus, and Donatus's Verſion of the Books of the Demonſtration, which Verſions are plac'd over againſt the Greek. Moreover in this Edition was added, the Greek of Euſebius's Treatiſe againſt Hierocles, which had been already reviſed by Holſtenius, publiſh'd by Morellus in 1606, together with the Ancient Tranſlation of Acciolus, which had alſo been Printed apart at Cologne in 1532, with the Latin Works of Euſebius; and in ſhort, the five Books againſt Marcellus of Ancyra, with the Tranſlation of Richard Montague, and ſome Notes of his added at the end, which for the moſt part are in favour of Marcellus, and againſt Euſebius.

The Book of the Holy Land has been publiſh'd in Greek, as we have already obſerv'd, by Bonfrerius the Jeſuit, and printed at Paris in 1631. In 1580, Curterius put forth ſome Fragments concerning the Lives of the Prophets, which he has prefix'd to the Commentaries of Procopius upon Iſaiah. The Notes upon the Canticles aſcrib'd to Euſebius, have alſo been publiſh'd in Greek, without a Verſion, by Meurſius, and printed with Polychronius and Pſellus in the Year 1617. The Tracts publiſh'd in Latin by Sirmondus were alſo printed at Paris in Octavo in 1643. In fine, The Letter to Carpianus, and the Evangelical Canons of Euſebius, are to be found at the beginning of ſome Editions of the New Teſtament, and in Greek at the beginning of the Greek New Teſtament, printed at the Louvre, by Robert Stephen in the year 1550.

June 21. there is an Oration in praiſe of Euſebius; and in the Miſſal, printed in 1484, a Maſs of St. Euſebius. In an ancient Manuſcript Verſion of Euſebius's Hiſtory, at the Church of Paris, the Name of Saint is given to him. Cardinal Baronius ſays, That all this is the miſtake of ſome that took Euſebius Biſhop of Caſarea, for Euſebius of Samoſata, and upon this Conjecture, he raſes the Name of the firſt out of the Roman Martyrology. But Baronius affirms this without any ground, and againſt the expreſs Teſtimonies of the Martyrologies, which do plainly mention Euſebius Biſhop of Caſarea, and diſtinguiſh him from all others by moſt evident Characters, in which no man can be deceived.

CONSTANTINE the firſt Chriſtian Emperor.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

THough it be a very rare thing to ſee the Name of an Emperor, in a Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, yet this of Conſtantine is commonly to be found among them, becauſe of ſome Diſcourſes which he made and repeated, if we will believe Euſebius: and it may be alſo upon the account of the many Letters which he wrote, and Edicts which he made in favour of the Chriſtian Religion: But before we ſay any thing of the Writings of this Emperor, it will be neceſſary according to our uſual Method, to give a ſhort Abridgment of his Life.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

Conſtantine was the Son of the Emperor Conſtantius Chlorus, who was the only Perſon of all thoſe that ſhar'd the Empire in his time, that did not Perſecute the Chriſtians (a). His Mother was call'd Helena, a Woman of mean Birth,

(a) Who was the only Perſon of all thoſe that ſhar'd the Empire in his time, that did not Perſecute the Chriſtians.] The Donatiſts in a Petition which they preſented to Conſtantine, ſay, that he was the Son of a Juſt Father, who did not Perſecute the Chriſtians. Euſeb. Hiſt. B. VIII. Ch. 13, 15. And Ch. 16. he relates, that Conſtantine was very favourable to the Chriſtians: And Conſtantine himſelf in his Edict, recited by Euſebius, in his Books of the Life of that Emperor, ſays, that his Father was the only Emperor, who was favourable to the Worſhip of the True God.

Constantine the Emperor.

who had not the Title of Empress, while Constantius liv'd (b).

Constantine in his youth, gave early proof of what might be expected from him afterward; His Conduct and Courage appear'd a little before his Father's Death: For being detain'd as an Hostage by the Emperor Galerius, and foreseeing plainly that he and his Associates had a design to kill him, that they might Invade that part of the Empire which belong'd to his Father Constantius, who could not live long, he made his Escape out of the hands of the Tyrants, took Post and went in great hast to find his Father in Britain. He kill'd all the Horses which he found at the Post-houses on the Road which he past, to hinder his Enemies from pursuing after him. When he came into Britain, he found his Father on his Death-Bed, who chose him for his Successor. After his Death, he was Proclaim'd Emperor by the Soldiers on the Sixth day of August, in the year of Jesus Christ 306. He was no sooner Emperor, but he gain'd the love of all his Subjects, by visiting the Provinces under his Government, to give them necessary Orders, and by beating back the Barbarians, who would have pass'd the Rhine to enter into his Territories; but they were defeated, and two of their Kings kill'd in the year 312. After this he attack'd the Tyrant Maxentius, who had laid Rome desolate by his Cruelties. He march'd towards Italy with an Army of 40000 Men, seiz'd upon all the Cities that oppos'd his Passage, or constrain'd them to submit, and defeated three several times the Troops of Maxentius. In short, the Tyrant coming to meet him with a great Army near Rome, was entirely conquer'd, and perish'd by the fall of a Bridge, over which he was passing to save himself. Eusebius says, that Constantine assur'd him, he saw then in the Heavens, a Cross of Light with this Inscription, [By this Sign you shall overcome your Enemies,] and that Jesus Christ appear'd to him when he was Sleeping, and commanded him to make a Standard after the form of a Cross, which he did in Obedience to this Revelation, and after his Victory, he plac'd his Standard among the Trophies in the midst of the City of Rome, with this Inscription: [By this Salutary Sign, which is the Mark of the true Power, I have deliver'd your City from the Yoke of Tyranny, and Establish'd your Senate and People in their ancient Splendor.] After he had regulated the Affairs of Rome, Constantine came to Milan, where he celebrated the Nuptials of his Sister with the Emperor Licinius. In this City 'twas that the two Emperors publish'd their first Edict in favour of the Christian Religion, in which they granted Liberty of Conscience to all their Subjects; and a little after, at their going out of Milan, they allow'd the Christians by a second Edict, the Publick Exercise of their Religion, and commanded that those places should be restor'd to them wherein they had usually kept their Assemblies. A short time after this, the two Emperors quarrelled, and declar'd War against one another in the year 314. Licinius lost at first a great Battle in Pannonia; but at the second in Thracia, the Advantage was equal on both Sides, which induc'd the Emperors to make Peace for that time.

The Wars and Affairs of the Empire did not hinder Constantine from concerning himself with the Affairs of the Christians: For having receiv'd Complaints in behalf of the Donatists against Cæcilian and other African Bishops, he appointed for Judges, such as liv'd out of Africk, and summon'd a Council to meet at Rome under Miltiades, about this Matter. But the Donatists still complaining of this Decision (c), he call'd a Council at Arles, where they were condemned a new; and at last when they appeal'd from the Determination of this Council to the Emperor, either because he believ'd that he might take cognizance of the Matter, since there was nothing alledg'd, but a particular Accusation against Cæcilian, which was Matter of Fact; or because he would oblige the Donatists to yield, as St. Austin observes, he himself gave Judgment at Milan in favour of Cæcilian, condemn'd the Donatists, and wrote against them in Africk; caus'd an Information to be drawn up against Silvanus, who was of their Party, and their Temples to be taken from them; but yet he recommended them to be gently dealt withal, as a means to bring them back again into the Bosom of the Church. About this time he made many Laws in favour of the Christians. He permitted Masters to grant Liberty to their Slaves that were within the Church, in presence of the Bishop and the People. He made Laws for the due Observation of Sunday, forbidding all sorts of Persons to Travel on that Day; and allow'd Men to leave their Goods to the Church by Testament. On the contrary, Licinius Emperor of the East, publish'd Edicts against the Christians, caus'd their Churches to be demolish'd, and themselves to be Persecuted, or at least conniv'd at those that did so. Constantine declar'd War against him in 324. conquer'd him near Adrianople and Chalcedon, and then besieged him in Nicomedia, whither he had retir'd after his Defeat. Licinius seeing that he was not able to maintain the Siege, came and threw himself at Constantine's Feet, who gave him his Life at the instance of his Wife, who was Licinius's Daughter, and then sent him to Thessalonica, where a little after he caused him to be put to Death, under pretence that he design'd to stir up Sedition. After this, Constantine Abrogated the Edicts of Licinius against the Christians, and commanded that those who were Condemn'd to the Mines or Banishment, or had been depriv'd of their Honour or Goods upon the account of Religion, should be releas'd and re-establish'd in their former Estate; That the Goods of the Martyrs which had been Confiscated should be return'd to their Heirs, that the Churches of Christians should be Rebuilt, and their Burial-places restor'd unto them: Then he exhorted all his Subjects very earnestly in a Letter, to embrace the Christian Religion.

Constantine the Emperor.

And he did not only take care to preserve the Church in Peace against the Attempts of its Enemies, but he us'd his utmost endeavours to hinder all Divisions in its Bowels by the Disputes of those who were its profess'd Members. He applied himself to allay the Controversy between Arius and Alexander, by writing a Letter to them, wherein he earnestly Exhorts them to Peace, in a most moving and persuasive manner, assuring them that he had delay'd his Voyage to the East, for fear of finding them there at Variance, and praying them to open by their good Agreement, his Passage to the East, which they had hitherto, as one may say, stopt up by their Differences. He sent this Letter by Hosius Bishop of Corduba, a Man commendable for his Worth and Prudence. This Bishop having call'd a Synod in the City of Alexandria, did all that in him lay to appease their Differences, but not being able to compass his Design, Constantine judged, that the best way to restore Peace to the Church, was to summon a General Council of the East and West in the City of Nice in Bithynia. He himself assisted at it, Exhorted the Bishops to Peace, and refus'd to receive the Accusations which one Party form'd against the other. He made them agree in the same Doctrine, and approv'd the Decision of the Council, to which they all Subscribed, except Secundus and Theonas. He wrote himself to all the World, and exhorted all the Bishops to receive the Decrees of this Council. He banish'd Arius and two Bishops that had taken his Part in the Synod; he caus'd the Books of that Heretick to be burnt; he forbad all his Subjects to keep them; and wrote in particular two very earnest Letters against Arius, and his followers. In short, he treated the Bishops of the Council magnificently, testified a great deal of Friendship to them, and sent them away laden with Presents. Eusebius and Theognis having publish'd anew their Errors after the Council, altho' they had Subscribed to its Decrees, were by him sent into Banishment.

After this, he caused the Sepulchre of Jesus Christ to be found out in Jerusalem, and built a stately Church there, as well as at Bethlehem, and at the Mount of Olives. 'Tis said, That he discovered the Cross of Christ, and some pretend that many Miracles were then done by it. And yet it is very strange, that Eusebius, an Eye-witness of those things, who has exactly described all the Circumstances of the Discovery of Christ's Sepulchre, and who forgets nothing that may be to the Advantage of Religion, should not say one word, neither of the Cross of Christ, nor of the Miracles that are pretended to be wrought by it. About the same time, he gave the Name of Constantinople to the City of Byzantium, and endowed it with the same Priveleges which Old Rome enjoy'd, from whence it had the Name of New Rome. After this, he laboured more than ever he had done, to aggrandize the Church; he made Laws against Hereticks, wrote to the King of Persia in favour of the Christians, destroyed the Temples of Idols, gave great Gifts to Churches, and caused magnificent Copies of the Bible to be made: In a word, he did so much for Religion, that he had good right to be called Bishop of the Church, as to those things that concern its external Policy. And truly the Church had no reason to complain of his Conduct, till the latter end of his Life, when he gave ear to the accusations that were brought to him against St. Athanasius, by those Bishops that favoured Arius's Faction: For they being offended with him because he would not appear at a Council held at Cæsarea, whither

(b) Who had not the Title of Empress, while Constantius liv'd.] Eusebius, St. Jerome, Cassiodorus, and Orosius, make no scruple to give her the Title of Constantius's Concubine; Eutropius, altho a Pagan, smoothes this Expression, by saying, that Constantine was born of a Marriage that was but little known, i. e. That tho' Helena was Married to Constantius, yet she had not the Title of Empress; (and those Women that had not the honourable Name of Augustæ, were called the Concubines of the Emperors.) Helena had not this Dignity till after the Death of Constantius, and then her Son gave it her, as Eusebius observes. She was of Drepane a City of Bithynia, to which Constantine gave the Name of Helenopolis, in honour of his Mother. It is agreed on all hands, that she was of mean Extraction; and St. Ambrose says, She was an Hostess, and by this means Constantius first became acquainted with her.

(c) But the Donatists still complaining of this Decision.] Valesius has prov'd in his Dissertation about the History of the Donatists, that the Donatists, did not appeal from the Synod at Rome; but only complain'd to the Emperor that their Cause was not fully examin'd; and that they appeal'd afterwards from the determination of the Council at Arles, to that of the Emperor.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

whither he had been cited to come, mov'd the Emperor to ſummon a Synod in the City of Tyre, to judge his cauſe. There St. Athanaſius appear'd, and finding that his Enemies had injuriouſly oppreſs'd him, he had recourſe to the Emperor, and went to him at Conſtantinople. Conſtantine, although prejudiced againſt him, yet heard him favourably, and commanded the Biſhops of the Council of Tyre, who had called another afterwards at Jeruſalem, to come to him and render an account of their Proceedings. They deputed ſix Biſhops to go to the Emperor, and accuſe St. Athanaſius; but thoſe Deputies durſt not alledge the Facts, of which they had accuſed him at the Council of Tyre, for fear leſt the Emperor, being a Lover of Juſtice, ſhould diſcover their Falſity, and declare him innocent. They conſult therefore how they might charge him with a Crime againſt the State, by ſaying, that he threatned to hinder the Tranſportation of Corn from Alexandria to Conſtantinople. This Accuſation made ſuch Impreſſion upon the Emperor's Mind, and ſo ſtirred him up againſt St. Athanaſius, that he immediately baniſh'd him to Triers, a City of Gaul. The Enemies of St. Athanaſius having thus procured his Baniſhment who was the great Oppoſer of Arius, they call'd back again this Heretick, and uſed all their Endeavours to reſtore him to the Communion of the Church. But Conſtantine would not hear of it, 'till after he had drawn up a Confeſſion of Faith, which appear'd contrary to his Errors, and had ſworn and proteſted that this was his Doctrine; yet, even after he had done this, the Emperor, being always jealous of the Man, ſaid to him, 'If thy Faith be right, as thou wouldeſt make 'us believe, thou haſt done well to ſwear; but if not, then let 'God condemn thee to ſome Puniſhment for this falſe Oath. Which Words were followed with a ſuitable Effect; for in a little time after, Arius periſhed miſerably, the day before he ſhould have been admitted to the Communion of the Church at Conſtantinople.

The Reader no doubt may wonder that I have not ſpoke a Word all this while of the Baptiſm of this Emperor; for it ſeems very ſtrange, that one who took ſo great Care of the Affairs of Chriſtians, one who was convinced of the Truth of their Religion, and was ignorant in no Point of their Doctrine, ſhould continue ſo long a time without initiating himſelf into the Church by the Sacrament of Baptiſm. And yet this was certainly ſo, either becauſe he waited to receive Baptiſm, when he ſhould be near his death, that by this Sacrament he might throughly expiate his Sins, and ſo appear innocent before God; or elſe becauſe he had ſome other reaſon for this delay; however it came to paſs, he never thought of preparing himſelf for Baptiſm until he felt himſelf ſick, nor had he ever the Impoſition of the Biſhop's hands, to make him a Catechumen, 'till the year 337 (d), a few days before his Death, being then at Helenopolis, as Euſebius obſerves in the fourth Book of this Emperor's Life, Chap. 61. After this he received Baptiſm from the hands of Euſebius of Nicomedia, in the Suburbs of that City, as Euſebius of Cæſarea, St. Athanaſius, St. Jerome, and St. Ambroſe, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, and all the reſt of the Ancients unanimouſly affirm (e). It is therefore a fabulous Story which is related in the Acts, falſly attributed to Pope Sylveſter, That the Baptiſm of Conſtantine was celebrated at Rome. And indeed, nothing can be more fabulous than the Account ſet down in thoſe Acts: For there it is feign'd, that Conſtantine, being an Enemy to the Chriſtian Religion, and deſiring to perſecute it, was ſmitten with Leproſie; That the Soothſayers ſaid unto him, the only way to cure him, was to bathe himſelf in the Blood of new-born Infants; That many of them were ſought out to have their Throats cut, but Conſtantine being moved by their Tears, and the Cries of their Mothers, reſtored them again, without putting them to Death: That he was afterwards admoniſhed in a Dream by St. Peter and St. Paul, that he ſhould be cured if he were baptized by Sylveſter; which having done, he was preſently purified by Baptiſm, both from his Sins and from his Leproſie. What Forgeries, what Fables are here! What inconſiſtent Ravings of Madmen! Conſtantine was never an Enemy to the Chriſtian Religion; he did never perſecute it; he was always a Chriſtian from his heart before he came to Rome. There is no Hiſtorian that ſpeaks of his having a Leproſie, or that he was cur'd of it by Baptiſm. How came Euſebius to forget ſo conſiderable a Miracle in the Life of Conſtantine? With what Face could Julian the Apoſtate object to the Chriſtians, that Baptiſm never cleanſed any perſon from the Leproſie, if his own Grandfather had been cured by it? St. Cyril, to confute this Falſhood, never alledged an Example ſo illuſtrious as this of the Emperor had been. But I forbear to mention any more of the many Abſurdities and Impertinencies which are contained in thoſe Acts (f). 'Tis certain, Conſtantine died in a little time after his Baptiſm in the year 337, of the vulgar Account, May 22d. in the Conſulſhip of Titianus and Felicianus, the 64th. year of his Age, after he had reign'd thirty years and ten Months.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

This Emperor was one of the greateſt Princes that ever was, whether you conſider his Conduct and Policy, or take a view of the great Actions of his Life, or reflect on the great Services he had done to the Church. Some accuſe him of being an Arian, but that's a Calumny; for though he favour'd ſome Biſhops that were of Arius's Faction, and unjuſtly Baniſh'd St. Athanaſius; yet, he always maintained the Creed of the Nicene Council, and ſuffer'd it not to be violated while he liv'd. The Greeks have given him exceſſive Praiſes, and Plac'd him among the number of Saints, but I think the Latins have done more wiſely, in ſuſpending their Judgment as to that. We can ſay nothing of his Stile, becauſe it is very probable, that the Writings which (d) To make him a Catechumen, till the year 337.] Euſebius ſays expreſly, That Conſtantine then firſt received impoſition of hands, and that he aſſiſted at the ſolemn Prayers of the Church; which plainly ſhews, that he was not a Catechumen before. Neither does the title of the firſt Book, ch. 32 of the Life of Conſtantine, contradict this Obſervation, for there it is only ſaid that Conſtantine was catechized, Κατηχηθεὶς, the meaning of which is, only that he was inſtructed in the Chriſtian Doctrine, which does not prove that he was a Catechumen, and we never read before this time that he aſſiſted at the publick Prayers of the Church.

(e) All the Ancients unanimouſly affirm.] Euſebius, B. 1ſt. of the Life of Conſtantine, c. 42. St. Jerome in his Chronicle, ſays, Conſtantinus ultimo vitæ ſuæ tempore baptizatus eſt. St. Ambroſe in his Funeral Oration upon Theodoſius, ſays of Conſtantine, Cui licet baptiſmatis gratia in extremis conſtituto omnia peccata dimiſerit. The Fathers of the Council of Ariminum, in a Letter written at the beginning of that Synod, ſay, that he died a little after he was baptized: which is certainly ſpoken of Conſtantine the Great, after they had mentioned in the ſame place his aſſiſting at the Council of Nice. I might add to this many other unqueſtionable Witneſſes, ſuch as Socrates, B. 1ſt. c. 39. Sozomen, B. 2d. c. 34. Theodoret, B. 1ſt. c. 32. Evagrius, B. 3d. c. 42. the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, &c.

(f) I forbear to mention any more of the many Abſurdities and Impertinencies which are contained in thoſe Acts.] There 'tis ſaid, that St. Sylveſter firſt appointed the celebration of Sunday, that he held a Synod of 75 Biſhops at Rome in the year 315, where they found 109 Jewiſh Prieſts. The ſame Author tells a ſtory of a Font and its Ornaments, which ſmells rank of a Fable. He makes Laws for Conſtantine which are ridiculous, and which never any heard of before. He reports, that Conſtantine laid the firſt Foundation of the Church of Rome, and carried thither 12 baskets full of earth in honour of the 12 Apoſtles. Theſe remarks, and many more of that ſort, make it as clear as day, that thoſe Acts are ſuppoſititious. And yet there is brought to maintain them, firſt, the Authority of Pope Gelaſius, who places them among thoſe Monuments that are genuine; And, that of Adrian, who cites thoſe Acts in his Letter to the Empreſs Irene, for maintaining Images; to which are added, the teſtimonies of the Author of a book called the Pontifical of Damaſus; of Nicholas the firſt in his Letter to the Emperor Michel, of Anaſtaſius, Nicephorus, and ſome other modern Authors. But are all theſe Authorities to be compared with thoſe of the Ancients whom we have cited? And what elſe do they prove, but that thoſe Acts were forged ſince the time of Gelaſius? This Pope therefore had never ſeen them himſelf, nor does he approve them of his own Knowledge, but only ſaith, that he heard that ſome Perſons had read them. As to Adrian 'tis very well known, that he was not very critical in the choice of the Monuments which he cited, and that he alledges ſometimes thoſe that are forged, as well as thoſe that are genuine. The following teſtimonies are ſtill of leſs Authority.

Secondly, Gregory of Tours is cited for thoſe Acts, who, B. 2d. c. 31. of his Hiſtory, ſaith to King Clovis, Behold, a new Conſtantine, who goes to Baptiſm to heal the Malady of an inveterate Leproſie, and to waſh out the ſpots and ſtains of his paſt Life by thoſe moſt holy waters. But this paſſage proves nothing, becauſe he does not mean the Leproſie of his body, but only of his ſoul; and moreover, it were not at all ſtrange that Gregory of Tours, a very credulous Man, ſhould give credit to thoſe forged Acts.

In ſhort, our Adverſaries not finding any ancient Chriſtian for their turn, have recourſe to Zoſimus a Pagan Author, and a great Enemy to Conſtantine, who ſays, that Conſtantine was tormented with remorſe of conſcience, after he had kill'd Criſpus his Son, and Fauſta his Wife; and having ſought in vain for ſome expiation by the ſacrifices of the Pagans, he applied himſelf to an Ægyptian, who told him, that the Chriſtian Doctrine had power to expiate all ſins; after which diſcourſe, he abandoned the Religion of his Anceſtors. But thoſe who employ this paſſage to prove the baptiſm of Conſtantine at Rome, do great injury to Conſtantine's reputation, by giving credit to the lye of an Heathen, who for this is convicted of forgery by all our writers. Secondly, they do not conſider that the death of Criſpus and Fauſta happened after the Council of Nice, and ſo this whole ſtory of Zoſimus is nothing to their purpoſe: In fine, Zoſimus ſays not that he was baptized, but that he embraced the Chriſtian Doctrine. I ſhall not now ſtay to refute thoſe that pretend Conſtantine was twice baptized, the firſt time at Rome by Sylveſter, the ſecond time at Nicomedia by Euſebius, for the ſame authorities we have alledged, deſtroy this ſuppoſition; and beſides, it is altogether incredible that Euſebius and the other Biſhops with him, ſhould have re-baptized Conſtantine with ſo much pomp and ceremony, if he had been baptized before; eſpecially at a time when the diſpute about the Trinity was not ſtarted.

Constantine the Emperor.

bear his Name, were composed by others, though done by his Order; They may be distinguish'd into three sorts; his Discourses, his Letters, and his Edicts.

Eusebius assures us, B. III. of the Life of this Emperor, Ch. 2. That he had acquir'd so profound a Knowledge of the Liberal Sciences, that even to the end of his Life, he compos'd Harangues for the Instruction of his Subjects; and that the method which he observ'd in his Discourses, was, first to begin with the Refutation of the Errors of the Pagans, who ador'd many Gods; and then he proceeded to prove the Unity of God, and his Providence by which he governs the Universe: After which, he explain'd the Motives which brought the Son of God down from Heaven to this Earth, and describ'd the Circumstances of the Life which he led here; from whence he pass'd on to the Description of the last Judgment, and terrified his Hearers with the vehemence of his Discourse, Threatning the Vengeance of God, and the just Punishment of their Sins against the Covetous, the Passionate and the Violent. The same Eusebius, gives us, B. III. Ch. 12. a short Harangue of Constantine's to the Fathers of the Council of Nice, exhorting them to Peace; to which may be added, that Form of Prayer which he prescrib'd to his Soldiers, related in B. IV. and the Admonition he gave a Covetous Man of his Court, which is to be found Ch. 30. of the same Book: But doubtless the most considerable of his Monuments, is, that great Oration which he made to the Convention of the Saints, translated by Eusebius into Greek, and annexed to his Life. The Preface of this Oration is about the Feast of Easter, the Goodness of our Saviour, and the Ingratitude of Men; but he concludes it with an Apostrophe to the Church. In the Body of this Discourse, he disputes against Idolatry and the multiplicity of Gods; and shews that there is but the one only true God, the Creator of all things, and the Father of the Word, who is begotten of Him, tho' the Father suffer no Diminution by it, and who is united to him: He confutes Destiny, establishes Providence and Free-Will, and overthrows the Errors of the Philosophers: He discovers the Advantages which Mankind receiv'd by the Incarnation of the Son of God, and shews that his coming was foretold by the Prophets, to whose Authority he adds the Prediction of the Sybils, which he endeavours to verifie by the Testimony of Virgil: He describes the unhappy death of those Emperors who persecuted the Church, and finishes this Discourse with saying, that we ought to attribute all the Good we do to God, and before we undertake any thing, always to implore his Aid by Prayer, as being the Fountain of all Good. The whole Discourse is Sublime, and worthy of the Majesty of such an Emperor as Constantine was.

The Letters of Constantine, are much more numerous than his Discourses. Here's a Catalogue of them, an Account of their Arguments, the Times when they were written, and the Places where they are to be found.

1. There is a Letter of Constantine to Cæcilian Bishop of Carthage, for distributing the Alms which he gave to the Poor of Africa, written in the Year 312, and set down by Eusebius, Hist. B. X. Ch. 6.

4. His Letter to Ablabius, [Dr. Cave calls him, Ælaphius or Ælianus] commanding him to send the Bishops of Donatus's Party, and Cecilian, to Arles to be judg'd there; written in 314, at the end of Optatus.

8. His Letter to Celsus, Deputy of Africk, written about the end of the same Year, or the beginning of the next, wherein he recommends it to him, to Advertise the Bishops of both parties, that he should come e'er long, to judge them; and to advise them in the mean time to continue in Peace. He testifies in this Letter, That he had a mighty Passion to establish a good Agreement among them.

9. Another Letter of his to the same Celsus, written by his Order by the Prefectus Prætorio in favour of Four Bishops of the Donatists, and one Presbyter who had obtained their Liberty.

10. His Letter to Eunalius, Deputy of Africk, in which he gives him Notice of the Judgment he had given in favour of Cæcilian against the Donatists, recited in the Conference of Carthage, Ch. 516. There is a Fragment of it in St. Austin's Third Book against Cresconius, Ch. 71. It was written in 316.

Constantine the Emperor.

11. His Letter to the Bishops of Africa wherein he testifies, That he had done all that was in his Power, to procure Peace to the Church; but since he could not compass it, he must wait till God himself afforded a Remedy for their Divisions. This Letter is at the end of Optatus.

24. His Letter to the Synod upon the same Subject, Ibid. Ch. 62.

25. His Letter to Sapor King of Persia, in favour of the Christians, B. IV. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 9, &c.

34. His Letters to Publilius Optatianus Porphyrius, who Dedicated some Poems to him, that were wrote in Prison; published by Paulus Velserus, and annexed to the Nurenberg Edition of Marcus Velserus's Works. [The 6th Letter to Cæcilian is only hinted at in a Letter of Constantine's to the Donatist Bishops, wherein he tells them, That tho' he had before given Orders that they should return into Africa, there to have their Controversy with Cæcilian Examin'd, yet he was now resolv'd that they should of both Sides go to Rome, as he himself had written already to Cæcilian. This Letter is in the Collection of Records at the End of Optatus.

As also another Letter to the Catholick Bishops in the Council of Arles, wherein he congratulates the Conclusion of their Differences, and expresses his detestation of those Persons, who would not abide by what was already determined: Adding withal, That if the Donatists would not be quiet, they should be brought before the Vicarius Præfecturæ, to whom he had given Orders to send them to his Palace, where they should meet with such treatment as they deserved.]

There are many other Letters, of which Eusebius design'd to make a distinct Volume, as he himself testifies, B. III. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 24.

Tho' the Edicts, which bear Names of the Emperors, are commonly Penn'd by their Secretaries of State, yet I must give an account of those that Constantine publish'd in favour of the Christians.

The first Edict of Constantine for the Liberty of Religion, was publish'd at Milan, in the Year 313, whereof there is mention made in the following Edict.

The second Edict of Constantine, by which he gave full Liberty to Christians of the publick Exercise of their Religion, and commanded that their Churches should be restor'd to them, was published sometime after the first, and is set down by Eusebius, Hist. B. X. Ch. 5.

His third Edict restrains this Favour to Catholicks. 'Tis found in the same place.

His Fourth Edict in favour of Religion, is dated the last of October, the same Year: It continues the Immunity of Ecclesiasticks, whom the Hereticks had caus'd to be charg'd with Publick Taxes, contrary to the Privileges which had been granted them. The Emperor commands that those who were taxed, be discharg'd, and that a Course be taken to hinder any such Proceedings for the Future.

Among the number of those Edicts, made in favour of the Christians, that which was directed to Ablabius, may be reckoned, bearing Date, May 12. 315. in which Constantine commands, That Provision be made for the Maintenance of the Children of the Poor in Italy.

The fifth Edict of Constantine for the Christian Religion, is dated November 16. the same Year, wherein he condemns the Jews to the Fire that should abuse the Christians. It is to be found in the Justinian and Theodosian Code.

His seventh Edict directed to Protogenes, dated June, 7th, 316, grants a very considerable favour to the Christian Church, by appointing a new way of giving liberty to Slaves, in the Presence of the Bishop and the People. This Law is related in the Justinian Code, Tit. 13. l. 1. Besides this, There are two other Edicts upon the same Subject: The first, which is dated in the Year 321, related in the same Place, is added to that, which we have been speaking of, That the Clergy may give liberty to their Slaves, even out of the Church. The third Edict upon the same Subject is lost.

The first which we have of those Edicts of Constantine, that establishes the Jurisdiction of Bishops as to Temporals, seems to be that which is related in an Edition to the Theodosian Code, publish'd by Sirmondus, under Title 17th. It imports, That if those who plead a Cause shall appeal to the Judgment of the Bishops, they shall be referr'd thither, altho' the Process be enter'd before another Judge. This Edict is dated, June 21*st*. 318. There is besides this, another on the same Subject, without the date of the Year, related in the same Collection, under the first Title, wherein he Confirms and Explains the former Order, concerning the Judicial Decisions of Bishops, and he will have them to stand firm, even tho' they are given between Minors, commanding, that at all times, and as oft as any one of the two Parties shall desire an appeal to the Judgment of the Bishop, it shall be granted him. He ordains also in this Edict, That the Testimony of a Bishop shall be received by all the Judges.

In the Year 319, November 19th. He confirmed the Immunity of the Clergy by a new Edict, declaring, that they should be free from all publick Taxes. This Law is related in the Theodosian Code, Lib. 16. Tit. 2. l. 2.

There are many more Edicts of the Year 320, and 321, concerning the Church, among which may be plac'd that which abrogates the Papian Poppean Law, which was made against those that continued unmarried; this Law Constantine seems to have abolish'd, in favour of the Christians, who honour those that make profession of continuing in Celibacy all their Life. Eusebius makes mention of this Edict, B. IV. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 26. and after him Sozomen, B. I. of his Hist. Ch. 9. and St. Ambrose, B. III. of Virgins.

It was also about this time, that he made some Edicts against the Donatists. The first is related by St. Austin, B. II. against Petilianus, Ch. 92. and in his Letters 167, and 168, wherein he commands, that the Churches should be taken from them which they possess'd: It bears Date, Anno 320.

The second Edict directed to Verinus, dated May the 4*th*. in the Year 321, moderates a little the Rigor of the first, for it permits them to return to their own Country, and to live there in quiet, reserving to God the Punishment of their Crime. This is also related by St. Austin, Ep. 152. and in his Book written after the Conference of Carthage. The Edict for the due observation of Sunday, of which Eusebius makes mention, B. IV. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 18, and 19. related in the Justinian Code, Lib. III. under the Title, De Feriis. B. III. is dated March 6*th*. in the Year 321. It imports, that all Judges, People and Artificers, shall cease from their Labour on this Day; yet he excepts Countrymen, who are permitted to Till the Ground on this Day, because it often happens, says the Emperor, That a more seasonable time cannot be found to Sow their Corn, or Plant their Vines, and it is not fit, that we should lose a favourable Opportunity which Divine Providence has put in our Hands.

There is another Edict of the first of July, the same year, by which he permits all sorts of Persons to leave their Goods by Testament, to the Catholick Church.

In the year 323, he publish'd an Edict against those who constrain'd Christians to Sacrifice to Idols, which is in the Theodosian Code, Tit. 2. B. V.

In the next year he made many Edicts after the defeat of Licinius, for the Liberty of Christians, and for the Restitution of their Goods and their Honour. Eusebius relates them, B. II. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 20, 24, &c.

Constantine the Emperor.

He produces likewise in the same place, his Edicts against the Worship of false Gods, and for the Establishment of the Church. Ibid. and Ch. 48.

After the Council of Nice, he publish'd an Edict, in which he condemns the Books of Arius to be burnt, and commands his followers to be call'd Porphyrians.

The Edict of the Month of May, in the year 326, prohibiting the admitting of rich Persons into the Order of the Clergy, or those that were the Children of such as had born publick Offices, appears but little favourable to the Clergy; but it was necessary, because many rich and great Persons, took Holy Orders, to exempt themselves by this means, from the publick Taxes, which tended to the Oppression of the Poor. Wherefore Constantine says wisely in this Edict, that it was just, the Rich should maintain the heavy Expences of the State, and that the Poor should be fed with the Riches of the Church: We have this Law in the Theodosian Code, B. XVI. Tit. 2. l. 6. Besides this, there is also another Edict publish'd in the Month of July, in consequence of the former, altho' it bears the Names of the Consuls for the year 320, which forbids the disturbing of those that had taken Holy Orders, before the preceding Law was publish'd, and commands at the same time, that such as had taken Orders since its publication, on purpose to avoid the publick Taxes, should be remov'd from the Clergy, and sent back into the World, and left liable to publick Taxes. This Edict is related in the same place, B. III. After all, by another Edict of the first of September, the same year 326, it is ordain'd, that Clergy-men who were Hereticks and Schismaticks, should not enjoy this Privilege of Exemption, but should be subject to Taxes and Impositions. This Edict is in the Justinian Code, B. 1. Tit. de Heret. and in the Theodosian.

He treats the Novatians with more moderation than the other Hereticks, permitting them by an Edict of the Month of September in the same year 326, to keep their Churches, their Cœmeteries, and the Goods which they had purchas'd after their Separation from the Church. In the Code of Theodosius, Tit. 5. B. II.

In the year 330, he publish'd an Edict against the Hereticks, in which he forbids their Assemblies. It is related in Eusebius, B. III. of the Life of Constantine, Ch. 63, &c.

There is in the Theodosian Code, another Edict of the same year, in favour of the Clergy that were accus'd, or evil treated by Hereticks.

The Laws concerning the Jews, are the last which Constantine made in the favour of the Christian Religion.

By an Edict, September 27*th*. 330, He grants to the Patriarchs of the Jews, i. e. to those that presided in their Assemblies, Exemption from the publick Taxes. He renews the same favour by another Edict December 1*st*. in the year following. It is probable that he granted these favours to the Jews for no other reason, but because they Worship the same God with the Christians, and to leave them some kind of Consolation, as he says in one of his Laws, because their's was once the only true Religion: For at the same time he made very severe Laws against the Jews that should purchase or detain Christian Slaves, and condemn'd those to death, that circumcis'd them. There are many other Laws in the Theodosian Code upon this Subject, of the years 330, 331, and 336.

I do not place among the Number of Constantine's Edicts, the Donation which bears his Name, in which he is suppos'd to give to the Bishop of Rome and his Successors, the Soveraignty of the City of Rome, and of the Provinces of the Western Empire; because this Act has so many signs of Forgery, that 'tis impossible it can be attributed to Constantine. I shall here subjoin some of those Reasons which clearly prove, that it is an Imposture.

1. Not one of the Ancients mentions this pretended Liberality of Constantine to the Church: But who can believe that Eusebius, and all the other Ancient Historians, who have exactly describ'd all the Benefits of this Emperor to the Christians, and especially to the Bishops, should pass over in silence one so considerable as this of the Western Empire, to the Bishop of Rome?

2. Not one of the Popes who mention the Benefits of Kings and Emperors to the See of Rome, or who defend their Temporal Patrimony, did ever alledge this pretended Donation, tho' it had been very much for their Advantage so to do.

3. The Date of this Act is false, for it bears the Names of the Consuls, Constantine (for the fourth time,) and Gallicanus: Now Constantine in his fourth Consulship, had not Gallicanus, but Licinius, for his Collegue: And this Consulship, answers to the year 315, at which time Constantine was not baptiz'd, even in the Opinion of those that believe he was baptiz'd at Rome by St. Sylvester; and yet mention is made of his Baptism in this Edict of Donation. We must add to this Argument, another Error in Chronology:

Bzovius

Constantine the Emperor.

Byzantium is there call'd Constantinople, tho' it had not that Name, till ten Years or thereabouts, after the Date of this Edict.

4. The Stile of it is barbarous, and very different from that of the Genuine Edicts of Constantine: It is full of new Modes of speaking, the Expressions are affected, and the Terms such as were never us'd in any publick Acts, till after the time of Constantine.

5. Who can believe that Constantine should give the City of Rome, all the Provinces and Cities of the West, that is to say, one half of his Empire, to the Bishop of Rome, and that this should never be known till the Eleventh Age of the Church?

6. There are infinite Numbers of Falsities and Absurdities in this Edict, which demonstrate that it was compos'd by an ignorant Impostor: take some of them as follows. In it the Pope is permitted to wear a Crown of Gold, like that of Kings and Emperors, whereas in those times, Kings and Emperors did not wear a Crown at all, but a Diadem. The Fabulous History of Constantine's Baptism by Sylvester, and the miraculous Cure of his Leprosy, is reported there as a thing Certain. There are reckon'd up in this Edict, five Patriarchal Churches, and that of Constantinople is put in the second place, whereas it had not this Honour, till a long time after. And yet it is suppos'd, that Sylvester had already acknowledg'd it for a Patriarchal See. These Falsities and many others that occur in this Edict, do plainly prove, that it is a Forgery.

In short, to destroy entirely this pretended Edict, it is sufficient to observe, that while Constantine liv'd, and a long time after his Death, the City of Rome, and the Empire of the West, were always subject to the Power of the Emperors; That the Popes themselves acknowledg'd them as their Sovereigns, without pretending that the City of Rome, or Italy, or any part of the Western Empire, belong'd to them: That all the Temporal Power they have obtain'd since, is owing to King Pepin and the Emperor Charlemaigne. The Account of this, deserves a little Digression, which will not be tedious to the Reader, and will not carry us too far from our present Subject.

'Tis certain, that the City of Rome, Italy, and all the other Provinces of the Western Empire, were under the Power of Constantine, and the Emperors that succeeded him. History informs us, that they were absolute Masters of it, that they sent Governors thither, that the City of Rome depended upon their Laws, upon their Power, and the Magistrates whom they should appoint; That they made such Changes there as they pleas'd: In a word, that they were no less Masters of it, than of all the other Cities of the World. When afterwards the Barbarians begun to invade Italy, they sent thither Generals of Armies to defend it, as being a Country that belong'd to them: But in spite of all their Endeavours Theodorick King of the Ostrogoths having Conquer'd it, made it Tributary, and govern'd the City of Rome with a Power as absolute as that of the Roman Governors. His Successors, Athalaric and Theodat, maintain'd the Possession of it, until they were chas'd thence in the time of Justinian by Belisarius the Roman Captain, who took the City of Rome by Force. A little time after, Count Narsetes delivered all Italy from the Tyranny of these Barbarians, and reduc'd it under the Power of the Greek Emperors, to which it had belong'd.

His Successor, nam'd Longinus, finding it was difficult to govern all Italy, which was divided into many Petty Principalities, appointed Dukes or Governors over the Principal Cities, and reserv'd to himself the Sovereignty over them; taking the Title of Exarch or Viceroy, and all this while acknowledging the Emperor for his Lord. From this time forward, the Emperors sent Exarchs into Italy, who commonly resided at Ravenna, and govern'd all Italy. But this Exarchate was diminish'd by little and little, and at last was wholly destroy'd, when the Lombards made themselves Masters of Italy. Until this time it does not appear that the Popes were Sovereigns of the City of Rome, and of Italy; on the contrary, they themselves were subject to the Emperor or King of Italy, and obey'd him as all his other Subjects. The History of the Popes furnishes us with many Instances, which prove this clearly. The first is that of Pope Liberius, whom the Emperor Constantius order'd to be made Prisoner, and carried out of Rome by Leontius Governor of that City, as St. Athanasius testifies. The Schism of Damasus and Ursicinus, does also prove, that the Popes were subject to the Emperors. Maximus, that then govern'd the City of Rome for the Emperor, compos'd the Differences that arose between those two Competitors, and the Bishops themselves address'd to the Emperor, praying him, that Ursicinus might be forc'd to depart out of the City of Rome. The same Observation may be made upon the Schism of Eulalius and Boniface, which was also cur'd by the Order of the Emperor, and afterwards by King Theodorick, when he became Master of Italy. 'Tis remarkable, that this King exercis'd his Power over the Church of Rome and its Bishop with so much Haughtiness, that he appointed a Visitor to this Church, and sent poor Pope John, being very sick, to the Greek Emperor, to obtain a Revocation of the Edict he had made against the Arians; which John not being able to obtain, Theodorick caused him to be imprisoned at Ravenna, where he died. Theodatus sent in like manner from Rome, Pope Agapetus, to the Emperor Justinian, and when he became Master of Italy, he used the Popes no less roughly than Theodorick had done; for he exacted of them great Sums of Money to confirm their Ordination, and caused the Popes, Silverus and Vigilius, to be carried to Constantinople, where he made them approve the Restauration of Anthimus, to the Patriarchal See of that City. Martin the first, was also banished to the Province of Pontus, by the Exarch of Ravenna, according to the Orders he had received from the Emperor. Justinian the younger banished also Pope Sergius. In short, The Emperor Leo Isauricus, would have put to Death, Pope Gregory the second: But the Italians growing weary of their Subjection to the Power of Strangers, who could not secure them against their Enemies, began to shake off the Yoke and to acknowledge their Dukes for Sovereigns. The Pope nevertheless opposed them in it, and did all that lay in his Power to retain them in their Allegiance, acknowledging, as he himself speaks in his Letter written to the Duke of Venice, That the Republick of Rome was subject to the Dominion of the Emperors. But the Lombards afterwards invading Italy, and having no expectation of Succours from the Greek Emperor who was entangled by other Wars, the Popes, Gregory the Third, and Zachary, were obliged to have recourse to Charles Martel Governor of the French. This Prince by Menaces obtained of Luitprand King of the Lombards, and his Successor Rachiseus, the Restitution of the Exarchate of Ravenna, which by his means was twice restored to the Exarchs depending upon the Greek Emperors. But at last Astolphus the Brother of Rachiseus made himself Master of it for ever, and obliged Eutychius, the last Exarch of Ravenna, to retire into the East.

Constantine the Emperor.

Stephen the Second being afraid for the City of Rome, was obliged to make a Truce with Astolphus for forty years in the Name of the Roman Republick. But this King breaking his Word, came four months after with a great Army to take and sack the City of Rome. In this extremity, Stephen writes presently to the Greek Emperor for Succours, but seeing there were no hopes of any from thence, he had recourse to King Pepin, who coming to besiege Pavia, forc'd King Astolphus to sue for Peace; which was granted him, upon Condition that he should not only restore to the Church of Rome, all the Lands and Territories which he had possessed in Italy; but also should yield up the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the Cities of the Roman Dutchy. This Peace was quickly broken by the Perfidiousness of this Lombard King, who perceiving that Pepin was gone out of Italy, went forthwith and besieged the City of Rome. Pepin presently reliev'd it, and raised the Siege; and yet Astolphus found himself in too good a Condition to perform the Articles of Peace, which he had made: But Pepin forc'd him to give Hostages, and enlarged the Bounds of the Exarchate of Ravenna, which Fulradus the Abbot of St. Denys, received in his Name, and presently restored into the hands of the Pope. It is observable, that in the time of these two Expeditions of Pepin, an Ambassador came from the Greek Emperor, and demanded back again the Exarchate of Ravenna, as belonging of right to his Master: But Pepin believing that he was lawfully dispossessed, thought it more convenient to give it to the Pope. In the mean time, the Greek Emperor was still Master of Sicily, Apulia, Calabria, and all the extreme Parts of Italy, and had a Governor called George in the City of Naples, who combined with Desiderius the Successor of Astolphus, to invade the Exarchate of Ravenna.

Paul the first knowing of this League, and seeing himself attack'd by this Lombard, wrote presently to Pepin, his Protector. Desiderius, fearing the Power of this King, pushed the Matter no further at this time, and promised to restore to the Roman Church what he had taken from it: But he declaring himself openly after the Death of Pepin, Pope Adrian implor'd the Aid of Charlemaigne, who came with a great Army, defeated Desiderius, and shut him up in Pavia. From thence Charles went to Rome, and restored to the Pope all the Cities which his Father Pepin had given him, and all the Estates which the Roman Church had possessed in Italy. In consideration of which Benefits, Adrian, as Head of the Roman Republick, granted him, with the consent of the People of Rome, the Title of Patricius, and gave him the Sovereignty over the City and all the Republick of Rome; insomuch that all the People, and even the Bishop himself, took an Oath of Allegiance to him. After this, Charles wanted nothing but the Title of Emperor, which he received in the year 800, being then proclaimed Emperor by the People of Rome, and afterwards consecrated and crowned by the Pope. When Charles had gotten the Title of Emperor, he regulated all the Affairs of Italy; he permitted the Lombards to live peaceably under his Dominion; he gave the Name of Romania to the ancient Exarchate, and shared Italy with the Greek Emperor, on condition, that all which was on this side Naples, should belong to him; and that the City of Naples, and all that was on the other side of it, should continue in the Greek Emperor's Power.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

From this time the Succeſſors of Charles were Kings of Italy, and Sovereigns of Rome; though the Popes were temporal Lords of the Cities that anciently belonged to the Exarchate of Ravenna, and ſome others. Ludovicus Pius, the Son of Charlemaigne, ſent Bernard to Rome, to allay the Diſſentions that were riſen there. After the Death of this Bernard, Lotharius comes to Rome with an Army, to puniſh ſome Rebels, and ordains, that for the future the Magiſtrates of Rome ſhould be created by the Emperors. But Charles the bald parted with this noble Right, and ſurrendred up to the Romans the Sovereign Power, reſtoring them, If I may ſo ſay, to their ancient Liberty.

In the mean while, the Popes began to lay by little and little the Foundations of their Sovereign Dominion. For although the Sovereign Power did as yet remain in the Body of the People, who created the Magiſtrates in Rome, and the neighbouring Cities, nevertheleſs, the Popes who were now grown rich and powerful, uſed all their endeavours to make themſelves Sovereigns, and that the ſhadow of Sovereignty ſhould only remain in the People. Yet the Romans had two Conſuls, one Prætor, and one Governor of the City, whom they choſe; and oftentimes caſt off the Yoke which the Popes would impoſe upon them; which was the Cauſe of thoſe cruel Wars that happened between the Popes, the principal Citizens of Rome, and the Emperors of Germany: But at laſt the Popes [illegible] the better on't, and remained ſole Maſters and Sovereigns of Rome, and the Countries about it.

All that we have ſaid concerning the Foundation and Growth of the Pope's Power, plainly ſhews, that the Settlement of their Empire is not owing to Conſtantine, but to the Kings of France; and by conſequence, that the Edict of Donation that bears the Name of Conſtantine, is wholly ſuppoſititious; but it is not ſo eaſie to find out who was the Author of this falſe Monument, and upon what Motives he forged it. 'Tis certain that it is more ancient than Hincmar, ſince that Biſhop cites it in his third Ep. ch. 13. and Iſidore * has put it in his Collection. It is alſo alledged by Pope Leo the ninth, in his Epiſtle to Michael Cerularius; and St. Anſelm, Ivo Carnutenſis, and Gratian, have inſerted it into their Collections. To conclude, Balſamon a Greek Author, has related a part of it in Greek, in his Commentaries upon Photius's Nomocanon. Baronius, and thoſe that blindly follow his Conjectures, have ſuſpected the Greeks of this Forgery, pretending that they forged this Monument to eſtabliſh the Antiquity of the Patriarchate of Conſtantinople, by affirming, that the Church of Rome owes its Grandeur to the Emperor Conſtantine. But beſides, that 'tis no ways probable that the Greeks ſhould forge an Act contrary to their own pretended Right over Italy, this Edict is found cited by the Latines 200 years before it was known to the Greeks. Morinus believes that it was written by John, a Deacon of the Church of Rome, who lived in the year 963: But that cannot be, ſince it was cited before that time by Hincmar. Monſieur de Marca maintains, That the Popes framed this Monument with the Conſent of the French Kings, that they might oppoſe it againſt the Greek Emperors, who demanded back again the Exarchate of Ravenna, as belonging to them: But what probability is there, that the Popes and French Kings ſhould have recourſe to this Forgery, which might eaſily be diſcover'd, having much better reaſons to alledge to the Greeks, why the Exarchate of Ravenna did not belong to them? Some have attributed this falſe Monument to the Author of the Collection of Iſidore, a notorious Forger of ſuch kind of Pieces; and this Conjecture is more probable than the reſt, but neither is it certain, and therefore it is better to ſuſpend our Judgment about this Matter, than to build it upon Conjectures that have ſo little ſolidity.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

Beſides the Greek Fragments of this Edict recited by Balſamon, 'tis ſaid, there are four Greek Manuſcripts of the whole Edict in the Vatican Library. The Latin Editions of it do not altogether agree; for Iſidore's is different from that which is found in the ancient Manuſcript of Juſtellus. One Bartholomew Picernas, boaſts that he made a new Tranſlation of it from a Greek Manuſcript in the Vatican Library, which he printed with a Dedication to Pope Julius the Second: But he has done nothing but corrected the ancient Latin Edition. A Prieſt of Deventer has alſo printed this Edition at Cologne in the year 1535. The Differences of all theſe Editions are to be ſeen in Father Labbé's firſt Volume of the Councils. It ſeems more probable to me, That the Greek was taken out of the Latin, than that the Latin was tranſlated from the Greek. However it be, this Monument has neither Authority nor Uſefulneſs.

JUVENCUS.

Juvencus.

Hitherto we have not met with any Poet among the Chriſtian Writers. Here is a very excellent one who flouriſhed under the Reign of Conſtantine; he was called C. Vettius Aquilinus Juvencus, and was deſcended of one of the nobleſt Families in Spain. St. Jerome aſſures us that he was a Prieſt, and that's all that he tells us of his Life. He compoſed a Poem about the year 329, divided into four Books; wherein he deſcribes the Life of Chriſt in Hexameter Verſe, without wandring from the Text of the Four Evangeliſts. St. Jerome alſo teſtifies, That he wrote ſome Books in Hexameter Verſe about Myſteries; and 'tis ſaid, that he compoſed ſome Hymns, of which St. Jerome ſays not a word: But 'tis probable enough, that one who had ſo fertile a Vein in Poetry, as he had, wrote ſeveral other Books. However that be, we have now only four Books of the Hiſtory of the Goſpel under his Name: In the Exordium of this Poem he ſays, That if the Verſes of thoſe who have publiſhed the Actions of mortal Men, which they adorned with their Fictions, have purchaſed them a Reputation ſo laſting for many Ages, he ought to be aſſured of immortal Glory, who writes the Life of Jeſus Chriſt, and needs not fear that the Day of Judgment ſhall conſume his Work.

Quod ſi tam longam meruerunt carmina famam,
Quæ veterum geſtis hominum mendacia nectunt;
Nobis certa fides æternæ in ſæcula laudis
Immortale decus tribuet, meritumque rependet:
Nam mihi carmen erunt Chriſti vitalia geſta,
Divinumvin populis falſi ſine crimine donum;
Nec metus ut mundi rapiant incendia ſecum
Hoc opus.

After this, he invocates the Aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit, to enable him to recount the Actions of Chriſt, in ſuch a manner as is ſuitable to their Greatneſs.

Juvencus.

Ergo age ſanctificans adſit mihi carminis auctor
Spiritus, & puro mentem riget amne canentis
Dulcis Jordanis, ut Chriſto digna loquamur.

After this Invocation, he begins the Hiſtory of Chriſt, and relates in Verſe all that has been ſaid by the four Evangeliſts, without wandring from the Text, and without adding any thing uncertain or fabulous. He concludes thoſe four Books with a Compliment to the Emperor Conſtantine, whom he thanks for the Peace of the Church, and mightily commends, becauſe he was the only King who would not allow the peculiar Names of God to be attributed to him.

The Air of the Poem is very Poetical, the Cadence of the Verſe is fine and ſoft; but the Words are not always Poetical, and ſometimes they are not very good Latin. That which is chiefly to be commended in this Author, is the Faithfulneſs of his Tranſlation; wherein he has rendred almoſt word for word the Text of the Evangeliſts. This was a difficult undertaking, which he has performed with good Succeſs, and one may ſay, that it is almoſt impoſſible to have done it better.

There are a great many Editions of this Author. His Book was printed with Sedulius and other Chriſtian Poets at Cologne, in Octavo 1537; at Baſil, in Octavo, 1537, 1550; at Venice by Aldus, in Quarto 1502; at Baſil by Oporinus, in Quarto alſo, 1564; at Lyons by Torneſius, 1588; at Paris, in 1543, 1575, 1589, 1624; at Vienna, in Quarto 1519; and in many other places: And, it is alſo to be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

RHETICIUS.

Rheticius.

Rheticius Biſhop of Autun, had ſo great a Reputation in the time of Conſtantine, that the Emperor choſe him to be one of the Judges in the Cauſe of the Donatiſts. He aſſiſted at the Council of Rome, wherein Cæcilian was Abſolv'd, and afterwards at the Council of Arles, held in the Year 314. St. Jerome ſays, that in his Time, this Biſhop's Commentaries upon the Canticles, were extant, and alſo a large Volume againſt Novatian; but he met with no other Books of his. The ſame St. Jerome, ſpeaking of this Author's Commentaries, in his Second Letter to Florentius, ſays, that he gave a lofty ſenſe of the Canticles: And laſtly, in his Ep. 133. to Marcellus, he Rheticius.

Rheticius. he gives a Critical Judgment of these Commentaries, which is very little to their Advantage. He says, They are full of Extravagant Explications; That he found an infinite number of Errors and base Things in them; That the Stile, indeed, is lofty and swelling, but such as is not suitable to an Interpreter, who ought not to aim at the discovery of his own Eloquence, but the true sense of his Author. He relates in the same place some of the gross Mistakes of this Author; e.g. That he confounds Tharsis which is mention'd in the Psalms, with the City of Tarsus where St. Paul was born; that he believ'd the Hebrew word Ophaz, which signifies Gold, signified a Stone, and so confounds it with the Name, Cephas, which is given in the Gospel to St. Peter. In short, St. Jerome wrote to Marcellus, That he had not sent the Commentaries of this Author as he desir'd; because there were many things in them that displeas'd him, and but few things that he could approve of: And we have nothing more of these Commentaries, nor of the other works of this Author. Rheticius.

EUSTATHIUS Bishop of Antioch.

Eustathius of Antioch. EUstathius, a Native of Syda, a City of Pamphilia (a), was chosen Bishop of Antioch, after he had govern'd the Church of Berœa for some time (b), in the room of Philogonus, in the year 323 from the Birth of Christ. He assisted at the Council of Nice, where he sat in one of the chief Places (c), and there maintained the Faith of the Church with great Constancy. After the Council of Nice, being one of the Zealous Defenders of its Decisions, and one of the greatest Adversaries to the Arians, he drew upon himself the Hatred of the Bishops of Palæstine, which burst forth immediately upon the first occasion they found: which offer'd it self in the Year 329, when Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice, return'd from their Banishment, and went to Palæstine, under pretence of visiting the Church of Jerusalem: for then they pass'd by Antioch, where they were honourably received by Eustathius, and they on their part gave marks of their Friendship to him. But at their Return they brought with them to Antioch, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, Aëcius of Lidda, Theodotus of Laodicea, with some other Eastern Bishops, with a design to depose Eustathius. These Bishops being then Assembled at Antioch in the year 330 (d), did not only falsly charge him with the Error of the Sabellians, but also accus'd him of infamous Crimes. Theodoret says, that they hir'd a Woman of an ill Life (e), to say, that she had a Child by Eustathius; That this wicked Woman entered with a Child in her Arms into the place of their Assembly, and declar'd with a loud Voice, that she had it by Eustathius; That this holy Bishop having ask'd her if she had any witness of what she affirm'd; she answer'd she had none; and yet notwithstanding this, the Bishops believ'd it upon her Oath, and Condemn'd Eustathius as convicted of the Crime. St. Athanasius says nothing of this Story, which appears otherwise to be fabulous enough; but he observes only that they accus'd Eustathius of having treated the Emperor's Mother reproachfully (f), and that immediately he was sent into Banishment, with many of his Priests and Deacons; but the place of his Exile is not certainly known (g). In whatsoever Place it was, there he ended his days, and 'tis probable, that he liv'd not long after his Condemnation; for there is no mention made of him in History, and 'tis false, whatever Socrates and Sozomen say, That he return'd again from Banishment in the time of the Emperor Jovian (h). This Bishop is the first, if we will believe St. Jerome, that wrote against the Arians. He compos'd many Books against their Doctrine, abundance of Homilies, an infinite number of Letters, many Treatises of the Soul, and a Discourse of the Pythoniss against Origen. Eustathius of Antioch.

Facundus quotes in Latin, Ch. 1. of his B. XI. Four Passages of Eustathius of Antioch, whereof the two first are taken out of B. VII. and the two last out of B. VIII. against the Arians. He alledges them in this place to prove, That this Bishop of Antioch, in speaking of the Incarnation, made use of Expressions, at least as harsh as those that were objected to Theodorus of Mopsuestia; in effect, the Passages

(a) SYda, a City of Pamphylia.] As St. Jerome observes, this is a Sea-Port Town, called at present Forte.

(b) After having governed the Church of Berœa for some time.] It is agreed upon all hands that he was Bishop of Berœa. St. Jerome, Theodoret, Socrates and Sozomen testifie it. He was also Bishop of that Church, when Alexander of Alexandria wrote his Letter against Arius, for Theodoret notes expressly, that it was directed to him. Sozomen says in the First Book of his Hist. ch. 2. That the See of Antioch was vacant after the Death of Romanus, and that Eustathius was ordain'd Bishop of Antioch in the Council of Nice: and in Ch. 17. of the same Book, he says, that he was already Bishop of Antioch when he assisted at this Council; yet St. Romanus was not Bishop, but only a Martyr of Antioch, and Eustathius succeeded immediately to Philogonus some time before the Council of Nice, but after the beginning of the Arian Controversy, that is to say, in the year 323, or 324.

(c) He sate in one of the Chief Places.] Proclus of Constantinople, in a Synodical Letter to the Oriental Bishops, set down by Facundus, B. I. Ch. 1. says, that he was the Chief of the Fathers in the Council of Nice. Facundus gives him the same Title, B. XI. Ch. 1. and Pope Felix III. calls him, in his 6th. Ep. to Zeno, President of the Council. Theodoret, B. I. of his Hist. Ch. 7. says, that he spoke to the Emperor in the Name of the Council; and Euseb. B. I. Life of Const. ch. 11. says, that he who first Harangued the Emperor, was seated in the Chief Place on the right Hand: But he seems to say at the Beginning of his Books of the Life of Constantine, that it was himself that made this Harangue, as Theodoret assures us, Hist. B. I. ch. 19. The Author of the Tripartite Hist. willing to joyn these several Opinions together, says, that Eusebius did not speak till after Eustathius. Theodorus of Mopsuestia, says, that Alexander of Alexandria, was entrusted with that Office. Be that as it will, it does not follow, that he who spoke first must therefore be President of the Council, as having the first Place upon the right hand: for besides that this might be given him only for the time while he spoke, it may be that this place was not the most honourable: Moreover, Eustathius might be call'd the Chief, because he was one of the first; But it is more probable, that Hosius was President of the Council.

(d) Being then assembled at Antioch in the Year 330.] All Historians agree, that Eustathius was depos'd under the Reign of Constantine. Eusebius an unquestionable Witness, gives us an Account, B. III. Life of Constantine, ch. 59. of the Tumult that arose in the Church of Antioch upon the Deposition of Eustathius, as a thing that happen'd after the Council of Nice, but before the Death of the Emperor Constantine. St. Athanasius begins with this Deposition, the History of the Arian Persecution under Constantine; and though there be in the Text Constantius for Constantine, that is a mistake; for 'tis plain from St. Athanasius, that Flacillus, who was ordain'd in the room of Eustathius, had the Title of Bishop of Antioch, at the Council of Tyre, held under Constantine, from whence it evidently follows that Eustathius was then depos'd. The like Error appears in some Editions of St. Jerome's Books of Ecclesiastical Writers; but in the ancient Editions and in the Greek Version, we read under Constantine, and not under Constantius.

(e) Theodoret says, That they hir'd a Woman of an ill Life.] Philostorgius reports also this Story, B. II. Ch. 7. Socrat. and Sozom. allude to it, when they say, that Eustathius was accus'd of Infamous Crimes. St. Jerome mentions it in his Apol. against Ruffinus; Eustathius says, he found Sons which he knew not of; Filios dum nescit invenit: and the Emperor Constantine seems to hint it in his Letter to the Bishops, the infamous Persons being driven away, as he speaks.

(f) Of having treated the Emperor's Mother reproachfully.] 'Twas to Constantine that they wrote this Calumny; for Eustathius having recourse to the Emperor, and being come to Constantinople to complain of the injustice that was done him, the Bishops assembled at Antioch made use of this Calumny to stir up the Emperor against him. They added also, that he was the Author of that Sedition which arose at Antioch after his Deposition. These things mov'd the Emperor to Banish him presently, without inquiring into the Merits of his Cause. The Eusebians also did afterwards make use of an Artifice just like this against St. Athanasius.

(g) But the place of his Exile is not certainly known.] Theodoret says, that he was sent to Illyricum; Philostorgius says only, that he was sent into the West: But St. Jerome assures us, that he was carried away to Trajanopolis, a City of Thracia. St. Chrysostome says, that he died in Thracia: And in fine, Theodorus Lector at the beginning of the Second Book of his History, says, that Calendion the Patriarch of Antioch, caus'd the Reliques of Eustathius to be transported from Philippopolis in Macedonia, to Antioch.

(h) 'Tis false,---that he return'd again from Banishment in the time of the Emperor Jovian.] Theodoret says, that Eustathius was dead when Meletius was ordain'd Bishop of Antioch. And certainly Meletius ought not to have been ordain'd in his place before, and the Eustathians (so call'd because they would not communicate with any Bishop of Antioch that was ordain'd by the Arian Faction) would never have suffer'd Paulinus to have been ordain'd while Eustathius liv'd. There is no mention of him in all the Disputes that follow'd after, neither did he return after the Death of Constantine, when all the banish'd Bishops were recall'd; for it does not appear that he was present in any Council, or that he ever demanded to be restor'd to his Bishoprick: In a word, there is nothing more said of him in History. From all which I conclude, that 'tis something probable, that he died before the year 337.

Euſtathius of Antioch.

which he relates, ſeem to favour the Error of Neſtorius (i). But his Doctrine muſt not be anathematized, ſays Facundus, upon the Account of ſome Expreſſions that are leſs exact, which he made uſe of at a time when he ſpoke ſimply and without precaution, becauſe the Error of Neſtorius did not yet appear. The Paſſages of Euſtathius which Theodoret gives us in Greek, Hiſt. B. I. Ch. 8. are much more conſiderable than thoſe which are cited by Facundus: It is taken out of the ſame Work againſt the Arians, and probably out of the two firſt Books. Take it whole as Monſieur Couſin has Tranſlated it.

'A very numerous Council being aſſembled about this 'matter in the City of Nice, where 270 Biſhops, or there- 'abouts, aſſiſted, (for that the Number was ſo great, I cannot 'preciſely ſet it down, and beſides, I took no great care to 'inform my ſelf of it.) When they firſt began to enquire 'into the Faith, a Libel of Euſebius was produc'd, which 'contain'd a convincing Proof of his Blaſphemies. The 'reading of it, caus'd a ſenſible Grief in all that heard it, 'and great Confuſion in its Author. The Malignity of 'Euſebius's Aſſociates being diſcover'd, and the Impious 'Writing being publickly tore in pieces, ſome under pre- 'tence of the Peace which they propoſed, impos'd Silence 'upon thoſe that uſed to ſpeak better than others. The 'Arians apprehending that they ſhould be caſt out of the 'Church by the Judgment of ſo great an Aſſembly, con- 'demn'd the Impious Doctrine, and ſign'd the Confeſſion 'of Faith. But having ſecur'd by their Cabals the principal 'Dignities to themſelves, inſtead of ſuffering Canonical 'Penance as they ought, they maintained the Doctrine that 'was condemn'd, ſometimes in private, and ſometimes in 'Publick, by ſeveral Arguments which they had invented 'for that purpoſe. The deſire they had to ſow the Seeds 'of Diviſion, made them ſhun meeting with the Learned, 'and attacquing the Defenders of the Faith; but we do 'not think that theſe Atheiſts can overcome God, for what- 'ever Efforts they make will be vanquiſh'd according to 'the authentick Teſtimonies of the Prophet Iſaiah. Theodoret adds, See here what Euſtathius has written of the Arians. There is alſo another Paſſage in Greek taken out of this Work, related by Anaſtaſius in his Collections, wherein Euſtathius maintains, That Jeſus Chriſt cannot be ſaid to be Created and Begotten according to the ſame Nature; for if he was Created he was not Begotten, and if he was Begot- ten he was not Created. The ſame Theodoret citeth in his Dialogues many Paſſages of Euſtathius about the Incarna- tion, taken out of his Book upon the Soul, and his Diſ- courſe upon theſe words of the Proverbs; God hath created me in the beginning of his ways: out of his 15th and 92d. Homilies upon the Pſalms, and out of two other Treatiſes upon the Inſcriptions or Titles of ſome Pſalms (k).

All the Paſſages of Euſtathius, reported by Theodoret (l), Prove, That there are two Perfect Natures in Jeſus Chriſt, the Divine and the Human Nature; That he has a Body and a Soul like us; That he is Paſſible according to the Human Nature, and, That the Humanity is not chang'd in- to the Divinity: From whence it appears, that Euſtathius did more formally reject the Error of the Eutychians, than that of the Neſtorians, Although there are ſome Expreſſions in the ſame Paſſages, which plainly enough ſhew that he was perſuaded, that theſe two Natures were united in one and the ſame Perſon. But the Oriental Writers have al- ways more applied themſelves to remark the diſtinction of the two Natures in Chriſt, than their intimate Union; whereas on the contrary, the Egyptians are more addicted to diſcourſe of their Union than their Diſtinction: Which thing afterwards was the Subject of the great Diſputes that were amongſt them about the Myſtery of the Incarnation.

Euſtathius of Antioch.

The Treatiſe of Euſtathius concerning the Pythoniſs (m), cited by St. Jerome, was publiſh'd in Greek in the Year 1629, and Tranſlated into Latin by Allatius; together with a Diſ- courſe of this Author upon the ſame Subject. The Que- ſtion there treated of is, whether the Witch mention'd B. I. of Kings, Ch. 28. did really bring back the Soul of Samuel into this World to ſpeak unto Saul? Euſtathius maintains the Negative againſt Origen, who had taught the Affirmative in one of his Homilies: and after he has related in a pleaſant manner all the Circumſtances of the Hiſtory, he refutes the Explication of Origen. He lays it down for a Principle, that the Devil cannot bring back Souls from the other World: He ſays, it is ridiculous to give him this Authority over the Souls of the Juſt, and that there is none but God only, who is Lord over them. He demands of Origen, Whether the Witch made Samuel appear in Body and Soul together, or if ſhe only brought back his Soul; and then he ſhews, that neither the one, nor the other is probable. He rallies Origen for attributing to the Holy Spirit the Words which the Witch pronounced when ſhe was acted by an evil Spi- rit. He maintains that Saul did not at all ſee the Ghoſt of Samuel, but only was aſtoniſh'd with the extraordinary Speeches, and Violent Motions of the Witch, and there- fore caſt himſelf down upon the ground to Worſhip. He proves, that 'tis contrary to common ſenſe, to ſay, as Ori- gen does, That the Gods which the Witch ſays ſhe ſaw aſcending out of the Earth, were the Souls of the Juſt and the Angels: He obſerves, that the Prediction of the Pythoniſs was found to be falſe; and tho' it had been true, it would not therefore follow, that it was from the Holy Spirit, ſince the Devil has often made ſuch like Predictions, which Chance and the Circumſtances of things, that are known to him, have ſometimes verified. He does alſo make it appear from the Circumſtances of this Prediction, That it was an Impoſture of the Devil, and that it cannot be attributed to the Holy Spirit, without ſome kind of Im- piety. After this, he anſwers the chief objection of Origen, taken from the Scripture, which gives the Name of Samuel to that Apparition: To which he ſays, that he was aſto- niſh'd at an Author, who durſt explain the whole Scripture Allegorically, treat as a Fable the Hiſtory of Moſes concern- ing the Terreſtrial Paradiſe, and give Myſtical Senſes to all the Hiſtories of the Old Teſtament, that he ſhould ende- vour to put off for Truth, the Fictions of a Woman acted by an evil Spirit. He ſhews, That when the Scripture gives the Name of Samuel to this Apparition, 'tis not to be un- derſtood as if Samuel himſelf in Body and Soul were there; but only that this Woman made him believe by the Re- preſentation which ſhe gave Saul of this Spectre, that this was the Prophet Samuel whom he deſir'd to conſult. In

(i) In effect, the Paſſages which he relates, ſeem to favour the Error of Neſtorius.] In the firſt, he ſays, That God who united the Human Nature to the Word for the Salvation of Mankind, has conceal'd from this Human Nature the Day of Judgment, leſt the Man ſhould teach Mankind the time of his ſecond Coming. In the Second he ſeems to ſay, That Jeſus Chriſt incarnate is another Perſon than the Word, but the word Perſon is not always taken in a ſtrict ſenſe. In the third, he ſays, That the Word dwells in the Human Nature as in its Temple: an Expreſſion which Neſtorius often made uſe of. In the laſt, he ſays, that the Scep- ter which God prepar'd for his Son, does not agree to the Fa- ther, nor to the Word, but only to the Man Chriſt, Who is, ſays he, the Lord of all the Creatures, becauſe of the Mixture of the Divine Word. 'Tis evident, that theſe Expreſſions are not exact; but then we ought not for this to accuſe him of Error, for 'tis eaſie to excuſe him, not only becauſe of the time when he wrote, but alſo becauſe 'tis common enough with thoſe that liv'd a long time after him, to make uſe ſometimes of Expreſ- ſions very like this, to diſtinguiſh the Humanity of Chriſt from his Divinity to which it is united. To which we may add, That 'tis plain from the paſſages related by Theodoret, that he was far enough from the error of the Neſtorians.

(k) Upon the Inſcriptions or Titles of ſome Pſalms.] The firſt is taken from the Treatiſe, Εἰς τὰς ἐπιγεγραμμένας ψαλμῳδίας, and the Se- cond from the Treatiſe, Εἰς τὰς ἐπιγεγραμμένας τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν. The 6th. Pſalm which is our 5th. has for its Title in the Septuagint Ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαβὶδ, i. e. the Inſcription of a Title for David; and the 57. Τῷ Δαβὶδ εἰς στηλογραφίαν, i. e. an Inſcription to David, or to David for an Inſcription. Στηλογραφία is properly an Inſcription up- on a Pillar. The Pſalms 57, 58, and 59. have the like titles. The Treatiſe which Theodoret cites in this place, Εἰς ἐπιγεγραμμένας στηλογραφίας, was compos'd upon theſe Inſcriptions; as the ſecond, Εἰς τὰς ἐπιγεγραμμένας τῶν ἀναβαθμῶν, was compos'd upon the Inſcriptions of the Pſalms of Degrees. St. Gregory Nyſſen has ſince made a Trea- tiſe upon the Inſcriptions of the Pſalms. This Obſervation I owe to the Learned Cotelerius.

(l) All the Paſſages of Euſtathius, reported by Theodoret.] In the Paſſages cited from the Firſt and Second Dialogue, he aſſerts, That Chriſt had a Body and Soul of the ſame Subſtance with ours, and there he calls the Fleſh of Chriſt, the Temple in which the Divinity dwelt. He obſerves in the laſt paſſage of his Se- cond Dialogue, that Chriſt had no need of the legal Sacrifices to purifie himſelf, becauſe he purifies himſelf, and ſanctifies all things; but he voluntarily ſubmitted to the Law, to deliver us from that Bondage, us who were enſlav'd under, and liable to the Malediction of Sin. In the Paſſages recited out of the laſt Dialogue, he proves that the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt was not ſubject to any Pains or Sufferings, but only his Humanity: There he affirms, That Jeſus Chriſt had a Soul, That he truly ſuffer'd, though voluntarily; and that the Word dwelling in the Body of the Man as in a Temple, reſtor'd by the Reſurrection that Tem- ple which Death had deſtroy'd. In a word, he ſhews, that all the Properties of the Human and Divine Nature were found in Chriſt; but that we muſt not attribute to the Divinity that which agrees only to the Humanity, or deny becauſe of his Di- vinity, the Properties which agree only to the Human Nature.

(m) The Treatiſe of Euſtathius concerning the Pythoniſs.] 'Tis entituled in Greek Εἰς τὸ τῆς ἐγγαστριμύθου, in Latin, De ventriloquo, which cannot be render'd in Engliſh, but by a Circumlocuti- on; that is to ſay, The Diſcourſe which thoſe Pronounce who have a Devil in their Belly. To underſtand this, we muſt obſerve that the Ancients believ'd, That the Demon which the Pagans ho- nour'd under the Name of the God Python, entred into the Bowels of the Prieſts and Prieſteſſes, and by ſtrange agitations excited in them a kind of Fury, which made them ſay many things which were taken for Predictions: For which reaſon the Women that profeſs'd to Divine things to come were call'd Pytha- niſſes. Such was ſhe, to whom Saul addreſs'd himſelf for con- ſulting Samuel, whoſe Hiſtory is the Subject of this Diſſertation, and therefore I have entituled it, Concerning the Pythoniſs.

short, he demonstrates, from all the Circumstances of this Story, That there was nothing real in this Apparition; but that it was only an Apparition represented in the imagination of Saul and this Prophetess, by the Devil which possess'd them. This is the Sentiment which Eustathius confirms in this Dissertation, which is short, beautiful and very close; for as he says nothing superfluous, so he omits no Proof which might be of Advantage to his Opinion. There appear in it much Learning and a well-pois'd Judgment, and one may venture to say, that there are few Works of this Nature in all Antiquity so perfect as this Discourse. Yet I think, he has treated Origen a little too harshly, in a Question that does not at all belong to Religion, but is purely Critical. To conclude, the Opinion of Eustathius is since his time grown the more common Opinion (n), and I must confess, that 'tis more probable than the other, tho' I cannot affirm any thing for certain in this matter.

We cannot give any Judgment so much to the advantage of that Commentary upon the Work of the Six Days, or the Hexameron which bears the Name of Eustathius, publish'd by the same Allatius; but on the contrary, 'tis a Work altogether unworthy of a Man of his Sense, and which cannot be attributed to Eustathius, without doing him great Dishonour; and there is no probability that it was his. For First, Not only St. Jerome and Theodoret make no mention of it but it, is not found cited by any Author. Secondly, It is an ill contriv'd Collection of Passages out of Eusebius, St. Basil, the Old Testament, Josephus, Artapanus, the Gospel falsly ascrib'd to St. James, and many other Authors. Thirdly, the Style is perfectly different from that of his Dissertation concerning the Pythoniss, and the Fragments of Eustathius's Sermons. Fourthly, the things treated of in this Book, do not at all suit with the Genius of Eustathius, for in his Dissertation concerning the Pythoniss, he reproves Origen for studying to make too many useless Remarks and Allegories in explaining the Scriptures, while he neglects the literal sense of them, and the Moral Reflections that should be made upon them: Now this Treatise upon the Hexameron, is almost wholly compos'd of such unprofitable Remarks, which concern neither Religion nor Manners. Fifthly, this Author begins with an extract out of the Chronicon of Eusebius, concerning the Antiquity of Moses, and then repeats the first Verses of Genesis, from whence he takes occasion to make a particular Enumeration of all the different sorts of Plants, Herbs, Trees, Fishes, Birds and Beasts; and to discourse of their Nature and properties, saying many things very fabulous of them: After this, he makes a very imperfect Abridgment of the History of Genesis, adding many circumstances to it taken out of Josephus. He makes a Digression concerning the Genealogy of Jesus Christ, in which he copies out a passage of Africanus, and then gives an Abridgment of the Fables which are in the Proto-Evangelium of St. James, concerning the Virgin, St. Joseph, Joachim, and Zachary. Afterwards he resumes the Continuation of his Abridgment of History, which goes as far as the end of Joshua's Government, being nothing else but Extracts out of the Books of Scripture, and the History of Josephus; whereby it appears, that there is neither Order nor Design in all this Work, and that 'tis nothing else but a heap of Passages confusedly jumbled together by a Man of no Learning or Judgment: which cannot be said of Eustathius of Antioch, who was a very Learn'd, Judicious and Eloquent Man, as any one may easily perceive by his Dissertation, and the Fragments we have of his Works. Allatius has no proof that this Work is Eustathius's of Antioch, under whose Name he has publish'd it; but he endeavours to prove, that it was made by some ancient Author, because in speaking of the end of the World, he maintains that it will not continue above 6000 Years, and in giving the Chronology of Time already past, he does not go beyond the 30th Year of Constantine. But this proof is not at all convincing, for 'tis probable, that this Author has taken what he says in those places from one of the Ancients, without adding any thing of his own: But suppose he were the Author of what is related concerning the end of the World, may not an Impostor affect to speak so, on purpose to make us believe that his work was Ancient? Be it as it will, there is no manner of Probability that it was written by Eustathius of Antioch.

Eustathius of Antioch.

I shall not now commend this Bishop for his Zeal in defending the Faith, his invincible Constancy, his Wisdom and singular Moderation, which appear'd in suffering patiently the reproachful Accusation, wherewith his enemies charg'd him, and the unjust Deposition which they pronounc'd against him; but shall content my self to consider him as an Author, and observe him with Sozomen, Hist. B. II. Ch. 19. that he had acquired a rare Eloquence, As appears, says he, by his Works, which are most Worthy of Commendation, as well for the antient Purity of Stile, as the Sublimity of Thought, the Beauty of Expression, and the Curiosity of his Discourses. These rare qualities of this good Writer appear in his Dissertation of the Pythoniss, and in his Fragment set down by Theodoret, which confirm the Judgment that Sozomen gives of this Author. I have not seen any other Edition in Greek and Latin of his Works, but that which we have already spoken of, Printed at Lyons by Durandus in Quarto, in the Year 1629.

(n) The Opinion of Eustathius is since his Time grown the more common Opinion.] St. Justin in his Dialogue against Tryphon, is of the same Opinion with Origen, and concludes, that all Souls, even those of the Just, fall under the power of Demons: But Tertullian is of Eustathius's Opinion in his Book of the Soul, Ch. 57. where he says expresly, That we must not believe that it was the Soul of Samuel which the Pythoniss brought back from the other World; but that 'twas only a cheat of the Devil. Since Eustathius's time, there are but few Authors of Origen's Opinion, excepting Sulpitius Severus. St. Austin makes a Problem of this Question, in his Letter to Simplicianus, but he inclines to Eustathius's side. Eucherius, Bede, St. Anselm, Rabanus, and St. Thomas, follow St. Austin. Theodoret and some others, have said, That God form'd this Apparition of Samuel, or that he made an Angel appear under the form of Samuel. St. Basil is of Eustathius's Opinion, in his Commentary upon Ch. 8. of Isaiah; but he seems to approve the contrary Opinion in his Letter to Eustathius the Physician. St. Gregory Nazianzen touches both these Opinions in his first Oration against Julian: But Gregory Nyssen, in a Letter Written on this Subject, expresly refutes the Opinion of Origen, and proves that of Eustathius. 'Tis no wonder that Methodius and St. Jerome condemn Origen's Opinion, but 'tis surprizing that Philastrius has tax'd it of Heresie, Heres. 28. The Author of the Question ascrib'd to St. Justin, Quest. 52. The Author of the Questions concerning the Wonderful things in Scripture, B. II. Ch. 2. and of the Questions of the Old and New Testament attributed to St. Austin, Quest. 26. Isidore, B. VIII. Ch. 8. of his Origines, Zonaras Hist. Tom. 1. Syncellus in his Chronicle, and many others approve the Opinion of Eustathius. The modern Commentators, are much divided about it: And indeed, the Opinion of Origen may be better maintain'd when 'tis suppos'd, That 'twas by the Permission of God, and not by the Power of the Devil, that the Pythoniss brought back the Soul of Samuel; and so it seems to be more agreeable to the Letter of Scripture; but the other is more Rational, and explains the matter in Dispute more naturally.

PETER of Alexandria.

Peter of Alexandria.

PEter of Alexandria had his Head cut off (a) for the Faith, by the Commandment of the Emperor Maximinus, in the ninth year of Diocletian's Persecution, that is to say, in the year 311 from the Birth of Christ: We have the Acts of his Martyrdom; but since they do not agree with the Ecclesiastical History of that Time, we ought not to give much Credit to them (b). Though St. Jerome and others, who have given an Account of Ecclesiastical Writers, do not place this Bishop among them; yet he certainly wrote some things. There is in the Council of Ephe-

Peter of Alexandria.

(a) Had his Head cut off.] Baronius sets down the Martyrdom of Peter at the year 310; but Eusebius says, in two places of his History, that he suffer'd the 9th. year of the Persecution, which is 311. according to the vulgar Æra: The Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum follows Eusebius. Baronius cites for himself, ch. 13. of the eighth Book of Eusebius, where Peter is numbred amongst the Martyrs; but in this place of his History, he does not reckon up the Martyrs in order of time, but only discourses of many famous Bishops and Martyrs.

(b) We ought not to give much credit to them.] These Acts were published by Surius, and afterwards in Greek by Combefis: But they neither agree with the History of the time, nor with that of Peter. 1. This Author says in two places, that Peter died under Diocletian, which is false, since this Emperor abdicated the Empire a long time before the year 311. 2. Eusebius says, that Peter was seiz'd, and executed upon the spot. These Acts suppose that he was a long time in Prison, and that he must have written of it to the Emperor who was at Nicomedia. 3 He places amongst the Bishops of Alexandria, one Milius, when in truth, there was never a one of that Name. 4. He places Heraclas after Dionysius and Maximus, though he certainly preceded them. 5. He feigns that Heraclas had Disputes with Origen, when there was never any such thing. 6. He says, that the Body of Peter was carried into the Church of Theonas, which was built by Alexander the Successor of Achillas, who came after Peter to the See of Alexandria. In short, he relates, that Arius was Excommunicated by Peter of Alexandria, because of his impious Doctrine: But the Ancients say not a word of this Excommunication, neither does Alexander, nor St. Athanasius object it to Arius: And indeed, can there be any probability, that Achillas should receive Arius if he had been Excommunicated by Peter? Especially, if it be true which is related in those Acts, that Peter advertized Achillas and Alexander, that he had seen a Vision, wherein he was ſus, a paſſage or two about the Incarnation, taken out of his Book about the Divinity. Juſtinian in his Edict to Menna againſt Origen, quotes two paſſages of Peter of Alexandria: The firſt out of a Homily againſt Pre-exiſtence of Souls; The ſecond out of a Myſtagogical Diſcourſe compoſed by him a little before his Martyrdom: this is very remarkable: I exhort you (ſays this Holy Martyr) to watch, for you ſhall once more be in Affliction; you know how the Heathens cauſed St. Thomas my Father and my Biſhop, who bred me up, and my Predeceſſor in this See, to ſuffer. Would to God I had alſo been his Succeſſor in Holineſs too: You know the Perſecution which the great Saint Dionyſius endured, and how he was obliged to hide himſelf, and to be continually changing the place of his Abode, whilſt the Heretick Sabellius tormented him in another manner: What ſhall I ſay of the holy Biſhops Heraclas and Demetrius? What Tribulations did not they endure from Origen, who ſowed Diviſions in their Church, and who cauſed Diſturbances there which are not yet quieted? And we have in Balſamon, in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and in the laſt Edition of the Councils, the Canons which are ſaid to be drawn out of one of his Diſcourſes upon Penance. Theſe were written in the fourth year of the Perſecution in 306, about the Feaſt of Eaſter; for they begin with theſe words, [Seeing this is the fourth Eaſter ſince the beginning of the Perſecution.] In theſe Canons, he regulates the time of Penance. In the firſt, he ordains, That thoſe who after long Reſiſtance had at laſt lapſed, being conquered by the Severity of Torments, and had been under Penance for three years, ſhould after forty days be received into Communion, during which time, he exhorts them to watch and pray. In the ſecond, he adds, yet another year of Penance for thoſe who had fall'n without enduring Torments, only to deliver themſelves from Priſon. In the third, he brings an inſtance from the Parable of the Fig-tree, to impoſe four years Penance upon thoſe who had voluntarily fall'n into Idolatry, without being put in Priſon. In the fourth, he deplores the unhappineſs of thoſe that are altogether deſperate, and do no Penance at all. In the fifth, he limits their Penance to ſix Months, who had pretended, that they had offered unto Idols, or that they had approached their Altars, or given up their Names; or had ſent Pagans to offer in their ſtead. In the ſixth he obſerves, That there were ſome that ſent thither their Slaves, though they were Chriſtians; and in the ſeventh Canon he impoſes upon them three years of Penance, but upon the Slaves one year only. In the eighth, he ſays, That 'tis but juſt to make them partakers of the Communion of the Body and Blood of Chriſt, of the Prayers of the Church and the Word of God, who after they had been once vanquiſhed, returned again to the Combate, and were committed to Priſon: or thoſe who ſuffered Torments, after they had confeſſed the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. In the ninth Canon, he blames their Conduct, who expoſe themſelves indiſcreetly to Danger, and by this means bring Perſecution upon themſelves and their Brethren. He proves by the example of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, that their Conduct is very much to be blamed; and yet he thinks we ought not to refuſe the Communion to thoſe who thus raſhly expoſe themſelves to Temptation, becauſe they do it in the Name of Chriſt. In the tenth Canon, he ordains, that the Clergy who had lapſed, ſhould be deprived of their Miniſtry, and content themſelves with Lay-Communion, which is not to be denied them. In the eleventh Canon, he adviſes to treat them with Meekneſs, and receive thoſe Chriſtians into Communion, who having expoſed themſelves to Martyrdom for the Encouragement of others by their Example, had at laſt fall'n by the Cruelty of their Torments. In the twelfth, he ſays, that thoſe who had given Money to deliver themſelves from Torments, were free from Sin in ſo doing, and moreover praiſes their Conduct. In the thirteenth, he makes an Apology for thoſe that fled to avoid Perſecution, and juſtifies their Carriage by many Examples. In the fourteenth, he ſays, That they ought to be placed in the rank of Confeſſors, who had been forced againſt their wills to taſte of Meats offered unto Idols. The laſt Canon has no connexion with the former, for there he approves the Faſts of Wedneſday and Friday, [On which he ſays we are enjoyned to Faſt, according to Tradition; On Wedneſday, becauſe on that Day the Jews took up a reſolution to deliver Jeſus to Death; and on Friday, becauſe he ſuffered on that day for us: But as to the Lord's-Day, that is a Day of rejoycing, becauſe on that Day Jeſus Chriſt was raiſed from the Dead, and therefore we do not kneel on that Day at our Prayers.] Of all the Canons of Antiquity concerning the Penance of the Lapſed, there are none more judicious or more equitable than thoſe we have now deſcribed. There appears in them a Wiſdom and Prudence that is altogether ſingular, in tempering the Rigour of Puniſhment by a reaſonable Moderation; without which, Juſtice would be weakned by too much Indulgence. He examines carefully all the Circumſtances which might augment or diminiſh the quality of the Crime, and as he does not lengthen out Penance by too ſevere Methods, ſo neither does he deceive the Sinner by too remiſs an Eaſineſs. 'Tis probable, that about the time when theſe Canons were compoſed, Peter of Alexandria depoſed Meletius Biſhop of Egypt, being convicted of Idolatry, who was afterwards the Author of the Sect of the Meletians; as Athanaſius reports in his ſecond Apology.

Peter of Alexandria.

given to underſtand, that Arius ſhould rend in pieces the Church of Jeſus Chriſt. Beſides, we read no where that Arius publiſhed his impious Doctrine, before the Pontificate of Alexander, and therefore if he had been Excommunicated by Peter it muſt have been for ſome other cauſe. There are found indeed in a Treatiſe of Juſtinian againſt Origen, ſome words that are aſcribed to Peter of Alexandria, which are much like thoſe that are found in thoſe Acts; but beſides that, they are not altogether the ſame: Juſtinian is neither ſo antient, nor of ſo great Authority, as to counter-balance the Reaſons which we have alledged.

ALEXANDER Biſhop of Alexandria.

Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria.

After the Death of Peter Biſhop of Alexandria, who ſuffered Martyrdom in the 9th. year of the Perſecution begun by Dioclefian, Achillas was choſen in his room to the See of Alexandria. Alexander, of whom we now write, ſucceeded this Achillas in the year 321, if we follow the Teſtimony of St. Jerome; or according to others, towards the year 315. He oppoſed the Hereſie of Arius vigorouſly, and endeavoured to ſtifle it in its Birth, by Excommunicating him who was the Author of it, and his Followers. This he did in a Council aſſembled in the City of Alexandria for that purpoſe. But Arius and thoſe of his Faction, having found ſome Biſhops that received them into their Communion, though they were condemned by their Biſhop, Alexander complains in a Letter which he wrote to his Fellow-Biſhops, which is related by Theodoret, Ch. 4. of the firſt Book of his Hiſtory; wherein he deſcribes the Troubles that were cauſed in the Church by Arius and his Faction, he lays open their Heretical Doctrine, and obſerves that they had withdrawn to ſome Biſhops who had received them into their Communion, and ſigned Letters in their Favour, becauſe they diſguiſed their true Sentiments, and concealed the Poiſon of their corrupt Doctrine. He reprehends the Conduct of thoſe Biſhops, and accuſes them of having violated the Canon of the Apoſtles, by Patronizing the Actions of thoſe who denyed the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt. Afterwards he refutes the impious Opinion of the Arians, and proves from Teſtimonies of Scripture, That the Word was not a Creature made of Nothing, but that he ſubſiſted from all Eternity, and is equal to his Father, being of the ſame Nature with him, and that there never was a time when the Son of God was not, and that the Father was always a Father. After having thus eſtabliſhed the Divinity of the Son of God by moſt convincing Proofs drawn from the Holy Scriptures, he proceeds to the Explication of the Articles contained in the Creed, concerning the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Reſurrection of the Dead. He obſerves that Jeſus Chriſt had a real Body, and not an imaginary one, that he was crucified and was dead; but his Divinity ſuffered nothing. He adds, That this is the Doctrine of the Apoſtolick Church, for which he is ready to die; and ſays, that Arius and Achillas were caſt out, becauſe they taught another Doctrine: wherefore he exhorts his Fellow-Biſhops to avoid them, and to joyn with him to repreſs their Inſolence. After all, he prays them to ſend him their Letters approving what he had done, and concludes his Letter with the Names of thoſe Hereticks whom he had condemned and caſt out of the Church.

Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria.

When the Biſhops who maintained Arius wrote alſo on their ſide in his favour, Alexander found himſelf obliged to write again a large Letter on this Subject to all the Biſhops in the World, which is ſet down by Socrates, Ch. 6. of the firſt Book of their Hiſtory. I know very well, that 'tis commonly thought that this Letter was written immediately after the Excommunication of Arius, before that which is in the fourth Chapter of Theodoret: But this is a miſtake, ſince this Letter was written at the time when Euſebius of Nicomedia was fully declared a Patron of Arius. Wherefore Alexander having obſerved in this Letter, That ſince the Catholick Church was but one Body, and all the Biſhops were obliged to preſerve Peace in it, It was expedient, that they ſhould reciprocally adverti ſe one another of what happened in each Dioceſs; to the end, that when one Member was afflicted, all the reſt ſhould mourn, or elſe, rejoice together with it. After he had begun his Letter with this handſome Reflection, he adds, 'That he had once a deſign to have buried 'this Diſorder in Silence; but ſince Euſebius had taken 'upon him the Patronage of theſe Apoſtates, and had written

Alexander Bishop of Alexandria.

'ten on all hands in their favour, he thought himself obliged to break Silence, and to give notice to all the World of this new Error, and to hinder his Fellow-Bishops from giving credit to the Letters which Eusebius might have written. After this, he inserts the Names of these Hereticks, lays open their Error, and refutes it in a few Words. He says, that their Impiety was the cause why they were thrown out of the Church and smitten with an Anathema; and tho' he acknowledges that he was sensibly troubled for their loss, yet he must not wonder that such false Teachers should arise and corrupt the Faith and Doctrine of Jesus Christ, since we are forewarned of them by Christ and his Apostle.

These two Letters of Alexander were sharp and vehement; wherein he pursues Arius and his Party vigorously, and having represented their Doctrine after such a manner, as discovers all that is odious in it, he disputes against it by many solid Arguments, and writes to his Fellow-Bishops with great Assurance, and yet with due Respect. In short, one may say, That these Letters are a Masterpiece in their kind.

Cotelerius has also published a Letter, or a Pastoral Advertisement of Alexander to his Priests of Egypt and Marcotis, written after these two Letters, in which he tells them, That though they had subscribed to the first Pastoral Advertisement which he had addressed to Arius and those of his Faction, wherein he exhorted them to return from their Impiety, and make Profession of the Catholick Faith; yet he thought it still necessary once more to assemble the Clergy of Alexandria and Marcotis, to shew them the Letter which he had written to all the Bishops since the first Condemnation of the Arians, and to give them notice, that Carus and Pistus Priests, Serapion, Potamon, Zosimus and Irenæus, Deacons, having join'd themselves to the other Arians, were deposed. He demands their Consent and Approbation, because, says he, 'tis reasonable that ye should know what I have written, and imprint it in your minds, as if you your selves had written it. This Monument of Antiquity, gives us to understand, That according to the Discipline of the Church of Alexandria, which was agreeable to that of other Churches, the Bishop of that great See, held Synods of his Priests or Curates, not only of those that were in the City, but also of those that were in the Country, and that he would do nothing without the Consent and Approbation of his Clergy.

Alexander Bishop of Alexandria.

The Cause of Arius being afterwards carried into the Council of Nice, Alexander assisted there, and held one of the chief Places, as appears by the Council's Letter to the Alexandrians, wherein they say, That he was Head of the Council, and had a great hand in all its Decisions. He lived but five Months after this Council, and left Athanasius Successor to his See, and to his Zeal against the Arians.

St. ATHANASIUS.

St. Athanasius.

ST. Athanasius was born at Alexandria (a), but the precise Year of his Birth is not certainly known, neither do the Ancients tell us any thing of his Kindred (b). He was so young during the Persecution of Diocletian and Maximian, that when he speaks of it, he does not say, that he had seen what he says, but only that he learn'd it of his Fathers (c). We know nothing either of his Infancy, or Education. Ruffinus, indeed, tells us, that St. Athanasius being yet a Child, and playing with other Children, imitated the Ceremonies of the Church, and baptiz'd his Comrades; and that St. Alexander Bishop of Alexandria, perceiving it, and having enquir'd the manner in which they were baptiz'd, he approv'd the Baptism, and from that time, design'd St. Athanasius for the Clergy. But this Story, which, besides its being so very improbable, cannot agree with the Age of St. Athanasius, passes among Learned Men, rather for a Fable than a Truth (d). St. Gregory Nazianzen, assures us, in his Panegyrick on St. Athanasius, that this Saint applied himself but a short while to the prophane Sciences, and proceeded quickly to the Study of the Holy Scriptures. Afterwards he entred into the Clergy, and discharg'd his Function, when he was in Orders, with general Approbation, according to the Observation of Theodoret. He was particularly taken Notice of by Alexander his Bishop, whom he accompanied to the Council of Nice, being then but a Deacon, and yet the first of the Deacons of his Church. He oppos'd there the Heresie of Arius, and 'tis believ'd likewise, that he maintain'd a Disputation against the Hereticks. When he return'd again to the City of Alexandria, Alexander cast his Eyes upon him to make him his Successor. Apollinarius says, in a Passage related by Sozomen, B. II. Ch. 17. of his History, that St. Athanasius fled to avoid being chosen Bishop, and that Alexander being near his Death, did several times call for him. After the Death of this Bishop, he was chosen Bishop of Alexandria, in the beginning of the Year 326 (e), by the common Voice of all the People, and ordain'd by the Bishops of Egypt, Libya and Pentapolis assembled in the City of Alexandria. This is the Testimony which the Bishops of these Provinces give of his Ordination in a Synodical Letter reported by St. Athanasius, Apol. 2. p. 726. where at the same time they refute the Calumny of the Arians, who said, that Athanasius was privately Ordain'd by seven Bishops against the Will of all the rest. The Arians and the Bishops which Patroniz'd them, assoon as they saw St. Athanasius their Adversary promoted to this See, look'd upon this Promotion as a great Obstacle to their Designs, and therefore resolv'd to drive him out of the Church. And that they might execute this Design the more easily, they join'd with the Schismaticks call'd Meletians, (or rather Melitians) (f) because they had follow'd the Party of an Egyptian Bishop call'd Meletius or Melitius, who being depos'd in a Synod by Peter of Alexandria, for having Sacrific'd to Idols (g), separated himself from the Church, and made a considerable Faction in Egypt. Thus the Bishops that favour'd Arius, not being able to persuade St. Athanasius to receive him into his Communion, no more than his followers, tho' Eusebius had written him a threatning Letter to that purpose, did for that reason accuse him of laying a New Tax upon all the Linen or Woollen Vestments of the Egyptians, for the use of the Church of Alexandria; and deputed Ision, Eudemon, and Callinicus, Meletian Bishops, to carry this Accusation to the Emperor. But Alipius and Macarius, Priests of Alexandria, being then at Court when this Accusation was brought against St. Athanasius, defended him, and demonstrated his Innocence to the Emperor Constantine, who thereupon wrote to Athanasius to come and appear before him. At that time Eusebius of Nicomedia, being resolv'd at any rate to ruin St. Athanasius at Court, caus'd these three Informers to stay there, who invented new Accusations, alledging that the Priest Macarius had broken a Sacred Chalice by Athanasius's Order, and that Athanasius himself had conspir'd against the Emperor, by sending a Chest full of Gold to Philumenus who design'd to Usurp

St. Athanasius.

(a) AT Alexandria.] He was a Clergy-man of this Church, and the Clergy were commonly of that Place where they discharg'd their Office; but besides this Conjecture, 'tis plain also that he was originally of Alexandria by the Letter of Constantius, who recalling him from his Exile, says that he would restore him to his own Country, &c. Apol. 2. p. 769, 770. and he takes his Country and Church for the same thing. Orat. 1. contr. Ar.

(b) Of his Kindred.] The Greek Author of his Life, who is very late, says that they were very noble and of great Piety; but he gives us no Name, nor cites any Author to warrant his groundless Assertion: His Aunt was a Catholick, and died during the Tyranny of Gregory, Ep. ad Solit. p. 817. You may see in a Latin Letter of this Saint related at the end of Lucifer's Works, that during his Persecution, he had not the Liberty to see his Parents, which may be understood of his Father and Mother, according to the proper Signification of the Latin Word.

(c) But only that he learn'd it of his Fathers.] In his Letter ad Solitar. p. 855. I heard from my Fathers, that the Persecution was rais'd under Maximian Grandfather to Constantius.

(d) Rather for a Fable than a Truth.] 1. This Story of Children baptiz'd by Athanasius, does not at all agree with the Discipline of the Church of Alexandria upon the Subject of Rebaptization, and 'tis a thing unheard of that it should be approv'd of, or that any could approve a Baptism of this Nature, as Alexander of Alexandria is suppos'd to have done. 2. It does not agree with the Age of St. Athanasius, for Alexander was not ordain'd Bishop of Alexandria, according to the Testimony of St. Jerome, until the Year 321. and St. Athanasius being ordain'd Bishop in 326. was not, in this Interval, of an Age to play such little Pranks. And though it were suppos'd, against the Authority of St. Jerome, that Alexander was ordain'd in 315, this would not remove the Difficulty; for it cannot be said, that St. Athanasius play'd at this Sport when he was above 10. or 12. Years old, from whence it would follow, that he was ordain'd Bishop at the 25. or 27*th*, year of his Age, which is not very probable.

(e) In the Beginning of the Year 326.] Alexander died five Months after the Council of Nice, and St. Athanasius succeeded him immediately. St. Epiphanius says in Heres. 68. and 69. that Achillas was chosen by the Catholicks after the Death of Alexander, and Theonas by the Meletians, and that Athanasius was ordain'd three Months after: But all this Story is fabulous, because Achillas was Bishop of Alexandria before Alexander, and all Historians testify that St. Athanasius succeeded Alexander immediately; and St. Athanasius says as much expressly in his 2d. Apology.

(f) Or rather Melitians.] Their Leader is call'd by all the Ancients, Μελίτιος and never Μέλητος.

(g) For having sacrific'd to Idols.] St. Athanasius testifies, that this was the Occasion of the Schism of Melitius, which is much more credible than what St. Epiphanius reports to be the Origin of this Schism, after a fabulous manner, being deceiv'd by the Memoirs of some Meletians.

St. Athanaſius.

the Empire. But the Emperor himſelf having examin'd this Accuſation in one of their Suburbs of Nicomedia, call'd Pſammathie, declar'd St. Athanaſius Innocent of thoſe Crimes, and ſent him back to Alexandria with a very obliging Letter in his favour. This was done in the Year 331. The Enemies of St. Athanaſius not reſting ſatisfied with this Judgment, the next Year renew'd the Accuſation of the Chalice broken by Macarius, founded upon the Depoſition of one Iſchyras who call'd himſelf a Prieſt, altho' he was ordain'd by Collythus, who was not truly a Biſhop, and therefore had not Power to give him a valid Ordination. Iſchyras had dwelt at Mareotis, a Country of Egypt, where there was neither Biſhop nor Suffragan, but only a great many Pariſhes govern'd by Prieſts. He had one of theſe Churches, which Athanaſius underſtanding, ſent Macarius to forbid him when he viſited his Dioceſs, to Celebrate the Divine Myſteries, and to execute any part of the Sacerdotal Function. This gave the occaſion of accuſing Macarius, that he had broken one of the Sacred Chalices, altho' he found Iſchyras out of the Church and in his Bed. But to render St. Athanaſius more odious, they accuſe him of having put Arſenius to Death, who was Biſhop of Hipſele in Thebais, and of the Faction of the Meletians. The Emperor who had already examin'd the firſt Accuſation, (which was likewiſe confounded by the Letter of Iſchyras, who acknowledg'd, that he was forc'd to invent this Calumny,) did not take any further notice of that Article, but wrote to Dalmatius, to enquire into the ſecond Accuſation, concerning the Murder of Arſenius. This oblig'd St. Athanaſius to ſearch every where for this Biſhop whom the Meletians had hid in the Monaſteries at their Devotion: And at laſt, he was found at Tyre where he was made known before Paul the Biſhop. Then, St. Athanaſius having given notice to Conſtantine, that his Accuſers were convicted of an Impoſture, the Emperor wrote to Dalmatius, to ſtop all further Proceſs, and ſent a very obliging Letter to St. Athanaſius, wherein he exhorts him to moderation, condemns the Rage of the Meletians, and promiſes him Protection. But for all this, the Arian Faction loſt not their Courage, nor did they ceaſe to contrive ſtill new Accuſations againſt him: Whereupon the Emperor being tormented with their continual Importunity, thought fit to call a Council, to put an end to all theſe Differences; which he order'd to meet at Cæſarea, in Paleſtine, where St. Athanaſius was Summon'd to appear. But this Saint, perceiving that the Council was compos'd of his Enemies, would not appear there. His Abſence, irritated the Emperor againſt him, who call'd another Council to meet at Tyre, in the year 335, and wrote to St. Athanaſius, that he ſhould not fail to come there, which he did in ſuch Terms, as might make him ſenſible, that he was not ſatisfi'd with his Conduct. St. Athanaſius was forc'd to appear there in the quality of a Criminal; but he anſwer'd the Accuſation of the Murder of Arſenius, by producing him before the Council. Ruffinus, ſays, That they ſtill went on to accuſe St. Athanaſius, by a Woman of an ill Life, who was preſently convicted of being a Cheat, becauſe ſhe took for him a Deacon call'd Timotheus, who feign'd himſelf to be Athanaſius. But this Hiſtory which is ſupported by no other Authority, but that of Ruffinus, appears very doubtful, becauſe neither St. Athanaſius nor the Council of Alexandria, which relates exactly all the Calumnies and Forgeries which were invented againſt St. Athanaſius, ſay any thing of it, which they had never omitted, if it had been propos'd. There were ſome other wandring Reports alledg'd againſt him, but wanting Proof, they inſiſted upon that of the Chalice, which was ſuppoſed to be broken by Macarius; and to inquire into this Crime, they ſent Six Biſhops to Mareotis, who were very reſolute againſt St. Athanaſius, who heard many Witneſſes to this purpoſe, in ſpite of all the Proteſtations of the Clergy of Mareotis and Alexandria. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius retires, and appeals to the Emperor; but the Synod condemns and depoſes him upon the Information at Mareotis. This was no ſooner done, but a Letter was brought from the Emperor, directed to the Biſhops of the Council, to come preſently to Jeruſalem, to Celebrate the Dedication of a Church. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius arrives at Conſtantinople, and deſires Audience of the Emperor to juſtify himſelf; But this was not granted, and all that he could obtain, was an Order, wherein the Emperor ſends for the Biſhops that had condemn'd him, to come to Court, and give an Account to him of their Proceedings. But inſtead of coming in a Body, they ſent only Euſebius of Nicomedia with Five other Deputies, who without ſaying any thing of the former Accuſations fram'd againſt St. Athanaſius, accus'd him now of having threatned to hinder the Exportation of Corn from Alexandria to Conſtantinople. The Emperor was ſo provok'd by this Accuſation, that without hearing St. Athanaſius, he baniſh'd him preſently to Triers, a City in Gaul; but would not ſuffer his Biſhoprick to be fill'd.

St. Athanaſius.

After the Death of Conſtantine the Great, the three Cæſars his Sons, Conſtantine, Conſtantius and Conſtans, permitted all the Baniſh'd Biſhops to return to their Churches. St. Athanaſius was ſent back to Alexandria with Letters from Conſtantine, after he had been a Year and ſome Months in Exile (b). This Emperor praiſes St. Athanaſius in his Letter, and ſays, that his Father would not have Baniſh'd him, but that the Euſebians had a deſign upon his Life, and that he had intended to recall him before his Death. He was no ſooner return'd to Alexandria, but his antient Enemies attack him a-new: They ſay, that ſince his Return, he had ſtirr'd up Sedition in the City, and caus'd ſome Perſons to be put in Priſon, and others to be us'd harſhly: but they chiefly inſiſted upon his Depoſition by the Synod, alledging that he was incapable, according to the Canons, of returning to his Church, or performing his Epiſcopal Function, till he was reſtor'd by another Synod. They inſinuated themſelves into the favour of Conſtantius, and moreover accuſe St. Athanaſius of ſelling and taking Money for the Corn, which the Emperor had given to be diſtributed among the Poor, and the Widows of Alexandria. This Accuſation drew upon St. Athanaſius a very ſharp Letter from the Emperor. And the Euſebians not contented to have Conſtantius on their ſide, would alſo have gain'd the other two Cæſars, and therefore wrote to them againſt St. Athanaſius, but they fail'd of their aim, and were refus'd. They endeavour'd alſo to render Pope Julius favourable to them, by offering him the Arbitration of all their differences with St. Athanaſius. But this Pope having accepted their offer, and ſummon'd them to come to a Council, they refus'd it. In the mean time, St. Athanaſius was abſolv'd by a Synod of almoſt a Hundred Egyptian Biſhops in the Year 339, who gave an Authentick Teſtimony of his Innocence in all the Heads of his Accuſation. On the other ſide, the Euſebians aſſembled a Council at Antioch in 341, where after they had made a new Creed different from that of Nice, they reſolv'd to ſend a Biſhop to Alexandria: for which end, they firſt pitched upon Euſebius of Emeſa; but he refuſing, they choſe one Gregory, and went to find out the Emperor, and pray'd that this Gregory might be ſent to Alexandria. St. Athanaſius having only heard of this Choice, withdrew to Rome in the Year 341 (i); where he was kindly receiv'd by Pope Julius, who admitted him to Communion, and ſent preſently Legates with Letters to Euſebius, and the other Biſhops, to cite them to Rome. But the Euſebians did not come at the day which Julius had appointed them, detain'd his Legates till the Month of January 342 (k), and ſent Gregory to Alexandria, who made himſelf Maſter of that Church by force, and uſed thoſe of Athanaſius's Party very ill. While the Euſebians thus deſolated the Church of Alexandria, the Pope held a Council at Rome in the Church of Vito the Presbyter (l), towards the end of the Year 341 (m). There all the Accuſations of the Euſebians againſt St. Athanaſius were examined, he himſelf was juſtified, declared Innocent by all the Biſhops of the Council, and continued in Eccleſiaſtical Communion: but they determined nothing particularly about his Reſtauration (n) to the See of Alexandria. The Eaſtern biſhops after a long delay at laſt made anſwer, towards the beginning of the year 342, by the Pope's Legates whom they ſent back, excuſing themſelves becauſe of the War of the Perſians, that they could not come to Rome at the Day that he had appointed, and blaming Julius for receiving Athanaſius into communion after he was condemn'd, and for hearing a cauſe a-new, after it had been already determin'd. This Letter was written by a Synod of Antioch, held almoſt a year after that which we have mention'd: And

(b) A Year and ſome Months in Exile.] Theodoret B. II. Ch. 1. ſays, that he was there two years and four Months, but he is miſtaken; for he was ſent into Baniſhment at the End of the year 336, and was reſtor'd again June 15, 337. before the Sons of Conſtantine had taken upon them the Title of Emperors.

(i) Withdrew to Rome in the Year 341.] Baronius makes him go in the year 339, and ſuppoſes he was twice there; but Valeſius has very well prov'd, that he was but once there, ſince he mentions but one Voyage. When he withdrew, he had only heard of the Ordination of Gregory, and the Perſecution which was preparing againſt him and his Church, as he himſelf ſays in theſe Words, μίνον ἀκούσας.

(k) Till the Month of January 342.] For ſo it muſt be read in the Letter of Julius, and not as Baronius thought.

(l) In the Church of Vito the Presbyter.] So the Words of Julius muſt be underſtood, συνελθόντες ἐπὶ τὸν Βίτωνα πρεσβύτερον καὶ χωρίγον, which are ill tranſlated in theſe Words, In the Church where Vito the Presbyter aſſembled them: For he did not aſſemble the Biſhops but the People, according to the common Phraſe, colligere Populum, to hold a publick Aſſembly of their People, in the Church. St. Irenæus ſays, qui præterquam quod oportet colligunt, which is ſpoken of Schiſmaticks, who made Aſſemblies out of the true Church.

(m) Towards the end of the Year 341.] Valeſius thinks that the Council of Rome was not held till the year 342, after the Return of the Legates: But Julius ſays plainly, that the Biſhops of Italy met at the Day appointed, and that the Legates were detain'd a long time after till the Month of January, in the year 342.

(n) They determin'd nothing particularly about his Reſtauration.] Julius and St. Athanaſius ſay expreſly, that he was only aſſur'd of that Communion which had been granted him, and that his Enemies complain'd of nothing elſe.

St. Athanasius.

that which perplexes this Part of History to this Day, is the want of distinguishing these two Councils of Antioch, or the placing them at different times. Julius having received this Letter, took some time before he answer'd it, thinking that somebody at least would come from the Eastern Bishops; but nobody coming, he wrote them a long Letter (o), which is set down by St. Athanasius; wherein he gives an account of all his Proceedings, and reprehends theirs with great sharpness.

The Cause of St. Athanasius continued in this State till the Council of Sardica, summon'd by the Emperors in the Year 347. The Bishops of the East and the West met there, but those of the East would not assist at the Council, unless St. Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and the other Bishops depos'd by them, would appear as Criminals and Persons Excommunicated, and those of the West would not agree to this Condition: Whereupon the former withdrew, and the latter being left alone to the number of a Hundred, or thereabouts, pronounc'd the Sentence of Absolution of Athanasius, of Marcellus of Ancyra, and the other Bishops that had been condemn'd; restor'd them to their Dignities, and condemn'd their Principal Adversaries; while the Bishops of the East on the other side, being Assembled at Philippopolis, wrote against those Bishops whom they condemn'd, and Excommunicated Julius, Hosius, and the other Zealous Partisans of St. Athanasius. Things being at this pass, there was no Security for St. Athanasius to return to the East, without the Authority of the Emperor Constantius, who was Lord of that Part of the World, and therefore he stay'd then at Naisse, a City of Dacia, till Constans commanded him to come to Aquileia, and granted him his Protection.

The Death of Gregory, which happened in the year 348, came very seasonably to remove the chief Obstacle of Athanasius's Return: For then, either because Constantius knew his Innocence, and the Malice of his Accusers, or because he was desired to do so by his Brother, he would not suffer any to be ordained Bishop of Alexandria, and recalled St. Athanasius who was gone from Aquileia to Rome, to take his Farewel of the Church of that City and its Bishop, and was come from thence to find out Constantius, and pray him to call his Enemies before him, that he might convict them in his Presence. The Emperor would do no such thing, but only sent him back to Alexandria, with Letters directed to the Bishops of Egypt; to the Clergy and the People of Alexandria, to which he adjoyn'd two Edicts to abrogate and annul all that had been done against this holy Bishop. St. Athanasius returning triumphantly with these Letters, was received even by the Bishops that had been less favourable to him; and two of his greatest Enemies, Ursacius and Valens seemed to be outwardly reconciled to him. The Emperor Constans, Athanasius's Patron, dying in the Month of February, 350, he had some Jealousie lest Constantius should renew that Persecution which he had already made him suffer. But the Emperor sent him word, that he should not trouble himself on that Account; That he designed to keep him always in his See, and forbad his Enemies to attack him. Thus St. Athanasius, who was not yet entred within his Dioceſs, arrived there at last in the Month of March, 350, where he was received with the publick Rejoycing of the Bishops of Egypt, his Clergy, and all the People. But he enjoyed this Repose but a few years, which seemed to be granted him for ever; for after the year 354, the Emperor Constantius sent a Courtier of his to the City of Alexandria with Letters to him, wherein he gives him leave to retire from Alexandria, supposing that he had desired it. St. Athanasius seeing that this Order was founded upon a false Supposition, was of opinion, that he ought not for this to go out of Alexandria. Twenty six Months after, Diogenes comes to Alexandria, and spreads a Report that the Emperor had given order to drive away St. Athanasius from this City; but since Diogenes brought no Letters from the Emperor, St. Athanasius made answer, that he should either shew him a Letter from the Emperor, commanding him to depart from Alexandria, or at least, that the Governor of Egypt, or General of the Army, should deliver him an Order in writing to this purpose. Twenty three Days after, Syrianus, General of the Army in Egypt, entred with his Soldiers into the Church, on the 27th of January, 356, abused the Clergy, the People, and the Virgins that were there assembled. During this Tumult, St. Athanasius being carried out by some Monks, saved himself, and retired into a Desart (p). Constantius, understanding what had passed, sent an Edict to those of Alexandria, wherein he approves what was done against St. Athanasius, and exhorts the Youth to pursue him. The Count Heraclius published this Edict, and encouraged some lewd young Men of Alexandria, who entred into the Churches, beat all those they met with, tore the Veils, the Seats and the Ornaments, and broke the Episcopal Chair in Pieces, with such Violence, that none could check those Disorders; which were yet further heightned upon the Arrival of George, who was ordained Bishop of Alexandria by the Enemies of St. Athanasius. For this Man being come into the City of Alexandria some Days before Easter, entred forcibly into the Church, and caused all those that were for St. Athanasius to be driven away. Who meeting together in the Cœmeterie and the desart Places, for the Celebration of the Divine Mysteries on Easter-Day, and the following Sundays, were driven from thence and beaten by the Soldiers; nay, and some of them lost their Lives. In short, because the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, were all for St. Athanasius, they drove away eighty of them, and sent six into Banishment. These Outrages were authorized by the Letter which Constantius wrote to the Alexandrians, in which he declares against St. Athanasius, and enjoins them to obey George. Thus it was impossible for St. Athanasius to return into the City of Alexandria, and therefore he was forced to lie hid in the Desart, where he composed many Books.

St. Athanasius

After the Death of Constantius, Julian the Apostate became Master of the Empire, who taking no side in the Disputes of Religion that were among the Christians, permitted all the exiled Bishops to return to their Country. It happened at the same time, that George, who had intruded himself into the Church of Alexandria, was kill'd in a popular Sedition in the year 362. His Death facilitated the Return of St. Athanasius to the City of Alexandria, and his Restauration to his See in that City. When he was returned, he assembled a Council to regulate the manner of receiving the Arians, who had a Desire to return into the Bosom of the Church, and to compose some Differences which had happened in the Church of Antioch. But he could not long employ himself for the good of the Church, for the Pagans having rendred him odious to the Emperor Julian, he sent an Order directed to those of Alexandria, importing that Athanasius should depart from their City, because he had only permitted the exiled Bishops to return into their Country, but not to re-enter upon their Sees. The People of Alexandria, who loved St. Athanasius extremely, sent Deputies to the Emperor, to pray him, that he would not force him out of Alexandria: But this Message only provoked the Emperor against him, who thereupon presently banished him, not only from Alexandria, but also from all Egypt. It is said also, That he gave secret Orders to put him to death. St. Athanasius having heard this News, fled beyond the River Nile: And 'tis reported, That he was followed very close by those that were sent to stop him, and he returning the same way that they pursued him, met them on the Road, but when they enquired if he had seen Athanasius, one of his Company answered, That he was not far off, and if they would make haste, they might overtake him; and so having deluded them, he returned to Alexandria. But be this as it will, 'tis certain, That he lay concealed 'till the Reign of Jovian, a Christian Prince, who succeeded Julian. In the year 363, this Emperor came and found him with some other Bishops of Egypt, at the City of Antioch, where they held a kind of a Synod (q); and there they drew up a Letter, which was addressed to the Emperor, wherein they propose to him the Nicene Creed, as the Rule of Orthodox Faith, and condemn those that denied the Divinity of the Holy Spirit.

St. Athanasius was also persecuted under the Reign of Valens, who being baptized in 367, by Eudoxius, an Arian Bishop of Constantinople, made an Edict, wherein he ordains, That all the Bishops that had been deposed under Constantius, should be forced away from their Sees. The Governor of Egypt having received this Edict, prepared to put it in execution against St. Athanasius, but was hindred by the People. In the mean time, this Saint fearing lest he should be seized, (as they really intended to do afterwards) and seeing the Commotions of the People appeased, retired to the Country into the Sepulchre of his Fathers, and lay there concealed for the space of four Months; but Valens was obliged to re-call him. We are informed by the 47th Letter of St. Basil, That at this time St. Athanasius had some Difference with the Governor of Libya, whom he Excommunicated; but we know nothing of the Occasion of this (o) He wrote them a long Letter.] Valesius thinks that this Letter was written by the Council, but that cannot be; for the Pope's Legates were return'd when it was written, and they were detain'd in the East after the Day appointed for the Council, as we have already noted. It does not at all appear by this Letter, whatever Valesius says, that the Legates were return'd when it was written: On the contrary it is evident that the Council was held on the Day prefix'd, and that the Legates were then in the East. And therefore to reconcile these things, it must be said, that the Letter was written after the Council, although by Order of the Council, which had charg'd Julius to write his Decision, and to answer the 1*st*. Letter from the Eastern Bishops, but not the 2*d*. which was not yet arriv'd.

(p) Retired into a Desart.] Sozomen and Russinus say, that he was hid in a Cistern, but Athanasius says, that he retired into a Desart, and continued there ever after.

(q) At the City of Antioch, where they held a kind of a Synod.] 'Tis commonly thought that this Synod was held at Alexandria: But Valesius has well observed, that the Beginning of the Letter shews, that it was written by the Bishops, depured from the Provinces of Egypt, who were come to Antioch, where the Emperor was at that time.

St. Athanaſius.

Quarrel. At laſt, St. Athanaſius, after ſo many Revolutions and Perſecutions, did happily end the Courſe of this troubleſome Life, in the year 373 of Jeſus Chriſt (r), after he had been Biſhop of Alexandria more than 48 years. And thus I have given you in a few words the Hiſtory of this Saint taken out of his own Works, and the Authors that wrote either his Life, or the Hiſtory of his time: Let us now give an account of his Writings.

St. Athanaſius was one of thoſe Authors who were forced to write, and were engaged to take Pen in hand, rather by an Obligation to defend themſelves, than upon any Deſign to make Books; and therefore the greateſt Part of his Books, are either Apologies to juſtifie himſelf, or Invectives againſt his Enemies, or Treatiſes of Controverſy againſt the Errors of the Arians. They are all written in the form of Letters, a way of Writing which is moſt ſimple in the Compoſure, and at the ſame time moſt natural, and moſt proper for one that is in a place of Retirement.

There is great probability, that his two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, were the firſt which he compoſed, becauſe he does not there attack the Arians, as he does in all the other Books which he made, after he had any perſonal Differences with them. The laſt of theſe two Books, is entituled at preſent, Concerning the Incarnation, and Theodoret cites it under that Name; but St. Jerome gives them both the Title of, Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, and indeed, they are both written rather to convert Pagans, than to inſtruct Chriſtians.

The next Work of St. Athanaſius, after theſe two Treatiſes, is his Apologetick (ſ) to the Emperor Conſtantius, which he wrote ſome time after he was forced away from Alexandria, in the year 356. He wrote alſo the ſame year, Two Letters (t) upon the Perſecution which the Chriſtians of Alexandria ſuffered, when George took Poſſeſſion of that Epiſcopal See. The firſt, which was addreſſed to the Biſhops of Egypt, is improperly called The firſt Diſcourſe againſt the Arians. The ſecond is written to all the Orthodox Biſhops. A little time after, he compoſed his two Apologies in the place of his Retirement: 'Tis likewiſe very probable, that he wrote at that time his four Treatiſes againſt the Arians, which he addreſſed to the Monks, as we learn from the beginning of his Letter to Serapion, concerning the Death of Arius. His Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, is made up of two different Pieces: The firſt is a Letter written to the Monks, which is a kind of Preface to ſome Treatiſe againſt the Arians, and may be ſo to that which follows; it contains about a Page and an half, and ends at theſe words in page 810. Gratia Domini Jeſu Chriſti ſit vobiſcum. Amen. The following Treatiſe, which was addreſſed to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, is a Hiſtory of all that paſſed from the beginning of Arianiſm, to the fall of Oſius and Liberius, i.e. to the year 358. There are ſome Periods in the beginning, which are loſt, ſo that not only this Treatiſe has no Connection with the Letter that precedes it, but alſo there is no Senſe in the beginning of it: And I am aſtoniſhed to think, that ſo many able Men ſhould read this Book without perceiving, or at leaſt without obſerving it. The Letter to Serapion, concerning the Death of Arius, was written after the Treatiſe which is directed to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, as appears by the Beginning of it. The Book of Synods was compoſed in 359 (u), before the Councils of Seleucia and Ariminum, were ended: He afterwards added in this Book, what concerns the Council of Conſtantinople in 360, and what is there ſaid concerning the Death of Conſtantius. The two Latin Letters which are at the end of the Works of Luciſer Calaritanus, were alſo written under Conſtantius. The Letter of the Council of Alexandria, to thoſe of Antioch, was written after the Death of that Emperor, in 362; The Letter of the Council of Antioch, under Jovian, was written in 363: That which is directed to all the Biſhops of Egypt and Arabia, Syria and Phœnicia, was written in 368, under the Reign of Valens, as well as that which is directed to the Africans (x). And the Letter to Epictetus was written laſt (y).

There are beſides, many other Works of St. Athanaſius, of which the Chronology is not known, which it concerns us to diſtinguiſh well from thoſe that are doubtful or ſuppoſititious. Theſe works are in the firſt Volume. The Homily upon theſe Words, My Father hath given me all things, p. 149. The Epiſtle to Adelphius, p. 155. That to Maximus, p. 162. Two Letters to Serapion, to prove that the Son and the Holy Spirit are not Creatures, p. 166, and 173. An Expoſition of the Faith, p. 240. A Letter concerning the Hi-

St. Athanaſius.

(r) In the year 373 of Jeſus Chriſt.] Proterius Biſhop of Alexandria, places the Death of St. Athanaſius in this year, in a Letter to St. Leo; and St. Jerome ſays, that Peter of Alexandria was choſen the ſame year. Theſe Authors are more credible than Socrates, Ruffinus and St. Cyril, who place it in the year 371.

(ſ) The next Work of St. Athanaſius, after theſe two Treatiſes, is his Apologetick.] This was compoſed immediately after his retiring. Which he did with a Deſign to ſpeak it in the Preſence of Conſtantius: But underſtanding the Miſchiefs he had done to thoſe that favoured him, he thought it not ſafe to come near him. His two Apologies and his Epiſtle to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life, were written after this, where he ſpeaks with much Sharpneſs and Freedom againſt Conſtantius, particularly, in his Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life.

(t) He wrote alſo the ſame year, two Letters.] I ſay that theſe two Letters were written a little while after the Enthroning of George, though I know Baronius is of opinion, that the firſt was written a long time before, when Gregory ſeized upon the Church of Alexandria, and that the ſecond was written in 361. but this opinion is not defenſible. As to the firſt, Baronius was deceived by the Verſion, where he found ſometimes the Name of Gregory, and ſometimes that of George; but this Confuſion is avoided in the Greek, where one may always find the Name of George, when mention is made of him that came to intrude into the Church of Alexandria: But that which can never be anſwered, is, That Gregory is mentioned there as one that had been condemned long ago, and was no more. See the place, p. 948. For after all the Churches in the World had anathematized Gregory, whom the Arians had formerly, πρότερον, made Biſhop; yet the ſame Arians preſently ſent George thither. Here you ſee how Gregory and George are well diſtinguiſhed. We may add to this Authority, that the Circumſtances related in this Letter agree with the Enthronizing of George, and not at all with that of Gregory. It may be alledged for the Opinion of Baronius, 1. That 'tis ſaid in the Letter, Philagrius the Governor of Egypt introduced him, who is there ſpoken of, and 'tis very well known, that Philagrius carried Gregory to Alexandria: But I cannot ſee why he might not as well be employed to conduct George thither likewiſe. 2. 'Tis alledged, that 'tis ſaid in the Letter, that he who was ſent to Alexandria by the Arians, was ordained by Euſebius; and Euſebius was certainly dead in George's time: But 'tis eaſy to anſwer this difficulty, for 'tis not in the Greek Εὐσέβιος, but οἱ περὶ Εὐσέβιον, the Euſebians, which is the Name that St. Athanaſius commonly gives to his Perſecutors. St. Athanaſius ſeems to ſay, that he was at Alexandria when this Trouble happen'd; but 'tis well known, that he was out of the City when George came thither, ſince he withdrew before Eaſter, and George did not thruſt himſelf into thoſe Churches till that time. To which I anſwer, That Athanaſius does not ſay, that he was at Alexandria when George arriv'd there; but only when Philagrius publiſh'd the Edict againſt him. Laſtly, 'tis objected, that 'tis ſaid towards the end of this Letter, that they would have a Council aſſembled at Rome in the preceding Year; but the Roman Church, ſay they, was not then in a Condition to have aſſembled in the Year 356, becauſe Liberius was then in exile. Anſw. This Objection is eaſily deſtroy'd, for Liberius and the other Biſhops of Italy had many times deſired the aſſembling of a Council. 1. By their Legates ſent to Milan in 354. 2. In 355. before Liberius went from Rome. And, 3. When he was come to Court: St. Athanaſius therefore might ſay truly in 356, that thoſe of Rome had deſired a Council the Year before. The Letter to the Egyptians was written before George arriv'd at Alexandria, for there he is mentioned as one ready to be ſent thither, p. 290. and he is deſcrib'd as one that was not yet known to the Egyptians. There Cecrops is mention'd as a Biſhop alive; but he was ſwallowed up by an Earthquake which deſtroyed Nicodemia in 358. There Liberius and Oſius are mention'd with Commendation, who fell away in 357. Baronius objects two Things to prove that it was not written till 360. 1*ſt*. Becauſe it is ſaid there, that it was now 36 Years ſince the Arians were declared Hereticks: 2*dly*, becauſe mention is made in it of a Creed which they would have ſign'd; but we read of none that there was at this Time. In Anſwer, to the 1*ſt*. Objection it may be ſaid, that the Figures are wrong, or rather, that we muſt count the 36 Years from the 1*ſt*. Synod held by Alexander againſt the Arians. 'Tis more eaſy to anſwer the 2*d*. by ſaying, that the Arian Biſhops might make a Creed when they ſent George; beſides that, Athanaſius ſays only that he heard ſay, that they had made one and not that they had done it. Be it as it will, this 1*ſt*. Treatiſe againſt the Arians is a Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt, which is nothing of Affinity with the Subject and Matter of the other Four: The Oration that follows begins as a new Diſcourſe, and St. Cyril cites a paſſage out of the 3*d*. Book of Athanaſius concerning the Trinity, which is found in that which is now call'd the 4*th*. and Theodoret cites one taken out of the Second, which is now in the 3*d*. Treatiſe.

(u) The Book of Synods was compoſed in 359.] This is evident, becauſe he does not finiſh the Hiſtory of the Council of Ariminum, concluding with the Nomination of the 1*ſt*. Deputies which were ſent to the Emperor; and at the end he adds the Letter of Conſtantius, and the generous Anſwer of the Biſhops, which he had learn'd afterwards. He ſpeaks always of that Council as a thing preſent, and with Commendation; and he ſays nothing more of what paſs'd at Conſtantinople after the Council of Seleucia. This Book is probably that which St. Jerome ſays, St. Athanaſius had Written againſt Urſacius and Valens, unleſs we ſhould rather ſay, that it was a Work ſubjoyn'd to his Letter to thoſe that lead a Monaſtick Life.

(x) As well as that which is directed to the Africans.] This is to the Biſhops of the Weſtern Africa, and not to thoſe of Cyrenaick, as Baronius thought, who ſays, that theſe Letters were written under the Pontificate of Damaſus.

(y) And the Letter to Epictetus was written laſt.] He obſerves in this Letter, that Auxentius and the other Arians, were anathematiz'd by the Councils of France, Spain, and Rome. St. Cyril ſays that it was corrupted, but that which we now have agrees with that which is related by the Emperor.

A Treatise upon the Words of Jesus Christ, Whosoever shall be guilty of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this World, nor in that which is to come, p. 970.

In the Second Volume, there are few of his Genuine Works; but here follow those which we own. Two Letters to Serapion, concerning the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, p. 10. and 16. A short Discourse against the Arians, p. 22. The Conferences of St. Athanasius with the Arians, in the presence of Jovian, from p. 27, to p. 29. An Epistle to Ammon, p. 35. A Fragment of one, p. 39. A Festival Epistle, p. 38. An Epistle to Ruffinian, p. 40. A Book of the Abridgment of the Holy Scripture, p. 55. All these Works, whereof some are cited by the Ancients, agree well enough with the Stile of St. Athanasius, and they contain nothing in my Opinion, which gives just cause to suspect them of Forgery (z).

There is not any of the other Works, that bear the Name of St. Athanasius, besides those which we have already mentioned, that is Genuine, but they are all either manifestly Supposititious, or very doubtful.

The Treatise which has this Title, That there is but one Jesus Christ, altho' it be antient, yet is not written by St. Athanasius. For, first, This Author places Marcellus of Ancyra, amongst the Hereticks, whereas St. Athanasius always communicated with him as a Catholick Bishop, even in the last Years of his Life, as appears by the Letters of St. Basil, which complain of St. Athanasius upon this occasion. Secondly, The Author of this Treatise, acknowledges but one only Hypostasis in Jesus Christ, whereas St. Athanasius always took this Word, rather to signifie the Nature, than to denote the Person (aa).

For this last reason we ought also to reject the little Treatise of the Incarnation against Paulus Samosatenus, which is in the First Volume of St. Athanasius, p. 591. because the Author of it owns three Hypostases in the Trinity.

The Refutation of the Hypocrisie of Meletius, is rather the work of Paulinus of Antioch, or some of his Party, than of St. Athanasius, who was neither so conceited of the Notion of three Hypostases, nor so transported with Anger against Meletius, as the Author of this Treatise was. St. Athanasius.

The Book of Virginity (bb), has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius, and it contains some Precepts very remote from the Genius and Discipline of his time. There is a Difference between him that wrote upon this Subject, who is cited by Theodoret, and him whom St. Jerome mentions.

The Treatise of Testimonies drawn from the Holy Scriptures, to prove the Essential Unity of the three Persons of the Holy Trinity, is none of St. Athanasius's. 1. Because the Author there relates some Passages of the Questions to Antiochus, which were written a long time after St. Athanasius, as we shall shew hereafter. 2. The Stile of this Treatise is very different from that of St. Athanasius. 3. He uses childish Expressions, and gives impertinent Definitions of Angels and Men.

The Homily of the Annunciation, or of the Virgin, is also written by a later Author than St. Athanasius. 1. Because he expressly refutes the Error of Nestorius, and that of the Monothelites; and yet neither St. Cyril, nor any other Catholick Author, alledges this Book against those Hereticks. 2. In explaining the Doctrine of the Church, he uses such Terms, as were not in use till after the Nestorians and Eutychians time; as when he says, That he acknowledges two Natures in Jesus Christ, without Confusion or Mixture, without Change or Division, Terms which were not us'd till after the Council of Ephesus. 3. He detests the Error of those that call'd Jesus Christ, a Man-bearing God, an expression which St. Athanasius did not reject, and the Ancients sometimes made use of, and which was not condemn'd till after Nestorius had abus'd it. 4. He gives a ridiculous Etymology of the Greek Word θεὸς, by saying, that it comes from θέειν, which is not a Greek word.

The Life of St. Syncletica (cc), publish'd in Latin, by Bollandus, and in Greek, by the Learned Cotelerius, in his First Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, is suspected of falshood, because no body mentions it before Nicephorus; and in some Manuscripts, 'tis ascrib'd to a Monk nam'd Polycarp; besides that, it has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius.

The Life of St. Anthony has better Authority (dd); for St. Jerome and St. Gregory Nazianzen, say positively, that St. Athanasius wrote the History of the Life of this Father of Monks; but still 'tis doubted, whether that which we now

(z) Which gives just cause to suspect them of Forgery.] Yet there is some Doubt, of some of those Works which are mention'd in this place; But the Conjectures which are alledged have little Solidity. Some have doubted of the Letters to Serapion, but these are written in the Stile of St. Athanasius. The two which are in the 2*d*. Volume, are an Abridgment of the 2*d*. which is in the 1*st*. Volume. The exposition of Faith which is in p. 240. of the 1*st*. Volume, is cited by Facundus, B. XI. Ch. 6. The Treatise of the Union of the Human Nature is cited by Theodoret in his 2*d*. and 3*d*. Dialogue; and so it cannot be deny'd, that it is St. Athanasius's, especially since it has his Stile, although the Author of St. Athanasius's Life Affirms the contrary. The 2*d*. B. of the Incarnation against Apollinarius is no ways doubtful; but the 1*st*. is call'd in question, which is more obsure, and less methodical: Yet Leontius B. II. against Eutyches cites the 2*d*. under the Name of the 2*d*. Treatise of St. Athanasius against Apollinarius. The Letter to Marcellinus about the Interpretation of the Psalms, is in all Probability that which St. Jerome and Cassiodorus call a Treatise of the Titles of the Psalms, because it contains the Subject and Argument of every Psalm. The Epistle to Serapion of the Death of Arius, is cited by the antient Historians. The Homily of the Sabbath and Circumcision is not wholly of St. Athanasius's Stile, but the Difference is very inconsiderable. Some have doubted of the Tract upon these Words, Whosoever shall speak Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit; but unjustly, for this Tract has not only the Stile of St. Athanasius, but also is prov'd to be really his, because Gobarus in Photius, Cod. 232, testifies, that St. Athanasius had many times cited Theognostus, who is not found cited but in this Book, and in the Treatise of the Judgment of Denys of Alexandria. And, Lastly, because the Treatise which we now discourse of, is cited in the Council of Lateran, held under Martin the 1*st*. in the Year 549. I think we ought not to reject the conferences of St. Athanasius with the Arians before Jovian. 'Tis certain that St. Athanasius came to find out this Emperor; and Philostorgius says, that the Arians came to accuse St. Athanasius in his presence. Moreover, they are written with great Simplicity, and appear to be very Antient. Scultetus doubts of the Letter to Ammon, because it prefers Celibacy to Marriage, alledging that St. Athanasius taught the contrary in his Letter to Dracontius: But he was mistaken. The Fragment of the 39*th*. Festival Epistle ought to be received as undoubtedly his, after St. Jerome's Testimony, who says, that St. Athanasius wrote those Letters which bear his Name. I say the same of the Abridgment of the Holy Scripture, which is upon the same Subject with this Festival Epistle, and has the same Opinions of the Canonical Writers. Some doubt of this last Treatise; 1. because the Author calls Lucian, who was a Ring-leader of the Arians, a holy Martyr. 2. Because he does not reckon the Book, entituled Pastor, among useful Books, as St. Athanasius does in his 39*th*. Letter, and in his Book of the Nicene Synod. But 'tis easy to answer these Conjectures. As to the 1*st*, That St. Athanasius did not think that Lucian was of the same Opinion that Arius had afterwards, or that knowing he died in the Bosom of the Church, he thought that he ought not to condemn him: Or Lastly, that he cited him as commonly he had been accustom'd to cite him. As to the 2*d*. That he says nothing of the Truth of the Book entituled Pastor, but neither does he reject it as a wicked Book, and by Consequence there can nothing be built upon this Conjecture.

(aa) St. Athanasius always took this Word, rather to signify the Nature, than to denote the Person.] The Council of Nice seems to have taken the Word Hypostasis in this Sense, when it condemns those who say, that the Word is another Hypostasis, or Substance. St. Athanasius says often in his 5th. Oration, that the Father and the Son are one Hypostasis only; and in his Letter to the Africans, that the Hypostasis is the Substance. In short, though the Synod of Alexandria was persuaded that this Difference concern'd not Matters of Faith, yet they approv'd more the Opinion of those who take Hypostasis for Nature.

(bb) The Book of Virginity.] This Book is written in a low Stile, and contains Precepts about the Quality of the childish Clothes of Virgins: There are in it Expressions unworthy of St. Athanasius, as when he calls a Virgin, the Dancer of Jesus Christ. Theodoret, B. II. of his Hist. Ch. 4. cites a Passage out of a Book of St. Athanasius address'd to Virgins, which is not to be found in this Treatise; which shews that this is not the genuine Treatise of St. Athanasius.

(cc) The Life of St. Syncletica.] 'Tis cited as St. Athanasius's by Nicephorus Callistus, and there is a Manuscript of it which bears his Name; but in another 'tis ascribed to a Monk named Polycarp, which is very likely to be true: For the Stile is unworthy of Athanasius. It is full of childish Comparisons, which are to be met with almost in every Period, and agree much better to a Monk, than to St. Athanasius.

(dd) The Life of St. Anthony has better Authority.] 'Tis alledg'd against this Life, to prove that it is not St. Athanasius's, that this Saint relates the Death of Balacius, after another manner than it is related in this Life: For St. Athanasius says, in his Epistle to those that lead a Monastick Life. That the Letter of St. Anthony was written to Gregory, who gave it to Balacius; whereas in the Life of St Anthony, it is said, that this Letter was address'd to Balacius himself. 2*dly*, 'Tis reported in the Life of St. Anthony, that Balacius was killed by Nestorius the Governor of Egypt's Horse, who accompanied him: Whereas St. Athanasius says, that the Horse upon which Balacius rode, did bite him: But these Differences are of little Consequence, and have, be not different from that which was known to theſe Ancients. Rivet and other Proteſtant Criticks, being Enemies of all thoſe Books which concern Monkery, boldly reject this Life, as a ſuppoſititious Work: But their Reaſons are not wholly convincing, and all the Circumſtances of the Life of St. Anthony, related by the Ancients, are to be found in this Book, and therefore I think it very probable that this was St. Athanaſius's, altho' ſomething might be added or chang'd in it, as it often happen'd to Books of this nature.

The Creed which bears the Name of St. Athanaſius (ee), paſs'd a long time without any Contradiction, as a Work which was truly this Father's; and yet, now all the World agrees, that 'twas none of his, but ſome Authors that liv'd a long time after him. 'Tis not certainly known whoſe it is; ſome have attributed it to ſome Frenchman; others, as Father Queſnel, think that 'tis written by Vigilius Tapſenſis, who liv'd towards the End of the Fifth Age of the Church. Howſoever this be, 'tis certain that 'twas compos'd after the Council of Chalcedon, becauſe it rejects ſo formally the Errors of the Neſtorians and Eutychians, that 'tis evident it aims at theſe two Hereſies.

St. Cyril of Alexandria, in his Book addreſs'd to Queens, and his Defence of the Eighth Anathematiſm, cites a Confeſſion of Faith under the Name of St. Athanaſius, about the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, which is ſtill found among the Works of this Father, in the Second Vol. P. 30. St. John Damaſcene, B. III. Of the Orthodox Faith, Ch. 6. and Theorianus, attribute it to St. Athanaſius. Baſil of Seleucia, in the Firſt Act of the Council of Conſtantinople, ſays, 'Twas reported that St. Athanaſius was the Author of an Expreſſion which is found in this Confeſſion of Faith, viz. That the Word had but one Nature Incarnate. But Leontius in his Book of Sects, denies that St. Athanaſius was the Author of this Sentence, and the Catholick Biſhops at a Conference held at Conſtantinople againſt the Severians in the Year 533, have alſo rejected it, as being falſly attributed to St. Athanaſius. And truly the Doctrine and Expreſſions of this Confeſſion of Faith about the Incarnation, do not at all agree with thoſe of St. Athanaſius in his Books of the Incarnation; in which he does not only ſay nothing which may favour the Error of the Eutychians, but alſo he formally rejects it, and rather favours the contrary Opinion. St. Athanaſius.

The other Works attributed to St. Athanaſius, are yet more manifeſtly ſuppoſititious, and no body almoſt has acknowledg'd them for Genuine. The Diſpute againſt Arius(ff) which is in the Firſt Volume, is a Dialogue compos'd under the Names of St. Athanaſius and Arius, by ſome body that liv'd long after. This is plain, and all the World is agreed in't; but 'tis not known who is the Author of it. Some have attributed it to Vigilius Tapſenſis; but for my part, I rather believe that 'tis the Work of a Greek, than a Latin Author, and that it may well be attributed to Maximus.

The Letter of Liberius to St. Athanaſius, and the Anſwer of this Saint to Liberius (gg), agree not at all with the Hiſtory of theſe two Biſhops, and have no reſemblance of their Stile.

The Explication of theſe words of Jeſus Chriſt to his Apoſtles, Go to the Village that is over againſt you, and there ye ſhall find a Colt tied (hh); the Homily upon the Paſſion (ii) of Jeſus Chriſt, and that upon the Seed (kk), which are found at the End of the firſt Volume, have neither the Stile nor the Air of St. Athanaſius, and contain many things unworthy of him.

The Diſcourſe againſt all Hereſies, which is the laſt Work of the firſt Volume of St. Athanaſius, is confus'd, and the Stile mean, as is obſerv'd in an antient Manuſcript. He oppoſes in a few words all Hereſies, contrary to the Cuſtom of St. Athanaſius, who refutes very largely all thoſe he takes in hand. The Oration upon the Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt, is of a Stile more florid than that of St. Athanaſius, the Phraſes are forc'd and tumid, whereas St. Athanaſius writes in a Simple and Natural Stile. The Oration of Melchiſedeck cannot be St. Athanaſius's, ſince the Author mentions the Fathers of the Council of Nice as dead long before.

The Letter of Jovian to St. Athanaſius, and that of St. Athanaſius to Jovian, which are in the ſecond Volume, are much to be ſuſpected. That of St. Athanaſius diſcovers the the ſame Author may relate differently ſuch kind of little Circumſtances, either through the Fault of his Memory, or becauſe he is better inform'd at one time than another. The Difference of Stile which is to be met with, between this Letter and the other Works of St. Athanaſius, gives us more Trouble: But it may be that he proportion'd his Stile in this Life, both to the Matter, and the Capacity of the Monks for whom he wrote it. This is certain, the Ancients do teſtify that St. Athanaſius wrote the Life of St. Anthony, and all that they report of it, is found to agree with what is ſaid in that Book which we now have. See St. Chryſoſt. Homil. 8. on Matth. St. Auſtin in his Confeſſions, Palladius Hiſt. Lauſ. Ch. 8. Socrates Lib. I. c. 21. and Lib. IV. c. 23. All which makes me think, that 'tis not convenient to reject it.

(ee) The Creed which bears the Name of St. Athanaſius.] The Reaſons that convince me that this Creed is none of St. Athanaſius's, are theſe. 1. Becauſe 'twas not known till the Sixth Century. 2. Becauſe St. Athanaſius never would make a Confeſſion of Faith, nor a Creed, being perſuaded he ought to keep to that of Nice. 3. Becauſe this Creed rejects ſo plainly the Errors of the Neſtorians, Eutychians, and Monothelites, that 'tis eaſy to perceive, 'twas made ſince thoſe Hereticks, on purpoſe to reject their Errors. 4. The Stile and terms do plainly ſhew, that this Creed was made by a Latin, and not by a Greek Author. 5. No Account can be given, upon what Occaſion, at what time, and for what Reaſon, St. Athanaſius ſhould make this Creed. See Voſſius in his Book De Tribus Symbolis. 6. It appears by the Terms, that 'twas the Work of a Latin Author. 7. 'Tis not found among the antient Manuſcripts of St. Athanaſius. 'Twas made ſince the Council of Chalcedon, as the Reaſons we have now given do clearly prove. 'Tis cited in the Council of Autun, in the year 670, and there we read in the Fourth Council of Toledo, in 633, ſome Phraſes which ſeem to be taken out of this Creed. But it muſt be confeſs'd, that this laſt Council does not ſay, that they were taken out of the Creed of St. Athanaſius, and that there is no certainty, that this Canon of the Council of Autun, where mention is made of St. Athanaſius's Creed, is ſo antient, as we have ſaid, ſince it is not found among the Canons of that Council under Leodegarius; but in a Collection of thoſe Canons taken out of the Library of the Monaſtry of St. Benignus of Dijon. Hincmar and Abbo, who liv'd about the tenth Century; Radulphus, Haimo, Hugo, and ſome other antient Frenchmen have cited it as St. Athanaſius's. The Greeks alſo, as Manuel Calecas, Lib. 2. have made no ſcruple to aſcribe it to him. Pithœus thought that a Frenchman compos'd it, becauſe the French Authors were the firſt that expreſly cited it: and perhaps ſome Frenchman did draw this Creed, partly from the Council of Toledo, and put the Name of St. Athanaſius to it. Father Queſnel is of opinion, that 'twas the Work of Vigilius Tapſenſis, and it muſt be confeſs'd, that this Conjectures are very probable: For, 1ſt. This Author has forg'd many Books under the Names of the Fathers, and particularly under the Name of St. Athanaſius. 2. In all his Writings he oppoſes the Neſtorians and Eutychians, and this Creed attributed to St. Athanaſius, is directly againſt the Errors of thoſe Hereticks. 3. The ſame Vigilius made ſeveral Confeſſions of Faith under the Name of St. Athanaſius. 4. The firſt part of the Creed ſeems to be a Recapitulation of the Chapters of Vigilius Tapſenſis's Book againſt Varimadus: and even in the third Book, the three firſt Chapters contain theſe Propoſitions, Deus Pater, Deus Filius, Deus Spiritus Sanctus; Dominus Pater, Dominus Filius, Dominus Spiritus Sanctus; Omnipotens Pater, Omnipotens Filius, Omnipotens Spiritus Sanctus, which are word for word in the Creed. Theſe are the Conjectures of Father Queſnel, to which one may adhere ſo much the rather, while there is nothing to be had more certain about this Matter. Be it as it will, 'tis certainly the Work of a Latin Author, which has been ſince tranſlated into Greek, which is the reaſon why the Greek Copies differ among themſelves.

(ff) The Diſpute againſt Arius.] 'Tis evident that 'tis not a Conference made in the Council, but only a fictitious Dialogue made by ſome body, under the Names of St. Athanaſius and an Arian, and not of Arius; for the Catholick ſays, that his Adverſary is a Monſter come out of the Sect of Arius. The Author of this Dialogue is ſo ignorant, that he thinks the Council of Nice was held in the year 310.

(gg) The Letter of Liberius to St. Athanaſius, and the Anſwer of this Saint to Liberius.] Theſe Letters neither agree with St. Athanaſius, nor with Liberius: the laſt to St. Athanaſius is ſo written, as if there were ſome doubt of his being a Catholick: He requires him to Anathematize Arius and Sabellius, that I, ſays he, may obey your Commands. The Letter of Liberius and the Anſwer of St. Athanaſius, are written as if they were Confeſſions of Faith, and they favour the Error of Neſtorius. The Stile of theſe two Letters is Childiſh and mean. The Letter attributed to Liberius, begins with a Then.

(hh) The Explication of theſe words of Jeſus Chriſt, Go to the Village that is over againſt you, and there ye ſhall find a Colt tied.] This Homily is a Fragment of ſome Commentary upon the Goſpel. It is not the Stile of St. Athanaſius. He explains all the paſſages of Scripture in a myſtical ſenſe, and draws from thence Allegories, which have more of ſubtilty than ſolidity. It is very different from the Air of St. Athanaſius, which is grave and ſerious; and beſides, he generally interprets the Scripture in its natural ſenſe.

(ii) The Homily upon the Paſſion.] This alſo is not written in the Stile of St. Athanaſius; for though it be ſomething more Sublime than the former, yet it comes not near the Gravity of this Father's Stile. There are ridiculous things related in it of the Fear of Chriſt. 'Tis ſaid, that he counterfeited the Fear of Death, leſt the Devil ſhould not withdraw, and that when the Devil heard him cry out, Eli, Eli, he had the boldneſs to attack him: But on the contrary, St. Athanaſius in his Fourth Dialogue againſt the Arians, does expreſly deny that Jeſus Chriſt counterfeited any fear, and aſſures us, that as Man he was really afraid. The Author of this Homily diſallows all Oaths, whereas St. Athanaſius approves them upon ſeveral occaſions.

(kk) And that upon the Seed.] Or rather upon the Action of the Diſciples, who ate the Ears of Corn upon the Sabbath-Day. 'Tis found only in one Manuſcript, and it has nothing excellent, nor is it written in the ſtile of St. Athanaſius.

Forgery,

St. Athanasius.

Forgery, because it contains a Confession of Faith different from that of the Council of Nice, and 'tis certain that he sent no other to this Emperor. The Author of this Letter writes in such terms, as plainly discover that he was not St. Athanasius, but rather Apollinarius, since he acknowledges but one Nature in Jesus Christ; and indeed, Leontius testifies that Apollinarius had inserted this Doctrine in a Letter to the Emperor Jovian. The Book of Definitions, which are pretended to be Collections out of St. Clement, and other holy Fathers, cannot be St. Athanasius's, since the Author cites in it Gregory Nyssen, in the Chapter of the Action. Moreover, he speaks of two Natures and one Person in Jesus Christ, as if he had written after the Birth of the Heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches. A good part of the Book is taken out of a Book of Anastasius Sinaita, entituled, Ὁδηγὸς, a Guide; and in some Manuscripts, the Definitions are ascrib'd to Maximus, under whose Name Father Combefis had Publish'd them.

All the Learned agree, that the seven Dialogues of the Trinity, are not St. Athanasius's (ll); the difference of the Stile, the Terms, and the Doctrine, are convincing Proofs of it; and 'tis plain, that the Author of this Treatise liv'd since the Council of Constantinople, at the time when the Disputes about the Incarnation of Jesus Christ were afoot in the Church. Father Combefis has restor'd them to Maximus (mm), upon the Authority of some Manuscripts, and the Testimony of the Modern Greeks, who cite them often under the Name of this Author. Garnerius a very learned Jesuit, ascribes them to Theodoret, and has printed them under his Name, in a pretended Supplement to the Works of this Father. But he has nothing to support this Opinion but some slight Conjectures (nn); and he does not sufficiently refute the Assertion of Father Combefis.

The following Book, entituled, A Tragedy, is falsly attributed to St. Athanasius. Photius in Cod. 46. sets down all the Titles of the Questions which are handled in this Book, with some others that are not found there, and ascribes them to Theodoret. Garnerius upon the Credit of Marius Mercator, attributes them to Etherius Tyanæus a Disciple of Theodoret.

The Questions to Antiochus, and those that follow them, are yet later (oo) than those Books of which we have already spoken: These were made by some Modern Greek, and seem to be all written by the same Author. The Homily of the Vigils of Easter, has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius, but is dry and barren, and full of affected Figures. The Fragments of the Commentary, upon the Psalms, related by Nicetas in his Catena, are very dubious, and so much the more, because we have no account in the Ancients that St. Athanasius ever compos'd a Commentary upon the Psalms. The same must be said of the Passages taken out of the Catena upon Job; for there is not much Credit to be given to those Catena's made by the Modern Greeks. But the Passages cited by Theodoret, are more valuable, for they are almost all found in some of the Works of St. Athanasius which we have mention'd, excepting only those which he cites as taken out of a large Discourse of this Father about Faith. We must also acknowledge for Genuine the Fragment of a Treatise of St. Athanasius upon these words of Jesus Christ, My Soul is troubled, which is recited in the Sixth Council, Art. 14. for besides the Authority of this Council, which cites it as St. Athanasius's, 'tis easie to perceive, that it has the Stile and Air of this Father. 'Tis also very probable, that the Passages cited by Gelasius and St. John Damascene, and set down at the end of the second Volume, P. 547, and 548, are St. Athanasius's. The Passage of a Letter to Eupsychius (pp), recited in Latin in the Sixth Council, is not so certainly his, for it is not written in his Stile, and we read no where else that St. Athanasius ever wrote to Eupsychius. Photius mentions a Commentary of St. Athanasius upon Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles; we have nothing of it at present and I doubt very much, whether it was St. Athanasius's, since Photius himself confesses, that it had not the Stile of his other Works, and that none of the Ancients, mention it. The Eleven Books of the Unity of the Godhead in the Trinity, belong to Vigilius (qq), a Deacon of Africk, and afterwards Bishop of Tapsa, as well as the Dialogue, or Conference of Arius and St. Athanasius, which follows these Eleven Books.

St. Athanasius.

The Exhortation to the Monks, and to the Spouse of Jesus Christ, which is in the Collection of Holstenius, has nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius, no more than the Book entituled, Instructions abridged for Monks and Christians, published not long ago in Greek and Latin, by Arnoldus, and printed at Paris by the Widow Martin, in the year 1685. These Books are written in a mean Stile, and contain such Rules and Precepts, as neither agree with the Person, nor the Genius of St. Athanasius.

The Letters of St. Athanasius to the Bishops of Egypt, to the Popes Marcus and Felix (rr), and those of these Popes to these Bishops, are notoriously false and suppositious.

(ll) The Seven Dialogues of the Trinity, are not St. Athanasius's.] 1. The Author speaks there of an Addition made by the Council of Constantinople to the Nicene Creed. Annon & vos fidei Nicenæ adjecistis? says the Heretick, and the Catholick answers, Sed non ipsi pugnantia. 2. He explains the Six Epithets given to the Holy Spirit by the Council. 3. He treats there of subtle Questions about the Trinity, which were not started in the time of St. Athanasius. 4. He opposes Eunomius and Macedonius, whom St. Athanasius did never particularly attack. 5. The Author of the Dialogue acknowledges three Hypostases in Jesus Christ. 6. The Stile is wholly different from that of St. Athanasius. There are cited indeed in the Lateran Council under Martin the 1*st. Sect.* 6. Three testimonies of St. Athanasius; and the 3*d.* under this Title, In sermone Athanasii qui per modum interrogationis & Responsionis cum Apollinario fit; which Title agrees well enough with these Dialogues: But what is here related, is no where to be found.

(mm) Father Combefis has restor'd them to Maximus.] In the Greek Manuscript which Bessa us'd, 'tis observ'd on the Margin, This Dialogue is not St. Athanasius's, but some say 'tis Maximus's. Two other Manuscripts of Rome and Venice, and that of Dufresne, attribute it to Maximus. Gregorius Protosyncellus, Veccus, Aryndinus, Demetrius, and some other modern Greeks, cite it often under the Name of Maximus, and seldom under that of St. Athanasius. It appears by the Stile and by all the Arguments in that Author, that these seven Dialogues are by one and the same Hand; and the Authorities which we have alledg'd, do plainly shew that they ought to be attributed to Maximus.

(nn) Garnerius has nothing to support this Opinion but some slight Conjectures.] He has no Manuscripts, nor Citations from the Ancients. All that he says to prove it, is, 1*st.* That Theodoret writ against the Arians, the Eunomians, the Macedonians, and the Apollinarists, as he testifies in many Places of his Works. 2. That the Doctrine, the Expressions, and the Reasons of this Author resemble those of Theodoret, and this Author denies as well as he, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son. These Conjectures are very slight, when there are no Manuscripts for him; for it may so happen that two Authors, writing upon the same Principles, may agree very near in these things; besides the Resemblance of the Stile is not so great as Garnerius would have us believe. The Proofs which he brings to shew that this Treatise is none of Maximus's are not of any greater Weight: He says this Book was written before the Creed of Ephesus, because there is no Mention in it of the Nestorians and Eutychians: That from Maximus's time the Question was no longer treated of de Genito & Ingenito: That there is no Probability, that Maximus, should dispute against the Anomæans, without opposing the Eutychians, and Monothelites. 'Tis easie to confute these Conjectures, by saying, that Maximus in these Books disputed against the antient Heresies, and that he sufficiently oppos'd those of his own time in his other Books.

(oo) The Questions to Antiochus, and those that follow them, are yet later.] In these Questions to Antiochus, the Author cites many Writers more modern than St. Athanasius, as Gregory Nyssen in his 8*th.* The Author of the Book ascribed to St. Denys, Ibid. St. Epiphanius Question, 3. And many others in other Places. They have nothing of the Stile of St. Athanasius, and the Author in many Places is of a contrary Opinion: In short, in Athanasius's time, those kind of Questions that were more Curious than useful, were not suffer'd. The Questions that follow about the Explication of some Doubts upon Places of Holy Scripture, and the other anonymous Questions are by the same Author as the preceding, and are only a Collection of Passages, taken out of St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril of Alexandria, St. Gregory Nyssen, St. Climacus, St. Maximus, which are sometimes recited under their Names. The Author of these Questions calls the Occidentalists by the Name of Franks, and says that the Romans are a Nation of the Franks, ἔθνος τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἐστὶν τῶν Φράγγων τὸ γένος: Which plainly discovers that they were compos'd by the Modern Greeks, after the Empire of the West came to the Franks. The modern Greeks have made many such Collections, which they have put forth under the Name of antient and famous Fathers.

(pp) The Passage of a Letter to Eupsychius.] Theodoret and the Council of Chalcedon cite a Letter of Atticus of Constantinople Successor to St. Chrysostom, directed to Eupsychius. St. Athanasius mentions one Eupsychius Bishop of Cappadotia, Orat. 1. against Ar. But the sixth Council says, that the Eupsychius mention'd by him was a Priest of Cæsarea.

(qq) The Eleven Books and the Conference of Arius and St. Athanasius, belong to Vigilius Tapsensis.] It has been observ'd long since that these were the Works of a Latin Author, who wrote long after St. Athanasius. Sirmondus first discover'd that they were written by Vigilius Tapsensis. This he observ'd in his Notes upon Theodulphus of Orleans, where he says, that these two Books are found in an antient Manuscript, together with the Books of this African Bishop against Nestorius and Eutyches, in which he testifies himself that he compos'd these Dialogues under the Name of St. Athanasius.

(rr) To the Popes Marcus and Felix.] 1. The Author of this Letter to Marcus, uses the Words of the Epistle to Felix. 2. The Author of this Letter places the Persecution against St. Athanasius, which happened in 335, under Liberius, nineteen years after the Death of Pope Marcus. 3. This Letter is composed of Passages of Authors who lived since St. Athanasius, as St. Leo, Atticus, St. Cyril, St. Celestine, &c. 4. He says, that there were eighty Canons of the Nicene Council, forty Greek, and forty Latin, which is a manifest Falshood. 5. He adds, that he reduced

St. Athanaſius.

The Relation of the Paſſion of the Image of Jeſus Chriſt in the City of Berytus (ſſ), cannot be St. Athanaſius's; ſince the Hiſtory which is there related, happened not, as is pretended, till the year 765, and moreover, it is full of Fables, and unworthy of St. Athanaſius.

The Fragment upon the Incarnation, againſt the Diſciples of Paulus Samoſatenus, is done by an antient Author; but we have it not in Greek, and there is no proof that it was St. Athanaſius's.

The other Fragment of the Sabbath, is an Extract from part of the Homily upon the ſame Subject, which is in Greek, Vol. I. of St. Athanaſius's Works.

The ſeven Homilies publiſhed by Holſtenius, have nothing of the Stile of St. Athanaſius, but are written by ſome late Greek Declaimer. There is nothing in them that is uſeful or ſublime; and they come not near the noble Simplicity of St. Athanaſius's Writings, as thoſe who have any reliſh of ſuch things are all agreed.

The four other Diſcourſes publiſhed by Father Combefis, though they are more uſeful than the former, yet they are not St. Athanaſius's. The firſt rejects ſo expreſly the Errors of Neſtorius and Eutyches, that 'tis plain, it was compoſed after theſe two Hereticks had publiſhed their Doctrine.

The two laſt about Eaſter and Aſcenſion, are attributed in ſome Manuſcripts to St. Baſil of Seleucia, and 'tis probable that they are all four written by him. St. John Damaſcene, or the Author of a Diſcourſe upon the Dead, cites a Diſcourſe of St. Athanaſius, upon the ſame Subject; but we have none that bears this Title; and 'tis probable that this which is cited by this Author, is ſuppoſititious. I ſay nothing of the Commentary upon the Pſalms, which in its firſt Edition, bore the Name of St. Athanaſius, becauſe now 'tis certainly known, that it was written by Theophylact.

When we conſider the Works of St. Athanaſius, with reſpect to the Subject on which they treat, they may be diſtinguiſhed into four ſorts: The firſt, are Hiſtorical, and relate to the Hiſtory of his own time; the ſecond ſort, are purely Dogmatical; the third concern Morality; and the laſt, are upon the Holy Scriptures. His Apologies ought to be ranked under the firſt Head. The firſt Apology was written immediately after he was driven out of Alexandria, and is addreſſed to the Emperor Conſtantius. There he refutes the Calumnies which his Enemies had made uſe of, to render him odious to Conſtantius. And the better to inſinuate himſelf into the Emperor's Favour; he begins his Diſcourſe with ſaying, That he made his Defence with much Aſſurance before an Emperor, who had been long a Chriſtian, and whoſe Anceſtors had embraced the true Religion: That having made uſe of the Words of St. Paul, for his own Defence, he took him for his Interceſſor with the Emperor, to whom, no doubt, he would give a favourable Hearing. Then he adds, That it was not neceſſary for him to purge himſelf from the Accuſation relating to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, which his Enemies had formerly framed againſt him, ſince as to them he was ſufficiently juſtified by the Teſtimony of an infinite Number of Biſhops, and by the Retractation of Urſacius and Valens, who had acknowledged, that all thoſe Accuſations were pure Calumnies invented by them to deſtroy him; and that tho' theſe things were not ſo, yet he ought not to have any regard to an Information made in his Abſence by his Enemies, which ſhould be of no weight, according to all Laws both Divine and Human. And therefore without inſiſting upon thoſe former Accuſations in this Apology, he refutes thoſe which were made uſe of ſince his Return, to blacken his Reputation with the Emperor. Firſt of all, he is accuſed of having ſpoken ill of this Emperor to his Brother Conſtans. But he takes God to Witneſs, that he never did it, and ſays, That it had been a Madneſs in him, to have attempted ſo bold a thing: That Conſtans would never have ſuffered it; That he had not ſo great an Intereſt in him, as to dare ſay any thing againſt his Brother: That he never ſpoke to him, but in the Preſence of many Perſons who were witneſſes of what he ſaid. But to prove the Falſeneſs of this Accuſation beyond exception, he makes a faithful Relation of all that paſſed in his Voyage to Italy; wherein he ſays, that he parted from Alexandria, to put his Perſon and Reputation under the Protection of the Church of Rome; That he aſſiſted at the Aſſemblies of the Faithful there; That he wrote but twice to Conſtans, while he ſtaid at Alexandria: The firſt time to defend himſelf againſt ſome Letters full of Calumnies, which his Enemies had wrote to him; And the ſecond time, to ſend him ſome Copies of the Holy Scriptures; and that he never went to wait on him but twice, and both times by his own Order. At laſt, he ſays, That the Emperor may judge by the manner of his ſpeaking of his greateſt Enemies, whether he was capable of ſpeaking ill of him to his own Brother. The ſecond Accuſation was no leſs heinous, for they accuſed him of having written a Letter to the Tyrant Magnentius, and they ſaid, That they had the Original of his Letter. To which St. Athanaſius anſwers, That this Accuſation had no Appearance of Truth; That he had never ſeen nor known Magnentius; That he never had occaſion to write to him; That he had all the reaſon in the World, to deteſt him, and to hold no Correſpondence with him; That the firſt Calumny deſtroyed this, ſince it was incredible, that one who was ſo much for the Intereſt of Conſtans, ſhould be of this Tyrant's Faction, who had revolted from him, and cruelly killed him. And as to their pretending to have this Letter, he ſays, It was not to be wondred at, that they had found out an Impoſture, ſince it was very well known, that they had counterfeited the Emperor's Letters. But he prays Conſtantius, to enquire from whence they had this Letter, and who gave it them; and to ſummon before him the Secretaries of Magnentius, and inform himſelf, if they had ever received it: He conjures him to examine this Cauſe as if Truth it ſelf were preſent at his Deciſion; for, ſays he, If they had accuſed me before any other Judge, I might have appealed to the Emperor; but being accuſed before the Emperor, to whom can I appeal, but to the Father of him who is called the Truth, that is, to God? Then he addreſſes to him in a lively and elegant Prayer, That he might enlighten the Mind of the Emperor, to judge in a Cauſe which concerned the whole Church. The third Accuſation is concerning his Celebration of the Holy Myſteries in the Great Church before it was Conſecrated: To which he anſwers, That he did not celebrate the Dedication of this Church, which he could not do, without the Order of the Emperor; but he confeſſes, that he did Celebrate there the Divine Myſteries before its Conſecration. He excuſes himſelf upon the account of the great Concourſe of People that came to Alexandria on Eaſter-Day; and ſays, That the old Churches were ſmall and few in Number, and that the People demanding earneſtly to aſſemble in the Great Church, there to make Prayers for the Safety of the Emperor, he uſed much Entreaty, but in vain, that they would delay it, and rather aſſemble, though with ſome Inconvenience, in the other Churches; and they would not obey him, but on the contrary, were ready to go out of Alexandria, to keep their Aſſembly in the Fields: That this was the reaſon which obliged him to Celebrate in the Great Church before it was Conſecrated, which he did ſo much the rather, becauſe during the Faſt of Lent, many Perſons had been hurt in the preſs of the People. That it was not a thing without Example, that he had Celebrated Divine Offices in a Church, before its Dedication. That his Predeceſſor had done the like in the Church of St. Theonas, which he had built, and that he had ſeen the ſame done at Aquileia: That it was much more convenient to Celebrate in a place that was intended for the Aſſemblies of the Faithful, though it was not yet Conſecrated, than to do it in the Fields, or in thoſe Churches, where the People were in danger of being ſtifled. He obſerves, that though there had been no ſuch fear of Danger, yet it was more expedient, that all the Faithful ſhould offer up their Prayers together in one and the ſame Place, (tho' it was not yet Conſecrated,) than that they ſhould do it apart in ſeveral Places. He was alſo accuſed of diſobeying the Emperor's Orders, when he commanded him to depart them to ſeventy, that there might be as many Canons as there were Diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt, and Languages in the World; which is the height of Impertinence. 6. The Stile is very different from that of St. Athanaſius, and is of a Latin Author. 7. In 336, when this Letter is ſuppoſed to be written, St. Athanaſius was in Gaul, and conſequently could not write from Alexandria. In a word, the Letter is dated the 1ſt. of December, and Marcus died the ſame year, in the beginning of November. The ſame Reaſons prove, that the Anſwer could not be written by Marcus, for 'tis dated about a Month after his Death. The Letter written to Felix has as many Marks of Falſhood. 1. St. Athanaſius never communicated with this falſe Pope. 2. It has not the Stile of St. Athanaſius, but of a Latin Author. 3. 'Tis compoſed of Paſſages taken out of St. Innocent, Celeſtine, the Roman Council, and Adrian. 4. When Felix was choſen, St. Athanaſius lay concealed, and could not then aſſemble a Synod. The Anſwer of Felix is compoſed of Paſſages out of the decretal Epiſtles forged by Iſidore, and of Teſtimonies out of the Fathers; and the Date of the Conſuls is falſe.

(ſſ) The Relation of the Paſſion of the Image of Jeſus Chriſt in the City of Berytus.] Sigebert in his Chronicle, relates the Story at the year 765, and ſo the Treatiſe which he cites cannot be St. Athanaſius's. I ſhall give a ſhort Account of the Story; and leave the Reader to judge whether it be fabulous or no. 'Tis ſaid, that a Chriſtian having over-againſt his Bed, an Image of Jeſus Chriſt which was of his natural Bigneſs, removing out of his Lodging, forgot it in the Lodging where it was, though he knew that Jeſus Chriſt gave it to Nicodemus, who left it to Gamaliel, and that from Gamaliel it paſs'd to St. James, and from St. James to Simeon, and from him to Zacheus, and ſo it paſſed from Hand to Hand till the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem? That a Jew having hired the Houſe where this Image was, for ſome time did not perceive it; but having invited ſome of his Friends to eat with him, they diſcovered it, and after that, all the Jews aſſembled together to beat it, and one of them having pierced it with a Lance, there came forth Blood and Water, which wrought abundance of Miracles. The Title of this Story ſays, that it happened under Conſtantine and Irene. 'Tis related alſo in the 2d. Council of Nice, and 'tis ſaid, that it made the Fathers of the Council to weep.

St. Athanasius.

from Alexandria. To which he answers, That he was not disobedient to his Orders, but that Montanus having brought him the Letter in which the Emperor permits him to depart from Alexandria, and go for Italy, as if he had asked leave; he did not think it was the Emperor's Intention that he should withdraw, but that his Enemies had informed the Emperor, that he desired to retire. That afterwards Diogenes came to Alexandria, without bringing any Letter or Order from the Emperor, and at his Arrival, it was sufficiently published, that he must withdraw, but still there was no Order for it to him from the Emperor, either by word of Mouth, or in Writing: That he always said, he was ready to depart, whensoever the Emperor should write to him, or command him to do so; but it was agreed not to trouble the Church, till such time as he should receive his Orders: That twenty three Days after, Syrianus, General of the Army in Egypt, entered into the Church with his Soldiers the People being there at Prayers, on the Vigil when we ought to celebrate Divine Mysteries; that there he committed great Outrages, and obliged him to retire into a Desart; and so he was neither guilty for flying, nor for disobeying the Orders of the Emperor. He says, That if he had retired sooner, he had been guilty both before God and Men, for 'tis a great Crime in a Bishop, to abandon his Flock, when he is not absolutely forced to do it. He adds, That he intended to go and wait upon the Emperor, and was come out of the Desart upon this design; and though he knew very well the ill treatment those Bishops had met with that refused to sign against him, and the Violence that had been used against those of Alexandria, who took his part; yet he did not give over his intended Voyage upon that Account, but having seen an Order to seize him, sent to the Magistrates of Auxumis, he apprehended the Rage of his Enemies, and therefore returned again to hide himself in his Solitude.

In the first Apology for his Flying, he justifies himself against the Arians, who accused him of Timorousness: He describes the deadly Effects of their Fury, and the Mischiefs they had done to the greatest Bishops of the World, Hosius, Liberius, Paul of Constantinople, and many others. He shews by the Examples of Jacob, Moses, David, Elias, St. Paul, and Jesus Christ; and by the Command of Christ in Matt. 10. That it is lawful to fly from Persecution, and that 'tis oftentimes of greater Use than to expose our selves to Danger: He observes, That the Saints who delivered themselves up to their Persecutors, did it by the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He demands of his Adversaries, where they had learned, that it is permitted to persecute, and not permitted to fly: He objects to them, that the Devil is the Cause of Persecution, and that Jesus Christ has advised Flight. At last, he complains of the Violence they used against himself, and the Mischiefs they still do to the Church.

In the Second Apology, he justifies himself from the former Accusations made against him, by setting down the Judgments given in his favour, in the Councils of Egypt, Rome, and Sardica, whose Letters he produces at full length. These Monuments are very considerable for the History of that Time, because there are particular remarks in them about the Discipline of the Church: As, for Instance, we learn from the Letter of the Synod of Alexandria, that the Bishop of Alexandria, was chosen by the People, and ordained by the Bishops of the whole Province of Egypt; that the Ecclesiastical Laws forbid the Translations of Bishops; that the Mystery of the Eucharist was carefully concealed from those that were no Christians; That 'twas an Impiety to break a Chalice, and to spill the Blood of Jesus Christ; That the Eucharist was given to the Laicks in both kinds; that 'twas Consecrated on Sunday, and that it was kept for some time; that none but Priests lawfully ordain'd could consecrate and distribute it; that the Bishop had a Throne, or a Seat, that was rais'd higher than other Seats. Julius the Bishop of Rome, maintains in his Letter, that he could examine anew in one Synod what had been ordain'd in another, and alledges the example, rather than the Authority of the Council of Nice. He lays claim to this Power, and complains that St. Athanasius was condemn'd without sending him notice: He blames the Eusebians for sending a Stranger, that lived almost 60 Leagues off from Alexandria, to take Possession of the Episcopal See of that City. After this, he recites two Letters from the Council of Sardica, one addressed to the Church of Alexandria, and the other to all the Bishops of the World, which contain an ample Justification of St. Athanasius; and the last contains the Subscriptions of many Bishops who Subscribed in this Council afterwards. And after these Letters there follow three Letters of Constantius to St. Athanasius, commanding him to return; one Letter of Julius to the Church of Alexandria, wherein he congratulates the Alexandrians, upon the Return of their Bishop; the Letters of Recommendation which Constantius gave him to return to Alexandria, the Letter of the Synod of Jerusalem to the Church of Alexandria in favour of St. Athanasius, and last of all, the Retractation of Ursacius and Valens addressed to Julius, wherein they declare, that all which was said against Athanasius was false, that they acknowledged Arius for an Heretick, and anathematized his Error; and one Letter from the same Bishops addressed to St. Athanasius, wherein they declare, that they are of his Communion. After St. Athanasius has thus produced those Instruments of his Absolution, being desirous to shew that he had done nothing partially, out of favour to himself, he goes back again as far as the beginning of the Schism of Meletius and the Heresie of Arius, and gives an account of all that pass'd upon this occasion until his Exile, reciting the authentick Acts to justifie all that he Asserts: So that for the future, to read the History of that time, one should begin at the Second Part of this Apology, which begins towards the middle of P. 777. of the Greek and Latin Edition at Paris, and then resume the Beginning of the History, when he shall have finished the Second Part.

St. Athanasius.

He wrote also this History long before with more order, and deduces it higher in his Book which is call'd, A Letter to those that lead a Monastick Life. After he has there related all that pass'd about the Cause of Arianism till the Council of Sardica, he insists upon the Circumstances of the Banishment of Pope Liberius. He says, that the Arians did not at all spare him, that they had not any respect for the City of Rome, the Metropolis of the whole Roman Empire, nor for the Holy Apostolical See; that by their Instigation, the Emperor had sent a Bishop to Rome, to persuade the Bishops there to Condemn St. Athanasius. But Liberius refusing him, answer'd, that it was against the Canons to condemn a Man that is absent, who had been judged worthy of communion while he was present at Rome; that if the Emperor would determine the Controversies of the Church, he should assemble a free Council, where there was neither Prince, nor Courtier, and where all things might be decided in the Fear of God, and according to the Doctrine of the Apostles; and where every one should follow the Faith of the Council of Nice, and from whence those should be excluded that would not profess to follow it; and afterwards the Council might examine the Matters now in Debate. He adds, that the Bishop having entred into the Church of St. Peter to consecrate the Presents that were brought to Liberius, as soon as he understood that they were intended to procure his Subscription against St. Athanasius, he reproved the Sacristan for receiving them, and threw them out of the Church as Sacrilegious Offerings: That when these things were told to the Emperor, he caused him to be brought to Constantinople, and that the Pope spoke to him more sharply than he had done at Rome, whereupon he was sent into Banishment; and there he was forc'd at last to subscribe for fear of Death, after he had resisted for the space of two Years. After this, he describes the fall of Hosius; and tells us that Constantius being sollicited by the Arians, who would fain engage to their Party a Bishop of so great Authority, exhorted him to Subscribe; and that the Holy Man not only could not endure the Proposal, but perswaded the Emperor to let him alone, and retired into his own Country; and that the Arians still continuing to sollicit the Emperor, he wrote many Letters, fill'd sometimes with fair promises, sometimes with Threats, to oblige him to condemn Athanasius. But the generous Old-man answered him in a Letter which St. Athanasius produces, wherein he declares to him that he had suffered under the Reign of Maximian for the Faith, that he was still ready to suffer, and to shed his Blood for the defence of Innocence and Truth; he advises him not to hearken to those Easterlings, any more than he would do to Ursacius and Valens. He tells him that he was Mortal, and that he ought to be afraid of the Day of Judgment; That he ought to meddle no more in Ecclesiastical Matters, than the Bishops should in Temporals. His words are excellent, which are these; [Remember, says he, that you are Mortal, fear the Day of Judgment, keep your self in Purity, that you may appear there amongst the number of the Elect: Do not meddle at all in Ecclesiastical Affairs, and command us nothing about those Matters; but learn them of us. God has given the Power of the Empire into your Hands, and has entrusted us with that which concerns the Church; and as he who Invades your Empire, acts against the Order of God, so take heed that you render not your self Guilty of a very heinous Crime, by assuming to your self a power in those things which are of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. 'Tis written, Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the Things that are God's; So then we are not permitted to govern the Empire of the World, and you, Sir, have no Power at all in Things that are Sacred.] After this, St. Athanasius relates the Violence that was done to Hosius to make him Subscribe, and how the Emperor caused him to go to Sirmium, where he detained him till he had communicated with Ursacius and Valens. The rest of this Letter is a very vehement Declamation, against the outrages and Persecutions of Constantius, and the Arians; to which is added, a Protestation of the People of Alexandria, concerning the Violences that were used against St. Athanasius.

The Book of the Synods of Ariminum and Seleucia, contains not only the History of these two councils, but also of the principal Creeds made by the Bishops of Arius's Faction after that which was made by the Council of Nice, which he sets down in its full length. From thence he takes occasion to treat of the word, Consubstantial, which he maintains againſt the Arians; and yet he acknowledges, that they are not to be treated as Hereticks, who ſcruple to make uſe of this word, though they confeſs the Faith of the Divinity of the Son: he explains in what ſenſe this word was condemn'd in the Council of Antioch, held againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, and alledges for his ſenſe the Teſtimony of the two Dionyſii, who made uſe of this Word.

Beſides theſe Works of St. Athanaſius, which contain the Deduction of the Hiſtory of that time, there are ſome others which concern particular Facts.

The Firſt is the Book of the Definitions of the Council of Nice, wherein he defends the Deciſions of this Council, and takes notice of the conſiderable Circumſtances of it. He ſays, that the Biſhops of the Council who were about 300 in number, defired the Arians with great meekneſs, to juſtifie themſelves, but ſcarce had they begun to ſpeak, when all the Biſhops diſapprov'd them; that the Hereticks could not agree among themſelves, but were obliged to keep ſilence, and then the Biſhops made the Creed, which was ſign'd by the Euſebians; That Euſebius of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, who had refus'd to Sign the Day before, approv'd of it next Day, and wrote to thoſe of his Church about it. After this he diſputes againſt the impiety of the Arians, who had relaps'd into their former Error, and proves that the Son of God was from all Eternity. He Juſtifies the Terms which are us'd by the Nicene Council in their Creed, and ſays, the word Conſubſtantial, has a very good ſenſe, and there is none more proper to expreſs a formal Condemnation of the Error of the Arians: And he adds moreover, that this Word is not new, ſince Theognoſtus, Denys of Alexandria, Denys of Rome, and Origen have us'd it long before the Council of Nice; that this Synod had not eſtabliſhed any new Doctrine, but confirmed that which was approved by Scripture and Tradition. He Obſerves, that in Matters of Faith, its Deciſions did not run in the ſame manner as thoſe that were made about the Celebration of Eaſter, when this Phraſe was us'd, It pleaſes us, we will have it ſo; for now they only ſay, This is the Catholick Faith; Ita credit Catholica Eccleſia.

The Second Book of this Nature, is a Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt, which is improperly called, The Firſt Diſcourſe againſt the Arians. There he deſcribes the Outrages which the Arians Committed againſt the Catholicks, and exhorts his Brethren to ſhun their Snares: He warns them by no means to Subſcribe their Confeſſion of Faith, how Catholick ſoever it may appear to them, but to adhere to that of the Council of Nice, in which the Impiety of Arius was condemn'd. Then he recites the Principal Heads of his Error and he refutes them by the Teſtimonies of Holy Scripture. He deſcribes the miſerable end of this Heretick; and concludes with an exhortation to the Catholicks to maintain the Faith unto Death; repreſenting unto them, that he is not only a Martyr who ſuffers death for refuſing to offer unto Idols, but alſo he that dies rather than betray the Truth.

The Letter to all the Orthodox Biſhops was Written about the ſame Time, and upon the ſame Subject: There he gives an Account of the Violent manner of introducing George into the Church of Alexandria, and deſcribes the Fury of the Arians, and the Damage the Church has ſuffered by them very particularly.

In the two Letters to Luciſer, he deſcribes the Perſecutions which the Arians ſet on foot againſt the Catholicks, and repreſents the lamentable State of the Church.

In the Letter to Serapion concerning the Death of Arius, he relates the unhappy end of this Heretick, who periſhed in a Jakes the very Night before he was to be received into the Church. St. Athanaſius ſays, That he learn'd this ſtory from the relation of Macarius, a Presbyter.

The Letter written by St. Athanaſius concerning the Opinion of Dionyſius of Alexandria, concerning the Trinity, may be numbred amongſt his Hiſtorical Books, becauſe it teaches us a very conſiderable Point of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which we ſhould not have known if St. Athanaſius had not reported it there; namely, That Denys of Alexandria wrote againſt the Sabellians of Pentapolis, and that in Diſputing againſt them, he made uſe of ſuch Expreſſions, as would make one believe that he favour'd the contrary Error; That he was accus'd of this in a Synod held at Rome; That he Wrote a Treatiſe to the Pope, entituled, A Refutation and Apology, wherein he defends himſelf and confutes his Adverſaries; and that he taught in this Book a Doctrine perfectly contrary to that of the Arians: All which St. Athanaſius proves in this Treatiſe, by citing ſeveral Paſſages out of the Book of Denys of Alexandria.

The Letter of the Council of Alexandria, to thoſe of Antioch, concerns the ſtate of the Church of Antioch, after the Death of Conſtantius. St. Athanaſius and the other Biſhops of this Council adviſe the Church of Antioch, to receive the Arians who expreſly condemn their Error, to joyn themſelves to Paulinus and thoſe of his Party, to admit into their communion thoſe that held their Aſſemblies in the Old City, that is to ſay, thoſe of Meletius's Party, without requiring any other Profeſſion of Faith, but that of the Council of Nice. They give them notice, that there was no Creed made in the true Council of Sardica; they adviſe them to have no Diſputes among themſelves about the Hypoſtaſes, ſince thoſe who acknowledg'd Three in the Trinity, and thoſe who own'd but One, were both of the ſame judgment, and only differ'd in the manner of Expreſſion.

St. Athanaſius.

St. Athanaſius ſpeaks after the ſame manner of the Reception of the Arians, in a Letter to Ruffinian, where he mentions the Deciſion of this Synod.

In a Letter to the Emperor Jovian, St. Athanaſius and the other Biſhops of Egypt, propoſe to him the Nicene Creed as the only true one: They ſay, that this contains the Faith which was maintain'd by many Holy Martyrs, who are now with Jeſus Chriſt, that it had never had any Adverſaries, if the Malice of the Hereticks had not endeavour'd to corrupt it; but that Arius and his followers intending to introduce a new Doctrine contrary to the Truth, the Council of Nice condemn'd it, and made a Confeſſion of Faith to eſtabliſh the Truth, and extinguiſh the Flame that was kindled by his Partizans: That this Creed was prais'd and ſincerely believ'd in all the Churches of Chriſt, till ſome Biſhops, having a mind to revive the Error of the Arians, began to deſpiſe it; and yet they did not openly declare themſelves againſt it, but only in their Explications of it they reflected obliquely upon the Conſubſtantiality, and ſpoke Blaſphemies againſt the Holy Spirit. After they have thus explain'd the Nicene Creed, they ſet it down, and tell the Emperor, that this is the only Creed to which we muſt adhere.

I ſay nothing of the Conferences of the Arians and St. Athanaſius, becauſe they contain little remarkable.

The Catholick Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Cilicia, and Phœnicia, was written, as well as the preceding Letters, in the Name of the Synod of Egyptian Biſhops, in which St. Athanaſius preſided. They Exhort the Biſhops to whom they write, to ſeparate themſelves from the Arians, to act unanimouſly in the Defence of the Faith, and not to diſſemble the Truth for Fear or Ambition; and to acknowledge the Divinity of the Holy Spirit: And at laſt they propoſe to them as a Badge and Teſt of the true Faith, theſe Words, The Conſubſtantial Trinity.

The Letter to the Africans was written upon the ſame Subject in the Name of St. Athanaſius, and 82 Egyptian Biſhops; wherein they recommend the Faith of the Nicene Council eſtabliſhed by 318 Biſhops; publiſh'd and receiv'd by all the World becauſe this Synod had follow'd the Doctrine, and manner of Expreſſion uſed by the Holy Scriptures, and the Fathers.

In the Letter to John and Antiochus Presbyters, St. Athanaſius rejoyces becauſe he underſtood by their Letters written from Jeruſalem, that a great number of Brethren were re-united in one and the ſame Communion; he reproves thoſe that would trouble the Church by their Diſputes about words, and wonders that any ſhould dare to reprehend the Doctrine of St. Baſil.

In the following Letter to Palladius, he commends him for being Orthodox, and approves of his ſtaying with Innocent. He rebukes thoſe Monks that would not obey St. Baſil, but praiſes this Biſhop, ſaying he was the Glory of the Church, for he contended for the Truth, and taught thoſe that needed Inſtruction, and none could be good Catholicks that had any Diſpute with him. He adds, that he had written to his Monks to obey him as their Father, and that they were to blame for complaining of him. Probably 'twas about the queſtion of the Hypoſtaſes, that the Monks had ſome Diſpute with St. Baſil.

After we have ſpoken of his Hiſtorical Works, let us now come to the Dogmatical.

The Firſt of theſe, are the two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, whereof the Second is now entituled, Of the Incarnation. In the firſt of theſe two Books he Oppoſes Idolatry, and Eſtabliſhes the Worſhip of the true God: he diſcovers the ſource of Idolatry, that it comes from the Corruption of Man's Heart, who being created after the Image of God, fell under the guilt of Adam's Sin, and inherited from him an unhappy Inclination to Sin, which the Will does very often follow, though it be free to reſiſt it. From this principle he concludes, in the firſt place, againſt the Hereticks, that 'tis not neceſſary there ſhould be two Principles, or two Gods, one Good the Author of Good; and another Evil, the Author of Evil. He refutes this Impious Opinion, by Reaſon and Authority, and concludes that Sin is not a Subſtance, but that it entered into the World by the Fall of the firſt Man. He obſerves that this is the ſource of all Idolatry, that Men being fall'n from their firſt Eſtate do no longer raiſe their Heart and Spirit to things Spiritual, but fix them on things Terreſtrial and Senſible. He refutes afterwards the different kinds of Idolatry, and ſhews that we ought not to Worſhip, nor acknowledge for Divinities, either the Gods of the Poets, or the World, or any part of it. After he has thus overthrown all kinds of Idolatry, he eſtabliſhes the Exiſtence and Worſhip of the true God: He demonſtrates, that God may be known by the light of Nature, firſt from our ſelves, that is to ſay, by Reflection upon our own thoughts, that he is neither Corporeal, nor Mortal. 2. from the Beauty of the univerſe, which diſcovers the Exiſtence

St. Athanaſius.

Exiſtence of him as the cauſe of it: Then he ſhews that this God is the Father of Jeſus Chriſt, that he created all things, and governs them by his Word.

The Second Treatiſe againſt the Gentiles, is that which is entituled, Of the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt; becauſe there he treats of that Myſtery. For explaining the Cauſes of it, he goes back as far as the beginning of the World; and proves that it was not made by chance, nor fram'd of an eternal Matter, but that God the Father created it by his Word. After this, he ſpeaks of the Fall of Man, who being created after the Image of God, addicted himſelf to things corruptible and periſhing, and ſo became the cauſe of his own Miſery and Corruption. He ſays, that the Fall of Man was the cauſe of the Incarnation of the Word; becauſe God pitying Man, reſolved to ſend his Son to ſave him, and to give him the means of obtaining that Immortality which he had loſt. Upon this Principle he founds the Neceſſity of the Incarnation of the Word; which he proves, Firſt, Becauſe the Son being the Eſſential Image of his Father, there was none but he that could render Man like to God, as he was before his Fall: 2. Becauſe as the Word is the Reaſon and Wiſdom of his Father, there is none but he can teach Men and undeceive them of their Errors. From the Cauſes of the Incarnation, he paſſes to its Effects, and after he has deſcribed the Graces which the Word has merited for Mankind by his Incarnation, he ſpeaks of his Death; and ſhews that he was to die as he did, by the Torments of the Croſs, that by his Death he might conquer Death both in himſelf and us. Laſtly, he proves the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt by the wonderful Effects that follow'd his Death, and by the contempt of Death wherewith it inſpired his Diſciples, after he has thus explained the Doctrine of Chriſtians, he refutes the Jews and Pagans, the former by proving from the Prophets that Jeſus is the Meſſias promiſed in the old Teſtament; and the latter, from the Miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, from the deſtruction of Idolatry, and the eſtabliſhment of the Doctrine of the Goſpel; which, though contrary to the Luſts and Paſſions of Men, was entertain'd without difficulty, and in a little time by the greateſt part of the World. He concludes theſe Diſcourſes with an Advertiſement to his Friend Macarius, to whom they are directed, that he ſhould have recourſe to the Holy Scripture, which is the fountain from whence theſe things are drawn; to which he adds this Remark, that for the better underſtanding of it, we ſhould lead a Life like to that of the Authors of theſe Holy Books.

St. Athanaſius, wrote but two Treatiſes againſt the Gentiles, for his other Dogmatical Treatiſes are either about the Trinity, or the Incarnation. The four Diſcourſes againſt the Arians are the chief of his Dogmatical Works. In the firſt, which is call'd the ſecond, he convicts the Sect of the Arians of Hereſie; for which end, he firſt makes uſe of an Argument which he employs againſt all Hereticks, which is the Novelty of their Sect, and the Name which it bears; Then he explains their Doctrine, and proves, that it is impious, full of Blaſphemies, and comes near to that of the Jews and Gentiles. Laſtly, he refutes their Reaſons, and clears up a great many Difficulties which they propoſe againſt the Doctrine of the Church.

In the ſecond Treatiſe, which is the third in the common Editions, he explains ſome of the Paſſages which the Arians alledge, to prove that the Son is a Creature, and inſiſts chiefly upon that in Chap. 8. of the Proverbs, The Lord hath created me in the Beginning of his ways, &c. He ſays towards the end, 'That the Arians run a hazard of having no true 'Baptiſm; becauſe to make this Sacrament valid, 'tis not 'ſufficient to pronounce the Words, but we muſt alſo have 'a right Underſtanding of them, and a right Faith. He adds, 'That if the Baptiſm of other Hereticks who pronounce 'the ſame Words, be null and void, becauſe they have not 'a true Faith, 'tis not to be thought, that we ought to give the 'ſame Judgment of the Baptiſm of the Arians, who are be'come the worſt of all Hereticks. Theſe Words of St. Athanaſius ſhew, That in his time, thoſe that had been Baptized by Hereticks, were Re-baptized in the Church of Alexandria, though they had been Baptized in the Name of the Trinity.

In the third Diſcourſe, which is reckoned for the fourth, he proves, That the Father and the Son have but one and the ſame Subſtance, and one and the ſame Nature, and that they are one God only, though they be two diſtinct Perſons. Afterwards he ſhews, that all that is ſaid of Jeſus Chriſt in the Scriptures, which ſeems unworthy of his Divinity, ſhould be applied to his Human Nature, becauſe Chriſt being a Perſon compoſed of the Divine and Human Nature, the Properties of both theſe Natures may be attributed unto him. At laſt, he examines a Queſtion propoſed by the Arians, viz. Whether the Father begot his Word voluntarily or neceſſarily: To which he anſwers, That he begot him naturally and not by conſtraint, and ſo in this ſenſe he begot him voluntarily, becauſe he would beget him, though he could not but beget him.

In the laſt Diſcourſe he refutes the Ariam, proving that the Word is Eternal and Conſubſtantial to the Father, and the Sabellians, who denyed that the Son was a Perſon diſtinct from the Perſon of the Father; and the Paulianiſts, who diſtinguiſhed the Word from the Son of God, and the Paraclete from the Holy Spirit. St. Athanaſius.

The Diſcourſe upon the Words of the Goſpel of St. Matt. Ch. 11. My Father has given me all things, &c. contains a Refutation of that falſe Concluſion which the Arians drew from thoſe Words, by ſaying, That if the Father had given all things to his Son in time, there was a time when he had not all things, and by conſequence that he had not always a Supreme Empire over the Creatures, from whence it would follow, that he was not equal to the Father: To which St. Athanaſius anſwers, That this Paſſage does not treat of the abſolute Power of God over his Creatures, but concerns the Myſtery of the Incarnation: That the Father has given Mankind to Jeſus Chriſt, as a ſick Perſon is left to a Phyſician for his Cure: That Man having ſinned, and Death being the Puniſhment of his Sin, the Word became Man, and God gave all Mankind unto him, that he might heal them, and reſtore to them that Life and Light which they had loſt.

In the Letter to Adelphius, St. Athanaſius proves againſt the Arians, that we muſt worſhip the Word in the Perſon of Jeſus Chriſt.

In the following Letter to Maximus, he ſhews, That Jeſus Chriſt is truly God, and truly Man. The Titles of the Letters to Serapion, ſufficiently ſhew what they treat about: Againſt thoſe that ſay, that the Son and the Holy Spirit are Creatures. The Treatiſe againſt the Sabellians, is a Collection of Paſſages out of Holy Scripture, which prove the Trinity of Perſons and the Divinity of the Word. The deſign of the Treatiſe about the Union of the human Nature with the Word, is rather to prove the Divinity of the Son of God, than to explain the Incarnation. The Expoſition of Faith, which is in the firſt Volume, P. 140. is an Explication of the Nicene Creed, concerning the Unity and the Incarnation. The ſhort Diſcourſe againſt the Arians, is a Writing of the ſame Nature. The Letter to Epictetus, is the Principal Treatiſe of St. Athanaſius, concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt, where he refutes the Error and the Arguments of thoſe that maintain that the Fleſh of Jeſus Chriſt, was of the ſame Subſtance with his Divinity; That the Divinity was changed into the Humanity, or the Humanity into the Divinity; That the Word had adopted a Body without being naturally united to it; That the Body was not aſſumed in the Womb of the Virgin Mary; That the Divinity did ſuffer; or in a word, That the Word was a Perſon different from the Man. In ſhort, he there refutes the foundations of the Error of the Apollinarians and Eutychians, and the Principle of the Error of the Neſtorians, by ſhewing, That Jeſus Chriſt is one Perſon compoſed of a Divine and Human Nature, wherein all the Properties of thoſe two Natures are found. He refutes the ſame Errors in the Books of the Incarnation againſt Apollinarius, in which he proves particularly againſt this Heretick, that Jeſus Chriſt took one Human Nature entire and perfect, That it was not deſtitute of a Soul, nor of Underſtanding and Will.

There are few Moral Treatiſes amongſt the Works of St. Athanaſius. The Epiſtle to Dracontius is one of the chief. [This is rather concerning Diſcipline, though urged with Moral Arguments.] Dracontius was a Monk that had been choſen Biſhop: But, either becauſe he was afraid of Perſecution, or elſe becauſe he thought himſelf unworthy to govern a Biſhoprick, he fled and hid himſelf, leſt he ſhould be obliged to take care of the People, of whom he had been ordained Biſhop. St. Athanaſius in this Letter, reproves his Puſillanimity, and exhorts him to return to his Biſhoprick. He repreſents to him, That his Conduct ſcandalized many Perſons; That being ordained Biſhop, he was no longer at his own diſpoſal, but owed himſelf to thoſe for whom he was ordained; That he was obliged to take care of them, and that he ſhould be anſwerable for the Salvation of thoſe that ſhould periſh for want of Inſtruction; That he ſhould improve the Talent that God had given him, and take care of the Flock that God had entruſted him with; That if the Fear of Perſecution made him flee from a Biſhoprick, it was a great Weakneſs in him; but if it was from any Diſlike of the Epiſcopal Function, it was an injurious Contempt of the Authority and Myſtery of Jeſus Chriſt; That he could not excuſe himſelf, by ſaying, that he had ſworn or vowed to the contrary, ſince Jeremy and Jonas were obliged to do contrary to what they had reſolved; and beſides, that many Monks whom he names, had accepted of a Biſhoprick, and that this Profeſſion was no hindrance to their Ordination; That a Biſhoprick was ſo far from being an Occaſion of Sin, as ſome would perſuade Dracontius, that it would be rather a means to ſanctify him by his imitating the Apoſtles; That this State did not hinder, but he might ſtill obſerve the Cuſtoms of the Cloyſter: (You will be permitted, ſays he, being a Biſhop, to faſt, or to abſtain from Wine: We have known Monks great Eaters, and Biſhops great Faſters: We have ſeen Monks that drink Wine, and Biſhops that drink none: Biſhops for the moſt part live in Celibacy *, and we have ſeen Monks mar-

* [St. Athanaſius's Words are theſe, Many Biſhops never married, and Monks have been Fathers of Children. (Πολλοὶ Ἐ*ried:*

St. Athanaſius.

ἢ Επισκοπων καὶ γεγαμηκασι, μοναχοὶ δὲ πατέρες τέκνων γεγόνασιν, p. 258. D. Vol. 1.) As theſe Words are tranſlated, they have quite a different meaning from that which was at firſt deſigned by St. Athanaſius. He makes his Compariſon between thoſe that practiſed, and thoſe that omitted the Auſterities there mentioned, in ſuch a manner as ſhews that he thought them abſolutely indifferent; and beſides, there is a great difference between many and the moſt part.

Yet I ſhould not have taken notice of it, if in his account of St. Athanaſius's Doctrine, Mr. du Pin had not repeated what he had before obſerved in this place, and with ſome Additions; for there he ſays, That there were Prieſts and Biſhops married, though but few. Here is a double Miſtake; for neither does St. Athanaſius ſay, that there be but few Prieſts or Biſhops married, nor does he ſpeak a word of Prieſts. Monks were not conſtantly ordained in thoſe Days. St. Anthony, their great Maſter, was a Lay-man, and in this very Letter to Dracontius, St. Athanaſius, amongſt other Arguments to perſuade him to accept the Biſhoprick to which he was Canonically Elected, tells him, That if the Monks deſired to have Presbyters among them, to inſtruct them in their Duty, they ought not to envy others, who for the ſame reaſon were earneſt to have Dracontius for their Biſhop.]

In the Letter to Ammon the Monk, he refutes the Error of ſome Monks, who condemn'd the uſe of Marriage; and ſhews by the Scripture, that 'tis permitted, and that 'tis an Impiety to condemn it, tho' Virginity is a more perfect State, and deſerves greater Rewards.

The Life of St. Anthony may be reckon'd among his Moral Writings, for it contains excellent Inſtructions for all Monks.

We muſt alſo place among the Moral Works of St. Athanaſius his Homily of Circumciſion and the Sabbath. There he treats of the Inſtitution of the Sabbath, and thinks that the principal end of its Celebration was not merely to reſt, but that it was Inſtituted to make known the Creator; that the Reaſon why 'tis abrogated in the New Law, and the Feaſt of Sunday eſtabliſh'd in its room, is, becauſe the firſt Day was the end of the firſt Creation, and the ſecond was the beginning of the New: For the ſame Reaſon he believes that Circumciſion was appointed on the eighth Day, to be a figure of that Regeneration which is made by Baptiſm.

Laſtly, That I may ſay ſomething of the Treatiſes of St. Athanaſius upon the Holy Scriptures, the Abridgment of the Scriptures, is the moſt uſeful of them. There you may ſee in one view, an Enumeration of all the Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament according to the Catalogue of the Hebrews, which contains but 22; and he adds thoſe that are not Canonical, but yet are read in the Church to the Catechumens, which according to him, are the Books of Wiſdom, Eccleſiaſticus, Eſther, Judith and Tobit; with this Obſervation, that ſome plac'd the Books of Eſther and Ruth amongſt thoſe which they eſteem'd Canonical. In the Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the New Teſtament, he places all thoſe which we acknowledge at preſent. After he has given us theſe Catalogues, he maks a very faithful Abridgment of what is contain'd in every Book, and gives the Reaſon, why 'tis call'd by ſuch a Name, and Diſcourſes of the Author that wrote it. Afterwards, he gives a Catalogue of thoſe Apocryphal Books which are of little or no uſe at all. He ſpeaks particularly of the four Goſpels, their Authors, and the Places where they were compos'd; he treats in a few Words of the Greek Verſions of the Old Teſtament, and at laſt, gives a Catalogue of ſome Books cited in Scripture that are loſt. The Fragment of the 39th. Feſtival Letter is upon the ſame Subject, and it contains alſo a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old and New Teſtament, and of thoſe that are uſeful, tho' they be not Canonical, which he diſtinguiſhes from theſe Apocryphal Books, that have been forg'd by Hereticks; and here he follows the ſame Catalogue which is in the Abridgment: But, he adds to the number of theſe Books, that may be read to the Catechumens, The Doctrine of the Apoſtles, and the Book, entituled Paſtor.

The Book to Marcellinus upon the Pſalms is alſo of the ſame Nature. St. Athanaſius, ſhews there the Excellency of the Book of Pſalms; and relates the Subject of many of them, thoſe that are Hiſtorical, and thoſe that are Moral. He obſerves there, that the Book of Pſalms, refers to all the Hiſtories of the Old Teſtament; That it includes all the Prophecies of Jeſus Chriſt; That is expreſſes all the Opinions which we ought to have; That it contains the Prayers that ſhould be made, and comprizes all the Precepts of Morality: He obſerves, that there are ſome Pſalms Hiſtorical, ſome Moral, ſome Prophetical, beſides thoſe that conſiſt of Prayers and Praiſes; all which he diſtinguiſhes, and places in their proper Rank and Order. He ſhews, that the Pſalms repreſent to every one of the Faithful, the State of his own Soul, that every one may ſee himſelf there repreſented, and may obſerve from the different Paſſions there expreſs'd, what he feels in his own Heart, and that in whatever State any one is, there he may find Words ſuitable to his preſent Diſpoſition, Rules for his Conduct, and Remedies for his Troubles. Wherefore he divides the Pſalms according to the different Matters of which they treat, that every one may make uſe of them according to his Neceſſities, and according to the different States that he falls into. He adds, that thoſe who Sing, ſhould be of a free and quiet Spirit, that the Melody of their Song, may agree with the Harmony of their Spirit And laſt of all, He would not have any Words of the Pſalms, which may appear ſimple, chang'd, under pretence of making them more Elegant.

St. Athanaſius.

The Treatiſe upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, Whoſoever ſhall ſpeak a word againſt the Holy Spirit, his Sin ſhall not be forgiven him, neither in this World, nor in the other, is an Explication of this difficult place of Scripture, wherein he firſt obſerves, that Origen and Theognoſtus thought, that the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, was the Sin of thoſe who after they were baptiz'd, loſt the Grace of Baptiſm by their Crimes. But St. Athanaſius maintains, that this Explication is not Natural, becauſe thoſe that violate their Vows of Baptiſm, ſin no more againſt the Holy Spirit, than againſt the Father and the Son, in whoſe Name Baptiſm is adminiſtred: And to ſhew that this Opinion of the Ancients, is not defenſible, he obſerves, that theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt were addreſs'd to the Phariſees who were never baptiz'd, and yet ſinned againſt the Holy Spirit, by ſaying, that Jeſus Chriſt caſt out Devils in the name of Beelzebub: He adds, that if this Explication were admitted, it would give up the Cauſe to Novatus. He explains the Paſſage of St. Paul to the Hebrews, where the Apoſtle ſays, 'Tis impoſſible that thoſe who were once baptiz'd ſhould be renew'd again, which does not exclude, ſays St. Athanaſius, Repentance after Baptiſm, but only a ſecond Baptiſm. After he has rejected this Explication, he advances a New one of his own; and is of Opinion, that to ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, is to deny the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt, by attributing to the Devil, as the Phariſees did, his moſt Divine Actions. Thus he explains himſelf: Thoſe, ſays he, who obſerving the Human Actions of Jeſus Chriſt, conſider'd him as a Man only, were in ſome meaſure excuſeable; Thoſe alſo who obſerving his Divine Actions, doubted if he was a Man, were not ſo much to be blam'd: But thoſe who ſeeing his moſt Divine Actions, deny'd his Divinity, by attributing his Actions to the Devil, as the Phariſees and the Arians do, commit ſo enormous a Crime, that they cannot hope for Pardon. The former ſin againſt the Son of Man, i. e. againſt the Humanity of Jeſus Chriſt; and the latter ſin againſt the Spirit, i. e. his Divinity. This in ſhort, is the ſum of the Explication that St. Athanaſius has given of theſe Words of the Goſpel, whereof he treats, and I leave it to the Judgment of the Reader, if he can find another more probable than this of the Ancients.

We may add likewiſe to thoſe Treatiſes of St. Athanaſius, upon the Holy Scripture, the Fragments that are found at the end of his ſecond Volume, and particularly, that which is taken out of the Sixth Council, upon theſe Words of Jeſus Chriſt, My Soul is exceeding ſorrowful.

I ſhall make no Extracts out of thoſe Books which I have rejected, as being none of St. Athanaſius's, tho' there be ſome things in them which may be uſeful, becauſe I would make no Confuſion, by mixing the Doctrine of another Author with that of this Saint, and therefore without ſtaying to ſpeak of theſe Books, I proceed to his Character.

His Stile cannot be better deſcrib'd than 'tis already by the Learned Photius, in Vol. 140 of his Bibliotheque. 'The 'Diſcourſes of St. Athanaſius, ſays he, are clear, ſimple and 'natural, and yet they have much ſtrength and gravity: 'He places the Reaſons which he uſes in a wonderful 'Light; He ſhews great copiouſneſs of Invention, and 'a wonderful eaſineſs of Thought. There is in his 'Works, a Depth of Logick, I do not mean of that barren Logick which propoſes Reaſonings and Syllogiſms, 'without any Ornament, and makes uſe of Dialectical 'Terms as School-Boys do, who would make a ſhow of 'Wit; but of a Logick like that of the antient Philoſophers, who propos'd their Idea's and Reaſonings in an 'excellent manner, accompanied with great Ornaments of 'Eloquence. He makes uſe alſo of Teſtimonies of the 'Holy Scripture, and draws from thence convincing Proofs 'of what he advances. In a word, his Books alone are 'ſufficient for the Refutation of Arianiſm, and he that ſhould 'ſay, that St. Gregory and St. Baſil drew from this Foun-'tain thoſe great Torrents of Learning which they em-'ploy'd againſt this Error, would not be much miſtaken'. The ſame Photius ſays alſo in another place, ſpeaking of the Letters and Apologies of this Father, 'That they are 'written with Clearneſs, Elegance and Grandeur; That 'he has given a turn at once perſuaſive and agreeable to all 'that he ſays'. This Character appears chiefly in his Apology to the Emperor Constantius, which is a Master-piece in its kind, for never any Book had a greater Air of Candor and Simplicity than this, never was any Discourse more Elegant, more beautified with Figures, or more persuasive: Here was St. Athanasius's great Excellency in all his Works; they appear simple and open, and yet being closely consider'd, one may perceive, that they are compos'd with wonderful Artifice: He observes all along an admirable fitness of Expression, and always adapts his Stile to the Subject of which he treats, and to the Persons to whom he speaks. He insinuates himself so dextrously into the mind by his manner of expressing things, that one entertains his Reasons, and feels himself often persuaded by them, before he is aware. How soft soever his Discourse appears, it wants nothing of sharpness; for when he attacks his Enemies, he spares them not in the least, but on the contrary, uses the most smart and emphatical Words that can be found to cover them with Confusion; and to render them Odious, he makes no scruple to load them with the reproachful Names which they have deserv'd, and to represent the Crimes they have committed, in the most lively Colours that can be drawn with a Masterly Hand: And yet he does it after such a manner, that it seems rather to proceed from a Zeal for the Truths of Religion, than from any Personal hatred which he bears to the Men themselves. The Conduct of this Saint is no less admirable than his manner of Writing. St. Basil gives this Character of him in his 48 Letter, address'd to himself. 'Who can be found, says he, that 'has more Prudence than you? Who has a clearer Inspection into the Affairs of the Church, and who has a greater Facility in executing his Designs? Is there any that has 'more Charity and Compassion for his Brethren? Are not 'you the Bishop in all the World, that is in most Veneration with those of the West?' And in the following Letter he has these Words; 'The more the Miseries of the 'Church encrease, the more are we oblig'd, says he, to have 'recourse unto you; we have no hopes of any Consolation under our Afflictions but by your means, since you 'can do much, both by your Prayers which are very Effectual, and also by the sharpness of your Wit, whereby 'you understand at the same time what is most advantageous to the Church.' And again in another Letter, 'When 'we consider our Calamities, and the State to which we 'are reduc'd, we do almost Despair of Safety; but when 'we cast our Eyes upon you, we take Courage, and consider you as a Physician whom God has given to heal all 'our Maladies. Who can be a fitter Pilot in this Tempest, than he who has all his Life time endur'd the like 'Persecutions for the Faith?' And truly, 'Tis hard to say, which of the two is most to be admir'd in St. Athanasius, his unmoveable Constancy and Firmness, which he always shew'd, or the Prudence that appear'd in his Conduct under all his Persecutions. I say nothing of his Humility, his Charity, Pastoral Vigilance, and his other Virtues, because they don't fall directly within the Compass of that Design which I have propos'd to my self in this Book.

His Doctrine is very pure, and his Opinions are not only very Orthodox, but his Expressions are very just and exact. He proves the Existence of a God, the Creation of the World, and Providence, in his Books against the Gentiles. He establishes the Trinity of three Divine Persons, and the Unity of the Nature and Substance, almost in all his Works; but he explains this Mystery with much simplicity; for he would not amuse the Reader with Disputes about Words, nor search too profoundly into this Matter. He confesses, that he cannot comprehend it, and he will not employ human Reasonings to Prove or to Explain the Mystery of the Trinity and the Generation of the Word: In short, He shuns as much as he can, to enter upon any of those subtile Questions, which have since unprofitably exercis'd the Wit of so many School-Divines. He speaks admirably of the Fall of the first Man, of the Punishments of Sin, of the Necessity and Effects of the Incarnation of the Son of God. He explains this Mystery in such a manner as is equally contrary to all the Errors of the Hereticks of either side; for he teaches against the Paulianists, that the Word is united to the Humanity; against the Valentinians, that it took a Body like ours in the Womb of the Virgin; against the Arians and Apollinarians, that it took a Soul and Spirit; against the Nestorians, that the Divinity is united in the same Person with the Humanity, so that the Virgin may be called the Mother of God; against the Eutychians, that these two Natures subsist in the same Person with their Properties, without Confusion, without Mixture, without Change. He believes, that the Soul is Spiritual and Immortal, and makes no scruple to affirm it as a thing certain, that the Saints are happy and with Jesus Christ. He speaks of the Efficacy of Baptism, and rejects that of the Hereticks: He acknowledges not only in his Apology, but also in his Treatise of the Faith, cited by Theodoret; He acknowledges, I say, in both places, that the Eucharist is the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ*. He praises Virginity, and prefers it to Marriage, tho' he thinks, that 'tis not forbidden. He condemns the Error of the Novatians; He acknowledges the Holy Scripture to be the Rule of Faith, and joyns with it Tradition and the Authority of the Holy Fathers. He observes that the Faith is always the same, and that it does not change, and that the Councils do nothing but declare what is the Doctrine of the Church. He attributes much to Free-Will, and yet he confesses, that since the Sin of Adam Man is enclin'd to Evil, and fix'd upon sensible things. He teaches, that the Soul of Jesus Christ, without dissolving the Union to his Divinity, descended into Hell, to fetch thence the Souls of the Just, and also of those who had liv'd well under the Law of Nature, who were there in Sorrow waiting for their Deliverance. As to what concerns Discipline in his time, one may observe in his Works, that the Communion in both kinds was then given to the Laicks; that the Priests only Consecrated; that the Eucharist was offer'd upon an Altar of Wood; that the Mysteries were hid from the Catechumens and Gentiles; that the Faithful assembled in Churches, where they were a long time at Prayers; that there were then a Multitude of Monks that were subject to their Bishop as their Father, and that some of them were made Bishops; that there were also Virgins who religiously kept their Virginity; that they were not shut up, but assisted at the Divine Mysteries in the Church; That there were Priests and Bishops married, though but few; That Eunuchs could not then be ordain'd; that the Translation of Bishops was condemn'd; That the People and Clergy chose them, and other Bishops ordain'd them; that they must be chosen out of those that were born in the place, rather than Strangers; that they had a Reverence for Churches and Sacred Vessels; that Churches were dedicated with Ceremonies, and that 'twas not permitted to celebrate Divine Mysteries in them before their Dedication, without some kind of Necessity; that there were Fonts in Churches, and that the Bishop had a Chair rais'd on high, call'd the Episcopal Throne; That Oyl and Wine, and Bread for Offerings were kept in the Font; that they had Cœmeteries where they assembled in case of Necessity; that the Churches there were govern'd by Priests, who kept there the Assemblies of the People; that the Bishops made their Visitations in their Dioceses; that the Church of Rome was consider'd as the first; that the Church of Alexandria had much Authority over all Egypt; That they us'd to make

*[That is to say, St. Athanasius calls the Bread the Body, and the Wine the Blood of Christ: He had no occasion to Dispute the Question, nor to determine of either side, concerning the Real Presence. This is plain from his Second Apology to the Emperor Constantius, for his Flight, wherein he clears himself from the Crime that was laid to his Charge in the Synod of Tyre, That he abetted one Macarius a Presbyter in Mareotis, who broke the Cup in which the Wine was usually Consecrated: The Council of Alexandria, that was call'd to examine the Cause of St. Athanasius, in their General Epistle, always call the Cup, πόμεσον μυστικον, the Mystical Cup: and speaking of Presbyters, (p. 732. ap. St. Athana. Vol. 1.) say, μονον ὑμῖν ἐστιν προπίνειν το αἷμα τε χριστε; it belongs to you alone first to drink of the Blood of Christ; that is, to receive before the Congregation: This determines nothing as to the Nature of the Presence; and our Saviour had sufficiently warranted such Expressions by his Discourse in the sixth Chapter of St. John.

If St. Athanasius had said any thing to declare his Opinion, upon a Question at that time not started in the World, his Arguments could have been considered, and his Notions might have then been known: But since all his Writings bend to one scope, from which he hardly ever wanders, any occasional Expressions relating to other Disputes cannot be urg'd any further than as they do in all probability shew what was the Stile of that Age; and it is certain, that the Elements were after Consecration, call'd, the Body and Blood of Christ, at that time; as well they might, since the Church then believ'd, what our Church likewise professes, That worthy Communicants do Spiritually eat the Body, and drink the Blood of Jesus Christ, when they eat the Bread and drink the Wine in the Lord's Supper. Mr. Du Pin, takes a great deal of Pains in his First Volume, to Vindicate the Fathers who lived before the Council of Nice, from the imputation of Arianism: And he observes all along, that before those Questions were professedly examined and Determined by the Church, Men did not speak so exactly as they did afterwards: His Observation is certainly right, and it has always been the receiv'd Excuse, whenever the Opinions of these earliest Fathers have been urg'd on the behalf of the Arian or Socinian Doctrines. If therefore this excuse be just in one Cause, it is equally so in another; and an occasional Expression can no more be urg'd in Favour of Transubstantiation, that in Favour of Arianism, when we otherways know, what was the Opinion of that Age, in which the Question was never put concerning it. There will be no necessity therefore to take notice in every place, where our Author fancies, that the Ancients favour'd his cause, of the particular Reasons, why they spoke in such a manner, or of the Sense in which their Words are to be understood; since it has been so often prov'd by those who have examined all the contested Passages in the Writings of these more Ancient Fathers, that either they favour our Opinions, or that they speak nothing to the purpose of the Dispute that has so long been managed between us and the Church of Rome.]

St. Athanaſius.

the ſign of the Croſs, and believed that it drove away Devils; That they received not the Offerings of the Impious, but only thoſe of the Juſt; That a Biſhop was not allowed to abdicate his Church; That they faſted in Lent; That they celebrated the Feaſt of Eaſter with great Solemnity; That they uſed the Prayers of the Church, and read the Goſpel in the Vulgar-tongue, which was underſtood by the People. I ſhall not ſtay to relate the Principles of Morality which are to be found in his writings, becauſe they are but few, and thoſe few are not handled in their full extent, excepting only what concerns flight from Perſecution, and from a Biſhoprick, and the Defence of the Truth.

The Firſt Editions of St. Athanaſius's Works are very imperfect and the laſt are confuſed. The moſt Antient that we have found, is a Latin Edition of ſome Books, which one Barnabas Celſanus Printed at Vicenza in the Year 1482, and which he Dedicated to Peter Brutus a Biſhop. This Edition is entituled, Treatiſes of St. Athanaſius againſt the Hereticks, and it contains the Four Treatiſes againſt the Arians, that of the Union of the Human Nature, together with the Diſpute againſt Arius, which was alſo Printed in 1500.

This Edition was followed by that of Paris in 1520, which contains a good part of the works of St. Athanaſius in Latin, tranſlated by different Authors, together with the Commentaries of Theophylact upon the Pſalms, which were alſo publiſhed under the Name of St. Athanaſius, by Chriſtopher Perſona, who cauſed them to be Printed at Rome in the Year 1477, [in fol. and afterwards in 1496. in fol.] and by Reuchlin at Tubing, in the Year 1515.

Theſe Diſcourſes were reprinted at Francfort by Knobulchus in 1522, and at Baſle by Froben in 1527. Euſtachius Cornecef Printer at Cologne, Printed them in 1532, without the Commentary of Theophylact upon the Pſalms, and they were alſo Printed the ſame Year at Lyons by the Treſchels.

After theſe, Epiſcopius and Froben undertook a new Edition of the Works of this Father: they were aſſiſted by Nannius Profeſſor at Louvain, who made a new Verſion of the moſt part of the Books which bear the Name of St. Athanaſius, and compared the Greek with three Manuſcripts. They divided the whole into Four Tomes, and place in the laſt ſome Diſcourſes attributed to St. Athanaſius, which had not been Tranſlated by Nannius: This Edition was finiſhed at Baſle, in 1558, and reprinted in 1564.

Nivelle added a Fifth Tome, wherein he put the Life of St. Anthony, the Five Dialogues of the Trinity publiſh'd by Beza at Baſle in 1570. This Edition was Printed twice at Paris, and the Letter to Ammon, in the Year 1572, and in the Year 1581.

Hitherto we have ſaid nothing of publiſhing the Greek Text of the Works of St. Athanaſius. Commelinus, a famous Printer at Heidelberg, firſt undertook it, which he happily finiſh'd in the Year 1600; and the ſame Year he publiſhed in Greek and Latin, over againſt one another, all the Works of St. Athanaſius in two Volumes, whereof the Firſt contains thoſe that were tranſlated by Nannius, and the Second all that could be found beſides. The Greek Text is reviſed by many Manuſcripts, and Printed very exactly. He took care alſo to add at the End, the different Readings collected by Flecmannus; but theſe are only in ſome Copies. This Edition, though very large, is very confuſed; for the Books are without any order, without any Obſervations, and many times the Verſion is very faulty. St. Athanaſius.

It was a little while after corrected by Fronto Ducæus, and Printed at Paris without the Greek in 1612, but he has left many Faults.

At laſt in the Year 1627. the Bookſellers of Paris made a New Edition Greek and Latin of the Works of St. Athanaſius. They follow'd Commelin's for the Greek, and that of 1612, for the Latin; and though they ſay in their Advertiſement that they have exactly reviſed the Greek Text by the Manuſcripts in the Royal Library, and have Corrected an infinite number of places in it, yet they have ſtill left a good number of Faults behind. They have added in this Edition the Greek of the Life of St. Anthony, which was publiſhed before by Hœſchelius in 1611, a Homily upon Eaſter, publiſhed by Plantin at Antwerp, in 1508, the Homilies of Holſtenius, and ſome other Fragments; but they have neither chang'd the order of the Books, nor diſtinguiſh'd the Genuine from the Supoſititious.

What I have now ſaid, ſufficiently diſcovers the Neceſſity that ſome very Skilful Perſon, or rather ſome Religious Society, ſhould undertake to Publiſh a New Edition of the Works of St. Athanaſius. And to make it perfect, they muſt compare the Greek Text exactly with Manuſcripts, make a new Verſion of all the Books, diſtinguiſh the Genuine from the Suppoſititious, and make a ſeparate Volume of theſe Laſt, dividing the firſt as we have done into Four Parts: The Firſt ſhould comprehend the Hiſtorical Books; the Second, the Dogmatical; the Third, the Moral; and the Laſt, thoſe upon the Scriptures. In the Hiſtorical, they muſt obſerve the Order and Thread of the Hiſtory; in the Dogmatical, they muſt keep the order of the Subject Matters; and in thoſe upon the Scripture, they muſt firſt place thoſe that are more general, following very near the Order which we have obſerv'd in our Abridgment. As to the Suppoſititious Books, 'twere good to diſtinguiſh them into three Ranks: The Firſt, ſhould contain the Books of Antient Authors unknown; the Second, thoſe of Modern Authors; and the Third, thoſe whereof the Authors are known, unleſs you would rather paſs by the laſt, and remit the Reader to the Books where they are printed, [with the other Works of thoſe Authors to whom they do of right belong.]

JACOBUS NISIBENUS.

Jacobus Niſibenus.

ST. James, a Native of Niſibis a City of Meſopotamia, which was antiently the Boundary of the Empire between the Perſians and Romans, having led a very auſtere life in the Deſart, and becoming famous by his Confeſſion under Maximinus, and by the great number of Miracles which he wrought, was choſen Biſhop of that City, where he was born: though he did not for that forſake his manner of Life, nor work fewer Miracles than before; nay, 'tis ſaid, that he even rais'd up the Dead. He aſſiſted at the Council of Nice, where he condemn'd the Hereſie of Arius: and Theodoret ſays, that being at Conſtantinople, when they would oblige Alexander Biſhop of that Church to receive Arius into Communion, he adviſ'd the Catholicks to have recourſe to God by Faſting and Prayer, and to Pray all together for the ſpace of Seven Days, that they might agree among themſelves what was beſt to be done. The Perſians coming about the Year 338, to beſiege the City of Niſibis, St. James upon this occaſion did the Office both of a Governor and a Biſhop; for he not only made fervent Prayers for his People, but encouraged them by his Exhortations to Rebuild a Wall in the Room of that which the Beſiegers had beat down; he mounted upon the Walls of the City, and appear'd Miraculouſly cloathed with Purple, as if he had been an Emperor. 'Tis ſaid alſo, that at his Prayer God rain'd an infinite Multitude of Gnats, which ſo annoy'd the Beſiegers, that they were forc'd to retire in diſorder. This Story is related not only by Theodoret, who has written the Life of this Saint, in his Book entituled, Philotheus [which is an Hiſtorical Account of Thirty eminent Aſceticks] and who ſpeaks alſo of this Circumſtance in his Hiſt. Ch. 30. of his Second Book; but alſo by Philoſtorgius who cannot be ſuſpected of too much favour to ſo great an Enemy of the Arians.

St. Athanaſius ſpeaks of this Saint, as of a Biſhop who had written for the Church: And if St. Jerome has not plac'd him among the number of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, it is becauſe, as Gennadius has obſerved that this Father underſtood not the Syriack Tongue, having never read theſe Syriack Writers, [This with Gennadius's leave is ſomething ſtrange: for it is not credible that a Man who lived ſo long in Paleſtine, where Syriack was the Mother-Tongue, and who underſtood Hebrew ſo well as St. Jerome did, ſhould not underſtand Syriack, which is but a different Dialect.] whom he mentions but in their Verſion; ſo that we muſt not wonder that he ſays nothing of his Works, becauſe they were never tranſlated into Greek. Gennadius has made a Catalogue, wherein he ſays, that the Work of this Author contain'd 26 Books, but he names but 23. The 1ſt. is concerning Faith; The 2d. againſt all Hereſies; The 3d. of Charity in general; The 4th. of Charity towards our Neighbours; The 5th. of Faſting; The 6th. of Prayer; The 7th. of the Reſurrection; The 8th. of the Life after Death; The 9th. of Humility; The 10th. of Patience; The 11th. of Penance; The 12th. of Satisfaction; The 13th. of Virginity; The 14th. of the Life of the Soul; The 15th. concerning Circumciſion; The 16th. concerning the Benediction of the Grape, which is the cauſe that the Bunch of Grapes is preſerv'd, which is mentioned by the Prophet Iſaiah, Ch. 65; The 17th. of Jeſus Chriſt, to prove that he is the Son of God, and Conſubſtantial to his Father; The 18th. of Chaſtity; The 19th; againſt the Gentiles; The 20th. of the Building of the Tabernacle; The 21ſt. of the Converſion of the Gentiles; The 22d. of the Empire of the Perſians; The 23d. of the Perſecution of the Chriſtians. Gennadius, ſays alſo, that this Father made a Chronicle, leſs ſtudied indeed than that of the Greeks, but more bold; for by uſing the words of Scripture, he ſtops the mouth of all thoſe that queſtion the coming of Jeſus Chriſt upon vain Conjectures. 'This Holy Man, as Gennadius 'goes on, died under Conſtantius, and was buried by Con'ſtantine's Order in the City of Niſibis, to be a kind of a 'Defender of it after his Death; but ſome time after, Ju'lian entering into this City, either becauſe he could not 'endure the Glory of this Saint, or becauſe he would re'proach the memory of Conſtantine, commanded, that the 'Relicks of his holy Body ſhould be thrown out of the 'City; wherefore in a few Months after the Emperor Jo-

[Theodoret gives us another Account of the removal of St. James's Body: He says, That when Jovian Surrendred up Nisibis to the Persians, the Inhabitants who left the Town, carried the Martyrs Bones along with them: His Testimony is the more valuable because he lived near the place, and also, because, as he tells us himself in his Ecclesiastical History, he took a great deal of Pains to collect and write down the Wonderful Things which were related of this Saint.]

MARCELLUS of Ancyra.

Marcellus of Ancyra.

Marcellus Bishop of Ancyra, assisted at the Council of Nice, where he defended the Faith, and opposed the Arians, as Pope Julius affirms, upon the Report of St. Sylvester the Pope. After that Council he wrote a Book against Asterius and other Bishops of the Arian Faction, entituled, Concerning the Subtraission of Jesus Christ; wherein he advances many Propositions favouring the Error of the Sabellians. The Eusebians immediately accus'd him of this Heresie, and 'tis said, that he promised in the Council of Jerusalem to burn his Book; but refusing to do it when he was at Constantinople, he was condemned and deposed in a Council held in that City by the Eusebians in the Year 336. There is some probability that he was restored again to his See after the Death of Constantine; but he was driven away at the same time that St. Athanasius was forced out of Alexandria, and obliged to fly for Refuge into the West, where he was Absolved in the Councils of Rome and Sardica. Socrates and Sozomen say, that after this last Council, he was restored to his Bishoprick as well as St. Athanasius, but that he could not live there in Quiet, because Basil, who was Ordained in his room in the Year 336. was in Possession of his See; and what became of him afterwards is not known. St. Hilary and Sulpitius Severus affirm, that St. Athanasius having discover'd that he favoured the Error of Photinus, deprived him of his Communion; and this Bishop seeing himself condemned by his Judgment, refrained coming to the Church Gate. But this Relation is not true; for St. Athanasius does always speak of him in his Writings as a Catholick Bishop; and we understand by the Letters which St. Basil wrote to St. Athanasius a little before his Death, that this Father continued always in Communion with him. St. Jerome places Marcellus of Ancyra among the number of Ecclesiastical Writers; and says that he composed many Volumes upon different Subjects, but chiefly against the Arians. We have nothing of his Works remaining, but some Fragments recited by Eusebius in the Books which he wrote against this Author; These passages are very intricate, and favour the Error of the Sabellians. Some have accused Eusebius, that he took for a positive assertion what Marcellus had only proposed by the way of doubt or objection: but the contrary appears sufficiently from Eusebius's Book, where 'tis plain, that in the greatest part of the passages which he recites, Marcellus of Ancyra proposes his true Sentiment, which 'tis very difficult to explain in a Catholick Sense. It appears by these Fragments, that Marcellus was a Man that talked much, who had little Wit, or Knowledge, or Eloquence, and was altogether void of good Sense. St. Epiphan. in Hæres. 72. recites a Letter of Marcellus of Ancyra.

Marcellus of Ancyra.

HOSIUS.

Hosius.

Hosius Bishop of Corduba, a City of Spain, did generously confess the Faith of Christ, in the Persecution of the Emperor Diocletian. The Donatists affirm, That he was condemned for his Crimes by the Bishops of Spain, and was afterwards absolved by those of France: But this is a notorious Calumny, of which they have no Proof, and which is sufficiently confuted by the great Reputation that Hosius had all his Life-time; besides, that his Enemies never charged him with any such thing. His Name is found amongst the Names of those Bishops that subscribed to the Canons, which are believed to be made in the Council of Elvira. He was known to Constantine, while this Emperor was in the West, and followed him into the East; where he was so much esteemed by him, that he was chosen to be sent into Egypt, to settle the Controversies that were risen there about the Heresie of Arius, and the Celebration of Easter. There he assembled a Council, to which the Egyptians have not scrupled to give the Name of Oecumenical, and used his utmost Endeavours to reduce Arius to the Communion of his Bishop Alexander, and to establish Peace: But all was in vain, for it was necessary to have recourse to a more powerful Remedy, which was the General Council of Nice. There he was chosen President, either because of his eminent Virtues, and rare Qualities, or because he had a perfect Knowledge of the Matter which was to be handled in that Council. He presided also at the Council of Sardica, and maintained for a long time with great Constancy the Faith of the Nicene Council, and the Innocence of St. Athanasius, under the Reign of Constantius. This Emperor did in vain sollicit him with Promises and Threatnings, for he answered and wrote to him with unshaken Firmness; but at last, he was so far overcome by the Miseries which he suffered in Banishment, as not only to Communicate with Ursacius and Valens, in the year 357, as St. Athanasius confesses, but also to subscribe to the second Creed of Sirmium, which is Arian, as St. Hilary and Phœbadius, who lived at the same time, do clearly testify. Yet 'tis true, that St. Athanasius who endeavours to excuse the Fault of his Friend, as much as he can, says, that he did not subscribe to his Condemnation, and that his Friend at his Death, protested by his last Will and Testament, against what he had done, and expresly condemned the Heresie of Arius. These two Authors, whom we cited before, do not speak at this rate of him; but on the contrary, St. Hilary says, That his Subscription discovered what he was formerly, i.e. an Hypocrite, who had no other Religion, but that of the Court. But it will be better to spare his Memory with St. Athanasius, than to blacken it by Declamations without Ground. His Fault indeed was very great, but then his great Age, and the Violence that was used towards him, do render him the less culpable; and I think we ought to believe upon the Testimony of St. Athanasius, that he repented of what he had done before his Death. 'Tis true, that the two Luciferians tell us a Story which would prove the contrary if it were certain; but it looks like a Fable. They say in their Petition to the Emperor Valentinian, that Hosius being returned into Spain with a Declaration of the Emperor, wherein 'twas ordained, That all those that would not communicate with him, should be cast out of their Sees; One Gregory, Bishop of the Province of Bætica, a dull Man, but a zealous Defender of the Faith, refused to communicate with him; and being forcibly carried away to Corduba by the Governor's Guards, he continued firm in his Opinion, and boldly reproved Hosius. That Hosius being moved with a violent Passion, desired of the Governor to send that Bishop into Banishment: But the Governor answered him, That he must first be condemned. And that Hosius being ready to pronounce the Sentence of Condemnation against him, he appealed to the Tribunal of Jesus Christ, and when Hosius was just beginning to pronounce the Sentence, he fell into Convulsions, and was cast down dead upon the Ground, or at least lost his Speech. This is what these two Luciferian Priests say of Hosius's End: But besides that this Relation is refuted by the positive Testimony of St. Athanasius, which is much more credible than theirs; it has all-over the Air of a Fable feign'd by Lucifer's Party, who please themselves, as is usual for the most part with those Devotee's that are too austere, with such kind of Tragical Stories that happen for the Punishment of some Crime. He lived almost 100 Years, and died in the year 358. St. Athanasius in his Letter to the Egyptians, which is called his first Discourse against the Arians, places Hosius in the number of those who had written against the Arians, but we have no more of him but that excellent Letter to Constantius, recited by St. Athanasius in his Letter to those that lived a Monastick Life; of which we have made an Extract, when we discoursed of the Works of St. Athanasius. Isidore of Sevil attributes also to Hosius a Letter to his Sister, in praise of Virginity; which was written, as he says, in a Stile very eloquent and polite: and moreover, he says, That he was the Author of a Part of the Canons of the Council of Sardica: Some also have said that he made the Nicene Creed, but without Ground.

Hosius.

We may joyn with Hosius, some Authors whereof St. Athanasius makes mention in his Letter to the Egyptians, who composed very Orthodox Books, which we have not at present, and whereof we have not so much as the Titles. These Authors are Maximinus, of France, Bishop of Triers, and his Successor Paulinus; Philogonus, of Antioch; Cyriacus of Mysia; Pistus and Aristeus, of Greece; Sylvester and Protogenes, of Dacia; Leontius and Eupsychius, of Cappadocia; Cæcilian, of Africk; Eustorgius, of Italy; Capito, of Sicily; Macarius, of Jerusalem; Alexander, of Constantinople; Pedarotus, of Heraclea; Meletius, Basil and Longinus, of Pontus and Armenia; Lupus and Appianus, of Cilicia. All these Bishops, and many others, composed Letters or Books, which were extant in St. Athanasius's time, but now we know nothing of them.

JULIUS.

Julius.

JUlius, was ordained Biſhop of Rome, in the year 334, or 335. He called a Council at Rome, in which St. Athanaſius was declared innocent; and wrote a Letter to the Biſhops of the Eaſt, of which we have given an Extract, when we gave an Account of the Works of St. Athanaſius. He ſent his Legates to the Council of Sardica, and wrote a Letter to thoſe of Alexandria, wherein he congratulates the Return of St. Athanaſius to them. Theſe two Letters are genuine, and are to be found in the Works of St. Athanaſius. The Eutychians have attributed to Pope Julius, a Letter concerning the Incarnation, addreſſed to one Dionyſius, which Gennadius believed to be truly his; though he obſerves, That though it might be uſeful in the time of this Pope, againſt thoſe that admitted two Perſons in Jeſus Chriſt; yet it proved pernicious after the Hereſie of Eutyches and Timotheus, which it very much favoured. But this Letter has been rejected by Hypatius, in a Conference at Conſtantinople, with the Acephali; by Facundus, B. I. Ch. 5. By Eulogius, in his third Diſcourſe; and by Leontius of Conſtantinople, Book of Sects, Ch. 8. who have all affirmed, That it was written by Apollinarius, and by the Eutychians, and falſly attributed to Pope Julius. There is another Letter of Julius, about the Incarnation, to Docius, which is alſo cited in the Council of Epheſus, Art. 1. Facundus has acknowledged it for genuine; and Vincentius Lirinenſis, ſays, that in that Council, the Faith of the Church, was confirmed by the Teſtimony of Pope Julius. Ephrem has alſo acknowledged it for genuine; as appears by an Extract out of his third Book of Laws, related by Photius. Anaſtaſius has cited it in his Collections about the Incarnation, as written by Acacius. Leontius only has rejected it in his Treatiſe of Sects, where he affirms, That 'tis the Work of Timotheus, a Diſciple of Apollinarius, as was proved then by many Copies. He adds, nevertheleſs, That 'tis not at all contrary to the Faith, and that 'tis no great matter whoſe it is. In ſhort, the ſame Leontius, affirms, That there were no Writings of Julius in his time (which muſt be underſtood with an Exception to thoſe that are extant in St. Athanaſius) and that the ſeven Epiſtles which bear his Name, were Apollinarius's. And truly, there is no probability, that Julius wrote Letters about the Incarnation at a Time when there was no Queſtion, but about the Trinity: Beſides, 'tis known, that the Eutychians, were wont to attribute the Works of Apollinarius, to the Fathers, who had the Reputation of Catholicks, as St. Athanaſius, St. Gregory, and St. Cyril, that ſo they might deceive the People, and engage them into their Hereſie.

Julius.

I ſay nothing of the two Decretal Epiſtles attributed to Pope Julius, becauſe they are plainly ſuppoſititious. This Pope died in the Year 352, and was ſucceeded by Liberius. The Author of Damaſus's Pontifical, Uſuardus, Ado, and ſome others, relate, That he was baniſhed for the ſpace of ten Months, till the Death of Conſtantius: But this cannot be maintained, for Julius never ſuffered any Perſecution, nor any Baniſhment, for the Defence of St. Athanaſius, ſince this Father ſays not one Word of it in his Books, who would never have failed to charge the Arians with the Baniſhment of Julius, as well as with that of Liberius, and other Biſhops of his Party.

ASTERIUS.

Aſterius.

ST. Jerome places this Arian Philoſopher among the Number of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, not becauſe he wrote a Book againſt the Faith of the Church about the Trinity, but becauſe of his Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Romans, upon the Goſpels, upon the Pſalms, and many other Books; which ſhews, that a Heretick may be placed amongſt Eccleſiaſtical Authors, when he writes ſuch learned Books as may be ſerviceable to the Church. St. Athanaſius gives a very different Character of this Aſterius from that which Euſebius had given of him in his Book againſt Marcellus. 'One Aſterius, ſays he, in his Book of 'the two Synods, a Sophiſt of Cappadocia, is a Partizan of 'the Euſebians; and when he could not enter into the Or'der of the Clergy, becauſe he had Sacrificed to Idols, du'ring the Perſecution of Maximian, he was adviſed to write 'a Book for the Opinions of Euſebius, the Impiety of which 'is equal to that of his Idolatry: For there he compares 'Jeſus Chriſt to a Locuſt, and a Worm of the Earth; nay, 'and ſeems to prefer theſe Inſects before him. He affirms, 'That the Word which is in Jeſus Chriſt, is different from 'the Word which created the World: He runs through 'all Syria, and enters into all the Churches by the favour 'of Euſebius's Recommendation, to teach others to deny 'Jeſus Chriſt. He inſolently oppoſes the Truth, and goes 'into thoſe places which are appointed only for the Cler'gy, and there he rehearſes very loudly, his impious Book. Thus St. Athanaſius deſcribes the Man and his Work. There are ſome Fragments preſerved in his Writings, which expreſly contain the impious Opinions of the Arians: I am only now to tell you, that this Aſterius, is different from the Biſhop of Amaſea.

Aſterius.

THEODORUS.

Theodorus.

THeodorus, Biſhop of Perinthus, a City of Thrace, which was alſo called Heraclea, was a Biſhop of the Euſebian Party. St. Athanaſius in his Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt, places him among the number of thoſe that were condemned, being Prieſts, and afterwards promoted to Epiſcopal Dignity by the Intrigues of the Arians. He aſſiſted at the Council of Tyre, and was one of the Deputies that were ſent to Mareotis, to inform againſt St. Athanaſius. He aſſiſted alſo at the Council of Antioch, and came to that of Sardica, and having retired from thence with the Biſhops of the Eaſt; he was Depoſed and Excommunicated in a Synod of the Weſtern Biſhops. St. Jerome and Theodoret, teſtify, that he was very learned, and compoſed in the Reign of the Emperor Conſtantius, very elegant and clear Commentaries upon the Goſpels of St. Matthew, and St. John; upon the Epiſtles of St. Paul, and the Pſalms, in which he endeavours, particularly to explain the Hiſtorical ſenſe of them. We have in the Catena upon St. Matthew, publiſhed by Corderius, and printed at Antwerp, in the Year 1642, ſome Fragments attributed to this Theodorus: But one cannot be certain upon the Credit of this Catena, that they are truly his.

Theodorus.

TRYPHILIUS.

Tryphilius.

TRyphilius, Biſhop of a City in the Iſle of Cyprus, called Ledra, was, according to St. Jerome, one of the moſt eloquent Writers of his Age; and was in great Reputation under the Reign of Conſtantius. St. Jerome had read his Commentary upon the Canticles, and ſays, That he wrote many other Books that never came to his Hands.

Tryphilius.

HELIODORUS.

Heliodorus.

GEnnadius informs us of this Author, in this manner. 'Heliodorus a Prieſt, has written a Book of the na'ture of Principles, wherein he ſhews, That there 'is but one Principle only; That there is nothing 'Eternal, but God; That God is not the Author of Evil; 'That all he does, is good: That he created the Matter 'which the Malice of Men makes uſe of to do Evil; That 'nothing was created without him, and that he having fore'ſeen that Nature would become ſubject to Corruption by 'Sin, he forewarned Man of this Puniſhment.

I have read nothing elſe that concerns this Author. Gennadius places him among thoſe Writers that lived in the time of Conſtantius.

Heliodorus.

DONA-

DONATUS, and Vitellius and Macrobius his Disciples.

Dona. and Vitell. and Macrob.

ST. Jerome places among the Number of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, Donatus, Head of the Party of the Donatiſts, in Africa; which in all probability is to be underſtood of the Biſhop of Carthage (a). He ſays, That he wrote many Books concerning his own Sect; and a Book of the Holy Spirit, whoſe Doctrine was agreeable to that of the Arians. St. Auguſtine has wrote a Book againſt a Letter of this Donatus (b), and he aſſures us in his Book of Hereſies, That he was an eloquent Writer. Gennadius mentions two other Authors of the ſame Party: The firſt is Vitellius, who wrote, ſays he, a Book to defend his Party, upon this Argument, That the Servants of God are hated of the World. This Book (adds he) contained excellent Doctrine, if he had not treated the Catholicks as Perſecutors. He has written alſo againſt the Gentiles, and againſt the Catholicks, who, as he pretends, baſely betrayed the Holy Books in the time of Perſecution. There are ſome other Writings of his, which concern the Diſcipline of the Church. He flouriſhed under Conſtans, the Son of Conſtantine.

Dona. and Vitell. and Macrob.

The ſecond is Macrobius, a Donatiſt Prieſt, who is mentioned in the Writings of Optatus (c), who was afterwards ſent to Rome, to be Biſhop there of thoſe of his Party. He wrote before his Separation, a Book directed to Confeſſors and Virgins; which is a Book of Morality, and contains very uſeful Inſtructions, chiefly, to teach one to live in Inviolable Chaſtity. He flouriſhed in Africa, among the Catholicks, and at Rome among the Donatiſts.

(a) Which is to be underſtood of the Biſhop of Carthage.] There were two Donati of the ſame Party, as St. Auſtin obſerves, B. I. Retract. ch. 12. The firſt was Donatus Biſhop of Caſa nigra, or Calame, who never was Biſhop of Carthage, whatever Albaſpinæus ſays, and the ſecond Donatus was Succeſſor to Majorinus, againſt whom St. Auſtin wrote a Book, called a Diſcourſe againſt the Epiſtle of Donatus; which was written by the latter Donatus, for he compoſed that Epiſtle which St. Auſtin refutes; and confirmed the Faction of the Donatiſts by his Eloquence.

(b) St. Auguſtine has wrote a Book againſt a Letter of this Donatus.] Lib. I. Retract. ch. 21. I have written, ſays he, a Book againſt the Epiſtle of Donatus, who was Biſhop of Carthage, next after Majorinus, wherein he pretends, that the Baptiſm of Jeſus Chriſt is not valid out of his own Communion.

(c) Who is mentioned in the Writings of Optatus.] B. II. p. 37. Ye ſay, ſays he, ſpeaking to the Donatiſts, That ye have many of your Party in the City of Rome; This is a Branch of your Error, which proceeds from a Lye, and cannot come from the Root of Truth: And if it be demanded of Macrobius, what See he belongs to, he may ſay that he belongs to the Chair of St. Peter, which perhaps he never ſaw. How can he enter into the Church where the Sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul are? Did he ever offer to do it?

St. ANTHONY.

St. Anthony.

ST. Anthony, who was the firſt Inſtitutor of a Monaſtick Life, was born towards the year 250, in Egypt: His Parents, who were Chriſtians, and very conſiderable for their Nobility, took great care to educate him in Piety: He was not inſtructed in human Learning, neither had he any Commerce with the World. His Father and Mother dying when he was but eighteen years old, left great Riches to him and his Siſter: But a little after, he took up a Reſolution of forſaking the World entirely; and then he diſtributed his Inheritance to his Neighbours, ſold his Moveables, and gave the Price of them to the Poor, and ſo retired into a ſolitary Place towards the year 270. The firſt place of his Retreat, was a Cell near his own Village, and after that, he ſhut himſelf up in a Sepulchre that was more remote; but at laſt, he paſſed over the Nile, and retired into the Ruins of an old Caſtle, where he ſtayed near twenty years. But he was forced to come forth from thence, towards the year 305, to govern thoſe that came to put themſelves under his Conduct. About this time, the Number of thoſe that followed him, encreaſing daily, ſeveral Monaſtries were begun to be built in the Deſarts, to which St. Anthony was as a Father. His Charity obliged him to go out of his Solitude, during the Perſecution of Maximinus, and to come to the City of Alexandria, that he might aſſiſt the Chriſtians which ſuffered for Jeſus Chriſt. But the Perſecution was no ſooner ended, but he returned to his Monaſtry, where he betook himſelf to his former Exerciſes, and wrought many Miracles, for delivering thoſe that were poſſeſſed, and curing thoſe that were ſick. But theſe extraordinary Actions drawing after him a great multitude of Perſons, who troubled his Retirement; he withdrew to the remoteſt Part of the Mountains, and there built a Cell, or a little Monaſtry upon Mount Colzim, about a Day's Journey from the Red-Sea. He lived long in this Solitude, out of which he went nevertheleſs from time to time to viſit his former Diſciples, who looked upon him always as their Father. In a word, after he had acquired an immortal Fame here on Earth, he went to receive the Reward of his Labours in Heaven, in the 19th. year of the Reign of Conſtantius, i. e. in the year 356, being the 105th. year of his Age.

Theſe are the principal Circumſtances of the Life of St. Anthony, taken out of the Hiſtory of his Life, attributed to St. Athanaſius, which one may read if he has a mind to know thoſe things more particularly. But this is not the Place to inſiſt upon them, for we conſider him neither as a Monk, nor as a Saint, but only as a Writer. And one may ſay, with all the Reſpect that is due to him, That in this Capacity, he was much leſs famous, and leſs known; for as he had not ſtudied at all, ſo he could not undertake to write any great Books; but the quickneſs of his Wit, might furniſh him with Pieces of leſs Conſequence, ſuch as Letters, Exhortations and Anſwers, ſo that no Writings but of theſe ſorts are attributed to him.

St. Jerome, ſays, That he wrote in the Egyptian Tongue, ſeven Letters to ſeveral Monaſtries, which come near, ſays he, to the Opinions of the Apoſtles, and their manner of Writing; and theſe have been tranſlated into Greek, but we have nothing of them at preſent, but a Latin Verſion, which is attributed to one Sarraſius. The Firſt of theſe Letters is, concerning Vocation; the Second, concerning the Snares of the Devil, and the means of avoiding them; the Third is, concerning the Bleſſings of God towards Mankind; the Fourth, concerning the Incarnation of Jeſus Chriſt; the Fifth, concerning Chriſtian Vigilance; the Sixth concerning the Knowledge of one's ſelf, and the Neceſſity of the Incarnation; the Seventh and Laſt, is alſo concerning the Knowledge of our ſelves; and he Concludes with an Advertiſement againſt Arius. Of theſe Letters, there are Six addreſs'd to the Arſinoïtes, (i. e. to the Monks of one of his Monaſtries, which was at Arſinoe) tho' St. Jerome ſpeaks but of one that was directed to them. Theſe are all written with much Candor; the Thoughts and Expreſſions indeed are ſomething elevated, but the Air is ſimple and without Ornament. There a Man may find a great deal of Piety, and many Excellent Counſels, eſpecially for thoſe perſons that make profeſſion of a Monaſtick Life. In ſhort, 'Tis obvious to every one that reads them, that the Writer was a much better Chriſtian, than a Scribe; one that underſtood better the Maxims of Chriſtianity, than the Precepts of Eloquence, and was much more fill'd with the Unction of the Holy One, than with Human Science and Learning.

St. Anthony.

St. Athanaſius, or the Author of the Life of St. Anthony, which is attributed to this Father, ſets down a long Exhortation of St. Anthony to his Monks, which contains many Inſtructions very uſeful for them, and wholeſome Advices about the Temptations of the Devil. There are alſo found in this Writing, ingenious Anſwers of the ſame Saint to the Philoſophers, and ſome other Perſons, and a Letter to the Emperor.

There is moreover a ſhort Rule attributed to St. Anthony, ſet down in the Collection of Rules made by St. Benedictus Anianenſis, who liv'd towards the Year 820, from the birth of Chriſt, which contains many Moral Precepts, and preſcribes ſome Monaſtical Obſervations. Beſides theſe, Gerard Voſſius has given us under the Name of St. Anthony, a Sermon, which is a Declamation againſt the Vices and Exceſſes of the Men of the World, at the End of which he Exhorts Men to do Penance, by repreſenting unto them the Judgment of God, and the Pains which the damned ſuffer after the Reſurrection. 'Tis hard to ſay, whether this Diſcourſe be truly St. Anthony's, or whether it be only put out under his Name, as a Diſcourſe that would agree exactly to one ſo retir'd from the World as he was. Be that as it will, it has much of the Stile of this Saint's Letters, though more Elegant and Sublime.

Laſtly, There were two Books of Latin Sermons, attributed to St. Anthony in the time of Trithemius; but now all the Criticks agree, that they are none of his; neither can be, ſince they cite St. Baſil, St. Gregory Nyſſen, St. Chryſoſtom, St. Nilus and Photius, Authors that liv'd and wrote after St. Anthony. The Letters of St. Anthony were printed apart, and are ſince inſerted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum. His Rule is in Benedictus Anianenſis's Code, publiſh'd by Holſtenius, from the Copy of Manuſcript; (which was in the Monaſtry of St. Maximin, near Triers) [at Rome in 1661.] and reprinted in Quarto at Paris, by Billaine in 1663.

St. PACHOMIUS.

St. Pachomius.

THough St. Anthony was the Inſtitutor of a Monaſtick Life, yet St. Pachomius ought to be conſider'd as the Author of a Cœnobitick Life, becauſe he was the firſt that appointed regulated Societies. He was Born in Thebais, of Gentile Parents, and did for ſome time bear Arms in the War of Conſtantine againſt Maxentius. When this War was ended, he, who had been always a Chriſtian in his Heart, was baptiz'd, and retir'd with an Hermit nam'd Palemon, under whoſe Conduct he led a very auſtere Life. He ſtay'd afterward in Tabenna, a Country of Egypt, ſituated on the Brink of the Nile in the Dioceſs of Tentyra, where he Founded a Monaſtry, in Obedience, as is believ'd, to the Admonition of an Angel, and in Conformity to a Rule, which he is thought to have received from it. Be this as it will, (for though this Story be related by many Authors, I do not think that any Man is abſolutely oblig'd to believe it:) Be this as it will, I ſay, the Monaſtry which he Founded in Tabenna, was fill'd in a very little time, and he was oblig'd to build many more of them; ſo that he peopl'd all the Upper Thebais with Monaſtries of his Order. 'Tis reported in the Greek Acts of his Life, publiſh'd not long ſince in the great Collection of the Lives of the Saints by Bollandus and Papebrochius, that he was accus'd at a Synod of Dioſpolis, becauſe he Divin'd the moſt ſecret Thoughts of Men; but he was Abſolv'd by the ſame Synod. where were two of his Diſciples, after he declar'd that God of his Grace reveal'd to him the moſt hidden things. He died about the Year 400. We have in the Life of St. Pachomius a Rule which is thought to have been given him by the Angels; but there is another alſo which bears the Name of this holy Abbot, in the Collection of the Oriental Rules, in the Bibliothecæ Patrum, and at the End of ſome Editions of Caſſian, which is much larger, and ſeems to have been drawn up at different times. It contains many Rules concerning the Habits, the Diet, the Employments and the Diſcipline of Monks: 'Tis thought to have been tranſlated by St. Jerome, and there is at the beginning, a Letter which imitates the Stile of this Father well enough. There are alſo ſome Moral Precepts publiſh'd under his Name, by Gerard Voſſius, printed at Mentz in the Year 1604. And in Benedictus Anianenſis's Collection, there are Eleven Letters (a) of the ſame Author, written with much Simplicity, which are cited by Gennadius; and a Letter of Theodorus his Diſciple, concerning Eaſter. Gennadius calls St. Pachomius a Man truly Apoſtolical in his Diſcourſes and Actions: His Rule is very Judicious, and comes down to all the Particulars neceſſary for the Government of a Monaſtry.

St. Pachomius.

(a) Eleven Letters.] Theſe were written, as Gennadius obſerves, to the Superiors of the Monaſtries of his Community, who are deſign'd by the Letters of the Alphabet; there is One to the Abbot Hyrus, One to the Abbot Cornelius, One to all the Superiors, to advertiſe them to come and Celebrate the Feaſt of Eaſter, at a Monaſtry call'd in the Egyptian Tongue Baum, and this is cited by St. Cyril of Alexandria, in a Letter cited by Bucherius: There is another to the ſame perſons, giving them notice to meet on the Day of Remiſſion, i. e. at the General Chapter, which was held in the Month of Auguſt; and another to the Brethren, who were gone out of the Monaſtry to Work.

ORSIESIS.

Orſieſis.

Orſieſis was Succeſſor to Pachomius after Petronius, who govern'd the Monaſtry of Tabenna but a few days. He has written a Spiritual Treatiſe of the Doctrine or Inſtitution of Monks, which he left when he was Dying to the Religious of his Monaſtry. 'Tis an Exhortation that he made to them to Watch over themſelves, and to diſcharge their Duties exactly, and is fill'd with many Paſſages of Scripture, which he applies to his Subjects very properly. Upon this account 'twas that Gennadius ſaid that this Treatiſe was ſeaſon'd with Divine Salt, Divino ſale conditus. 'Twas printed apart by Gymnicus at Cologne in the Year 1536. and afterwards inſerted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum. 'Tis found alſo in Benedictus Anianenſis's Code, that was publiſh'd by Holſtenius.

Orſieſis.

THEODORUS.

Theodorus.

THeodorus a Presbyter, one of the Principal Diſciples of St. Pachomius, and his Succeſſor in the Government of the Abby of Tabenna, if we believe Gennadius, wrote Letters to other Monaſtries, which are almoſt wholly made up of Paſſages of Scripture: and yet there he often mentions his Maſter St. Pachomius, and propoſes his Example and Doctrine for their Inſtruction. He admoniſhes alſo ſome Religious to continue with Zeal in their Vocation, and exhorts thoſe that were ſeparated from the Society of others to a Re-Union. Gennadius ſays, that there were three Letters on this Subject, but we have only one Extant, which concerns the Aſſembly of Monks at Eaſter, and that, as we have already ſaid, is in the Abbot of Anian's Code.

Theodorus.

The MACARII.

The Macarii.

THere are ſeveral Hermits of this Name, that liv'd much about the ſame time, and who are eaſily confounded, if one does not take heed. The Firſt is he that dwelt in the Deſart of Sceta, and liv'd in the time of St. Pachomius and Orſieſis, and was Evagrius's Maſter: He was an Abbot in Egypt, and his Feaſt is kept on the 15th. of January: He was call'd the Young Old-Man, πρεσβυγενης, becauſe he had in his Youth the Judgment and Gravity of an Old-man. The Second Macarius, Abbot in Thebais, was the Diſciple of St. Pachomius, and his Feaſt is kept on the 12th. of January. 'Tis commonly believed, That the Firſt of theſe Macarii was the Diſciple and Interpreter of St. Anthony, mention'd by St. Jerome in the Life of Paul the Hermit: But Poſſinus the Jeſuit maintains with great probability, that the Diſciple of St. Anthony was different from both theſe two; and he proves it, becauſe he was one of theſe two Diſciples, who ſtay'd with St. Anthony in his Solitude Fifteen Years, and interr'd him; which cannot be ſaid of the Firſt Macarius, who died in 390, after he had been 60 Years a Monk of Sceta.

There is yet a 4th. Macarius, a Monk as well as the other three, but Younger than they, who wrote at Rome about the beginning of the 5th. Century, a Treatiſe againſt the Mathematicians. This is he to whom Ruffinus addreſs'd his Apology for Origen, and of whom St. Jerome ſays to Ruffinus in his 2d. Apology, If you had not come from the Eaſt, this able Man had been ſtill among the number of Mathematicians; And in his 16th. Letter, He had been Truly Macarius, that is to ſay, Bleſſed, if he had not met with ſuch a Maſter. There are many Books which bear the Name of Macarius, and 'tis not known to which of the three they belong. Theſe are, Firſt, Fifty Greek Homilies, tranſlated by Picus, printed at Paris in Octavo in the Year 1559, and printed ſince in Folio in the Year 1623, with St. Gregory Thaumaturgus. There is alſo an Edition in Octavo, printed at Francfort in 1594, with the Tranſlation of Zacharias Palthenius, and they are inſerted into the Bibliothecæ Patrum. Secondly, ſeven Tracts, publiſh'd in Greek and Latin by the Jeſuit Poſſinus, in his Book, entituled, Theſaurus Aſceticus, or the Aſcetical Treaſure, printed at Tholouſe in the Year 1684. Thirdly, a Rule publiſh'd by Roverius from a Manuſcript of the Abby of Becco, and in the Collection of the Abbot of Anian; where there is alſo another Rule written by way of Dialogue between Serapion, Paphnutius, and the two Macarii, which had been before publiſh'd at the End of Caſſian, in the Antwerp Edition of the Year 1578.

The Macarii.

Gennadius aſſures us, that Macarius the Egyptian, i. e. the Elder, who was a Monk of Sceta, wrote only one Letter to the young Monks, wherein he teaches that Man can perfectly ſerve God, when knowing his Nature, he does voluntarily embrace all ſorts of Labour, and reſiſts all that is moſt Charming in this Life, to try the Aids that God has given him;

The Macarii.

him; and in short, when by keeping himself pure, he arrives to that degree of Continence, that it becomes as it were natural to him. The Subject of this Letter comes near to those Principles which are found in the Tracts and Greek Sermons that bear the Name of Macarius; which would make me believe that they were his, if Gennadius had not assur'd us, that Macarius the Egyptian wrote but one Letter only, which he mentions. We must therefore say, either that Gennadius was mistaken, or that he intended another Macarius; or lastly, That the Author of these Works, was that Macarius, who was the Disciple and Interpreter of St. Anthony, supposing with Possinus, that he was not Macarius the Egyptian.

However, the 50 Homilies appear to me to be very Antient; they are Exhortations to the Religious, and not Sermons to the People. The first contains an Allegorical Explication of the Vision of the Cherubims related by Ezekiel, which he applies to the state of Man's Soul in this Life. The 2d. is of the Kingdom of Darkness; that is to say, of Sin; from which he maintains, that Man could not be deliver'd but by the Grace of Jesus Christ, and by the Gifts of the Holy Spirit. In the 3d. he recommends to the Brethren to live in Peace, not to condemn one another; to pray continually, and to purifie their outward Man by fighting against the Temptations of the Flesh and the Devil. He says in this Homily, That 'tis in our power to resist and fight, but God only can pluck up Sin by the Roots; And that as a Man cannot See without Light, speak without a Tongue, Hear without Ears, Walk without Feet, Labour without Hands; no more can a Man be sav'd without Jesus Christ. In the 4th. he shews, That in order to Improvement in Virtue, we must renounce the World, that we may obtain the Love of the Holy Spirit, which is absolutely necessary for the Sanctification of Mankind. He teaches in this Homily, That Angels and Souls are very thin and subtile Bodies, which was an Error very common among the Antient Monks. In the 5th. he describes the difference between the Life of this World and that of Christians. The 6th. is of Prayer, where he says, That it should be made in silence, with Peace and Tranquility; That we must not throw forth confused Cries, but having God before our Eyes, we must pray with Attention, and with a Mind full of holy Thoughts. At the end of this Exhortation, there are are two Questions and Answers touching some passages concerning the Incarnation of Jesus Christ. The 7th. and 8th. are Questions and Answers about many Difficulties. All which shew, that these are not Homilies to the People, but the Exhortation of an Abbot to his Regulars, who had propos'd to him the Difficulties they might meet with, to be resolv'd in them. There are some of these Questions more curious than solid, and the Answers are often very Mystical. Those of the 8th. are about Prayer. In the 9th. he shews, that none can deliver himself from Temptations, but by fixing his Mind entirely upon God. In the 10th. he says, That though a Man be improv'd in Virtue, yet he ought to consider himself as one that has done nothing, and then he ought to reach forth after God with greater fervour, lest he lose the Holy Spirit by Pride or Laziness. The 11th. and 12th. contain very obscure Reflexions concerning the Fall of Mankind, and the Mercies of Jesus Christ; and in the latter part there are Questions and Answers of very little use. In the 13th he says, That since the coming of Jesus Christ, God requires of Men greater Holiness than before. In the 14th. he discourses of the Reward of Christians. The 15th. has no particular Subject. It begins with a Reflexion upon the Obligation that lies upon Christians to honour Jesus Christ with Purity and Faithfulness: and after this it contains many Questions, whereof the First is concerning the Resurrection; viz. If a Man shall rise with all his Members; and the rest concerning Concupiscence, and the Inclination to Sin, that is found in all Men. He is of opinion, That 'tis a kind of Fire kindled in a Man, which inflames, as one may say, all his Parts; That a Man may resist it, but that to do it aright, he must watch continually over himself, and always fight against it. He says, That those who resist their Passions, receive the Holy Spirit, and the Grace which Jesus Christ has merited for them; but they ought to take good heed, that they be not lifted up with Pride, and that they continue in Humility and Contempt of themselves, as being accountable to Jesus Christ for the Grace they have received; and capable of falling from that State of Holiness in which they are, unless they preserve themselves in it, by the virtue of Humility, which he calls the Sign and infallible Mark of a Christian. In the 16th. he says, That a Man ought always to live in Fear, because he is always expos'd to Temptations; That even those that have not yet received Grace, ought so to behave themselves, as to do Good and forsake Evil by Natural Motives; but those who have receiv'd it, need not such kind of Motives, because this Grace producing Love in their Hearts, makes that become sweet and pleasant, which appear'd rough and uneasie, and makes that appear easie which was thought before to be impossible. In the 17th. he treats of the Spiritual Unction, and the state of the more Perfect Christians, and makes it appear, that notwithstanding any Holiness they have acquired, they ought always to fear, because they are always in a Capacity of falling away. In the 18th. he declares the marvellous Effects of the Gifts of the Holy Spirit in the Soul of a Spiritual Man. In the 19th. he explains the degrees through which a Man ought to pass to acquire perfection; That he ought first to use his utmost natural endeavours to do good, and then God seeing him strive after this manner, gives him the grace of Prayer, by which means he obtains all Virtues. In the 20th. he says, That none but Jesus Christ can cure the Soul that is wounded by the Sin of Adam, and therefore we must address our selves to him by Prayer, that he would give us his Grace. The 21st. is of the War that Men are obliged to make against their Vices and their Passions. In the 22d. he describes the terrible difference between the latter End of the Just and the Wicked; and says, that at the hour of Death the Souls of the Just are received by Angels and conducted to the Lord; but those of the Wicked are encompassed by Devils, who draw them down with themselves to Hell. The 23d. is of the Victory which a Christian ought to gain over his Passions. The 24th. is of the Necessity of the Grace and Influence of the Holy Spirit, to make us capable and worthy of Eternal Life. He continues the same subject in the 25th. wherein, after he has prov'd, that we cannot shun all the occasions of Sin, nor resist all our Passions, without the assistance of the Grace of Jesus Christ, he makes a lively Representation of the state of the Men of this World, and describes the wonderful Effects which the Cœlestial Fire of the Holy Spirit produces in our Souls. The 26th. contains many Questions and Answers, concerning the Temptations of the Devil and the effects of Grace. The Author there teaches, That Man is restored to his Primitive Dignity by the Holy Spirit; that the Devil cannot tempt us any further, than God permits him; That Grace changes the Affections of the Heart; That the Devil knows some part of our Thoughts, but there are others unknown to him; That Grace and Charity have no bounds, and we ought never to say that we have arrived at the highest degree of Perfection; That the Soul goes immediately after Death to that place on which its Love was placed during this Life; That the good which may be done by Natural Strength, can never save a Man, without the Grace of Jesus Christ; That we ought always to attribute to him all the good we do, and to say, If God had not assisted us, we should neither have Fasted, nor Prayed, nor forsaken the World: And that God seeing us attribute to him the Actions which may be done by our Natural Powers, has liberally bestow'd upon us the Spiritual, Heavenly, and Divine Gifts of his Grace; That the Actions which are done without Grace, may be Good, but they are not perfect. In the 27th. after he has first considered the Dignity of a Christian, he then Answers to many Questions about the Effects of Grace: He says, that no Man shall ever arrive at the Top of Perfection in this World; That whatever state they are in, whatever Grace they have, they are always capable of sinning; That the strongest Grace does not hinder the Will from following after Evil, because the Nature of Man, as long as he is in this World, is changeable, and that though God has bestowed very singular Grace upon Christians, they ought nevertheless to work out their own Salvation with Fear and Trembling. In the 28th. he deplores the state of that Soul where Jesus Christ dwells not at all, because of Sin. In the 29th. he says, that God gives his Grace after two different manners; That he prevents some with it before they have us'd their own endeavours, and bestows it upon others after they have laboured a long time; and then shews what Reason we have to admire the Goodness and Wisdom of the Divine Conduct both towards the one and the other. In the 30th. he shews, That if the Holy Spirit does not produce within us the Love of God, we cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. In the 31st. He exhorts Men to Prayer, That they may obtain the change and renovation of their Heart. In the 32d. he says, that we cannot certainly know whether we be in a state of Grace as long as we are in this World, because we are always tormented with the Motions of Lust, but at the Day of Judgment, those who belong to God shall be made known. The 33d. is of the Attention and Fervour we ought to have in Prayer. The 34th. is of Eternal Glory. The 35th. is of the state of a Soul which God has delivered from Evil Thoughts, which he calls a new Sabbath. The 36th. is of their different degrees of Glory, who shall rise again from the Dead. In the 37th. he proves, that many who have thought themselves Just, were not really so; and that those who believed themselves to be arrived at the highest degree of Perfection, have oftentimes fall'n into Sin. I pass over the 38th. because that is entire among the little Tracts of Mark the Hermit. In the 39th. he says, 'Tis to no purpose to read the Scripture, if we make no Improvement by it. In the 40th. he proves, That there is a concatenation of Virtues one with another, and that there is the same in Vices: He answers also three Questions, and in his Answers, he says, That there are different degrees of Damnation, and that greater Sinners shall be more punished, than those that have not committed so great Crimes; That the quiet State of ſome Souls does not hinder them from exerciſing Charity; That Grace and an Inclination to Sin may be found together in one and the ſame Soul at the ſame time. In the 41ſt. he deſcribes the Improvements of Grace in a Soul, and makes it appear, that none can preſerve this Diſpoſition of growing in Grace without Humility. In the 42d. he ſays, that nothing but the Actions of Men can be hurtful or uſeful unto them. In the 43d. he ſpeaks of the different Improvements of thoſe that ſtrive againſt Sin, but 'tis ſo obſcure, that hardly any thing can be underſtood in it. The 44th. is of the Change that Jeſus Chriſt wrought in us, and the manner how he heals our Souls: He continues the ſame Subject in the following Homily, and explains by many Compariſons, the Union of the Soul with God. In the 46th. he ſays, That a ſick Soul may have recourſe to a Phyſician, to pray and requeſt his Help, and when the Heavenly Phyſician comes to its aſſiſtance, he joyns himſelf to it, to enlighten and conduct it, and make it his Spouſe. The 47th. contains many Allegorical Explications of the Law of Moſes, which he applies to the different States of the Soul. In the 48th. he ſays, That thoſe who have a true Faith of Heavenly Things, ought not to have their Affections fixed on things of this Earth; and that thoſe who retire from the World, ought not to be ſollicitous or anxious about the things thereof: In ſhort, he would not have the Monks to make uſe of any Medicines to help them in their Diſeaſes, but to put their whole truſt in Jeſus Chriſt. In the 49th. he ſhews, that it is not enough to have abandoned the World, but we muſt alſo ardently ſeek after Eternal Happineſs. In the 50th. and laſt, he obſerves, That God was the cauſe of all the Miracles which the Saints wrought, and from this remark he draws a Moral Reflection, that we cannot command the Devil but by the Aſſiſtance of God, and the Power of the Holy Spirit. He adds, That he that conſiders his Infirmity, his Weakneſs and Wounds, and does not withal conſider the Aids of the Holy Spirit which ſtrengthens him, is an Indiſcreet Man: And on the contrary, He that ſo much thinks upon the Divine Aids as to forget his own Weakneſs, and ſo fancies that he can never fall, does miſerably deceive himſelf. After this manner does this Author always reconcile theſe two Fundamental Doctrines of Grace and Free-Will, that we ought always ſo to labour, as if the whole depended upon our own Endeavours, and yet to acknowledge that we can do nothing without God. And if Men had always contented themſelves with this ſimplicity without nice Philoſophical Enquiries, How many Queſtions had been ended without Noiſe! How many Differences compoſed! What Diſputes had been Aboliſhed! What Arguments Superſeded! How many Books had been ſtifled! But to return to our Author; there are beſides Seven Spiritual Treatiſes of his, which have been publiſhed in Greek and Latin by Poſſinus: The 1ſt. is concerning Watching over our Heart; The 2d. Of Perfection of Mind; the 3d. Of Prayer; The 4th. Of Patience and Diſcretion; The 5th. Of the Elevation of the Mind; The 6th. Of Charity; The 7th. Of the Freedom of the Spirit; and Apothegms of the Fathers. 'Tis plain, that the Author of the 50 Homilies is the Author of theſe Treatiſes; for there is the ſame Genius in them both. He has the ſame Notions, and the ſame Stile. He diſcourſes after the ſame manner of Grace and Free-will, and he maintains in theſe Seven Treatiſes, as well as the Author of the Homilies, That Angels and Souls are Bodies. But 'tis not ſo certain that theſe are the Works of Macarius the Diſciple of St. Anthony; and I think 'tis more probable, that they were made by a later Monk. Whoever was the Author, his Stile is ſimple, and one may ſee that he was a Good Hermit, who ſpeaks from his Heart without Affectation and Ornament, and oftentimes even without Order. He allegorizes all, and expreſſes a great many myſtical Thoughts which are very hardly intelligible, and for the moſt part makes uſe of Compariſons which are not juſt and fit. In a Word, ſome things have eſcap'd which cannot altogether be reconciled to good Senſe; ſo difficult a thing it is in Spiritual Matters not to wander ſometimes!

The Macarii.

The Rules which bear the Name of Macarius, are of another Author; Thoſe that are found under the Name of Macarius only, in Benedictus Anianenſis's Code, are attributed to Macarius of Alexandria, i. e. the Abbot of Nitria, Diſciple of St. Pachomius, and Maſter of Evagrius. There is a certain paſſage in them which ſeems to be taken out of St. Jerome's Letter to Ruſticus, which makes me think, either that this was added, or that St. Jerome imitated St. Macarius. However, this Rule is antient, and is cited by the Author of the Life of St. Philibert, who ſays, that this Saint read the Rules of St. Macarius, St. Benedict and St. Columbanus. The other Rule which is found in the ſame Code, compoſed by the two Macarii, St. Serapion, and St. Paphnutius, is made in the Form of a Dialogue, and probably is nothing elſe, but ſome Conferences of theirs, which ſome Monks had gather'd together: as the two Rules which follow in the ſame Code, are a Collection of the Speeches of 34 Abbots. There is alſo found a Rule in the ſame Code which bears the Name of the Abbot Iſaiah, which is proper for Hermits, and eſpecially younger Regulars. 'Tis full of Moral Precepts, and therefore had the Title of, The Precepts and Advices of the Abbot Iſaiah. This Abbot is probably he Whom Ruffinus and Palladius mention and calls the Abbot of Syria. There are alſo under the Name of the ſame Iſaiah, ſome Remarks upon a Religious Life, publiſhed by Poſſinus. At the ſame Time there lived one Mark, a Hermit, who dwelt in the Deſart of the Cells, and lived almoſt an Hundred Years, to whom ſome Books are attributed, which probably belong to another Mark who lived long after.

I ſhall ſay nothing at preſent of the Diſcourſes, the Anſwers, and Admonitions of the other Hermits of this time, becauſe they may be ſeen in Ruffinus, Palladius, and other Authors who have written their Lives.

SERAPION Biſhop of Thmuis.

Serapion Biſhop of Thmuis.

WE muſt not confound this Serapion, whom we now write of, with the famous Serapion Abbot in the Territory of Arſinoe, though he was a Monk and Abbot as well as the other; but this Serapion was Ordain'd towards the Year 340 Biſhop of Thmuis a City of Egypt, in the province of Sceta, by St. Athanaſius, as we find in his Epiſtle to Dracontius. St. Jerome ſays, That this Biſhop deſerved the Name of a Scholar becauſe of his Eloquence; that he was St. Anthony's Friend, and had the honour to be a Confeſſor under Conſtantius, that is to ſay, to ſuffer for the Defence of the Faith of the Council of Nice, and the Innocence of St. Athanaſius. 'Tis probable, that 'tis he, whoſe Name is read among the Subſcriptions of the Letter from the Council of Sardica. 'Tis he alſo who wrote to St. Athanaſius about the Death of Arius, as we learn by the Anſwer of this Father, which is directed to him. St. Jerome ſays, that he Wrote a Book againſt the Manichees, a Treatiſe of the Titles of the Pſalms, and many very uſeful Letters: we have no more extant, but his Treatiſe againſt the Manichees, publiſhed by Caniſius, wherein he proves, That Vice or Evil, is not a Subſtance, and that our Nature is not Evil of it ſelf: Which he proves chiefly, becauſe many very wicked Perſons do afterwards become very Pious and Virtuous. This is the Subject of this little Treatiſe. The Arguments in it are very Solid, but the Stile is very Simple and without Art.

EUSEBIUS EMISENUS.

Euſebius Emiſenus.

THis Euſebius, was of Edeſſa, a City of Meſopotamia, of a Conſiderable Family. He had Learned from his Infancy the Holy Scriptures according to the Cuſtom of his Country, and then he ſtudied the Greek and Human Learning, and came to Paleſtine to perfect himſelf in the knowledge of the Scripture; he was the Diſciple of Euſebius of Caſarea, and of Patrophilus of Scythopolis. The Euſebians would have choſen him Biſhop of Antioch, after the Depoſition of Euſtathius; and afterwards would have placed him in the See of Alexandria, in the room of St. Athanaſius, but he would not accept of theſe conteſted Biſhopricks. He was afterwards Ordained Biſhop of Emeſa, near Mount Libanus, but the People made ſo great Reſiſtance againſt him, that he was forced to retire to Laodicea, where he was well received by George, Biſhop of that Church, who re-eſtabliſhed him in Emeſa. He was very dear to Conſtantius, who carried him with him, to the Perſian War. He died in the Year 359. when his Succeſſor, Paul of Emeſa, aſſiſted at the Council of Seleucia, as we learn from St. Epiphanius. He is placed in ſome Martyrologies, among the number of Saints. St. Jerome, gives this account of the Writings of this Biſhop: 'Euſebius, Biſhop 'of Emeſa, who was well skilled in Rhetorick, and had 'the Air of an Orator, wrote an infinite number of Books; 'he applyed himſelf chiefly, to give the Hiſtorical Senſe of 'Scripture; And therefore thoſe who would learn to Preach, 'read his Books with great Attention.' His principle Pieces were againſt the Jews, againſt the Gentiles, againſt the Novatians, Two Books of Commentaries upon the Epiſtle to the Galatians, and many ſhort Homilies upon the Goſpels. Theodoret, has preſerv'd in his third Dialogue, Two Fragments, to prove that the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt did not ſuffer, which are taken out of ſome of thoſe Books that we have already ſpoken of; and there are in the Greek Catena's upon the Scriptures, Scriptures, several Fragments which are attributed to Eusebius of Emesa. The Homilies which we have at present under his Name, are none of his, though they are cited under his Name in the Eleventh Century, by Guitmondus, and in the Twelfth, by Gratian, but they were all written by some Latin Authors, much later than Eusebius of Emesa (a); some of them by St. Eucherius, others by Faustus Rhedonensis, and Cæsarius of Arles, and many other French-men. Petrus Diaconus, Library-Keeper of Mount-Cassin, attributes these Homilies upon the Gospels, and upon the Feasts of the several Seasons, and of the Saints of the Year, to Brunno, Bishop of Signi; and this is confirmed by the Catalogues in the Manuscripts of the Vatican, and Mount-Cassin, where these Homilies are attributed to the same Author. They were published by Gagneus, and Printed apart, and also in the Fifth Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum at Cologne.

Eusebius Emisenus.

(a) But they were all Written by some Latin Authors, much later than Eusebius of Emesa.] The Stile is of a Latin Author that understood no Greek; and it appears by the Homilies of St. Blandina, Epiphodius, Alexander of St. Genest, that the Author was a Frenchman. There is a Sermon of St. Maximus the Second Abbot of Lerins, which mentions also St. Honoratus Abbot of Lerins, and afterwards Bishop of Arles, who lived after the Death of Eusebius of Emesa. There is also a Sermon of the Rogation-Days instituted by St. Mamertus. The Author calls himself the Disciple of St. Maximus Abbot of Lerins, which makes me believe that these Sermons belong to St. Eucherius of Lyons, under whose Name they have been printed. The Author of the Homilies about Easter opposes the Heretick Pelagius, and cites St. Gregory the Great.

BASIL of Ancyra.

Basil of Ancyra.

Basil was ordained Bishop of Ancyra, in the year 336, by the Bishops of Eusebius's Party, in the Room of Marcellus, whom they had already Deposed: He was Excommunicated, and his Ordination declared void in the Council of Sardica, but yet he continued still in the Possession of his See: He disputed against Photinus in the Council of Sirmium, in the year 351, and there confounded that Heretick. He was one of the greatest Enemies to the Arians or Anomæans, that is to say, to those that openly defended the Opinion of Arius, and maintained, that the Word was not at all like to the Father: But he was look'd upon, as the Head of that Party, which was afterwards called Semi-Arians, who refusing to acknowledge, That the Son was Consubstantial with the Father; affirmed, That he was like him in all things, and even in Substance. Basil maintained this Opinion stoutly, and caused it to be established by the Authority of a Council, which was held at Ancyra, in the year 358. He defended it at Seleucia and Constantinople, against the Intrigues of the Eudoxians and Acacians, who Deposed him in the year 360, after they had charged him with many Crimes. St. Jerome informs us, That Basil of Ancyra, wrote a Book against Marcellus his Predecessor, a Treatise of Virginity, and some other little Pieces. We have nothing of his extant; but his Conduct and Actions, discover him to have been a Man of Wit, eloquent, and well skilled in Theology. Tho' he is said to be the Head of that Party, who were called Semi-Arians, yet 'tis not certain that he was a Heretick; on the contrary, St. Basil speaks of him as a Catholick Bishop, and St. Athanasius, confesses in his Book of Synods, That Basil of Ancyra, and those of his Party, did not differ from them that professed the Consubstantiality, but only in Words; and therefore St. Hilary and Philastrius call the Bishops of the Council of Sirmium, that was held against Photinus, whereof Basil of Ancyra was the Chief, Orthodox and Holy Bishops.

Basil of Ancyra.

LIBERIUS.

Liberius.

Liberius succeeded Pope Julius in the See of Rome, in the year 352. He protests in one of his Letters, That 'twas much against his Will, that he was promoted to this Dignity. In the Fragments of St. Hilary, there is a Letter attributed to this Pope, which was written to the Bishops of the East, soon after his Elevation to the Pontificate, wherein he acquaints them, That he had sent to St. Athanasius, three Priests of the Church of Rome, Luke, Paul, and Ælianus, to cite him to Rome, that Judgment might be given about his Cause, according to the Discipline of the Church; that he had also directed another Letter to him, wherein he acquaints him, That in case he did not come to Rome, He would declare him Excommunicated from the Roman Church. He adds, That these Priests being returned, and having informed him that St. Athanasius refused to come, he had followed the Judgment that the Eastern Bishops gave against him; That he would communicate with them, and all the Bishops of the Catholick Church; That on the contrary, Athanasius was fallen from his Communion, as well as from that of the Roman Church, and from all Correspondence with it by Letters.

This is the Substance of this Letter attributed to Liberius, which would not be much for his Advantage, if it were really his: But I think, 'tis very probable, that he never wrote any such thing, and that this Epistle was forged by him that made the Collection of the Fragments of St. Hilary. For first, is it any ways credible, that Liberius should Excommunicate St. Athanasius, without any Cause, and without any Regard to the Judgment of his Predecessor, or to that of the Council of Sardica?

Secondly, the Author of this Letter says, That the Eastern Bishops had written to Julius against St. Athanasius, without mentioning the Judgment which this Pope gave in his Favour.

Thirdly, St. Athanasius never complains that Liberius had Excommunicated him before he was banished; but on the contrary, he supposes, That he was always for him, till he subscribed in the place of his Banishment.
